She seem'd a virgin of the Spartan blood,
With such array Harpalyce bestrode
Her Thracian courser.—DRYDEN.

Apparel and attire respect the quality and fashion of the thing; but array has regard to the disposition of the things with their neatness and decorum: apparel may be costly or mean; attire may be gay or shabby; but array will never be otherwise than neat or comely.

TO PLACE, DISPOSE, ORDER.

To place is to assign a place (v. Place) to a thing: to dispose is to place according to a certain rule; to order is to place in a certain order.

Things are often placed from the necessity of being placed in some way or another: they are disposed so as to appear to the best advantage.

Books are placed on a shelf or in a cupboard to be out of the way; they are disposed on shelves according to their size: chairs are placed in different parts of a room; prints are tastefully disposed round a room.

Material objects only are placed, in the proper sense of the term. Sticks are placed at certain distances for purposes of convenience; persons or things are placed in particular situations;

Our two first parents, yet the only two
Of mankind in the happy garden plac'd.—MILTON.

If I have a wish that is prominent above the rest, it is to see you placed to your satisfaction near me.—SHENSTONE. It may also be applied in the improper sense to spiritual objects.

Material or spiritual objects are disposed;

And last the reliques by themselves dispose,
Which in a brazen urn the priests enclose.
DRYDEN.

Spiritual objects only are ordered.

To dispose in the improper sense is a more partial action than to order: one disposes for particular occasions; one orders for a permanency and in complicated matters: our thoughts may be disposed to seriousness in certain cases; our thoughts and wills ought to be ordered aright at all times. An author disposes his work agreeably to the nature of his subject; a tradesman orders his business so as to do every thing in good time.

PLACE, SITUATION, STATION, POSITION, POST.

Place, in German platz, comes from platt even or open; situation, in Latin situs, comes from the Hebrew שׁוּב to put; station, from the Latin status and sto to stand, signifies the manner or place in which an object stands or is put; position, in Latin positio or positus, comes from the same source as situs.

Place is the abstract or general term that comprehends the idea of any given space that may be occupied: station is the place where one stands or is fixed: situation and position respect the object as well as the place, that is, they signify how the object is put, as well as where it is put. A place or a station may be either vacant or otherwise; a situation and a position necessarily suppose some occupied place. A place is either assigned or not assigned, known or unknown, real or supposed; 'Surely the church is a place where one day's truce ought to be allowed to the dissensions and animosities of mankind.'—BURKE. A station is a specifically assigned place;

The planets in their station listening stood.
MILTON.

We choose a place according to our convenience, and we leave it again at pleasure; but we take up our station, and hold it for a given period. One inquires for a place which is known only by name; the station is appointed for us, and is therefore easily found out. Travellers wander from place to place; soldiers have always some station.

The terms place and situation are said of objects animate or inanimate; station only of animate objects, or objects figuratively considered as such; position only of inanimate objects. A person chooses a place, a thing occupies a place, or has a place set apart for it: a station or stated place must always be assigned to each person who has to act in concert with others; 'The seditious remained within their station, which, by reason of the nastiness of the beastly multitude, might more fitly be termed a kennel than a camp.'—HAYWARD. A person chooses a situation according to his convenience; 'A situation in which I am as unknown to all the world as I am ignorant of all that passes in it would exactly suit me.'—COWPER. A situation or position is chosen for a thing to suit the convenience of an individual; the former is said of things as they stand with regard to others; the latter of things as they stand with regard to themselves. The situation of a house comprehends the nature of the place, whether on high or low ground; and also its relation to other objects, that is, whether higher or lower, nearer or more distant: the position of a window in a house is considered as to whether it is by the side or in front; the position of a book is considered as to whether it stands leaning or upright, with its face or back forward. Situation is moreover said of things that come thither of themselves; position mostly of those things that have been put there at will. The situation of some tree or rock, on some elevated place, is agreeable to be looked at, or to be looked from; 'Prince Cesarini has a palace in a pleasant situation, and set off with many beautiful walks.'—ADDISON. The faulty position of a letter in writing sometimes spoils the whole performance; 'By varying the position of my eye, and moving it nearer to or farther from the direct beam of the sun's light, the colour of the sun's reflected light constantly varied upon the speculum as it did upon my eye.'—NEWTON.

Place, situation, and station have an improper signification in respect to men in civil society, that is, either to their circumstances or actions. Post has no other sense when applied to persons. Place is as indefinite as before; it may be taken for that share which we personally have in society either generally, as when every one is said to fill a place in society; or particularly for a specific share of its business, so as to fill a place under government: situation is that kind of place which specifies either our share in its business, but with a higher import than the general term place, or a share in its gains and losses, as the prosperous or adverse situation of a man; a station is that kind of place which denotes a share in its relative consequence, power, and honour; in which sense every man holds a certain station; the post is that kind of place in which he has a specific share in the duties of society: the situation comprehends many duties; but the post includes properly one duty only; the word being figuratively employed from the post, or particular spot which a soldier is said to occupy. A clerk in a counting-house fills a place: a clergyman holds a situation by virtue of his office; 'Though this is a situation of the greatest ease and tranquillity in human life, yet this is by no means fit to be the subject of all men's petitions to God.'—ROGERS. A clergyman is in the station of a gentleman by reason of his education, as well as his situation; 'It has been my fate to be engaged in business much, and often, by the stations in which I have been placed.'—ATTERBURY. A faithful minister will always consider that his post where good is to be done; 'I will never, while I have health, be wanting to my duty in my post.'—ATTERBURY.

PLACE, SPOT, SITE.

A particular or given place is the idea common to these terms; but the former is general and indefinite, the latter specific. Place is limited to no size nor quantity, it may be large: but spot implies a very small place, such as by a figure of speech is supposed to be no larger than a spot: the term place is employed upon every occasion; the term spot is confined to very particular cases: we may often know the place in a general way where a thing is, but it is not easy after a course of years to find out the exact spot on which it has happened. The place where our Saviour was buried is to be seen and pointed out, but not the very spot where he lay;

O, how unlike the place from whence they fell!
MILTON.

My fortune leads to traverse realms alone,
And find no spot of all the world my own.

GOLDSMITH.

The site is the spot on which any thing stands or is situated; it is more commonly applied to a building or any place marked out for a specific purpose; as the site on which a camp had been formed;

Before my view appear'd a structure fair,
Its site uncertain if on earth or air.—POPE.

BACK, BACKWARD, BEHIND.

Back and backward are used only as adverbs; behind either as an adverb or a preposition. Hence we say to go back or backward, to go behind or behind the wall.

Back denotes the situation of being, and the direction of going; backward, simply the manner of going: a person stands back, who does not wish to be in the way; he goes backward, when he does not wish to turn his back to an object;

So rag'd Tydides, boundless in his ire,
Drove armies back, and made all Troy retire.
POPE.

Whence many wearied e'er they had o'erpass'd
The middle stream (for they in vain have tried)
Again return'd astounded and aghast,
No one regardful look would ever backward cast.
GILBERT WEST.

Back marks simply the situation of a place, behind the situation of one object with regard to another: a person stands back, who stands in the back part of any place; he stands behind, who has any one in the front of him: the back is opposed to the front, behind to before;

Forth flew this hated fiend, the child of Rome,
Driv'n to the verge of Albion, lingered there.
Then, with her James receding, cast behind
One angry frown, and sought more servile climes.
SHENSTONE (on Cruelty).

AFTER, BEHIND.

After respects order; behind respects position. One runs after a person, or stands behind his chair; after is used either figuratively or literally; behind is used only literally. Men hunt after amusements; misfortunes come after one another: a garden lies behind a house; a thing is concealed behind a bush;

Good after ill, and after pain delight,
Alternate, like the scenes of day and night.
DRYDEN.

He first, and close behind him followed she,
For such was Proserpine's severe decree.—DRYDEN.

UNDER, BELOW, BENEATH.

Under, like hind in behind, and the German unter, hinter, &c., are all connected with the preposition in implying the relation of enclosure; below denotes the state of being low; and beneath from the German nieder, and the Greek νέω or ἐνέω downwards, has the same original signification. It is evident, therefore, from the above, that the preposition under denotes any situation of retirement or concealment; below any situation of inferiority or lowness; and beneath, the same, only in a still greater degree. We are covered or sheltered by that which we stand under; we excel or rise above that which is below us; we look down upon that which is beneath us: we live under the protection of government; the sun disappears when it is below the horizon; we are apt to tread upon that which is altogether beneath us; 'The Jewish writers in their chronological computations often shoot under or over the truth at their pleasure.'—PRIDEAUX. 'All sublunary comforts imitate the changeableness, as well as feel the influence, of the planet they are under.'—SOUTH.

Our minds are here and there, below, above;
Nothing that's mortal can so quickly move.

DENHAM.

'How can any thing better be expected than rust and canker when men will rather dig their treasure from beneath than fetch it from above.'—SOUTH.

ABOVE, OVER, UPON, BEYOND

When an object is above another, it exceeds it in height; when it is over another, it extends along its superior surface; when it is upon another, it comes in contact with its superior surface; when it is beyond another, it lies at a greater distance. Trees frequently grow above a wall, and sometimes the branches hang over the wall or rest upon it, but they seldom stretch much beyond it;

So when with crackling flames a caldron fires,
The bubbling waters from the bottom rise,
Above the brim they force their fiery way;
Black vapours climb aloft and cloud the day.
DRYDEN.

The geese fly o'er the barn, the bees in arms
Drive headlong from their waxen cells in swarms.
DRYDEN.

As I did stand my watch upon the hill
I look'd toward Birnam, and anon mought
The wood began to move.—SHAKESPEARE
He that sees a dark and shady grove
Stays not, but looks beyond it on the sky.
HERBERT

In the figurative sense the first is mostly employed to convey the idea of superiority, the second of authority, the third of immediate influence, and the fourth of extent. Every one should be above falsehood, but particularly those who are set over others, who may have an influence on their minds beyond all calculation.

SITUATION, CONDITION, STATE, PREDICAMENT, PLIGHT, CASE.

Situation (v. Place) is said generally of objects as they respect others; condition (v. Condition) as they respect themselves. Whatever affects our property, our honour, our liberty, and the like, constitutes our situation; 'The man who has a character of his own is little changed by varying his situation.'—MRS. MONTAGUE. Whatever affects our person immediately is our condition: a person who is unable to pay a sum of money to save himself from a prison is in a bad situation: a traveller who is left in a ditch robbed and wounded is in a bad condition; 'It is indeed not easy to prescribe a successful manner of approach to the distressed or necessitous, whose condition subjects every kind of behaviour equally to miscarriage.'—JOHNSON. The situation and condition are said of that which is contingent and changeable; the state, from the Latin sto to stand, signifying the point that is stood upon, is said of that which is comparatively stable or established. A tradesman is in a good situation who is in the way of carrying on a good trade: his affairs are in a good state if he is enabled to answer every demand and to keep up his credit. Hence it is that we speak of the state of health, and the state of the mind; not the situation or condition, because the body and mind are considered as to their general frame, and not as to any relative or particular circumstances; so likewise we say a state of infancy, a state of guilt, a state of innocence, and the like; but not either a situation or a condition; 'Patience itself is one virtue by which we are prepared for that state in which evil shall be no more.'—JOHNSON.

When speaking of bodies there is the same distinction in the terms, as in regard to individuals. An army may be either in a situation, a condition, or a state. An army that is on service may be in a critical situation, with respect to the enemy and its own comparative weakness; it may be in a deplorable condition if it stand in need of provisions and necessities, an army that is at home will be in a good or bad state, according to the regulations of the commander-in-chief. Of a prince who is threatened with invasion from foreign enemies, and with a rebellion from his subjects, we should not say that his condition, but his situation, was critical. Of a prince, however, who like Alfred was obliged to fly, and to seek safety in disguise and poverty, we should speak of his hard condition: the state of a prince cannot be spoken of, but the state of his affairs and government may; hence, likewise, state may with most propriety be said of a nation: but situation seldom, unless in respect to other nations, and condition never. On the other hand, when speaking of the poor, we seldom employ the term situation, because they are seldom considered as a body in relation to other bodies: we mostly speak of their condition as better or worse, according as they have more or less of the comforts of life; and of their state as regards their moral habits.

These terms may likewise be applied to inanimate objects; and upon the same grounds, a house is in a good situation as respects the surrounding objects; it is in a good or bad condition as respects the painting, cleaning, and exterior, altogether; it is in a bad state, as respects the beams, plaster, roof, and interior structure, altogether. The hand of a watch is in a different situation every hour; the watch itself may be in a bad condition if the wheels are clogged with dirt; but in a good state if the works are altogether sound and fit for service.

Situation and condition are either permanent or temporary. The predicament, from the Latin predico to assert or declare, signifies to commit one's self by an assertion; and when applied to circumstances, it expresses a temporary embarrassed situation occasioned by an act of one's own: hence we always speak of bringing ourselves into a predicament;

The offender's life lies in the mercy
Of the duke only 'gainst all other voice,
In which predicament I say thou stand'st.

SHAKESPEARE.

Plight, contracted from the Latin plicatus, participle of plico to fold, signifies any circumstance in which one is disagreeably entangled; and case (v. Case) signifies any thing which may befall us, or into which we fall mostly, though not necessarily contrary to our inclination. Those two latter terms therefore denote a species of temporary condition; for they both express that which happens to the object itself, without reference to any other. A person is in an unpleasant situation who is shut up in a stage coach with disagreeable company. He is in an awkward predicament when attempting to please one friend he displeases another. He may be in a wretched plight if he is overturned in a stage at night, and at a distance from any habitation;

Satan beheld their plight

And to his mates thus in derision call'd.—MILTON.

He will be in evil case if he is compelled to put up with a spare and poor diet; 'Our case is like that of a traveller upon the Alps, who should fancy that the top of the next hill must end his journey, because it terminates his prospect.'—ADDISON.

CASE, CAUSE.

Case, in Latin casus, from cado to fall, chance, happen, signifies the thing falling out; cause, in French cause, Latin causa, is probably changed from case, and the Latin casus.

The case is matter of fact; the cause is matter of question: a case involves circumstances and consequences; a cause involves reasons and arguments: a case is something to be learned; a cause is something to be decided.

A case needs only to be stated; a cause must be defended: a cause may include cases, but not vice versa; in all causes that are to be tried, there are many legal cases that must be cited: 'There is a double praise due to virtue when it is lodged in a body that seems to have been prepared for the reception of vice: in many such cases the soul and body do not seem to be fellows.'—ADDISON. Whoever is interested in the cause of humanity will not be heedless of those cases of distress which are perpetually presenting themselves; 'I was myself an advocate so long, that I never mind what advocates say, but what they prove, and I can only examine proofs in causes brought before me.'—SIR WILLIAM JONES

CONDITION, STATION.

Condition, in French condition, Latin conditio, from condo to build or form, signifies properly the thing formed; and in an extended sense, the manner and circumstances under which a thing is formed; station, in French station, Latin statio, from sto to stand, signifies the standing place or point.

Condition has most relation to the circumstances, education, birth, and the like; station refers rather to the rank, occupation, or mode of life which one pursues. Riches suddenly acquired are calculated to make a man forget his original condition; 'The common charge against those who rise above their original condition, is that of pride.'—JOHNSON. 'There is nothing which men are more apt to forget than the duties of their station;' 'The last day will assign to every one a station suitable to the dignity of his character.'—ADDISON

The condition of men in reality is often so different from what it appears, that it is extremely difficult to form an estimate of what they are, or what they have been. I is the folly of the present day, that every man is unwilling to keep the station which has been assigned to him by Providence. The rage for equality destroys every just distinction in society; the low aspire to be, in appearance, at least, equal with their superiors; and those in elevated stations do not hesitate to put themselves on a level with their inferiors

TO PUT, PLACE, LAY, SET.

Put is in all probability contracted from positus, participle of pono to place; place signifies the same as in the preceding articles; lay, in Saxon legan, German legen, Latin loco, and Greek λέγωμαι, signifies to cause to lie; set, in German setzen, Latin sisto, from sto to stand, signifies to cause to stand.

Put is the most general of all these terms;

The labourer cuts

Young slips, and in the soil securely puts.—DRYDEN.

Place, lay, and set are but modes of putting; one puts, but the way of putting it is not defined; we may put a thing into one's room, one's desk, one's pocket, and the like; but to place is to put in a specific manner, and for a specific purpose; one places a book on a shelf as a fixed place for it, and in a position most suitable to it;

Then youths and virgins, twice as many, join
To place the dishes, and to serve the wine.

DRYDEN.

To lay and set are still more specific than place; the former being applied only to such things as can be made to lie;

Here some design a mole, while others there
Lay deep foundations for a theatre.—DRYDEN.

And set only to such as can be made to stand: a book may be said to be laid on the table when placed in a downward position; and set on a shelf when placed on one end; we lay ourselves down on the ground; we set a trunk upon the ground;

Ere I could Give him that parting kiss, which I had set
Between two charming words, comes in my father.

SHAKESPEARE

TO LIE, LAY.

By a vulgar error these words have been so confounded as to deserve some notice. To lie is neuter, and designates a state; to lay is active, and denotes an action on an object; it is properly to cause to lie: a thing lies on the table; some one lays it on the table: he lies with his fathers; they laid him with his fathers. In the same manner, when used idiomatically, we say, a thing lies by us until we bring it into use: we lay it by for some future purpose: we lie down in order to repose ourselves; we lay money down by way of deposit: the disorder lies in the constitution; we lay the ill treatment of others to heart: we lie with the person with whom we sleep; we lay a wager with a person when we stake our money against his; 'Ants bite off all the buds before they lay it up, and, therefore, the corn that has lain in their nests will produce nothing.'—ADDISON. 'The church admits none to holy orders without laying upon them the highest obligations imaginable.'—BEVERIDGE.

TO DISORDER, DERANGE, DISCONCERT, DISCOMPOSE.

Disorder signifies to put out of order, derange, from de and range or rank, signifies to put out of the rank in which it was placed; disconcert, to put out of the concert or harmony; discompose, to put out of a state of composure.

All these terms express the idea of putting out of order; but the three latter vary as to the mode or object of the action. The term disorder is used in a perfectly indefinite form, and might be applied to any object. As every thing may be in order, so may every thing be disordered; yet it is seldom used except in regard to such things as have been in a natural order. Derange and disconcert are employed in speaking of such things as have been put into an artificial order. To derange is to disorder that which has been systematically arranged, or put in a certain range; and to disconcert is to disorder that which has been put together by concert or contrivance: thus the body may be disordered; a man's affairs or papers deranged; a scheme disconcerted. To discompose is a species of derangement in regard to trivial matters: thus a tucker, a frill, or a cap may be discomposed. The slightest change of diet will disorder people of tender constitutions: misfortunes are apt to derange the affairs of the most prosperous: the unexpected return of a master to his home disconcerts the schemes which have been formed by the domesticks: those who are particular as to their appearance are careful not to have any part of their dress discomposed.

When applied to the mind disorder and derange are said of the intellect; disconcert and discompose of the ideas or spirits: the former denoting a permanent state; the latter a temporary or transient state. The mind is said to be disordered when the faculty of ratiocination is in any degree interrupted; 'Since devotion itself may disorder the mind, unless its heats are tempered with caution or prudence, we should be particularly careful to keep our reason as cool as possible.'—ADDISON. The intellect is said to be deranged when it is brought into a positive state of incapacity for action: persons are sometimes disordered in their minds for a time by particular occurrences, who do not become actually deranged; 'All passion implies a violent emotion of mind; of course it is apt to derange the regular course of our ideas.'—BLAIR. A person is said to be disconcerted who suddenly loses his collectedness of thinking; 'There are men whose powers operate only at leisure and in retirement; and whose intellectual vigour deserts them in conversation; whom merriment confuses, and objection disconcerts.'—JOHNSON. A person is said to be discomposed who loses his regularity of feeling;

But with the changeful temper of the skies,
As rains condense, and sunshine rarefies,
So turn the species in their alter'd minds,
Compos'd by calms, and discompos'd by winds.
DRYDEN.

A sense of shame is the most apt to disconcert: the more irritable the temper the more easily one is discomposed.

DERANGEMENT, INSANITY, LUNACY, MADNESS, MANIA.

Derangement, from the verb to derange, implies the first stage of disorder in the intellect; insanity, or unsoundness, implies positive disease, which is more or less permanent; lunacy is a violent sort of insanity, which was supposed to be influenced by the moon; madness and mania, from the Greek palvoiai to rage, implies insanity or lunacy in its most furious and confirmed stage. Deranged persons may sometimes be perfectly sensible in every thing but particular subjects. Insane persons are sometimes entirely restored. Lunatics have their lucid intervals, and maniacs their intervals of repose.

Derangement may sometimes be applied to the temporary confusion of a disturbed mind, which is not in full possession of all its faculties: madness may sometimes be the result of violently inflamed passions; and mania may be applied to any vehement attachment which takes possession of the mind; 'The locomotive mania of an Englishman circulates his person, and of course his cash, into every quarter of the kingdom.'—SUMMERLAND

MADNESS, PHRENSY, RAGE, FURY.

Madness (v. Derangement); phrensy, in Latin phrenesis, Greek φρενις from φρη the mind, signifies a disordered mind; rage, in French rage, Latin rabies; fury, in Latin furor, comes in all probability from feror to be carried, because fury carries a person away.

Madness and phrensy are used in the physical and moral sense; rage and fury only in the moral sense: in the first case, madness is a confirmed derangement in the organ of thought; phrensy is only a temporary derangement from the violence of fever: the former lies in the system, and is, in general, incurable; the latter is only occasional, and yields to the power of medicine.

In the moral sense of these terms the cause is put for the effect, that is, madness and phrensy are put for that excessive violence of passion by which they are caused; and as rage and fury are species of this passion, namely, the angry passion, they are therefore to madness and phrensy sometimes as the cause is to the effect: the former, however, are so much more violent than the latter, as they altogether destroy the reasoning faculty, which is not expressly implied in the signification of the latter terms. Moral madness differs both in degree and duration from phrensy: if it spring from the extravagance of rage, it bursts out into every conceivable extravagance, but is only transitory; if it spring from disappointed love, or any other disappointed passion, it is as permanent as direct physical madness;

'T was no false heraldry when madness drew
Her pedigree from those who too much knew.

DENHAM.

Phrensy is always temporary, but even more impetuous than madness; In the phrensy of despair men commit acts of suicide: in the phrensy of distress and grief, people are hurried into many actions fatal to themselves or others;

What phrensy, shepherd, has thy soul possessed?
DRYDEN.

Rage refers more immediately to the agitation that exists within the mind; fury refers to that which shows itself outwardly: a person contains or stifles his rage; but his fury breaks out into some external mark of violence: rage will subside of itself; fury spends itself: a person may be choked with rage; but his fury finds a vent: an enraged man may be pacified; a furious one is deaf to every remonstrance,

Desire not

To allay my rages and revenges with Your colder reasons.—SHAKESPEARE.

Rage, when applied to persons, commonly signifies highly inflamed anger; but it may be employed for inflamed passion towards any object which is specified, as a rage for music, a rage for theatrical performances, a fashionable rage for any whim of the day. Fury, though commonly signifying rage bursting out, yet may be any impetuous feeling displaying itself in extravagant action: as the Divine fury supposed to be produced upon the priestess of Apollo, by the inspiration of the god, and the Bacchanalian fury, which expression depicts the influence of wine upon the body and mind;

Confin'd their fury to those dark abodes.—DRYDEN

In the improper application, to inanimate objects, the words rage and fury preserve a similar distinction the rage of the heat denotes the excessive height to which it is risen; the fury of the winds indicates their violent commotion and turbulence: so in like manner the raging of the tempest characterizes figuratively its burning anger; and the fury of the flames marks their impetuous movements, their wild and rapid spread.

TO CONFOUND, TO CONFUSE.

Confound and confuse are both derived from different parts of the same verb, namely, confundo and its participle confusus, signifying to pour or mix together without design that which ought to be distinct.

Confound has an active sense; confuse a neuter or reflective sense: a person confounds one thing with another;

I to the tempest make the poles resound,
And the conflicting elements confound.—DRYDEN.

Subjects become confused, or a person confuses himself: it is a common error among ignorant people to confound names, and among children to have their ideas confused on commencing a new study;

A confus'd report passed through my ears;
But full of hurry, like a morning dream,
It vanished in the bus'ness of the day.—LEE.

The present age is distinguished by nothing so much as by confounding all distinctions, which is a great source of confusion in men's intercourse with each other, both in publick and private life.

CONFUSION, DISORDER.

Confusion signifies the state of being confounded or confused (v. To confound); disorder, compounded of the privative dis and order, signifies the reverse of order.

Confusion is to disorder as the species to the genus: confusion supposes the absence of all order; disorder the derangement of order: there is always disorder in confusion, but not always confusion in disorder: a routed army, or a tumultuous mob, will be in confusion and will create confusion.

Now seas and earth were in confusion lost,
A world of waters, and without a coast.

DRYDEN.

A whisper or an ill-timed motion of an individual constitutes disorder in a school, or in an army that is drawn up; 'When you behold a man's affairs through negligence and misconduct involved in disorder, you naturally conclude that his ruin approaches.'—BLAIR.

DIFFERENCE, VARIETY, DIVERSITY, MEDLEY.

Difference signifies the cause or the act of differing: variety, from various or vary, in Latin varius, probably comes from varus a speck or speckle, because this is the best emblem of variety; diversity, in Latin diversitas, comes from diverto, compounded of di and verto, signifying the quality of being asunder; medley comes from the word meddle, which is but a change from mingle, miz, &c.

Difference and variety seem to lie in the things themselves; diversity and medley are created either by accident or design: a difference may lie in two objects only; a variety cannot exist without an assemblage: a difference is discovered by means of a comparison which the mind forms of objects to prevent confusion; variety strikes on the mind, and pleases the imagination with many agreeable images; it is opposed to dull uniformity: the acute observer traces differences, however minute, in the objects of his research, and by this means is enabled to class them under their general or particular heads; 'Where the faith of the Holy Church is one, a difference between customs of the church doth no harm.'—HOOKER. * Nature affords such an infinite variety in every thing which exists, that if we do not perceive it, the fault is in ourselves; 'Homer does not only outshine all other poets in the variety, but also in the novelty, of his characters.'—ADDISON. Diversity arises from an assemblage of objects naturally contrasted; 'The goodness of the Supreme Being is no less seen in the diversity, than in the multitude of living creatures.'—ADDISON. A medley is produced by an assemblage of objects so ill suited as to produce a ludicrous effect; 'What unnatural motions and counterferments must such a medley of intemperance produce in the body?'—ADDISON.

Diversity exists in the tastes or opinions of men; a medley is produced by the concurrence of such tastes or opinions as can in no wise coalesce: where the minds of men are disengaged from the control of authority, there will be a great diversity of opinions; where a number of men come together with different habits, we may expect to find a medley of characters; good taste may render a diversity of colour agreeable to the eye; caprice or bad taste will be apt to form a ridiculous medley of colours and ornaments. A variety of sounds heard at a suitable distance in the stillness of the evening, will have an agreeable effect on the ear; a medley of noises, whether heard near or at a distance, must always be harsh and offensive.

DIFFERENCE, DISTINCTION.

Difference (v. Difference) lies in the thing; distinction (v. To abstract) is the act of the person; the former is, therefore, to the latter as the cause to the effect; the distinction rests on the difference; those are equally bad logicians who make a distinction without a difference, or who make no distinction where there is a difference. Sometimes distinction is put for the ground of distinction, which brings it nearer in sense to difference, in which case the former is a species of the latter: a difference is either external or internal; a distinction is always external: we have differences in character, and distinctions in dress: the difference between profession and practice, though very considerable, is often lost sight of by the professors of Christianity; in the sight of God, there is no rank or distinction that will screen a man from the consequences of unrepented sins;

O son of Tydeus, cease! be wise, and see
How vast the diff'rence of the gods and thee.

POPE.

'When I was got into this way of thinking, I presently grew conceited of the argument, and was just preparing to write a letter of advice to a member of parliament, for opening the freedom of our towns and trades for taking away all manner of distinctions between the natives and foreigners.'—STEELE.

DIFFERENT, DISTINCT, SEPARATE.

Difference (v. To differ, vary) is opposed to similitude; there is no difference between objects absolutely alike: distinctness (v. To abstract) is opposed to identity; there can be no distinction where there is only one and the same being: separation is opposed to unity; there can be no separation between objects that coalesce or adhere: things may be different and not distinct, or distinct and not different: different is said altogether of the internal properties of things; distinct is said of things as objects of vision, or as they appear either to the eye or the mind: when two or more things are seen only as one, they may be different, but they are not distinct; but whatever is seen as two or more things, each complete in itself, is distinct, although it may not be different: two roads are said to be different which run in different directions, but they may not be distinct when seen on a map: on the other hand, two roads are said to be distinct when they are observed as two roads to run in the same direction, but they need not in any particular to be different: two stars of different magnitudes may, in certain directions, appear as one, in which case they are different, but not distinct; two books on the same subject, and by the same author, but not written in continuation of each other, are distinct books, but not different;

No hostile arms approach your happy ground;
Far diff'rent is my fate.—DRYDEN.

What is separate must in its nature be generally distinct; but every thing is not separate which is distinct: when houses are separate they are obviously distinct; but they may frequently be distinct when they are not positively separated: the distinct is marked out by some external sign, which determines its beginning and its end; the separate is that which is set apart, and to be seen by itself: distinct is a term used only in determining the singularity or plurality of objects; the separate only in regard to their proximity or to distance from each other; we speak of having a distinct household, but of living in separate apartments; of dividing one's subject into distinct heads or of making things into separate parcels: the body and soul are different, inasmuch as they have different properties; they are distinct inasmuch as they have marks by which they may be distinguished, and at death they will be separate;

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Difference, diversité, variété, bigarrure."

His sep'rate troops let every leader call,
Each strengthen each, and all encourage all;
What chief or soldier of the num'rous band,
Or bravely fights or ill obeys command,
When thus distinct they war, soon shall be known.
POPE.

DIFFERENT, SEVERAL, DIVERS, SUNDRY, VARIOUS.

All these terms are employed to mark a number (v. To differ, vary): but different is the most indefinite of all these terms, as its office is rather to define the quality than the number, and is equally applicable to few and many; it is opposed to singularity, but the other terms are employed positively to express many. Several, from to sever, signifies split or made into many; they may be either different or alike: there may be several different things, or several things alike; but there cannot be several divers things, for the word divers signifies properly many different. Sundry, from asunder or apart, signifies many things scattered or at a distance, whether as it regards time or space. Various expresses not only a greater number, but a greater diversity than all the rest.

The same thing often affects different persons *different*ly: an individual may be affected several times in the same way; or particular persons may be affected at sundry times and in divers manners; the ways in which men are affected are so various as not to admit of enumeration: it is not so much to understand different languages as to understand several different languages; 'It is astonishing to consider the different degrees of care that descend from the parent to the young, so far as is absolutely necessary for the leaving a posterity.'—ADDISON. 'The bishop has several courts under him, and may visit at pleasure every part of his diocese.'—BLACKSTONE. Divers modes have been suggested and tried for the good education of youth, but most of too theoretical a nature to admit of being reduced successfully to practice; 'In the frame and constitution of the ecclesiastical polity, there are divers ranks and degrees.'—BLACKSTONE. An incorrect writer omits sundry articles that belong to a statement;

Fat olives of sundry sorts appear,
Of sundry shapes their unctuous berries bear.
DRYDEN.

We need not wonder at the misery which is introduced into families by extravagance and luxury, when we notice the infinitely various allurements for spending money which are held out to the young and the thoughtless; 'As land is improved by sowing it with various seeds, so is the mind by exercising it with different studies.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny).

DIFFERENT, UNLIKE.

Different is positive, unlike is negative: we look at what is different, and draw a comparison; but that which is unlike needs no comparison: a thing is said to be different from every other thing, or unlike to any thing seen before; which latter mode of expression obviously conveys less to the mind than the former; 'How different is the view of past life in the man who is grown old in knowledge and wisdom from that of him who is grown old in ignorance and folly.'—ADDISON.

How far unlike those chiefs of race divine,
How vast the difference of their deeds and mine.
POPE.

TO CHANGE, ALTER, VARY.

Change, in French changer, is probably derived from the middle Latin cambio to exchange, signifying to take one thing for another; alter, from the Latin alter another, signifies to make a thing otherwise; vary, in Latin vario to make various, comes in all probability from varius a spot or speckle, which destroys uniformity of appearance in any surface.

We change a thing by putting another in its place; we alter a thing by making it different from what it was before; we vary it by altering it in different manners and at different times. We change our clothes whenever we put on others: the tailor alters clothes which are found not to fit; and he varies the fashion of making them whenever he makes new. A man changes his habits, alters his conduct, and varies his manner of speaking and thinking, according to circumstances; 'The general remedy of those who are uneasy without knowing the cause is change of place.'—JOHNSON.

All things are but alter'd, nothing dies:
And here and there th' unbodied spirit flies;
By time, or force, or sickness, disposess'd,
And lodges, where it lights, in man or beast.

DRYDEN.

'In every work of the imagination, the disposition of parts, the insertion of incidents, and use of decorations, may be varied a thousand ways with equal propriety.'—JOHNSON.

A thing is changed without altering its kind; it is altered without destroying its identity; and it is varied without destroying the similarity. We change our habitation, but it still remains a habitation; we alter our house, but it still remains the same house; we vary the manner of painting and decoration, but it may strongly resemble the manner in which it has been before executed.

CHANGE, VARIATION, VICISSITUDE.

Change (v. To change, alter) is both to vicissitude and variation as the genus to the species. Every variation or vicissitude is a change, but every change is not a variation or vicissitude; vicissitude, in French vicissitude, Latin vicissitudo, from vicissim by turns, signifies changing alternately.

Change consists simply in ceasing to be the same: variation consists in being different at different times; vicissitude in being alternately or reciprocally different and the same. All created things are liable to change; old things pass away, all things become new: the humours of men, like the elements, are exposed to perpetual variations: human affairs, like the seasons, are subject to frequent vicissitudes.

Changes in governments or families are seldom attended with any good effect; 'How strangely are the opinions of men altered by a change in their condition.'—BLAIR. Variations in the state of the atmosphere are indicated by the barometer or thermometer; 'One of the company affirmed to us he had actually enclosed the liquor, found in a coquette's heart, in a small tube made after the manner of a weather-glass; but that instead of acquainting him with the variations of the atmosphere, it showed him the qualities of those persons who entered the room where it stood.'—ADDISON. Vicissitudes of a painful nature are less dangerous than those which elevate men to an unusual state of grandeur. By the former they are brought to a sense of themselves; by the latter they are carried beyond themselves;

It makes through heaven
Grateful vicissitude, like day and night.

VARIATION, VARIETY.

Variation denotes the act of varying (v. To change); variety denotes the quality of varying, or the thing varied. The astronomer observes the variations in the heavens; the philosopher observes the variations in the climate from year to year; 'The idea of variation (as a constituent in beauty), without attending so accurately to the manner of variation, has led Mr. Hogarth to consider angular figures as beautiful.'—BURKE. Variety is pleasing to all persons, but to none so much as the young and the fickle: there is an infinite variety in every species of objects animate or inanimate; 'As to the colours usually found in beautiful bodies, it may be difficult to ascertain them, because in the several parts of nature there is an infinite variety.'—BURKE.

INDISTINCT, CONFUSED

Indistinct is negative; it marks simply the want of distinctness; confused is positive; it marks a positive degree of indistinctness. A thing may be indistinct without being confused; but it cannot be confused without being indistinct: two things may be indistinct, or not easily distinguished from each other; but many things, or parts of the same things, are confused: two letters in a word may be indistinct; but the whole writings or many words are confused; sounds are indistinct which reach our ears only in part; but they are confused if they come in great numbers and out of all order. We see objects indistinctly when we cannot see all the features by which they would be distinguished from all objects; 'When a volume of travels is opened, nothing is found but such general accounts as leave no distinct idea behind them.'—JOHNSON. We see an object confusedly when every part is so blended with the other that no one feature can be distinguished; 'He that enters a town at night and surveys it in the morning, then hastens to another place, may please himself for a time with a hasty change of scene and a confused remembrance of palaces and churches.'—JOHNSON. By means of great distance objects become indistinct; from a defect in sight objects become more confused.

TO MIX, MINGLE, BLEND, CONFOUND.

Mix is in German mischen, Latin misceo, Greek μίσγω, Hebrew מִשַׁךְ; mingle, in Greek μυγνύω, is but a variation of mix; blend, in German blenden to dazzle, comes from blind, signifying to see confusedly, or confuse objects in a general way; confound, (v. Confound).

Mix is here a general and indefinite term, signifying simply to put together: but we may mix two or several things; we mingle several objects: things are mixed so as to lose all distinction; but they may be mingled and yet retain a distinction: liquids mix so as to become one, and individuals mix in a crowd so as to be lost;

Can imagination boast,
Amid its gay creation, hues like hers,
Or can it mix them with that matchless skill,
And lose them in each other?—THOMSON

Things are mingled together of different sizes if they lie in the same spot, but they may still be distinguished;

There as I pass'd with careless steps and slow,
The mingling notes came soften'd from below.
GOLDSMITH.

To blend is only partially to mix, as colours blend which fall into each other: to confound is to mix in a wrong way, as objects of sight are confounded when they are erroneously taken to be joined.

To mix and mingle are mostly applied to material objects, except in poetry: to blend and confound are mental operations, and principally employed on spiritual subjects: thus, events and circumstances are blended together in a narrative;

But happy they! the happiest of their kind,
Whom gentler stars unite, and in one fate
Their hearts, their fortunes, and their beings blend.
THOMSON.

The ideas of the ignorant are confounded in most cases, but particularly when they attempt to think for themselves;

And long the gods, we know,
Have grudg'd thee, Cæsar, to the world below,
Where fraud and rapine, right and wrong, confound.
DRYDEN.

MIXTURE, MEDLEY, MISCELLANY.

Mixture is the thing mixed (v. To mix); medley, from meddle or middle, signifies what comes between another; miscellany, in Latin miscellaneus, from misceo to mix, signifies also a mixture.

The mixture is general; whatever objects can be mixed will form a mixture; a medley is a mixture of things not fit to be mixed: and a miscellany is a mixture of many different things. Flour, water, and eggs may form a mixture, in the proper sense; but if to these were added all sorts of spices, it would form a medley; 'In great villanies, there is often such a mixture of the fool, as quite spoils the whole project of the knave.'—SOUTH.

More oft in fools' and madmen's hands than sages,
She seems a medley of all ages.—SWIFT.

Miscellany is a species of mixture applicable only to intellectual subjects: the miscellaneous is opposed to that which is systematically arranged: essays are miscellaneous in distinction from works on one particular subject; 'A writer, whose design is so comprehensive and miscellaneous as that of an essayist, may accommodate himself with a topic from every scene of life.'—JOHNSON.

PROMISCUOUS, INDISCRIMINATE.

Promiscuous, in Latin promiscuus, from promisceo or pro and misceo to mingle, signifies thoroughly mingled; indiscriminate, from the Latin in privative and discrimen a difference, signifies without any difference.

Promiscuous is applied to any number of different objects mixed together;

Victors and vanquish'd join promiscuous cries
POPE.

Indiscriminate is only applied to the action in which one does not discriminate different objects: a multitude is termed promiscuous, as characterizing the thing; the use of different things for the same purpose, or of the same things for different purposes, is termed indiscriminate, as characterizing the person: things become promiscuous by the want of design in any one; they are indiscriminate by the fault of any one: plants of all descriptions are to be found promiscuously situated in the beds of a garden: it is folly to level any charge indiscriminately against all the members of any community or profession; 'From this indiscriminate distribution of misery, moralists have always derived one of their strongest moral arguments for a future state.'—JOHNSON.

IRREGULAR, DISORDERLY, INORDINATE, INTEMPERATE.

Irregular, that is literally not regular, marks merely the absence of a good quality; disorderly, that is, literally out of order, marks the presence of a positively bad quality. What is irregular may be so from the nature of the thing; what is disorderly is rendered so by some external circumstance. Things are planted irregularly for want of design: the best troops are apt to be disorderly in a long march. Irregular and disorderly are taken in a moral as well as a natural sense; inordinate, which signifies also put out of order, is employed only in the moral sense. What is irregular is contrary to the rule that is established, or ought to be; what is disorderly is contrary to the order that has existed; what is inordinate is contrary to the order that is prescribed; what is intemperate is contrary to the temper or spirit that ought to be encouraged. Our habits are irregular which are not conformable to the laws of social society; 'In youth there is a certain irregularity and agitation by no means unbecoming.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny). Our practices will be disorderly when we follow the blind impulse of passion; 'The minds of bad men are disorderly.'—BLAIR. Our desires will be inordinate when they are not under the control of reason guided by religion; 'Inordinate passions are the great disturbers of life.'—BLAIR. Our indulgencies will be intemperate when we consult nothing but our appetites; 'Persuade but the covetous man not to deify his money, the intemperate man to abandon his revels, and I dare undertake all their giant-like objections shall vanish.'—SOUTH. Young people are apt to contract irregular habits if not placed under the care of discreet and sober people, and made to conform to the regulations of domestic life: children are naturally prone to become disorderly, if not perpetually under the eye of a master: it is the lot of human beings in all ages and stations to have inordinate desires, which require a constant check so as to prevent intemperate conduct of any kind.

SEQUEL, CLOSE.

Sequel is a species of close; it is that which follows by way of termination; but the close is simply that which closes, or puts an end to anything. There cannot be a sequel without a close, but there may be a close without a sequel. A story may have either a sequel or a close; when the end is detached from the beginning so as to follow, it is a sequel; if the beginning and end are uninterrupted, it is simply a close.

When a work is published in distinct parts, those which follow at the end may be termed the sequel: if it appears all at once, the concluding pages are the close. The same distinction between these words is preserved in their figurative application;

If black scandal or foul-fac'd reproach
Attend the sequel of your imposition,
Your meer enforcement shall acquaintance me.
SHAKESPEARE.

Speedy death,
The close of all my miseries, and the balm.
MILTON.

TO END, CLOSE, TERMINATE.

To bring any thing to its last point is the common idea in the signification of these terms.

To end is the simple action of putting an end to, without any collateral idea; it is therefore the generic term. To close is to end gradually, or by shutting in, hence we speak of closing the rear, or of a scene closing;

Orestes, Acamas, in front appear,
And Enomaus and Thoon close the rear.—POPE.

To terminate is to end in a specific manner, hence we speak with propriety of a road or a line terminating; 'As I had a mind to know how each of these roads terminated, I joined myself with the assembly that were in the flower and vigour of their age, and called themselves the band of lovers.'—ADDISON. They preserve this distinction in the moral application. There are persons even in civilized countries so ignorant as, like the brutes, to end their lives as they began them, without one rational reflection;

Greece in her single heroes strove in vain,
Now hosts oppose thee, and thou must be slain:
So shall my days in one sad tenour run,
And end with sorrows as they first begun.—POPE.

The Christian closes his career of active duty only with the failure of his bodily powers;

One frugal supper did our studies close.—DRYDEN.

A person ends a dispute, or puts an end to it, by yielding the subject of contest; he terminates the dispute by entering into a compromise; 'The wisdom of this world, its designs and efficacy, terminate on this side heaven.'—SOUTH.

END, EXTREMITY.

Both these words imply the last of those parts which constitute a thing; but the end designates that part generally; the extremity marks the particular point. The extremity is from the Latin extremus the very last end, that which is outermost. Hence the end may be said of that which bounds any thing; but extremity of that which extends farthest from us: we may speak of the ends of that which is circular in its form, or of that which has no specific form;

Now with full force the yielding horn he bends,
Drawn to an arch, and joins the doubling ends.—POPE.

We speak of the extremities of that only which is supposed to project lengthwise; 'Our female projectors were all the last summer so taken up with the improvement of their petticoats, that they had not time to attend to any thing else; but having at length sufficiently adorned their lower parts, they now begin to turn their thoughts upon the other extremity.'—ADDISON.

The end is opposed to the beginning; the extremity to the centre or point from which we reckon. When a man is said to go to the end of a journey or to the end of the world, the expression is in both cases indefinite and general; but when he is said to go to the extremities of the earth or the extremities of a kingdom, the idea of relative distance is manifestly implied.

He who goes to the end of a path may possibly have a little farther to go in order to reach the extremity. In the figurative application end and extremity differ so widely as not to render any comparison needful.

EXTREMITY, EXTREME.

Extremity is used in the proper or the improper sense; extreme in the improper sense: we speak of the extremity of a line or an avenue, the extremity of distress, but the extreme of the fashion.

In the moral sense, extremity is applicable to the outward circumstances; extreme to the opinions and conduct of men: in matters of dispute between individuals it is a happy thing to guard against coming to extremities; 'Savage suffered the utmost extremities of poverty, and often fasted so long that he was seized with faintness.'—JOHNSON. It is the characteristic of volatile tempers to be always in extremes, either the extreme of joy or the extreme of sorrow; 'The two extremes to be guarded against are despotism, where all are slaves, and anarchy, where all would rule and none obey.'—BLAIR.

CLOSE, COMPACT.

Close, in French clos, comes from the Latin clausus participle of claudo to shut; compact, in Latin compactus, participle of compingo to fix or join, signifies jointed close together.

Proximity is expressed by both these terms; the former in a general and the latter in a restricted sense. Two bodies may be close to each other, but a body is compact with regard to itself.

Contact is not essential to constitute closeness; but a perfect adhesion of all the parts of a body is essential to produce compactness. Lines are close to each other that are separated but by a small space;

To right and left the martial wings display
Their shining arms, and stand in close array;
Though weak their spears, though dwarfish be their height,

Compact they move, the bulwark of the fight.
SIR WM. JONES.

Things are rolled together in a compact form that are brought within the smallest possible space; 'Without attraction the dissevered particles of the chaos could never convene into such great compact masses as the planets.'—BENTLEY.

CLOSE, NEAR, NIGH.

Close signifies the same as in the preceding article; near and nigh are in Saxon near, neah, German, nah, &c.

Close is more definite than near: houses stand close to each other which are almost joined; men stand close when they touch each other;

Th' unwearied watch their listening leaders keep,
And couching close, repel invading sleep.—POPE.

Objects are near which are within sight; persons are near each other when they can converse together. Near and nigh, which are but variations of each other, in etymology, admit of little or no difference in their use; the former however is the most general. People live near each other who are in the same street; they live close to each other when their houses are adjoining;

O friend! Ulysses' shouts invade my ear;
Distress'd he seems, and no assistance near.—POPE.

From the red field their scatter'd bodies bear,
And nigh the fleet a funeral structure rear.—POPE.

Close is annexed as an adjective; near is employed only as an adverb or preposition. We speak of close ranks or close lines; but not near ranks or near lines.

STRAIT, NARROW.

Strait, which is otherwise spelled straight, from the Latin strictus bound, signifies bound tight, that is, brought into a small compass: narrow, which is a variation of near, expresses a mode of nearness or closeness. Strait is a particular term; narrow is general: straitness is an artificial mode of narrowness; a coat is strait which is made to compress the body within a small compass: narrow is either the artificial or the natural property of a body; as a narrow ribbon, or a narrow leaf.

That which is strait is so by the means of other bodies; that which is so of itself, as a piece of water confined close on each side by land, is called a strait; 'They are afraid to meet her if they have missed the church; but then they are more afraid to see her if they are laced as strait as they can possibly be.'

LAW. Whatever is bounded by sides that are near each other is narrow; thus a piece of land whose prolonged sides are at a small distance from each other is narrow;

No narrow frith
He had to pass.—MILTON.

The same distinction applies to these terms in their moral use: a person in straitened circumstances is kept, by means of his circumstances, from incurring even necessary expenses; a person who is in narrow circumstances is represented as having but a small extent of property.

DISTANT, FAR, REMOTE.

Distant is employed as an adjunct or otherwise; far is used only as an adverb. We speak of distant objects, or objects being distant; but we speak of things only as being far.

Distant, in Latin distans compounded of di and stans standing asunder, is employed only for bodies at rest; far, in German fern, most probably from gefahren, participle of fahren, in Greek πόσειν to go, signifies gone or removed away, and is employed for bodies either stationary or otherwise; hence we say that a thing is distant, or it goes, runs, or flies far.

Distant is used to designate great space; far only that which is ordinary: the sun is ninety-four millions of miles distant from the earth; a person lives not very far off, or a person is far from the spot.

Distant is used absolutely to express an intervening space. Remote, in Latin remotus, participle of removere to remove, rather expresses the relative idea of being gone out of sight. A person is said to live in a distant country or in a remote corner of any country.

These terms bear a similar analogy in the figurative application; when we speak of a remote idea it designates that which is less liable to strike the mind than a distant idea. A distant relationship between individuals is never altogether lost sight of; when the connection between objects is very remote it easily escapes observation; 'It is a pretty saying of Thales, "Falsehood is just as far distant from truth as the ears from the eyes," by which he would intimate that a wise man would not easily give credit to the reports of actions which he has not seen.'—SPECTATOR.

O might a parent's careful wish prevail,
Far, far from Iliion should thy vessels sail,
And thou from camps remote the danger shun,
Which now, alas! too nearly threatens my son.

POPE.

SHORT, BRIEF, CONCISE, SUCCINCT, SUMMARY.

Short, in French court, German kurz, Latin curtus, Greek κῆρτος; brief, in Latin brevis, in Greek βραχὺς; concise, in Latin concisus, signifies cut into a small body; succinct, in Latin succinctus, participle of sucingo, signifies brought within a small compass, summary, v. Abridgement.

Short is the generic, the rest are specific terms: every thing which admits of dimensions may be short, as opposed to the long, that is, either naturally or artificially; the rest are species of artificial shortness, or that which is the work of art: hence it is that material, as well as spiritual, objects may be termed short; but the brief, concise, succinct, and summary, are intellectual or spiritual only. We may term a stick, a letter, or a discourse, short; 'The widest excursions of the mind are made by short flights frequently repeated.'—JOHNSON. We speak of brevity only in regard to the mode of speech; 'Premeditation of thought, and brevity of expression, are the great ingredients of that reverence that is required to a pious and acceptable prayer.'—SOUTH. Conciseness and succinctness apply to the matter of speech; 'Aristotle has a dry conciseness, that makes one imagine one is perusing a table of contents.'—GRAY.

Let all your precepts be succinct and clear,
That ready wits may comprehend them soon.

ROSCOMMON.

Summary regards the mode either of speaking or action;

Nor spend their time to show their reading,
She'd have a summary proceeding.—SWIFT

The brief is opposed to the prolix; the concise and succinct to the diffuse; the summary to the circumstantial or ceremonious. It is a matter of comparatively little importance whether a man's life be long or short; but it deeply concerns him that every moment be well spent. Brevity of expression ought to be consulted by speakers, even more than by writers; conciseness is of peculiar advantage in the formation of rules for young persons; and succinctness is a requisite in every writer, who has extensive materials to digest: a summary mode of proceeding may have the advantage of saving time, but it has the disadvantage of incorrectness, and often of injustice.

TO CLOSE, SHUT.

Close is to make close; shut is in Saxon scuttan, Dutch schutten, Hebrew  to stop up.

Close is to shut, frequently as the means to the end. To close signifies simply to put together; to shut signifies to put together so close that no opening is left. The eyes are shut by closing the eyelids; the mouth is shut by closing the lips. The idea of bringing near or joining is prominent in the signification of close; that of fastening or preventing admittance in the word shut. By the figure of metonymy, close may be often substituted for shut; as we may speak of closing the eyes or the mouth; closing a book or a door in the sense of shutting, particularly in poetry;

Soon shall the sire Seraglio's horrid gates

Close like the eternal bars of death upon thee.

JOHNSON

On the other hand, the poets may sometimes use shut where close would be more appropriate;

Behold, fond man!

See here thy pictur'd life: pass some few years
Thy flowering spring, thy summer's ardent strength,
Thy sober autumn fading into age,
And pale conclud'g winter comes at last,
And shuts the scene.—THOMSON.

In ordinary discourse, however, these words are very distinct.

Many things are closed which are not to be shut, and are shut which cannot be closed. Nothing can be closed but what consists of more than one part; nothing can be shut but what has or is supposed to have a cavity. A wound is closed, but cannot be shut; a window or a box is shut, but not closed.

When both are applied to hollow bodies, close implies a stopping up of the whole, shut an occasional stoppage at the entrance. What is closed remains closed; what is shut may be opened. A hole in a road, or a passage through any place is closed; a gate, a window, or a door, is shut.

TO CLOSE, FINISH, CONCLUDE.

To close signifies literally to make close, or bring as near together as they ought to be, and in an extended sense, to bring things to the point where they ought to end; to finish, from the Latin finis an end, and conclude, from con and cludo or claudo to shut, have the same general and literal meaning as close.

To close is to bring to an end; to finish is to make an end: we close a thing by ceasing to have any thing more to do with it; we finish it by really having no more to do to it. We close an account with a person with whom we mean to have no farther transactions; we finish the business which we have begun.

It is sometimes necessary to close without finishing, but we cannot finish without closing. The want of time will compel a person to close his letter before he has finished saying all he wishes. It is a laudable desire in every one to wish to close his career in life honourably, and to finish whatever he undertakes to the satisfaction of himself and others.

To conclude is a species of finishing, that is to say, finishing in a certain manner; we always finish when we conclude, but we do not always conclude when we finish. A history is closed at a certain reign; it is finished when brought to the period proposed; it is concluded with a recapitulation of the leading events.

Close and finish are employed generally, and in the ordinary transactions of life; the former in speaking of times, seasons, periods, &c. the latter with regard to occupations and pursuits; conclusion is used particularly in speaking of moral and intellectual operations. A reign, an entertainment, an age, a year, may have its close; a drawing, an exercise, a piece of work, may be finished; a discourse, a story, an affair, a negotiation may be concluded. The close of Alfred's reign was more peaceful than the commencement: those who are careful as to what they begin will be careful to finish what they have begun: some preachers seldom awaken attention in their hearers until they come to the conclusion of their discourse;

Destruction hangs on every word we speak,
On every thought, till the concluding stroke
Determines all, and closes our design.

ADDISON.

The great work of which Justinian has the credit, although it comprehends the whole system of jurisprudence, was finished, we are told, in three years."—SIR WM. JONES.

COMPLETE, PERFECT, FINISHED.

Complete, in French complet, Latin completus, participle of compleo to fill up, signifies the quality of being filled, or having all that is necessary; perfect, in Latin perfectus, participle of perficio to perform or do thoroughly, signifies the state of being done thoroughly; finished marks the state of being finished (v. To close).

That is complete which has no deficiency: that is perfect which has positive excellence; and that is finished which has no omission in it.

That to which any thing can be added is incomplete; when it can be improved it is imperfect; when more labour ought to be bestowed upon it it is unfinished. A thing is complete in all its parts; 'With us the reading of the Scripture is a part of our church liturgy, a special portion of the service which we do to God, and not an exercise to spend the time, when one doth wait for another coming, till the assembly of them that shall afterward worship him be complete.'

—HOOKER. A thing is perfect as to the beauty and design of the construction; 'It has been observed of children, that they are longer before they can pronounce perfect sounds, because perfect sounds are not pronounced to them.'—HAWKSWORTH. We count those things perfect which want nothing requisite for the end, whereto they are instituted.'—HOOKER. A thing is finished as it comes from the hand of the workman, and answers his intention. A set of books is not complete when a volume is wanting: there is nothing in the proper sense perfect which is the work of man; but the term is used relatively for whatever makes the greatest approach to perfection: a finished performance evinces care and diligence on the part of the workman; 'I would make what bears your name as finished as my last work ought to be; that is more perfect than the rest.'—POPE. A taste is said to be perfect to denote its intrinsic excellence, but it is said so be finished to denote its acquired excellence: 'It is necessary for a man who would form to himself a finished taste of good writing, to be well versed in the works of the best critics, ancient and modern.'—ADDISON.

A thing may be complete or finished without being perfect: and it may be perfect without being either complete or finished. A sound is said to be perfect, but not complete or finished. The works of the ancients are, as they have been handed down to us, incomplete, and some probably unfinished; and yet the greater part are perfect in their way: the works of the moderns are mostly complete and finished; yet but a small part have any claims even to human perfection. The term complete may be applied in a bad as well as good sense: a complete knave implies one who is versed in every part of knavery;

None better guard against a cheat,
Than he who is a knave complete.—LEWIS.

TO COMPLETE, FINISH, TERMINATE.

Complete is to make complete; finish and terminate have been explained in the preceding article v. To end.

We *complete what is undertaken by continuing to labour at it; we finish what is begun in a state of forwardness by putting the last hand to it; we terminate what ought not to last by bringing it to a close. So that the characteristic idea of completing is the conducting of a thing to its final period; that of finishing, the arrival at that period; and that of terminating, the cessation of a thing.

Completing has properly relation to permanent works only, whether mechanical or intellectual. We desire a thing to be completed from a curiosity to see it in its entire state; 'It is perhaps kindly provided by nature, that as the feathers and strength of a bird grow together, and her wings are not completed till she is able to fly, so some proportion should be preserved in the human kind between judgement and courage.'—JOHNSON. To finish is employed for passing occupations; we wish a thing finished from an anxiety to proceed to something else, or a dislike to the thing in which we are engaged; 'The artificer, for the manufacture which he finishes in a day, receives a certain sum; but the wit frequently gains no advantage from a performance at which he has toiled many months.'

—HAWKSWORTH. Terminating respects discussions, differences, and disputes. Light minds undertake many things without completing any. Children and unsteady people set about many things without finishing any. Litigious people terminate one dispute only to commence another.

CONSUMMATION, COMPLETION.

Consummation, Latin consummatio, compounded of con and summa the sum, signifies the summing or winding up of the whole—the putting a final period to any concern; completion signifies either the act of completing, or the state of being completed (v. To complete).

The arrival at a conclusion is comprehended in both these terms, but they differ principally in application; wishes are consummated; plans are completed: we often flatter ourselves that the completion of all our plans will be the consummation of all our wishes, and thus expose ourselves to grievous disappointments: the consummation of the nuptial ceremony is not always the consummation of hopes and joys: it is frequently the beginning of misery and disappointment; 'It is not to be doubted but it was a constant practice of all that is praiseworthy, which made her capable of beholding death, not as the dissolution but the consummation of life.'—STEELE. We often sacrifice much to the completion of a purpose which we afterward find not worth the labour of attaining; 'He makes it the utmost completion of an ill character to bear a malevolence to the best of men.'—POPE.

As epithets, consummate is employed only in a bad sense, and complete either in a good or bad sense: those who are regarded as complete fools are not unfrequently consummate knaves: the theatre is not the only place for witnessing a farce; human life affords many of various descriptions; among the number of which we may reckon those as complete in their kind which are acted at elections, where consummate folly and consummate hypocrisy are practised by turns.

RIPE, MATURE.

Ripe is the English, mature the Latin word; the former has a universal application, both proper and improper; the latter has mostly an improper application. The idea of completion in growth is simply designated by the former term; the idea of moral perfection, as far at least as it is attainable, is marked by the latter: fruit is ripe when it requires no more sustenance from the parent stock; a judgement is mature which requires no more time and knowledge to render it perfect or fitted for exercise: in the same manner a project may be said to be ripe for execution, or a people ripe for revolt;

So to his crowne, she him restor'd againe,
In which he dyde, made ripe for death by eld
SPENSER

On the contrary, reflection may be said to be mature to which sufficiency of time has been given, and age

* Vide Girard; "Achever, finir, terminer" may be said to be mature which has attained the highest pitch of perfection;

Th' Athenian sage, revolving in his mind
This weakness, blindness, madness of mankind,
Foretold that in maturer days, though late
When time should ripen the decrees of fate,
Some god would light us.—JENYNS.

Ripeness is however not always a good quality; but maturity is always a perfection: the ripeness of some fruit diminishes the excellence of its flavour; there are some fruits which have no flavour until they come to maturity.

WHOLE, ENTIRE, COMPLETE, TOTAL, INTEGRAL.

Whole excludes subtraction; entire excludes division; complete excludes deficiency: a whole orange has had nothing taken from it; an entire orange is not yet cut; and a complete orange is grown to its full size. It is possible, therefore, for a thing to be whole and not entire; and to be both, and yet not complete: an orange cut into parts is whole while all the parts remain together, but it is not entire. Hence we speak of a whole house, an entire set, and a complete book. The wholeness or integrity of a thing is destroyed at one's pleasure; the completeness depends upon circumstances.

Total denotes the aggregate of the parts; whole the junction of all the parts: the former is, therefore, employed more in the moral sense to convey the idea of extent, and the latter mostly in the proper sense. Hence we speak of the total destruction of the whole city, or of some particular houses; the total amount of expenses; the whole expense of the war. Whole and total may in this manner be employed to denote things as well as qualities: in regard to material substances wholes are always opposed to the parts of which they are composed; the total is the collected sum of the parts: and the integral is the same as the integral number.

The first four may likewise be employed as adverbs; but wholly is a more familiar term than totally in expressing the idea of extent; entirely is the same as undividedly; completely is the same as perfectly, without anything wanting. We are wholly or totally ignorant of the affair; we are entirely at the disposal or service of another; we are completely at variance in our accounts.

All these terms, except the last, are applied to moral objects with a similar distinction;

And all so forming an harmonious whole.

THOMSON.

'The entire conquest of the passions is so difficult a work, that they who despair of it should think of a less difficult task, and only attempt to regulate them.'

—STEELE.

And oft, when unobserv'd,
Steal from the barn a straw, till soft and warm,
Clean and complete, their habitation grows.

THOMSON.

Nothing under a total thorough change in the convert will suffice.—SOUTH.

GROSS, TOTAL.

Gross is connected with the word great: from the idea of size which enters into the original meaning of this term is derived that of quantity: total, from the Latin totus, signifies literally the whole. The gross implies that from which nothing has been taken: the total signifies that to which nothing need be added: the gross sum includes every thing without regard to what it may be: the total includes every thing which one wishes to include: we may, therefore, deduct from the gross that which does not immediately belong to it; but the total is that which admits of no deduction. The gross weight in trade is applicable to any article, the whole of which, good or bad, pure or dross, is included in opposition to the neat weight; the total amount supposes all to be included which ought to form a part, in opposition to any smaller amounts or subdivisions; when employed in the improper sense, they preserve the same distinction: things are said to be taken or considered in the gross, that is, in the large and comprehensive way, one with another. 'I have more than once found fault with those general reflections which strike at kingdoms or commonwealths in the gross.'—ADDISON. Things are said to undergo a total change; 'Nature is either collected into one total, or diffused and distributed.'—BACON.

TO ACCOMPLISH, EFFECT, EXECUTE, ACHIEVE.

Accomplish, in French accomplir, is compounded of the intensive syllable ac or ad and complir, in Latin compleo to complete, signifying to complete to the end: effect, in Latin effectus, participle of efficio, compounded of ef and ex out of or up, and facio to make, signifies to make up until nothing remains to be done: execute, in Latin executus, participle of exequor, compounded of ex and equor or sequor to follow, signifies to follow up or carry through to the end; achieve, in French achever, from chef a chief, signifies to perform as a chief, or perfectly.

We accomplish an object, effect a purpose, execute a project, achieve an enterprise. Perseverance is requisite for accomplishing, means for effecting, abilities for executing, and spirit for achieving. Some persons are always striving to attain an end without ever accomplishing what they propose; 'It is the first rule in oratory that a man must appear such as he would persuade others to be; and that can be accomplished only by the force of his life.'—SWIFT. It is the part of wisdom to suit the means to the end when we have any scheme to effect; 'Reason considers the motive, the means, and the end; and honours courage only when it is employed to effect the purpose of virtue.'

HAWKSWORTH. Those who are readiest in forming projects are not always the fittest for carrying them into execution; 'We are not to indulge our corporeal appetites with pleasures that impair our intellectual vigour, nor gratify our minds with schemes which we know our lives must fail in attempting to execute.'—JOHNSON. That ardour of character which impels to the achievement of arduous undertakings belongs but to very few; 'It is more than probable, that in case our freethinkers could once achieve their glorious design of sinking the credit of the Christian religion, and causing the revenues to be withdrawn which their wiser forefathers had appointed to the support and encouragement of its teachers, in a little time the Shaster would be as intelligible as the Greek Testament.'—BERKELEY.

We should never give up what we have the least chance of accomplishing, if it be worth the labour; nor pursue any plan which affords us no prospect of effecting what we wish; nor undertake what we do not feel ourselves competent to execute, particularly when there is any thing extraordinary to achieve. The friends of humanity exerted their utmost endeavours in behalf of the enslaved Africans, and after many years' noble struggle at length accomplished their wishes as far as respects Great Britain, by obtaining a legislative enactment against the slave trade; but they have not yet been able to effect the total abolition of this nefarious traffick: the vices of individuals still interfere with the due execution of the laws of their country: yet this triumph of humanity, as far as it has been successful, exceeds in greatness the boldest achievements of antiquity.

ACCOMPLISHED,* PERFECT.

These epithets express an assemblage of all the qualities suitable to the subject; and mark the qualification in the highest degree. Accomplished refers only to the artificial refinements of the mind; perfect is said of things in general, whether natural or artificial, mental and corporeal.

An acquaintance with modern languages and the ornamental branches of the arts and sciences constitutes a person accomplished; 'For who expects that, under a tutor, a young gentleman should be an accomplished public orator or logician.'—LOCKE. The highest possible degree of skill in any art constitutes a man a perfect artist;

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Accompli, parfait"

Within a ken our army lies,
Our men more perfect in the use of arms.
SHAKESPEARE.

An accomplished man needs no moral endowment to entitle him to the name; 'The English nation in the time of Shakspeare was yet struggling to emerge from barbarity; and to be able to read and write was an accomplishment still valued for its rarity.'—JOHNSON. A perfect man, if such a one there could be, must be free from every moral imperfection, and endowed with every virtue; 'A man endowed with great perfections, without good breeding, is like one who has his pocket full of gold, but always wants change for his ordinary occasions.'—STEELE. Accomplished is applied only to persons; perfect is applicable not only to persons but to works, and every thing else as occasion requires; it may likewise be employed in a bad sense to magnify any unfavourable quality.

QUALIFICATION, ACCOMPLISHMENT.

The qualification serves the purpose of utility; the accomplishment serves to adorn: by the first we are enabled to make ourselves useful; by the second we are enabled to make ourselves agreeable.

The qualifications of a man who has an office to perform must be considered: of a man who has only pleasure to pursue the accomplishments are to be considered. A readiness with one's pen, and a facility at accounts, are necessary qualifications either for a school or a counting-house; 'The companion of an evening, and the companion for life, require very different qualifications.'—JOHNSON. Drawing is one of the most agreeable and suitable accomplishments that can be given to a young person; 'Where nature bestows genius, education will give accomplishments.'—CUMBERLAND.

TO FULFIL, ACCOMPLISH, REALIZE.

To fulfil is literally to fill quite full, that is, to bring about full to the wishes of a person; accomplish (v. To accomplish) is to bring to perfection, but without reference to the wishes of any one; to realize is to make real, namely, whatever has been aimed at. The application of these terms is evident from their explanations: the wishes, the expectations, the intentions, and promises of an individual, are appropriately said to be fulfilled; national projects, or undertakings, prophecies, and whatever is of general interest, are said to be accomplished: the fortune, or the prospects of an individual, or whatever results successfully from specific efforts, is said to be realized: the fulfilment of wishes may be as much the effect of good fortune as of design; 'The palsied dotard looks round him, perceives himself to be alone; he has survived his friends, and he wishes to follow them; his wish is fulfilled; he drops torpid and insensible into that gulf which is deeper than the grave.'—HAWKESWORTH. The accomplishment of projects mostly results from extraordinary exertion, as the accomplishment of prophecies results from a miraculous exertion of power: 'God bless you, sweet boy! and accomplish the joyful hope I conceived of you.'—SIR PHILIP SIDNEY. The realization of hopes results more commonly from the slow process of moderate well-combined efforts than from any thing extraordinary; 'After my fancy had been busied in attempting to realize the scenes that Shakspeare drew, I regretted that the labour was ineffectual.'—HAWKESWORTH.

TO KEEP, OBSERVE, FULFIL.

These terms are synonymous in the moral sense of abiding by, and carrying into execution, what is prescribed or set before one for his rule of conduct: to keep (v. To keep) is simply to have by one in such manner that it shall not depart; to observe, from the Latin observo, i. e. ob and servo to keep in one's view, is to keep with a steady attention; to fulfil (v. To accomplish) is to keep to the end or to the full intent. A day is either kept or observed; yet the former is not only a more familiar term, but it likewise implies a much less solemn act than the latter; one must add, therefore, the mode in which it is kept, by saying that it is kept holy, kept sacred or kept as a day of pleasure; the term observe, however, implies always that it is kept religiously: we may keep, but we do not observe a birth-day; we keep or observe the Sabbath.

To keep marks simply perseverance or continuance in a thing; a man keeps his word if he do not depart from it;

It is a great sin to swear unto a sin,

But greater sin to keep a sinful oath.—SHAKESPEARE

To observe marks fidelity and consideration; we observe a rule when we are careful to be guided by it; 'I doubt whether any of our authors have yet been able for twenty lines together, nicely to observe the true definition of easy poetry.'—JOHNSON. To fulfil marks the perfection and consummation of that which one has kept; we fulfil a promise by acting in strict conformity to it; 'You might have seen this poor child arrived at an age to fulfil all your hopes, and then you might have lost him.'—GRAY.

A person is said to keep the law when he does not commit any violent breach of it; he observes every minutia in the law, if he is anxious to show himself a good citizen; by this conduct he fulfils the intentions of the legislator: St. Paul recommends to Christians to keep the faith, which they can never do effectually, unless they observe all the precepts of our Saviour, and thereby fulfil the law: children may keep silence when they are desired; but it is seldom in their power to observe it as a rule, because they have not sufficient understanding.

TO EXECUTE, FULFIL, PERFORM

To execute (v. To accomplish) is more than to fulfil and to fulfil than to perform, which signifies to form thoroughly or make complete. To execute is to bring about an end; it involves active measures, and is peculiarly applicable to that which is extraordinary, or that which requires particular spirit and talents; schemes of ambition are executed, and great designs are executed;

Why delays

His hand to execute what his decree
Fix'd on this day?—MILTON.

To fulfil is to satisfy a moral obligation; it is applicable to those duties in which rectitude and equity are involved; we fulfil the duties of citizens, but one may also fulfil purposes good or bad;

To whom the white-arm'd goddess thus replies

Enough thou know'st the tyrant of the skies,

Severely bent his purpose to fulfil,

Unmov'd his mind, and unrestrain'd his will.—POPE

To perform is to carry through by simple action or labour; it is more particularly applicable to the ordinary and regular business of life; we perform a work or an office:

When those who round the wasted fires remain,

Perform the last sad office to the slain.—DRYDEN.

One executes according to the intentions of others; the soldier executes the orders of his general; the merchant executes the commissions of his correspondent; 'He casts into the balance the promise of a reward to such as should execute, and of punishment to such as should neglect, their commission.'—SOUTH. One fulfils according to the wishes and expectations of others; it is the part of an honest man to enter into no engagements which he cannot fulfil; it is the part of a dutiful son, by diligence and assiduity, to endeavour to fulfil the expectations of an anxious parent;

If on my wounded breast thou drop'st a tear,
Think for whose sake my breast that wound did bear,
And faithfully my last desires fulfil,
As I perform my cruel father's will.

One performs according to circumstances, what suits one's own convenience and purposes; every good man is anxious to perform his part in life with credit and advantage to himself and others; 'He effectually performed his part with great integrity, learning, and acuteness; with the exactness of a scholar, and the judgement of a complete divine.'—WATERLAND.

TO EFFECT, PRODUCE, PERFORM.

The two latter are in reality included in the former; what is effected is both produced and performed; but what is produced or performed is not always effected; effect (v. Accomplish) signifies to make out any thing; produce, from the Latin produco, signifies literally to draw forth; perform, compounded of per and form, signifies to form thoroughly or carry through.

To produce signifies to bring something forth or into existence; to perform, to do something to the end; to effect is to produce by performing; whatever is effected is the consequence of a specific design; it always requires therefore a conscious agent to effect;

The united powers of hell are joined together for the destruction of mankind, which they effected in part.—ADDISON. What is produced may follow incidentally, or arise from the action of an irrational agent or an inanimate object; 'Though prudence does in a great measure produce our good or ill fortune, there are many unforeseen occurrences which pervert the finest schemes that can be laid by human wisdom.'—ADDISON. What is performed is done by specific efforts; it is therefore like what is effected, the consequence of design, and requires a rational agent; 'Where there is a power to perform, God does not accept the will.'—SOUTH.

Effect respects both the end and the means by which it is brought about; we speak of the object to be effected, and the way of effecting it: produce has a particular reference to the end or the thing produced; perform to the means or to the course pursued. No person ought to calculate on effecting a reformation in the morals of men, without the aid of religion. Small changes in society often produce great evils. The performance of a person's duty is estimated according as it is faithful or otherwise.

To effect is said of that which emanates from the mind of the agent himself; to perform, of that which is marked out by rule, or prescribed by another. We effect a purpose; we perform a part, a duty, or office. A true Christian is always happy when he can effect a reconciliation between parties who are at variance: it is a laudable ambition to strive to perform one's part creditably in society.

EFFECTIVE, EFFICIENT, EFFECTUAL, EFFICACIOUS.

Effective signifies capable of effecting; efficient signifies literally effecting; effectual and efficacious signify having the effect, or possessing the power to effect. The former two are used only in regard to physical objects, the latter two in regard to moral objects. An army or a military force is effective; 'I should suspend my congratulations on the new liberties of France, until I was informed how it had been combined with government, with the discipline of the armies, and the collection of an effective revenue.'—BURKE. A cause is efficient; 'No searcher has yet found the efficient cause of sleep.'—JOHNSON. A remedy or cure is effectual; 'Nothing so effectually deadens the taste of the sublime, as that which is light and radiant.'—BURKE. A medicine is efficacious, and in the moral sense motives or measures are termed efficacious.

The end or result is effectual, the means are efficacious. No effectual stop can be put to the vices of the lower orders, while they have a vicious example from their superiors; 'Sometimes the sight of the altar, and decent preparations for devotion, may compose and recover the wandering mind more effectually than a sermon.'—SOUTH. A seasonable exercise of severity on an offender is often very efficacious in quelling a spirit of insubordination. When a thing is not found effectual, it is requisite to have recourse to farther measures; that which has been proved to be inefficacious should never be adopted; 'He who labours to lessen the dignity of human nature, destroys many efficacious motives for practising worthy actions.'—WARTON.

VAIN, INEFFECTUAL, FRUITLESS.

Vain, v. Idle; ineffectual, that is, not effectual (v. Effective); fruitless, that is, without fruit, signifies not producing the desired fruit of one's labour.

These epithets are all applied to our endeavours; but the term vain is the most general and indefinite; the other terms are particular and definite. What we aim at, as well as what we strive for, may be vain; but ineffectual and fruitless refer only to the termination of our labours. When the object aimed at is general in its import, it is common to term the endeavour vain when it cannot attain this object. It is vain to attempt to reform a person's character until he is convinced that he stands in need of reformation;

Vain is the force of man
To crush the pillars which the piles sustain.

DRYDEN.

Nature aloud calls out for balmy rest,
But all in vain.—GENTLEMAN.

When the means employed are inadequate for the attainment of the particular end, it is usual to call the endeavour ineffectual; cool arguments will be ineffectual in convincing any one inflamed with a particular passion;

Thou thyself with scorn
And anger would resent the offer'd wrong,
Though ineffectual found.—MILTON.

When labour is specifically employed for the attainment of a particular object, it is usual to term it fruitless if it fail: peace-makers will often find themselves in this condition, that their labours will be rendered fruitless by the violent passions of angry opponents; 'After many fruitless overtures, the Inca, despairing of any cordial union with a Spaniard, attacked him by surprise with a numerous body.'—ROBERTSON.

EFFECT, CONSEQUENCE, RESULT, ISSUE, EVENT.

Effect signifies that which is effected or produced by an operating cause; consequence, in French consequence, Latin consequentia, from consequor to follow, signifies that which follows in connexion with something else; result, in French resulte, Latin resulto or resultus and resilio to rebound, signifies that which springs or bounds back from another thing; event has the same signification as given under the head of Accident; issue signifies that which issues or flows out of another thing.

Effect and consequence agree in expressing that which follows any thing, but the former marks what follows from a connexion between the two objects; the term consequence is not thus limited: an effect is that which necessarily flows out of the cause, between which the connexion is so intimate that we cannot think of the one without the other. In the nature of things, causes will have effects; and for every effect there will be a cause: a consequence, on the other hand, may be either casual or natural; it is that on which we cannot calculate. Effect applies either to physical or moral objects, consequence only to moral subjects.

There are many diseases which are the effects of mere intemperance: an imprudent step in one's first setting out in life is often attended with fatal consequences. A mild answer has the effect of turning away wrath; 'A passion for praise produces very good effects.'—ADDISON. The loss of character is the general consequence of an irregular life; 'Were it possible for anything in the Christian faith to be erroneous, I can find no ill consequences in adhering to it.'—ADDISON.

Consequences flow of themselves from the nature of things; results are drawn. Consequences proceed from actions in general; results proceed from particular efforts and attempts. Consequences are good or bad; 'Jealousy often draws after it a fatal train of consequences.'—ADDISON. Results are successful or unsuccessful; 'The state of the world is continually changing, and none can tell the result of the next vicissitude.'—JOHNSON.

We endeavour to avert consequences which threaten to be bad; we endeavour to produce results that are according to our wishes. Not to foresee the consequences which are foreseen by others, evinces a more than ordinary share of indiscretion and infatuation. To calculate on a favourable result from an ill-judged and ill-executed enterprise, only proves a consistent blindness in the projector.

The term event respects great undertakings; issues particular efforts; consequence respects every thing which can produce a consequence. Hence we speak of the event of a war; the issue of a negotiation; and the consequences of either. The measures of government are often unjustly praised or blamed according to the event; 'It has always been the practice of mankind to judge of actions by the events.'—JOHNSON. The fate of a nation sometimes hangs on the issue of a battle; 'A mild, unruffled, self-possessing mind is a blessing more important to real felicity than all that can be gained by the triumphant issue of some violent contest.'—BLAIR. The conquest of a nation is one of the consequences which follow the defeat of its armies; 'Henley in one of his advertisements had mentioned Pope's treatment of Savage; this was supposed by Pope to be the consequence of a complaint made by Savage to Henley, and was therefore mentioned by him with much resentment.'—JOHNSON. We must be prepared for events, which are frequently above our control: we must exert ourselves to bring about a favourable issue: address and activity will go far towards ensuring success: but if after all our efforts we still fail, it is our duty to submit with patient resignation to the consequences.

TO ARISE, PROCEED, ISSUE, SPRING, FLOW, EMANATE.

Arise in its original meaning signifies to go upwards (v. To arise), but is here taken in the sense of coming out from; proceed, in Latin procedo, that is pre and cedo to go, signifies to go forth; issue, in French issue, comes from the Latin isse or visse, infinite of eo, and the Hebrew נָסַח to go out; spring, in German springen, comes from rinnen to run like water, and is connected with the Greek ῥέειν to pour out; flow, in Saxon fleowan, Low German flogan, High German fließen, Latin fluo, &c., all from the Greek ῥέω or ῥέω, which is an onomatopoeia expressing the murmur of waters; emanate, in Latin emanatus, participle of emano, compounded of mano to flow, from the Hebrew מֵי and Chaldee מֵי waters, expressing the motion of waters.

The idea of one object coming out of another is expressed by all these terms, but they differ in the circumstances of the action. What comes up out of a body and rises into existence is said to arise, as the mist which rises or arises out of the sea;

From roots hard hazels, and from scions rise
Tall ash, and taller oak that mates the skies.

DRYDEN.

What comes forth as it were gradually into observation is said to proceed;

Teach me the various labours of the moon,
And whence proceed the eclipses of the sun.

DRYDEN.

Thus the light proceeds from a certain quarter of the heavens, or from a certain part of a house: what comes out from a small aperture is said to issue; thus perspiration issues through the pores of the skin; water issues sometimes from the sides of rocks: what comes out in a sudden or quick manner, or comes from some remote source, is said to spring; thus blood springs from an artery which is pricked; water springs up out of the earth: what comes out in quantities or in a stream is said to flow; thus blood flows from a wound; to emanate is a species of flowing by a natural operation, when bodies send forth, or seem to send forth, particles of their own composition from themselves; thus light emanates from the sun.

This distinction in the signification of these terms is kept up in their moral acceptation, where the idea of one thing originating from another is common to them all; but in this case arise is a general term, which simply implies the coming into existence; but proceed conveys also the idea of a progressive movement into existence. Every object therefore may be said to arise out of whatever produces it; but it proceeds from it only when it is gradually produced: evils are continually arising in human society for which there is no specific remedy; 'The greatest misfortunes men fall into arise from themselves.'—STEELE. In complicated disorders it is not always possible to say precisely from what the complaint of the patient proceeds;

But whence proceed these hopes, or whence this dread,
If nothing really can affect the dead?—JENYNS.

Issue is seldom used but in application to sensible objects; yet we may say, in conformity to the original meaning, that words issue from the mouth;

As when some huntsman with a flying spear
From the blind thicket wounds a stately deer,
Down his cleft side while fresh the blood distils,
He bounds aloft and scuds from hills to hills,
Till life's warm vapour issuing through the wound
Wild mountain wolves the fainting beast surround.

POPE.

'Providence is the great sanctuary to the afflicted who maintain their integrity: and often there has issued from this sanctuary the most seasonable relief.'—BLAIR. The idea of the distant source or origin is kept up in the moral application of the term spring, when we say that actions spring from a generous or corrupt principle;

All from utility this law approve,
As every private bliss must spring from social love.

JENYNS.

The idea of a quantity and a stream is preserved in the moral use of the terms flow and emanate; but the former may be said of that which is not inherent in the body: the latter respects that only which forms a component part of the body: God is the spring whence all our blessings flow: all authority emanates from God, who is the supreme source of all things: theologians, when speaking of God, say that the Son emanates from the Father, and the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son, and that grace flows upon us incessantly from the inexhaustible treasures of Divine mercy; 'As light and heat flow from the sun as their centre, so bliss and joy flow from the Deity.'—BLAIR. 'As in the next world so in this, the only solid blessings are owing to the goodness of the mind, not the extent of the capacity; friendship here is an emanation from the same source as beatitude there'.

POPE.

TO RISE, ISSUE, EMERGE.

To rise (v. To arise) may either refer to open or enclosed spaces; issue (v. To arise) and emerge, in Latin emerge to rise out of, have both a reference to some confined body: a thing may either rise in a body, without a body, or out of a body; but they issue and emerge out of a body. A thing may either rise in a plain or a wood; it issues out of a wood: it may either rise in water or out of the water; it emerges from the water; that which rises out of a thing comes into view by becoming higher: in this manner an air balloon might rise out of a wood;

Ye mists and exhalations that now rise,
In honour to the world's great author rise.

MILTON.

That which issues comes out in a line with the object; horsemen issue from a wood; and that which issues comes from the very depths of it, and comes as it were out as a part of it; 'Does not the earth quit scores with all the elements in the noble fruits and productions that issue from it?'—SOUTH. That which emerges proceeds from the thing in which it has been, as it were, concealed;

Let earth dissolve, yon ponderous orbs descend,
And grind us into dust, the soul is safe,
The man emerges.—YOUNG.

Hence in a moral or extended application, a person is said to rise in life without a reference to his former condition; but he emerges from obscurity: colour rises in the face; but words issue from the mouth

OFFSPRING, PROGENY, ISSUE.

Offspring is that which springs off or from: progeny that which is brought forth or out of; issue that which issues or proceeds from; and all in relation to the family or generation of the human species. Offspring is a familiar term applicable to one or many children, progeny is employed only as a collective noun for a number; issue is used in an indefinite manner without particular regard to number. When we speak of the children themselves, we denominate them the offspring; 'The same cause that has drawn the hatred of God and man upon the father of liars may justly entail it upon his offspring too'—SOUTH. When we speak of the parents, we denominate the children their progeny;

The base, degen'rate iron offspring ends,
A golden progeny from Heav'n descends.

DRYDEN.

A child is said to be the only offspring of his parents, or he is said to be the offspring of low parents; a man is said to have a numerous or a healthy progeny, or to leave his progeny in circumstances of 'honour and prosperity. The issue is said only in regard to a man that is deceased: he dies with male or female issue; with or without issue; his property descends to his male issue in a direct line;

Next him King Leyr, in happy place long reigned,
But had no issue male him to succeed.—SPENSER.

ORIGIN ORIGINAL, BEGINNING, RISE, SOURCE.

Origin or original both come from the Latin orior to rise: the former designating the abstract property of rising; the latter the thing that is risen. The origin is said only of things that rise; the original is said of those which give an origin to another: the origin serves to date the existence of a thing; the original serves to show the author of a thing, and is opposed to the copy. The origin of the world is described in the first chapter of Genesis; Adam was the original from whom all the human race has sprung;

And had his better half, his bride,
Carv'd from th' original, his side.—BUTLER.

The origin has respect to the cause; the beginning to the period of existence: every thing owes its existence to the origin; it dates its existence from the beginning; there cannot be an origin without a beginning; but there may be a beginning where we do not speak of an origin. We look to the origin of a thing in order to learn its nature; 'Christianity explains the origin of all the disorders which at present take place on earth.'—BLAIR. We look to the beginning in order to learn its duration or other circumstances;

But wit and weaving had the same beginning,
Pallas first taught in poetry and spinning.—SWIFT.

When we have discovered the origin of a quarrel, we are in a fair way of becoming acquainted with the aggressors; when we trace a quarrel to the beginning, we may easily ascertain how long it has lasted.

The origin and the rise are both employed for the primary state of existence; but the latter is a much more familiar term than the former: we speak of the origin of an empire, the origin of a family, the origin of a dispute, and the like; but we say that a river takes its rise from a certain mountain, that certain disorders take their rise from particular circumstances which happen in early life: it is moreover observable that the origin is confined solely to the first commencement of a thing's existence; but the rise comprehends its gradual progress in the first stages of its existence; 'The friendship which is to be practised or expected by common mortals must take its rise from mutual pleasure.'—JOHNSON. The origin of the noblest families is in the first instance sometimes ignoble; the largest rivers take their rise in small streams. We look to the origin as to the cause of existence: we look to the rise as to the situation in which the thing commences to exist, or the process by which it grows up into existence. It is in vain to attempt to search the origin of evil, unless as we find it explained in the word of God. Evil diseases take their rise in certain parts of the body, and after lying for some time dormant, break out in after-life.

The origin and rise are said of only one subject; the source is said of that which produces a succession of objects: the origin of evil in general has given rise to much speculation; the love of pleasure is the source of incalculable mischiefs to individuals, as well as to society at large;

Famous Greece,
That source of art and cultivated thought
Which they to Rome, and Romans hither brought.
WALLER.

The origin exists but once; the source is lasting;
One source of the sublime is infinity.—BURKE. The origin of every family is to be traced to our first parent, Adam: we have a never-failing source of consolation in religion.

TO BEGIN, COMMENCE, ENTER UPON.

Begin, in German beginnen, is compounded of b and ginnen, probably a frequentative of gehen to go, signifying to go first to a thing; commence, in French commencer, is not improbably derived from the Latin commendo, signifying to betake one's self to a thing; enter, in Latin intro within, signifies, with the preposition upon, to go into a thing.

Begin and commence are so strictly allied in signification, that it is not easy to discover the difference in their application; although a minute difference does exist. To begin respects the order of time; 'When beginning to act your part, what can be of greater moment than to regulate your plan of conduct with the most serious attention?'—BLAIR. To commence implies the exertion of setting about a thing; 'By the destination of his Creator, and the necessities of his nature, man commences at once an active, not merely a contemplative, being.'—BLAIR. Whoever begins a dispute is termed the aggressor; no one should commence a dispute unless he can calculate the consequences, and as this is impracticable, it is better never to commence disputes, particularly such as are to be decided by law. Begin is opposed to end: commence to complete: a person begins a thing with a view of ending it; he commences a thing with a view of completing it.

To begin is either transitive or intransitive; to commence is mostly transitive: a speaker begins by apologizing; he commences his speech with an apology; happiness frequently ends where prosperity begins; whoever commences any undertaking, without estimating his own power, must not expect to succeed.

To begin is used either for things or persons; to commence for persons only: all things have their beginning; in order to effect any thing, we must make a commencement: a word begins with a particular letter, or a line begins with a particular word; a person commences his career. Lastly, begin is more colloquial than commence: thus we say, to begin the work; to commence the operation; to begin one's play; to commence the pursuit; to begin to write; to commence the letter.

To commence and enter upon are as closely allied in sense as the former words; they differ principally in application: to commence seems rather to denote the making an experiment;

If wit so much from ignorance undergo,
Ah! let not learning too commence its foe!

POPE.

To enter upon, that of first doing what has not been tried before: we commence an undertaking; 'If any man has a mind to enter upon such a voluntary abstinence, it might not be improper to give him the caution of Pythagoras, in particular: Abstine a fabis, that is, say the interpreters, "meddle not with elections."—ADDISON. We enter upon an employment; speculating people are very ready to commence schemes, considerate people are always averse to entering upon any office, until they feel themselves fully adequate to discharge its duties.

TO MAKE, FORM, PRODUCE, CREATE.

The idea of giving birth to a thing is common to all these terms, which vary in the circumstances of the action: to make (v. To make) is the most general and unqualified term; to form signifies to give a form to a thing, that is, to make it after a given form (v. Form); to produce (v. To effect) is to bring forth into the light to call into existence; to create (v. To cause) is to bring into existence by an absolute exercise of power to make is the simplest action of all, and comprehend a simple combination by the smallest efforts; to form requires care and attention, and greater efforts; to produce requires time, and also labour: whatever is put together so as to become another thing, is made: a chair or a table is made: whatever is put into any distinct form is formed; the potter forms the clay into an earthen vessel: whatever emanates from a thing, so as to become a distinct object, is produced; fire is often produced by the violent friction of two pieces of wood with each other. The process of making is always performed by some conscious agent, who employs either mechanical means, or the simple exercise of power, a bird makes its nest; man makes various things, by the exercise of his understanding and his limbs; the Almighty Maker has made every thing by his word. The process of forming does not always require a conscious agent; things are likewise formed of themselves; or they are formed by the active operations of other bodies; melted lead, when thrown into water, will form itself into globules and masses of various shapes; hard substances are formed in the human body which give rise to the disease termed the gravel. What is produced is oftener produced by the process of nature, than by any express design; the earth produces all kinds of vegetables from seed; animals, by a similar process, produce their young. Create, in this natural sense of the term, is employed as the act of an intelligent being, and that of the Supreme Being only; it is the act of making by a simple effort of power, without the use of materials, and without any process.

They are all employed in the moral sense, and with a similar distinction: make is indefinite; we may make a thing that is difficult or easy, simple or complex; we may make a letter, or make a poem; we may make a word, or make a contract; 'In every treaty those concessions which he (Charles I.) thought he could not maintain, he never could by any motive or persuasion be induced to make.'—HUME. To form is the work either of intelligence, or of circumstances; education has much to do in forming the habits, but nature has more to do in forming the disposition and the mind altogether; sentiments are frequently formed by young people before they have sufficient maturity of thought and knowledge to justify them in coming to any decision; 'Homer's and Virgil's heroes do not form a resolution without the conduct and direction of some deity.'—ADDISON. To produce is the effect of great mental exertion; or it is the natural operation of things: no industry could ever produce a poem or a work of the imagination; but a history or a work of science may be produced by the force of mere labour. All things, both in the moral and intellectual world, are linked together upon the simple principle of cause and effect, by which one thing is the producer, and the other the thing produced: quarrels produce hatred, and kindness produces love; as heat produces inflammation and fever, or disease produces death; 'A supernatural effect is that which is above any natural power, that we know of, to produce.'—TILLOTSON. Since genius is a spark of the Divine power that acts by its own independent agency, the property of creation has been figuratively ascribed to it: the creative power of the human mind is a faint emblem of that power which brought every thing into existence out of nothing.

A wondrous hieroglyphic robe she wore,
In which all colours and all figures were,
That nature or that fancy can create.—COWLEY.

FORM, FIGURE, CONFORMATION.

Form, in French forme, Latin forma, most probably from φύσσει and φύσσει to bear, signifies properly the image borne or stamped; figure (v. Figure) signifies the image feigned or conceived; conformation, in French conformation, in Latin conformatio, from conform, signifies the image disposed or put together.

* Form is the generic term; figure and conformation are special terms. The form is the work either of nature or art; it results from the arrangement of the parts; the figure is the work of design: it includes the general contour or outline: the conformation includes such a disposition of the parts of a body as is adapted for performing certain functions. Form is the property of every substance; and the artificial form approaches nearest to perfection, as it is most natural;

Matter, as wise logicians say,
Cannot without a form subsist,
And form, say I as well as they,
Must fail if matter brings no grist.—SWIFT.

* Vide Girard: "Facon, figure, forme, conformation."

The figure is the fruit of the imagination; it is the representation of the actual form that belongs to things; it is more or less just as it approaches to the form of the thing itself; 'When Cæsar was one of the masters of the Roman mint, he placed the figure of an elephant upon the reverse of the publick money; the word Cæsar signifying an elephant in the Punick language.'—ADDISON. Conformation is said only with regard to animal bodies; nature renders it more or less suitable according to the accidental occurrence of physical causes; 'As the conformation of their organs are nearly the same in all men, so the manner of perceiving external objects is in all men the same.'—BURKE. The erect form of man is one of the distinguishing marks of his superiority over every other terrestrial being: the human figure when well painted is an object of admiration: the turn of the mind is doubtless influenced by the conformation of the bodily organs. A person's form is said to be handsome or ugly, common or uncommon; his figure to be correct or incorrect; a conformation to be good or bad. Heathens have worshipped the Deity under various forms; mathematical figures are the only true figures with which we are acquainted: the craniologist affects to judge of characters by the conformation of the skull.

Form and figure are used in a moral application, although conformation is not.

We speak of adopting a form of faith, a form of words, a form of godliness;

O ceremony! show me but thy worth,
Art thou aught else but place, degree, and form,
Creating fear and awe in other men?

SHAKESPEARE.

We speak of cutting a showy, a dismal, or ridiculous figure; 'Those who make the greatest figure in most arts and sciences are universally allowed to be of the British nation.'—ADDISON. Form may also sometimes be taken for the person who presents the form;

Lo, in the deep recesses of the wood,
Before my eyes a beauteous form appears;
A virgin's dress, and modest looks, she wears.

WYNN.

The word figure is also used in a similar manner.

TO FORM, FASHION, MOULD, SHAPE.

To form is to put into a form, which is here as be fore (v. Form) the generic term: to fashion is to put into a particular or distinct form; to mould is to put into a set form: to shape is to form simply as it respects the exterior. As every thing receives a form when it receives existence, to form conveys the idea of producing; 'Horace was intimate with a prince of the greatest goodness and humanity imaginable; and his court was formed after his example.'—STEELE. When we wish to represent a thing as formed in any distinct or remarkable way, we may speak of it as fashioned: 'By the best information that I could get of this matter, I am apt to think that this prodigious pile was fashioned into the shape it now bears by several tools and instruments, of which they have a wonderful variety in this country.'—ADDISON. God formed man out of the dust of the ground; he fashioned him after his own image. When we wish to represent a thing as formed according to a precise rule, we should say it was moulded; thus the habits of a man are moulded at the will of a superior;

How dare you, mother, endless date demand,
For vessels moulded by a mortal hand?—DRYDEN.

When we wish to represent a thing as receiving the accidental qualities which distinguish it from others, we talk of shaping it: the potter shapes the clay; the milliner shapes the bonnet; a man shapes his actions to the humours of another; 'Those nature hath shaped with a great head, narrow breast, and shoulders sticking out, seem much inclined to a consumption.'—HARVEY.

Nature has formed all animated beings with an instinctive desire of self-preservation. Creatures fashioned like ourselves with flesh and blood cannot attain to the perfection of spiritual beings. It is supposed by some that the human mind may be moulded upon the principles of art at the will of the instructor, with the same ease that wax may be shaped into the figure of a bird, a beast, or a man, at the pleasure of the artist. This is however true only in part.

TO FORM, COMPOSE, CONSTITUTE.

Form (v. Form, figure) signifies to give a form; compose has the same signification as given under the head To compose, settle; and constitute that given under the head of To constitute.

Form is a generic and indefinite term. To compose and constitute are modes of forming. These words may be employed either to designate modes of action, or to characterize things. Things may be formed either by persons or things; they are composed and constituted only by conscious agents: thus persons form things, or things form one another: thus we form a circle, or the reflection of the light after rain forms a rainbow. Persons compose and constitute: thus a musician composes a piece of music, or men constitute laws. Form in regard to persons is the act of the will and determination;

The liquid ore he drained
Into fit molds prepar'd; from which he form'd
First his own tools.—MILTON.

Compose is a work of the intellect; 'Words so pleasing to God as those which the Son of God himself hath composed, were not possible for men to frame.'—HOOKER. Constitute is an act of power, which men must submit to. We form a party; we form a plan; we compose a book; men constitute governments, offices, &c.

When employed to characterize things, form signifies simply to have a form, be it either simple or complex; compose and constitute are said only of those things which have complex forms: the former as respecting the material, the latter the essential parts of an object: thus we may say that an object forms a circle, or a semicircle, or the segment of a circle; 'All animals of the same kind which form a society are more knowing than others.'—ADDISON. A society is composed of individuals;

Nor did Israel 'scape
Th' infection, when their borrow'd gold composed
The calf in Oriel.—MILTON.

Law and order constitute the essence of society; 'To receive and to communicate assistance constitutes the happiness of human life.'—JOHNSON. So letters and syllables compose a word; but sense is essential to constitute a word.

FORMAL, CEREMONIOUS.

Formal and ceremonious, from form and ceremony (v. Form, ceremony), are either taken in an indifferent sense with respect to what contains form and ceremony, or in a bad sense, as expressing the excess of form and ceremony. A person expects to have a formal dismissal before he considers himself as dismissed; people of fashion pay each other ceremonious visits, by way of keeping up a distant intercourse. Whatever communications are made from one government to another must be made in a formal manner; 'As there are formal and written leagues, respective to certain enemies; so there is a natural and tacit confederation among all men against the common enemies of human society.'—BACON. It is the business of the church to regulate the ceremonious part of religion. 'Under a different economy of religion, God was more tender of the shell and ceremonious part of his worship.'—SOUTH.

Formal, in the bad sense, is opposed to easy: ceremonious to the cordial. A formal carriage prevents a person from indulging himself in the innocent familiarities of friendly intercourse;

Formal in apparel,
In gait and countenance surely like a father.

SHAKESPEARE.

A ceremonious carriage puts a stop to all hospitality and kindness. Princes, in their formal intercourse with each other, know nothing of the pleasures of society; ceremonious visitants give and receive entertainments, without tasting any of the enjoyments which flow from the reciprocity of kind offices; 'From the moment one sets up for an author, one must be treated as ceremoniously, that is, as unfaithfully, "as a king's favourite, or as a king."'—POPE.

TO CAUSE, OCCASION, CREATE.

To cause, from the substantive cause, naturally signifies to be the cause of; occasion, from the noun occasion, signifies to be the occasion of; create, in Latin creatus, participle of creo, comes from the Greek κρῆναι to command, and κρῆναι to perform.

What is caused seems to follow naturally; what is occasioned follows incidentally; what is created receives its existence arbitrarily. A wound causes pain; accidents occasion delay; busy-bodies create mischief.

The misfortunes of the children cause great affliction to the parents;

Scarcely an ill to human life belongs,
But what our follies cause, or mutual wrongs.

JENYNS.

Business occasions a person's late attendance at a place; 'The good Psalmist condemns the foolish thoughts which a reflection on the prosperous state of his affairs had sometimes occasioned in him.'—ATTERBURY. Disputes and misunderstandings create animosity and ill-will; 'As long as the powers or abilities which are ascribed to others are exerted in a sphere of action remote from ours, and not brought into competition with talents of the same kind to which we have pretensions, they create no jealousy.'—BLAIR. The cause of a person's misfortunes may often be traced to his own misconduct: the improper behaviour of one person may occasion an impropriety for an explanation: jealousies are created in the minds of relatives by an unnecessary reserve and distance.

TO MAKE, DO, ACT.

Make, in Dutch maken, Saxon macan, &c., comes from the Greek μᾶκάν thun, signifying to put together with art; do, in German thun, comes probably from the Greek θεῖναι to put, signifying to put, or put in order, to bring to pass; act, in Latin actus, from ago to direct, signifies literally to put in motion.

We cannot make without doing, but we may do (v. To act) without making: to do is simply to move for a certain end; to make is to do, so as to bring something into being, which was not before: we make a thing what it was not before; we do a thing in the same manner as we did it before: what is made is either better or worse, or the same as another;

Empire! thou poor and despicable thing!

When such as these make and unmake a king.

DRYDEN

What is done, is done either wisely or unwisely;

What shall I do to be for ever known,

And make the age to come my own.—COWLEY.

We act whenever we do any thing, but we may act without doing any thing. The verb act is always intransitive; and do transitive; we do something, but not act something. The act approaches nearest to the idea of move; it is properly the exertion of power corporeal or mental: do is closely allied to effect; it is the producing an effect by such an exertion. They act very unwisely who attempt to do more than their abilities will enable them to complete: whatever we do, let us be careful to act considerably; 'We have made this a maxim, "That a man who is commonly called good-natured is hardly to be thanked for what he does, because half that is acted about him is done rather by his sufferance than approbation."'—STEELE

ACTION, ACT, DEED.

The words action, act, and deed, though derived from the preceding verbs, have an obvious distinction in their meaning.

* We mark the degrees of action which indicate energy; we mark the number of acts which may serve to designate a habit or character: we speak of a lively, vehement, or impetuous action; a man of action, in distinction from a mere talker or an idler; whatever rests without influence or movement has lost its action: we speak of many acts of a particular kind; we call him a fool who commits continued acts of folly; and him a niggard who commits nothing but acts of meanness.

single exertion of power; it is physical movement; the simple acting. Our actions are our works in the strict sense of the word; our acts are the operations of our faculties. The character of a man must be judged by his actions; the merit of actions depends on the motives that give rise to them: the act of speaking is peculiar to man; but the acts of walking, running, eating, &c. are common to all animals.

Actions may be considered either singly or collectively; acts are regarded only individually and specifically: we speak of all a man's actions, but not all his acts; we say a good action, a virtuous action, a charitable action; but an act, not an action of goodness, an act of virtue, an act of faith, an act of charity, and the like. It is a good action to conceal the faults of our neighbours; but a rare act of charity among men. Many noble actions are done in private, the consciousness of which is the only reward of the doer; the wisest of men may occasionally commit acts of folly which are not imputable to their general character; 'Many of those actions which are apt to procure fame are not in their nature conducive to our ultimate happiness.'—ADDISON. Nothing can be a greater act of imprudence than not to take an occasional review of our past actions; 'I desire that the same rule may be extended to the whole fraternity of heathen gods; it being my design to condemn every poem to the flames, in which Jupiter thunders or exercises any act of authority which does not belong to him.'—ADDISON.

*Action is a term applied to whatever is done in general; act to that which is remarkable or that requires to be distinguished. The sentiments of the heart are easier to be discovered by one's actions than by one's words: it is an heroic act to forgive our enemy, when we are in a condition to be revenged on him. The good man is cautious in all his actions to avoid even the appearance of evil: a great prince is anxious to mark every year by some distinguished act of wisdom or virtue.

Act and deed are both employed for what is remarkable; but act denotes only one single thing done;

Who forth from nothing call'd this comely frame,
His will and act, his word and work the same.

PRIOR.

Deed implies some complicated performance, something achieved: we display but one quality or power in performing an act; we display many, both physical and mental, in performing a deed. A prince distinguishes himself by acts of mercy; the commander of an army by martial deeds;

I on the other side

Us'd no ambition to commend my deeds;

The deeds themselves, though mute, spoke loud the doer.—MILTON.

Acts of disobedience in youth frequently lead to the perpetration of the foulest deeds in more advanced life.

DEED, EXPLOIT, ACHIEVEMENT, FEAT.

Deed, from do, expresses the thing done; exploit, in French exploit, most probably changed from explicatus, signifies the thing unfolded or displayed; achievement, from achieve, signifies the thing achieved; feat, in French fait, Latin factum, from facio, signifies the thing done.

The first three words rise progressively on each other: deeds, compared with the others, is employed for that which is ordinary or extraordinary; exploit and achievement are used only for the extraordinary; the latter in a higher sense than the former.

Deeds must always be characterized as good or bad, magnanimous or atrocious, and the like, except in poetry, where the term becomes elevated;

Great Pollio! thou for whom thy Rome prepares

The ready triumph of thy finish'd wars;

Is there in fate an hour reserv'd for me

To sing thy deeds in numbers worthy thee?

DRYDEN.

Exploit and achievement do not necessarily require any epithets; they are always taken in the proper sense for something great. Exploit, when compared with achievement, is a term used in plain prose; it designates not so much what is great as what is real: achievement is most adapted to poetry and romance; it soars above what the eye sees, and the ear hears, and affords scope for the imagination. Martial deeds are as interesting to the reader as to the performer: the pages of modern history will be crowded with the exploits of Englishmen both by sea and land, as those of ancient and fabulous history are with the achievements of their heroes and demi-gods. An exploit marks only personal bravery in action; an achievement denotes elevation of character in every respect, grandeur of design, promptitude in execution, and valour in action.

* Girard "Action, acte."

An exploit may be executed by the design and at the will of another; a common soldier or an army may perform exploits;

High matter thou enjoyn'st me, O prime of men!

Sad task and hard; for how shall I relate

To human sense th' invisible exploits

Of warring spirits?—MILTON.

An achievement is designed and executed by the achiever; Hercules is distinguished for his achievements; and in the same manner we speak of the achievements of knights-errant or of great commanders;

Great spoils and trophies gain'd by thee they bear,
Then let thy own achievements be thy share.

DRYDEN.

Feat approaches nearest to exploit in signification; the former marks skill, and the latter resolution. The feats of chivalry displayed in jousts and tournaments were in former times as much esteemed as warlike exploits;

Much I have heard

Of thy prodigious might, and feats perform'd.

MILTON.

Exploit and feat are often used in derision, to mark the absence of those qualities in the actions of individuals. The soldier who affects to be foremost in situations where there is no danger cannot be more properly derided than by terming his action an exploit: he who prides himself on the display of skill in the performance of a paltry trick may be laughed at for having performed a feat.

ACTION, GESTURE, GESTICULATION, POSTURE, ATTITUDE, POSITION.

Action is either the act of acting, or the manner of acting; gesture, in French geste, Latin gestus, participle of gero to carry one's self, signifies the manner of carrying one's body; gesticulation, in Latin gesticulatio, comes from gesticulus to make many gestures; posture, in French posture, Latin positura a position, comes from positus, participle of pono, signifying the manner of placing one's self; attitude, in French attitude, Italian attitudine, is changed from aptitude, signifying a propriety as to disposition.

All these terms are applied to the state of the body; the former three indicating a state of motion; the latter two a state of rest. Action respects the movements of the body in general; gesture is an action indicative of some particular state of mind; gesticulation is a species of artificial gesture. Raising the arm is an action; bowing is a gesture.

Actions may be ungraceful; gestures indecent. A suitable action sometimes gives great force to the words that are uttered; 'Cicero concludes his celebrated book "de Oratore" with some precepts for pronunciation and action, without which part he affirms that the best orator in the world can never succeed.'—HUGHES. Gestures often supply the place of language between people of different nations; 'Our best actors are somewhat at a loss to support themselves with proper gesture, as they move from any considerable distance to the front of the stage.'—STEELE. Actions characterize a man as vulgar or well-bred; gestures mark the temper of the mind. There are many actions which it is the object of education to prevent from growing into habits: savages express the vehement passions of the mind, by vehement gestures or, every occasion, even in their amusements. An extravagant or unnatural gesture is termed a gesticulation; a sycophant, who wishes to cringe into favour with the great, deals largely in gesticulation to mark his devotion; a buffoon who attempts to imitate the gestures of another will use gesticulation; and the monkey who apes the actions of human beings does so by means of gesticulations; 'Neither the judges of our laws, nor the representatives of the people, would be much affected by laboured gesticulation, or believe any man the more, because he rolled his eyes, or puffed his cheeks.'—JOHNSON.

*Posture is a mode of placing the body more or less differing from the ordinary habits; attitude is the manner of keeping the body more or less suitable to the existing circumstances. A posture, however convenient, is never assumed without exertion; it is therefore willingly changed: an attitude, though not usual, is still according to the nature of things; it is therefore readily preserved. A posture is singular; it has something in it which departs from the ordinary carriage of the body, and makes it remarkable; 'Falsehood in a short time found by experience, that her superiority consisted only in the celerity of her course, and the change of her posture.'—JOHNSON. An attitude is impressing; it is the natural expression of character or impression; 'Falsehood always endeavoured to copy the mien and attitudes of truth.'—JOHNSON. A brave man will put himself into a posture of defence, without assuming an attitude of defiance.

Strange and forced positions of the body are termed postures; noble, agreeable, and expressive forms of carriage, are called attitudes: mountebanks and clowns put themselves into ridiculous postures in order to excite laughter; actors assume graceful attitudes to represent their characters. Postures are to the body what grimaces are to the face; attitudes are to the body what air is to the figure: he who in attempting to walk assumes the attitude of a dancer, puts himself into a ridiculous posture; a graceful and elegant attitude in dancing becomes an affected and laughable posture in another case.

Postures are sometimes usefully employed in stage dancing; the attitudes are necessarily employed by painters, sculptors, dancing masters, and other artists. Posture is said of the whole body; the rest, of particular limbs or parts. Attitude and posture are figuratively applied to other objects besides the body: armies assume a menacing attitude; in a critical posture of affairs, extraordinary skill is required on the part of the government; 'Milton has presented this violent spirit (Moloch) as the first that rises in that assembly to give his opinion upon their present posture of affairs.'—ADDISON.

Position, when compared with posture, is taken only in regard to persons, in which case the posture, as observed above, is a species of position, namely, an artificial position: if a person stands tiptoe, in order to see to a greater distance, he may be said to put himself into that position; but if a dancer do the same, as a part of his performance, it becomes a posture: so, likewise, when one leans against the wall it is a leaning position; 'Every step, in the progression of existence, changes our position with respect to the things about us.'—JOHNSON. But when one theatrically bends his body backward or forward, it is a posture: one may, in the same manner, sit in an erect position, or in a reclining posture; 'When I entered his room, he was sitting in a contemplative posture, with his eyes fixed upon the ground; after he had continued in his reverie near a quarter of an hour, he rose up and seemed by his gestures to take leave of some invisible guest.'—HAWKSWORTH.

ACTION, AGENCY, OPERATION.

Action (v. To act) is the effect, agency the cause. Action is inherent in the subject;

noble English, that could entertain

With half their forces the full power of France,

And let another half stand laughing by.

All out of work, and cold for action.—SHAKESPEARE.

Agency is something exterior; it is, in fact, putting a thing into action: in this manner, the whole world is in action through the agency of the Divine Being; 'A few advances there are in the following papers tending to assert the superintendence and agency of Providence in the natural world.'—WOODWARD. Sometimes the word action is taken in the sense of acting upon, when it approaches still nearer to agency; 'It is better therefore that the earth should move about its own centre, and make those useful vicissitudes of night and day, than expose always the same side to the action of the sun.'—BENTLEY. Operation, from the Latin operatio, and opera labour or opus need, signifying the work that is needful, is action for a specific end, and according to a rule; as the operation of nature in the article of vegetation;

* Roubaud. "Posture, attitude."

The tree whose operation brings

Knowledge of good and ill, shun thou to taste.

MILTON.

ACTIVE, DILIGENT, INDUSTRIOUS, ASSIDUOUS, LABORIOUS.

Active, from the verb to act, implies a propensity to act, to be doing something without regard to the nature of the object; diligent, in French diligent, Latin diligens, participle of diligere to choose or like, implies an attachment to an object, and consequent attention to it; industrious, in French industrieux, Latin industrius, is probably formed from intro within and struo to build, make, or do, signifying an inward or thorough inclination to be engaged in some serious work; assiduous, in French assidu, in Latin assiduus, is compounded of as or ad and siduus from sedeo to sit, signifying to sit close to a thing; laborious, in French laborieux, Latin laboriosus, from labour, implies belonging to labour, or the inclination to labour.

We are active if we are only ready to exert our powers, whether to any end or not; 'Providence has made the human soul an active being.'—JOHNSON. We are diligent when we are active for some specific end; 'A constant and unflinching obedience is above the reach of terrestrial diligence.'—JOHNSON. We are industrious when no time is left unemployed in some serious pursuit; 'It has been observed by writers of morality, that in order to quicken human industry, Providence has so contrived that our daily food is not to be procured without much pains and labour.'—ADDISON. We are assiduous if we do not leave a thing until it is finished; 'If ever a cure is performed on a patient, where quacks are concerned, they can claim no greater share in it than Virgil's Iapis in the curing of Æneas; he tried his skill, was very assiduous about the wound, and indeed was the only visible means that relieved the hero; but the poet assures us it was the particular assistance of a deity that speeded the operation.'—PEARCE. We are laborious when the bodily or mental powers are regularly employed in some hard labour; 'If we look into the brute creation, we find all its individuals engaged in a painful and laborious way of life to procure a necessary subsistence for themselves.'—ADDISON.

A man may be active without being diligent, since he may employ himself in what is of no importance; but he can scarcely be diligent without being active, since diligence supposes some degree of activity in one's application to a useful object. A man may be diligent without being industrious, for he may diligently employ himself about a particular favourite object without employing himself constantly in the same way; and he may be industrious without being diligent, since diligence implies a free exercise of the mental as well as corporeal powers, but industry applies principally to manual labour. Activity and diligence are therefore commonly the property of lively or strong minds, but industry may be associated with moderate talents. A man may be diligent without being assiduous; but he cannot be assiduous without being diligent; for assiduity is a sort of persevering diligence. A man may be industrious, without being laborious, but not vice versa; for laboriousness is a severer kind of industry.

The active man is never easy without an employment; the diligent man is contented with the employment he has; the industrious man goes from one employment to the other; the assiduous man seeks to attain the end of his employment; the laborious man spares no pains or labour in following his employment.

Activity is of great importance for those who have the management of public concerns; diligence in business contributes greatly to success; industry is of great value in obtaining a livelihood: without assiduity no advances can be made in science or literature; and without laborious exertions, considerable attainments are not to be expected in many literary pursuits.

Active minds set on foot inquiries to which the industrious, by assiduous application, and diligent if not laborious research, often afford satisfactory answers.

ACTIVE, BRISK, AGILE, NIMBLE.

Active signifies the same as in the preceding article; brisk has a common origin with fresh, which is in Saxon fersh, Dutch frisch or bersk, Danish frisk, fersk, &c.; agile, in Latin agilis, comes from the same verb as active, signifying a fitness, a readiness to act or move; nimble is probably derived from the Saxon nemen to take, implying a fitness or capacity to take any thing by a celerity of movement.

Activity respects one's transactions; briskness, one's sports: men are active in carrying on business; children are brisk in their play. Agility refers to the light and easy carriage of the body in springing; nimbleness to its quick and gliding movements in running. A rope-dancer is agile; a female moves nimblely.

Activity results from ardour of mind; 'There is not a more painful action of the mind than invention; yet in dreams it works with that ease and activity, that we are not sensible when the faculty is employed.'—ADDISON. Briskness springs from vivacity of feeling; 'I made my next application to a widow, and attacked her so briskly that I thought myself within a fortnight of her.'—BUDGE. Agility is produced by corporeal vigour, and habitual strong exertion; 'When the Prince touched his stirrup, and was going to speak, the officer, with an incredible agility, threw himself on the earth and kissed his feet.'—STEELE. Nimbleness results from an effort to move lightly;

O friends, I hear the tread of nimble feet
Hasting this way.—MILTON.

ACTIVE, BUSY, OFFICIOUS.

Active signifies the same as before; busy, in Saxon gebisged, from bisgian, in German beschäftigt, from beschäftigen to occupy, and schaffen to make or do, implies a propensity to be occupied; officious, in French officieux, Latin officiosus, from officium duty or service, signifies a propensity to perform some service or office.

Active respects the habit or disposition of the mind; busy and officious, either the disposition of the mind, or the employment of the moment: the former regards every species of employment; the latter only particular kinds of employment. An active person is ever ready to be employed; a person is busy, when he is actually employed in any object; he is officious, when he is employed for others.

Active is always taken in a good, or at least an indifferent sense; it is opposed to lazy; 'The pursuits of the active part of mankind are either in the paths of religion and virtue, or, on the other hand, in the roads to wealth, honour, or pleasures.'—ADDISON. Busy, as it respects occupation, is mostly in a good sense; 'We see multitudes busy in the pursuit of riches, at the expense of wisdom and virtue.'—JOHNSON. It is opposed to being at leisure; as it respects disposition, it is always in a bad sense; 'The air-pump, the barometer, the quadrant, and the like inventions, were thrown out to those busy spirits (politicians), as tubs and barrels are to a whale, that he may let the ship sail on without disturbance.'—ADDISON. Officious is never taken in a good sense; it implies being busy without discretion. To an active disposition, nothing is more irksome than inaction; but it is not concerned to inquire into the utility of the action. It is better for a person to be busy than quite unemployed; but a busy person will employ himself about the concerns of others, when he has none of his own sufficiently important to engage his attention: an officious person is as unfortunate as he is troublesome; when he strives to serve he has the misfortune to annoy; 'I was forced to quit my first lodgings by reason of an officious landlady, that would be asking me every morning how I had slept.'—ADDISON.

SEDULOUS, DILIGENT, ASSIDUOUS.

Sedulous, from the Latin sedulus and sedeo, signifies sitting close to a thing; diligent, v. Active, diligent; issiduous, v. Active, diligent.

The idea of application is expressed by these epithets, but sedulous is a particular, diligent is a general term: one is sedulous by habits; one is diligent either habitually or occasionally: a sedulous scholar pursues his studies with a regular and close application; a scholar may be diligent at a certain period, though not invariably so. Sedulity seems to mark the very essential property of application, that is, adhering closely to an object; but diligence expresses one's attachment to a thing, as evinced by an eager pursuit of it: the former, therefore, bespeaks the steadiness of the character; the latter merely the turn of one's inclination: one is sedulous from a conviction of the importance of the thing: one may be diligent by fits and starts, according to the humour of the moment.

Assiduous and sedulous both express the quality of sitting or sticking close to a thing, but the former may, like diligent, be employed on a partial occasion; the latter is always permanent: we may be assiduous in our attentions to a person; but we are sedulous in the important concerns of life. Sedulous peculiarly respects the quiet employments of life; a teacher may be entitled sedulous; 'One thing I would offer is that he would constantly and sedulously read Tully, which will insensibly work him into a good Latin style.'—LOCKE. Diligent respects the active employments; 'I would recommend a diligent attendance on the courts of justice (to a student for the bar).'—DUNNING. One is diligent at work: assiduity holds a middle rank; it may be employed equally for that which requires active exertion, or otherwise: we may be assiduous in the pursuits of literature, or we may be assiduous in our attendance upon a person, or the performance of any office;

And thus the patient dam assiduous sits,
Not to be tempted from her tender task.

THOMSON.

READY, APT, PROMPT.

Ready, from the German bereiten to prepare, signifies prepared; apt, in Latin aptus, signifies literally fit; prompt, in Latin promptus, from promove to draw forth, signifies literally drawn to a point.

Ready is in general applied to that which has been intentionally prepared for a given purpose;

The god himself with ready trident stands
And opes the deep, and spreads the moving sands.

DRYDEN.

Promptness and aptness are species of readiness, which lie in the personal endowments or disposition: hence we speak of things being ready for a journey; persons being apt to learn, or prompt to obey or to reply. Ready, when applied to persons, characterizes the talent; as a ready wit. Apt characterizes the habits; as apt to judge by appearance, or apt to decide hastily; and is also employed in the same sense figuratively; 'Poverty is apt to betray a man into envy, riches into arrogance.'—ADDISON. Prompt characterizes more commonly the particular action, and denotes the willingness of the agent, and the quickness with which he performs the action; as prompt in executing a command, or prompt to listen to what is said; so likewise when applied to things personal;

Let not the fervent tongue,
Prompt to deceive, with adulation smooth
Gain on your purpos'd will.—THOMSON.

ALERTNESS, ALACRITY.

Alertness, from ales a wing, designates corporeal activity or readiness for action; alacrity, from acer sharp, brisk, designates mental activity.

We proceed with alertness, when the body is in its full vigour;

The wings that waft our riches out of sight
Grow on the gamester's elbows; and the alert
And nimble motion of those restless joints
That never tire, soon fans them all away.

COWPER

We proceed with alacrity when the mind is in full pursuit of an object; 'In dreams it is wonderful to observe with what sprightliness and alacrity the soul exerts herself.'—ADDISON.

ACTOR, AGENT.

These terms vary according to the different senses of the verb from which they are drawn; actor is used for one who does any thing or acts a part; 'Of all the patriarchal histories, that of Joseph and his brethren is the most remarkable, for the characters of the actors, and the instructive nature of the events.'—BLAIR. An agent is one who puts other things in action, particularly as distinguished from the patient or thing acted upon; 'They produced wonderful effects, by the proper application of agents to patients.'—TEMPLE. The agent is also an active being, or one possessing the faculty of action;

Heav'n made us agents free to good or ill,
And forc'd it not, tho' he foresaw the will.

DRYDEN.

An agent in a piece of fiction is the being who performs the actions narrated; 'I expect that no Pagan agent shall be introduced into the poem, or any fact related which a man cannot give credit to with a good conscience.'—ADDISON. Hence it is that the word actor is taken in the sense of a player, and an agent in the mercantile sense of a factor, or one who acts in another's stead.

ACTOR, PLAYER, PERFORMER.

The actor and player both perform on a stage; but the former is said in relation to the part that is acted, the latter to the profession that is followed. We may be actors occasionally without being players professionally, but we may be players without deserving the name of actors. Those who personate characters for their amusement are actors but not players: those who do the same for a livelihood are players as well as actors; hence we speak of a company of players, not actors. So likewise in the figurative sense, whoever acts a part, real or fictitious, that is, on the stage of life, or the stage of a theatre, is an actor; 'Our orators (says Cicero) are as it were the actors of truth itself; and the players the imitators of truth.'—HUGHES. But he only is a player who performs the fictitious part; hence the former is taken* in a bad or good sense, according to circumstances; 'Cicero is known to have been the intimate friend of Roscius the actor.'—HUGHES. Player is always taken in a less favourable sense, from the artificiality which attaches to his profession;

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players.

SHAKESPEARE.

The term performer is now used in the sense of one who performs a part in a theatrical exhibition, and for the most part in application to the individual in estimating the merits of his performance, as a good or bad performer.

ACTUAL, REAL, POSITIVE.

Actual, in French actuel, Latin actualis, from actio a deed, signifies belonging to the thing done; real, in French reel, Latin realis, from res, signifies belonging to the thing as it is; positive, in French positif, Latin positivus, from pono to place or fix, signifies the state or quality of being fixed, established.

What is actual has proof of its existence within itself, and may be exposed to the eye; what is real may be satisfactorily proved to exist; and what is positive precludes the necessity of a proof. Actual is opposed to the supposititious, conceived or reported; real to the feigned, imaginary; positive to the uncertain, doubtful.

Whatever is the condition of a thing for the time being is the actual condition; sorrows are real which flow from a substantial cause; proofs are positive which leave the mind in no uncertainty. The actual state of a nation is not to be ascertained by individual instances of poverty, or the reverse; there are but few, if any, real objects of compassion among common beggars; many positive facts have been related of the deception which they have practised. By an actual survey of human life, we are alone enabled to form just opinions of mankind; 'The very notion of any duration being past implies that it was once present; for the idea of being once present is actually included in the idea of its being past.'—ADDISON. It is but too frequent for men to disguise their real sentiments, although it is not always possible to obtain positive evidence of their insincerity; 'We may and do converse with God in person really, and to all the purposes of giving and receiving, though not visibly.'—SOUTH. 'Dissimulation is taken for a man's positive professing himself to be what he is not.'—SOUTH

TO PERPETRATE, COMMIT.

The idea of doing something wrong is common to these terms; but perpetrate, from the Latin perpetro, compounded of per and petro, in Greek πράττω, signifying thoroughly to compass or bring about, is a much more determined proceeding than that of committing. One may commit offences of various degree and magnitude; but one perpetrates crimes only, and those of the more heinous kind. A lawless banditti, who spend their lives in the perpetration of the most horrid crimes, are not to be restrained by the ordinary course of justice;

Then shows the forest which, in after-times,
Fierce Romulus, for perpetrated crimes,
A refuge made.'—DRYDEN.

He who commits any offence against the good order of society exposes himself to the censure of others, who may be his inferiors in certain respects; 'The mis-carriages of the great designs of princes are of little use to the bulk of mankind, who seem very little interested in admonitions against errors which they cannot commit.'—JOHNSON.

INACTIVE, INERT, LAZY, SLOTHFUL, SLUGGISH.

A reluctance to bodily exertion is common to all these terms. Inactive is the most general and unqualified term of all; it expresses simply the want of a stimulus to exertion; inert is something more positive, from the Latin iners or sine arte without art or mind; it denotes a specific deficiency either in body or mind; lazy, which has the same signification as given under the head of idle; slothful, from slow, that is, full of slowness; and sluggish from slug, that is, like a slug, drowsy and heavy, all rise upon one another to denote an expressly defective temperament of the body which directly impedes action.

To be inactive is to be indisposed to action; that is, to the performance of any office, to the doing any specific business: to be inert is somewhat more; it is to be indisposed to movement: to be lazy is to move with pain to one's self: to be slothful is never to move otherwise than slowly: to be sluggish is to move in a sleepy and heavy manner.

A person may be inactive from a variety of incidental causes, as timidity, ignorance, modesty, and the like, which combine to make him averse to enter upon any business, or take any serious step; a person may be inert from temporary indisposition; but laziness, slothfulness, and sluggishness are inherent physical defects: laziness is however not altogether independent of the mind or the will; but slothfulness and sluggishness are purely the offspring of nature, or, which is the same thing, habit superinduced upon nature. A man of a mild character is frequently inactive; he wants that ardour which impels perpetually to action; he wishes for nothing with sufficient warmth to make action agreeable; he is therefore inactive by a natural consequence;

Virtue conceal'd within our breast
Is inactivity at best.—SWIFT.

Hence the term inactive is properly applied to matter;

What laws are these? instruct us if you can;
There's one design'd for brutes and one for man,
Another guides inactive matter's course.

JENYNS.

Some diseases, particularly of the melancholy kind, are accompanied with a strong degree of inertness; since they seem to deprive the frame of its ordinary powers to action, and to produce a certain degree of torpor. Hence the term is employed to express a want of the power of action in the strongest possible degree, as displayed in the inanimate part of the creation,

Informers of the planetary train,

Without whose quickening glance their cumbrous orbs

Were brute, unlovely mass, inert and dead.

THOMSON.

Lazy people move as if their bodies were a burden to themselves; they are fond of rest, and particularly averse to be put in action; but they will sometimes move quickly, and perform much when once impelled to move; 'The first canto (in Thomson's Castle of Indolence) opens a scene of lazy luxury that fills the imagination.'—JOHNSON. Slothful people never vary their pace; they have a physical impediment in themselves to quick motion;

Falsely luxurious, will not man awake,
And, springing from the bed of sloth, enjoy
The cool, the fragrant, and the silent hour?

THOMSON.

Sluggish people are with difficulty brought into action; it is their nature to be in a state of stupor; 'Conversation would become dull and rapid, if negligence were not sometimes roused, and sluggishness quickened by due severity of reprehension.'—JOHNSON.

IDLE, LAZY, INDOLENT.

Idle is in German eitel vain; lazy, in German lässig, comes from the Latin lassus weary, because weariness naturally engenders laziness; indolent, in Latin indolens, signifies without feeling, having apathy or unconcern.

A propensity to inaction is the common idea by which these words are connected; they differ in the cause and degree of the quality: idle expresses less than lazy, and lazy less than indolent: one is termed idle who will do nothing useful; one is lazy who will do nothing at all without great reluctance; one is indolent who does not care to do any thing or set about any thing. There is no direct inaction in the idler; for a child is idle who will not learn his lesson, but he is active enough in that which pleases himself: there is an aversion to corporeal action in a lazy man, but not always to mental action; he is lazy at work, lazy in walking, or lazy in sitting; but he may not object to any employment, such as reading or thinking, which leaves his body entirely at rest: an indolent man, on the contrary, falls in activity from a defect both in the mind and the body; he will not only not move, but he will not even think, if it give him trouble; and trifling exertions of any kind are sufficient, even in prospect, to deter him from attempting to move.

Idleness is common to the young and the thoughtless, to such as have not steadiness of mind to set a value on any thing which may be acquired by exertion and regular employment; the idle man is opposed to one that is diligent; 'As pride is sometimes hid under humility, idleness is often covered by turbulence and hurry.'—JOHNSON. Laziness is frequent among those who are compelled to work for others; it is a habit of body superinduced upon one's condition; those who should labour are often the most unwilling to move at all, and since the spring of the mind which should impel them to action is wanting, and as they are continually under the necessity of moving at the will of another, they acquire an habitual reluctance to any motion, and find their comfort in entire inaction. Hence laziness is almost confined to servants and the labouring classes: laziness is opposed to industry; 'Wicked condemned men will ever live like rogues, and not fall to work, but be lazy and spend victuals.'—BACON. Lazy may however be applied figuratively to other objects;

The daw,
The rook, and magpie, to the gray-grown oaks,
That the calm village in their verdant arms
Sheltering embrace, direct their lazy flight.

THOMSON.

Indolence is a physical property of the mind, a want of motive or purpose to action: the indolent man is not so fond of his bodily ease as the lazy man, but he shrinks from every species of exertion still more than the latter; indolence is a disease most observable in the higher classes, and even in persons of the highest intellectual endowments, in whom there should be the most powerful motives to exertion; the indolent stands in direct opposition to nothing but the general term active; 'Nothing is so opposite to the true enjoyment of life as the relaxed and feeble state of an indolent mind.'—BLAIR.

The life of a common player is most apt to breed an habitual idleness; as they have no serious employment to occupy their hands or their heads, they grow averse to every thing which would require the exercise of either: the life of a common soldier is apt to breed laziness: he who can sit or lie for twelve hours out of the twenty-four, will soon acquire a disgust to any kind of labour, unless he be naturally of an active turn: the life of a rich man is most favourable to indolence; he who has every thing provided at his hand, not only for the necessities, but the comforts of life, may soon become averse to every thing that wears the face of exertion; he may become indolent, if he be not unfortunately so by nature.

IDLE, LEISURE, VACANT.

Idle signifies here emptiness or the absence of that which is solid; leisure, otherwise spelled leasure, comes from lease, as in the compound release, and the Latin laxo to make lax or loose, that is, loosed or set free; vacant, in Latin vacans, from vacare to free or be empty, signifies the same.

Idle is opposed here to busy; at leisure simply to employed: he therefore who is idle, instead of being busy, commits a fault; which is not always the case with him who is at leisure or free from his employment. Idle is therefore always taken in a sense more or less unfavourable; leisure in a sense perfectly indifferent: if a man says of himself that he has spent an idle hour in this or that place in amusement, company, and the like, he means to signify he would have spent it better if any thing had offered; on the other hand, he would say that he spends his leisure moments in a suitable relaxation: he who values his time will take care to have as few idle hours as possible; 'Life is sustained with so little labour, that the tediousness of idle time cannot otherwise be supported (than by artificial desires).'—JOHNSON. But since no one can always be employed in severe labour, he will occupy his leisure hours in that which best suits his taste;

Here pause, my Gothick lyre, a little while:

The leisure hour is all that thou canst claim.

BEATTIE.

Idle and leisure are said in particular reference to the time that is employed; vacant is a more general term, that simply qualifies the thing: an idle hour is without any employment; a vacant hour is in general free from the employments with which it might be filled up; a person has leisure time according to his wishes; but he may have vacant time from necessity, that is, when he is in want of employment; 'Idleness dictates expedients, by which life may be passed unprofitably, without the tediousness of many vacant hours'—JOHNSON.

IDLE, VAIN.

Idle, v. Idle, lazy; vain, in Latin vannus, is probably changed from vacaneus, signifying empty.

These epithets are both opposed to the solid or substantial; but idle has a more particular reference to what ought or ought not to engage the time or attention; vain seems to qualify the thing without any such reference. A pursuit may be termed either idle or vain: in the former case, it reflects immediately on the agent for not employing his time on something more serious; but in the latter case, it simply characterizes the pursuit as one that will be attended with no good consequences: when we consider ourselves as beings who have but a short time to live, and that every moment of that time ought to be thoroughly well spent, we shall be careful to avoid all idle concerns; when we consider ourselves as rational beings, who are responsible for the use of those powers with which we have been invested by our Almighty Maker, we shall be careful to reject all vain concerns: an idle effort is made by one who does not care to exert him self for any useful purpose, who works only to please himself; a vain effort may be made by one who is in a state of desperation. These terms preserve the same distinction when applied to other objects;

And let no spot of idle earth be found,
But cultivate the genius of the ground.—DRYDEN.

'Deluded by vain opinions, we look to the advantages of fortune as our ultimate goods.'—BLAIR.

HEAVY, DULL, DROWSY.

Heavy is allied to both dull and drowsy, but the latter have no close connexion with each other.

Heavy and dull are employed as epithets both for persons and things; heavy characterizes the corporeal state of a person; dull qualifies the spirits or the understanding of the subject. A person has a heavy look whose temperament seems composed of gross and weighty materials which weigh him down and impede his movements; he has a dull countenance in whom the ordinary brightness and vivacity of the mind is wanting: heavy is either a characteristic of the constitution, or only a particular state arising from external or internal causes;

Heavy with age, Entellus stands his ground,
But with his warping body wards the wound.
DRYDEN.

Dullness as it respects the frame of the spirits, is a partial state; as it respects the mental vigour, it is a characteristic of the individual;

O thou dull god! why liest thou with the vile
In loathsome beds: and leav'st the kingly couch,
A watch-ease to a common larum bell?
SHAKESPEARE.

It is a misfortune frequently attached to those of a corpulent habit to be very heavy: there is no one who from the changes of the atmosphere may not be occasionally heavy. Those who have no resources in themselves are always dull in solitude: those who are not properly instructed, or have a deficiency of capacity, will appear dull in all matters of learning.

Heavy is either properly or improperly applied to things which are conceived to have an undue tendency to press or lean downwards: dull is in like manner employed for whatever fails in the necessary degree of brightness or vivacity; the weather is heavy when the air is full of thick and weighty materials; it may be dull from the intervention of clouds.

Heavy and drowsy are both employed in the sense of sleep; but the former is only a particular state, the latter particular or general; all persons may be occasionally heavy or drowsy; some are habitually drowsy from disease; they likewise differ in degree; the latter being much the greater of the two; and occasionally they are applied to such things as produce sleepiness;

And drowsy tinklings lull the distant fold.—GRAY.

TO SLEEP, SLUMBER, DOZE, DROWSE, NAP.

Sleep, in Saxon slapan, Low German slap, German schlaf, is supposed to come from the Low German slap or slack slack, because sleep denotes an entire relaxation of the physical frame; slumber, in Saxon slumern, &c. is but an intensive verb of schlummern, which is a variation from the preceding slapan, &c.; doze, in Low German dusen, is in all probability a variation from the French dors, and the Latin dormio to sleep, which was anciently dermio, and comes from the Greek δέρμα a skin, because people lay on skins when they slept; drowse is a variation of doze; nap is in all probability a variation of nob and nod.

Sleep is the general term, which designates in an indefinite manner that state of the body to which all animated beings are subject at certain seasons in the course of nature; to slumber is to sleep lightly and softly; to doze is to incline to sleep, or to begin sleeping; to nap is to sleep for a time: every one who is not indisposed sleeps during the night; those who are accustomed to wake at a certain hour of the morning commonly slumber only after that time; there are many who, though they cannot sleep in a carriage will yet be obliged to doze if they travel in the night in hot climates the middle of the day is commonly chosen for a nap.

SLEEPY, DROWSY, LETHARGICK.

Sleepy (v. To sleep) expresses either a temporary or a permanent state: drowsy, which comes from the Low German drusen, and is a variation of doze (v. To sleep) expresses mostly a temporary state: lethargick, from lethargy, in Latin lethargia, Greek ληθαργία, compounded of λήθη forgetfulness, and αργός swift, signifying a proneness to forgetfulness or sleep, describes a permanent or habitual state.

Sleepy, as a temporary state, expresses also what is natural or seasonable; drowsiness expresses an inclination to sleep at unseasonable hours: it is natural to be sleepy at the hour when we are accustomed to retire to rest; it is common to be drowsy when sitting still after dinner. Sleepiness, as a permanent state, is an infirmity to which some persons are subject constitutionally: lethargy is a disease with which people, otherwise the most wakeful, may be occasionally attacked.

INDOLENT, SUPINE, LISTLESS, CARELESS.

Indolent, v. Idle, lazy; supine, in Latin supinus, from super above, signifies lying on one's back, or with one's face upward, which, as it is the action of a lazy or idle person, has been made to represent the qualities themselves; listless, without list, in German lust desire, signifies without desire; careless signifies without care or concern.

These terms represent a diseased or unnatural state of the mind, when its desires, which are the spring of action, are in a relaxed and torpid state, so as to prevent the necessary degree of exertion. Indolence has a more comprehensive meaning than supineness, and this signifies more than listlessness or carelessness: indolence is a general indisposition of a person to exert either his mind or his body; supineness is a similar indisposition that shows itself on particular occasions: there is a corporeal as well as a mental cause for indolence; but supineness lies principally in the mind: corpulent and large-made people are apt to be indolent; but timid and gentle dispositions are apt to be supine. An indolent person sets all labour, both corporeal and mental, at a distance from him; it is irksome to him;

Hence reasoners more refined but not more wise,
Their whole existence fabulous suspect,
And truth and falsehood in a lump reject;
Too indolent to learn what may be known,
Or else too proud that ignorance to own.

JENYNS.

A supine person objects to undertake any thing which threatens to give him trouble;

With what unequal tempers are we fram'd!
One day the soul, supine with ease and fulness,
Revels secure.
ROWE.

The indolent person is so for a permanency; he always seeks to be waited upon rather than wait on himself; and as far as it is possible he is glad for another to think for him, rather than to burden himself with thought; the supine person is so only in matters that require more than an ordinary portion of his exertion; he will defer such business, and sacrifice his interest to his ease. The indolent and supine are not, however, like the listless, expressly without desire: an indolent or supine man has desire enough to enjoy what is within his reach, although not always sufficient desire to surmount the aversion to labour in trying to obtain it; the listless man, on the contrary, is altogether without the desire, and is in fact in a state of moral torpor, which is however but a temporary or partial state arising from particular circumstances; after the mind has been wrought up to the highest pitch, it will sometimes sink into a state of relaxation in which it apparently ceases to have any active principle within itself. Indolence is a habit of both body and mind; supineness is sometimes only a mode of inaction flowing out of a particular frame of mind; listlessness is only a certain frame of mind: an active person may sometimes be supine in setting about a business which runs counter to his feelings; a listless person, on the other hand, if he be habitually so, will never be active in any thing, because he will have no impulse to action;

Sullen, methinks, and slow the morning breaks,
As if the sun were listless to appear.—DRYDEN.

Carelessness expresses less than any of the above; for though a man who is indolent, supine, and listless, is naturally careless, yet carelessness is properly applicable to such as have no such positive disease of mind or body. The careless person is neither averse to labour or thought, nor devoid of desire, but wants in reality that care or thought which is requisite for his state or condition. Carelessness is rather an error of the understanding, or of the conduct, than the will; since the careless would care, be concerned for, or interested about things, if he could be brought to reflect on their importance, or if he did not for a time forget himself;

Pert love with her by joint commission rules,
Who by false arts and popular deceits,
The careless, fond, unthinking mortal cheats.

POMFREY.

TO STIR, MOVE.

Stir, in German stören, old German stiren or steren, Latin turbo, Greek τρέβω or θάρβω trouble or tumult; move, v. Motion.

Stir is here a specifick, move a generick term; to stir is to move so as to disturb the rest and composure either of the body or mind;

I've read that things inanimate have mov'd,
And as with living souls have been inform'd,
By magic numbers and persuasive sounds.

CONGREVE.

At first the groves are scarcely seen to stir.

THOMSON.

Hence the term stir is employed to designate an improper or unauthorized motion; children are not allowed to stir from their seats in school hours; a soldier must not stir from the post which he has to defend. Atrocious criminals or persons raving mad are bound hand and foot, that they may not stir.

MOTION, MOVEMENT.

These are both abstract terms to denote the act of moving, but motion is taken generally and abstractedly from the thing that moves: movement, on the other hand, is taken in connexion with the agent or thing that moves; hence we speak of a state of motion as opposed to a state of rest, of perpetual motion, the laws of motion, and the like; on the other hand, to make a movement when speaking of an army, a general movement when speaking of an assembly.

When motion is qualified by the thing that moves, it denotes a continued motion; but movement implies only a particular motion: hence we say, the motion of the heavenly bodies, the motion of the earth; a person is in continual motion, or an army is in motion; but a person makes a movement who rises or sits down, or goes from one chair to another; the different movements of the springs and wheels of any instrument; 'It is not easy to a mind accustomed to the inroads of troublesome thoughts to expel them immediately by putting better images into motion.'—JOHNSON.

Nature I thought perform'd too mean a part,
Forming her movements to the rules of art.—PRIOR.

MOVING, AFFECTING, PATHETICK.

The moving is in general whatever moves the affections or the passions; the affecting and pathetick are what move the affections in different degrees. The good or bad feelings may be moved; the tender feelings only are affected. A field of battle is a moving spectacle; 'There is something so moving in the very image of weeping beauty.'—STEELE. The death of King Charles was an affecting spectacle; 'I do not remember to have seen any ancient or modern story more affecting than a letter of Anne of Boulogne.'—ADDISON. 'The affecting acts by means of the senses, as well as the understanding. The pathetick applies only to what is addressed to the heart; hence, a sight or a description is affecting: but an address is pathetick;

What think you of the bard's enchanting art,
Which whether he attempts to warm the heart
With fabled scenes, or charm the ear with rhyme,
Breathes all pathetick, lovely, and sublime?

JENYNS.

TO COME, ARRIVE.

Come is general; arrive is particular.

Persons or things come; persons only, or what is personified, arrive.

To come specifies neither time nor manner; arrival is employed with regard to some particular period or circumstances. The coming of our Saviour was predicted by the prophets: the arrival of a messenger is expected at a certain hour. We know that evils must come, but we do wisely not to meet them by anticipation; the arrival of a vessel in the haven, after a long and dangerous voyage, is a circumstance of general interest in the neighbourhood where it happens;

Hail, rev'rend priest! to Phœbus' awful dome,
A suppliant from great Atrides come.—POPE.

Old men love novelties; the last arriv'd
Still pleases best, the youngest steals their smiles

YOUNG.

TO ADVANCE, PROCEED.

To advance (v. Advance) is to go towards some point; to proceed, from the Latin procedo, is to go onward in a certain course. The same distinction is preserved between them in their figurative acceptation.

A person advances in the world, who succeeds in his transactions and raises himself in society; he proceeds in his business, when he carries it on as he has done before; 'It is wonderful to observe by what a gradual progress the world of life advances through a prodigious variety of species, before a creature is formed that is complete in all its senses.'—ADDISON. 'If the scale of being rises by such a regular progress so high as man, we may by a parity of reason suppose that it still proceeds gradually through those beings which are of a superiour nature to him.'—ADDISON.

One advances by proceeding, and one proceeds in order to advance.

Some people pass their lives in the same situation without advancing. Some are always doing without proceeding.

Those who make considerable progress in learning stand the fairest chance of being advanced to dignity and honour.

PACE, STEP.

Pace, in French pas, Latin passus, comes from the Hebrew פָּסַע to pass, and signifies the act of passing, or the ground passed over; step, which comes through the medium of the northern languages, from the Greek scēbay, signifies the act of stepping, or the ground stepped over.

As respects the act, pace expresses the general manner of passing on, or moving the body; step implies the manner of treading with the foot; the pace is distinguished by being either a walk or a run; and in regard to horses, a trot or a gallop; the step is distinguished by the right or the left, the forward or the backward. The same pace may be modified so as to be more or less easy, more or less quick; the step may vary as it is light or heavy, graceful or ungraceful, long or short. We may go a slow pace with long steps, or we may go a quick pace with short steps. A slow pace is best suited to the solemnity of a funeral; a long step must be taken by soldiers in a slow march.

As respects the space passed or stepped over, the pace is a measured distance, formed by a long step; the step, on the other hand, is indefinitely employed for any space stepped over, but particularly that ordinary space which one steps over without an effort. A thousand paces was the Roman measurement for a mile. A step or two designates almost the shortest possible distance;

To-morrow, to-morrow, and to-morrow.

Creeps in a stealing pace from day to day.

SHAKESPEARE

Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eye,
In every gesture dignity and love.—MILTON

ONWARD, FORWARD, PROGRESSIVE.

Onward is taken in the literal sense of going nearer to an object: forward is taken in the sense of going from an object, or going farther in the line before one: progressive has the sense of going gradually or step by step before one.

A person goes onward who does not stand still; he goes forward who does not recede; he goes progressively who goes forward at certain intervals.

Onward is taken only in the proper acceptation of travelling; the traveller who has lost his way feels it necessary to go onward with the hope of arriving at some point;

Remote, unfriended, melancholy, slow,
Or by the lazy Scheld, or wandering Po,
Or onward where the rude Carinthian boor
Against the houseless stranger shuts the door,
Where'er I roam, whatever realms to see,
My heart untravell'd fondly turns to thee.

GOLDSMITH.

Forward is employed in the improper as well as the proper application; a traveller goes forward in order to reach his point of destination as quickly as possible; a learner uses his utmost endeavours in order to get forward in his learning; 'Harbood the chairman was much blamed for his rashness; he said the duty of the chair was always to set things forward.'—BURNETT. Progressively is employed only in the improper application to what requires time and labour in order to bring it to a conclusion: every man goes on progressively in his art, until he arrives at the point of perfection attainable by him;

Reason progressive, instinct is complete.—YOUNG.

EXCURSION, RAMBLE, TOUR, TRIP, JAUNT.

Excursion signifies going out of one's course, from the Latin ex and cursus a course or prescribed path: a ramble, from roam, of which it is a frequentative, is a going without any course or regular path; tour, from the word turn or return, is a circuitous course: a trip, from the Latin tripudio to go on the toes like a dancer, is properly a pedestrian excursion or tour, or any short journey that might be made on foot: jaunt, is from the French jante the felly of a wheel, and janter to put the felly in motion.

To go abroad in a carriage is an idle excursion, or one taken for mere pleasure: travellers who are not contented with what is not to be seen from a high road make frequent excursions into the interior of the country; 'I am now so rus-in-urbeish, I believe I shall stay here, except little excursions and vagaries, for a year to come.'—GRAY. Those who are fond of rural scenery, and pleased to follow the bent of their inclinations, make frequent rambles; 'I am going on a short ramble to my Lord Oxford's.'—POPE. Those who set out upon a sober scheme of enjoyment from travelling, are satisfied with making the tour of some one country or more; 'My last summer's tour was through Worcestershire, Gloucestershire, Monmouthshire, and Shropshire.'—GRAY. Those who have not much time for pleasure take trips; 'I hold the resolution I told you in my last of seeing you if you cannot take a trip hither before I go.'—POPE. Those who have no better means of spending their time make jaunts; 'If you are for a merry jaunt, I'll try for once who can foot it farthest.'—DRYDEN.

JOURNEY, TRAVEL, VOYAGE.

Journey, from the French journée a day's work, and Latin diurnus daily, signifies the course that is taken in the space of a day, or in general any comparatively short passage from one place to another: travel, from the French travailler to labour, signifies such a course or passage as requires labour, and causes fatigue; in general any long course: voyage is most probably changed from the Latin via a way, and originally signified any course or passage to a distance, but is now confined to passages by sea.

We take journeys in different parts of the same country; we make voyages by sea, and travel by land.

Journeys are taken in different parts of the same country for a specifick business.

To Paradise, the happy seat of man,
His journey's end, and our beginning wo.—MILTON.

Travels are made by land for amusement or information; 'In my travels I had been near their setting out in Thessaly, and at the place of their landing in Carniola.'—BROWN. Voyages are made by captains or merchants for purposes of commerce; 'Our ships went sundry voyages as well to the pillars of Hercules as to other parts in the Atlantick and Mediterranean seas.'—BACON.

We estimate journeys by the day, as one or two days' journey;

Scarce the sun

Hath finished half his journey.

We estimate travels and voyages by the months and years that are employed;

Cease mourners; cease complaint, and weep no more,
Your lost friends are not dead, but gone before,
Advanc'd a stage or two upon that road
Which you must travel in the steps they trode.

CUMBERLAND.

Calm and serene, he sees approaching death,
As the safe port, th' peaceful silent shore,
Where he may rest, life's tedious voyage o'er.

JENYNS.

The Israelites are said to have journeyed in the wilderness forty years, because they went but short distances at a time. It is a part of polite education for young men of fortune to travel into those countries of Europe which comprehend the 'grand tour' as it is termed. A voyage round the world, which was at first a formidable undertaking, is now become familiar to the mind by its frequency.

ARISE OR RISE, MOUNT, ASCEND, CLIMB, SCALE.

Arise, v. To arise; mount, from the Latin mons a mountain, signifies to go as it were up a mountain; ascend, in Latin ascendo, compounded of ad and scando, signifies to climb up towards a point; climb, in German klimmen, is probably connected with klammer a hook, signifying to rise by a hook; scale, in French escalader, Italian scalare, Latin scala a ladder, signifies to rise by a ladder.

The idea of going upwards is common to all these terms; arise is used only in the sense of simply getting up;

Th' inspected entrails could no fates foretell,
Nor, laid on altars, did pure flames arise.

DRYDEN.

But rise is employed to express a continued motion upward;

To contradict them, see all nature rise!
What object, what event the moon beneath.

But argues or endears an after-scene?—YOUNG.

A person arises from his seat or his bed; a bird rises in the air; the silver of the barometer rises: the first three of these terms convey a gradation in their sense; to arise or rise denotes a motion to a less elevated height than to mount, and to mount that which is less elevated than ascend: a person rises from his seat, mounts a hill, and ascends a mountain;

At length the fatal fabric mounds the walls,
Big with destruction.—DRYDEN.

We view a rising land like distant clouds;
The mountain tops confirm the pleasing sight,
And curling smoke ascending from their height.

DRYDEN.

Arise and rise are intransitive only; the rest are likewise transitive; we rise from a point, we mount and ascend to a point, or we mount and ascend some thing; an air balloon rises when it first leaves the ground; it mounts higher and higher until it is out of sight; but if it ascends too high it endangers the life of the aerial adventurer.

Climb and scale express a species of rising: to climb is to rise step by step, by clinging to a certain body; to scale is to rise by an escalade, or species of ladder, employed in mounting the walls of fortified towns: trees and mountains are climbed: walls are scaled.

While you (a.s., that I should find it so)
To shun my sight, your native soil forego,
And climb the frozen Alps, and tread the eternal snow.
DRYDEN.

But brave Messapus, Neptune's warlike son,
Broke down the palisades, the trenches won,
And loud for ladders calls, to scale the town.
DRYDEN.

TO FALL, DROP, DROOP, SINK, TUMBLE.

Fall, v. Fall; drop and droop, in German troffen, Low German, &c. druppen, is an onomatopoeia of the falling of a drop; sink, in German sinken, is an intensive of siegen to incline downward; tumble, in German tummeln, is an intensive of taweln to reel backwards and forwards.

Fall is the generic, the rest specific terms: to drop is to fall suddenly; to droop is to drop in part; to sink is to fall gradually; to tumble is to fall awkwardly or contrary to the usual mode. In cataracts the water falls perpetually and in a mass; in rain it drops partially; in ponds the water sinks low. The head droops, but the body may fall or drop from a height, it may sink down to the earth, it may tumble by accident;

Yet come it will, the day decreed by fates
(How my heart trembles, while my tongue relates!)
The day when thou, imperial Troy! must bend,
And see thy warriours fall and glories end.—POPE.

The wounded bird, ere yet she breathed her last,
With flagging wings alighted on the mast,
A moment hung, and spread her pinions there,
Then sudden dropp'd and left her life in air.—POPE.
Thrice Dido tried to raise her drooping head,
And fainting, thrice fell grov'ling on the bed.
DRYDEN.

Down sunk the priest; the purple hand of death
Clos'd his dim eye, and fate suppress'd his breath.
POPE.

Full on his ankle dropp'd the pond'rous stone,
Burst the strong nerves, and crush'd the solid bone,
Supine he tumbles on the crimson'd sands.—POPE.

Fall, drop, and sink are employed in a moral sense; drop in the physical sense. A person falls from a state of prosperity; words drop from the lips, and sink into the heart. Corn, or the price of corn, falls; a subject drops; a person sinks into poverty or in the estimation of the world.

TO SLIP, SLIDE, GLIDE.

Slip is in Low German slipen, from the Latin labor to slip, and libo to pour, which comes from the Greek λεῖβω to pour down as water does, and the Hebrew לפ to turn aside; slide is a variation of slip, and glide of slide.

To slip is an involuntary, and slide a voluntary motion: those who go on the ice in fear will slip; 'A skilful dancer on the ropes slips willingly, and makes a seeming tumble that you may think him in great hazard, while he is only giving you a proof of dexterity.'—DRYDEN. Boys slide on the ice by way of amusement;

Thessander bold, and Sthenelus their guide,
And dire Ulysses down the cable slide.—DRYDEN.

To slip and slide are lateral movements of the feet; but to glide is the movement of the whole body, and just that easy motion which is made by slipping, sliding, flying, or swimming: a person glides along the surface of the ice when he slides; a vessel glides along through the water;

And softly let the running waters glide.—DRYDEN.

In the moral and figurative application, a person slips who commits unintentional errors, or the thoughts slip away contrary to our intention; Every one finds that many of the ideas which he desired to retain have irrevocably slipped away.—JOHNSON. A person slides into a course of life, who wittingly, and yet without difficulty, falls into the practice and habits which are recommended; he glides through life if he pursues his course smoothly and without interruption.

TO STAGGER, REEL, TOTTER.

Stagger is in all probability a frequentative from the German steigen, and the Greek σχιζέω to go, signifying to go backward and forward; to reel signifies to go like a reel in a winding manner; totter most probably comes from the German zittern to tremble, because to totter is a tremulous action.

All these terms designate an involuntary and an unsteady motion; they vary both in the cause and the mode of the action; staggering and reeling are occasioned either by drunkenness or sickness;

Nathless it bore his foe not from his sell,
But made him stagger as he were not well.
SPENSER.

The clouds, commix'd
With stars, swift gliding sweep along the sky:
All nature reels.—THOMSON.

Tottering is purely the effect of weakness, particularly the weakness of old age: a drunken man always staggers as he walks; one who is giddy reels from one part to another: to stagger is a much less degree of unsteadiness than to reel; for he who staggers is only thrown a little out of the straight path, but he who reels altogether loses his equilibrium; reeling is commonly succeeded by falling. To stagger and reel are said as to the carriage of the whole body; but totter has particular reference to the limbs; the knees and the legs totter, and consequently the footsteps become tottering. In an extended application, the mountains may be said to stagger and to reel in an earthquake: houses may totter from their very bases;

Troy nods from high, and totters to her fall.

DRYDEN.
In a figurative application, the faith or the resolution of a person staggers when its hold on the mind is shaken, and begins to give way: a nation or a government will totter when it is torn by intestine convulsions.

TO DRAW, DRAG, HAUL OR HALE, PULL, PLUCK, TUG.

Draw comes from the Latin traho to draw, and the Greek ὑπάγω to lay hold of; drag through the medium of the German tragen to carry, comes also from traho to draw; haul or hale comes from the Greek ἅλω to draw; pull is in all probability changed from pello to drive or thrust; pluck is in the German plucken, &c.; tug comes from the German ziehen to pull.

Draw expresses here the idea common to the first three terms, namely, of putting a body in motion from behind oneself or towards oneself; to drag is to draw a thing with violence, or to draw that which makes resistance; to haul is to drag it with still greater violence. A cart is drawn; a body is dragged along the ground; or a vessel is hauled to the shore;

Furious he said, and tow'rd the Grecian crew,
(Seiz'd by the crest) the unhappy warrior drew;
Struggling he follow'd, while th' embroider'd thong,
That ty'd his helmet, dragg'd the chief along.
POPE.

Some hoisting levers, some the wheels prepare,
And fasten to the horse's feet; the rest
With cables haul along the unwieldy beast.
DRYDEN.

To pull signifies only an effort to draw without the idea of motion: horses pull very long sometimes before they can draw a heavily laden cart up hill; 'Two magnets are placed, one of them in the roof and the other in the floor of Mahomet's burying-place at Mecca, and pull the impostor's iron coffin with such an equal attraction, that it hangs in the air between both of them.'—ADDISON. To pluck is to pull with a sudden twitch, in order to separate; thus feathers are plucked from animals;

Even children follow'd with endearing wile,
And pluck'd his gown, to share the good man's smile
GOLDSMITH.

To tug is to pull with violence; thus men tug at the oar;

Clear'd, as I thought, and fully fix'd at length
To learn the cause, I tugg'd with all my strength
DRYDEN

In the moral application we may be drawn by any thing which can act on the mind to bring us near to an object; we are dragged only by means of force; we pull a thing towards us by a direct effort;

Hither we sail'd, a voluntary throng,
To avenge a private, not a publick wrong;
What else to Troy the assembled nations draws,
But thine, ungrateful! and thy brother's cause.

POPE.

'T is long since I for my celestial wife,
Loath'd by the gods have dragg'd a lingering life.

POPE.

Hear this, remember, and our fury dread,
Nor pull th' unwilling vengeance on thy head.

POPE.

To haul, pluck, and tag are seldom used but in the physical application.

TO CAST, THROW, HURL.

Cast probably comes from casus, participle of cado to fall, signifying to make or to let fall; throw, in Saxon throwan, is most probably a variation of thrust, in Latin trudo, Chaldee terad to thrust repeatedly; hurl, like the word whirl, comes from the Saxon hurfian, hiveorfan, German, &c. wirbel, Teutonic wirvel, Danish hvirvel, hvirveler, Latin verto, gyro, which are all derived from the Hebrew גלגל round, signifying to turn round.

Cast conveys simply the idea of laying aside, or putting from one's self; throw and hurl designate more specifically the mode of the action: cast is an indifferent action, whether it respects ourselves or others; throw always marks a direct motive of dislike or contempt. What is not wanted is cast off; clothes which are no longer worn are cast off; what is worthless or hurtful is thrown away; the dross is separated from the wheat and thrown away; bad habits cannot be thrown off too soon.

Cast, as it respects others, is divested of all personalities; but nothing is thrown at any one without an intention of offending or hurting: a glance is cast at a person, or things are cast before him; but insinuations are thrown out against a person; things are thrown at him with the view of striking.

Cast requires no particular effort; it amounts in general to no more than let fall or go: throw is frequently accompanied with violence. Money is cast into a bag; stones are thrown from a great distance: animals cast their young at stated periods; a horse throws his rider; a lawless man throws off constraint;

As far as I could cast my eyes
Upon the sea, something methought did rise
Like bluish mists.—DRYDEN.

O war, thou son of hell!
Whom angry heavens do make their minister,
Throw in the frozen bosoms of our part
Hot coals of vengeance!—SHAKESPEARE.

Hurl is a violent species of throwing employed only on extraordinary occasions, expressive of an unusual degree of vehemence in the agent, and an excessive provocation on the part of the sufferer: the hurler, the thing hurled, and the cause of hurling, correspond in magnitude; a mighty potentate is hurled from his throne by some power superior to his own; Milton represents the devils as hurled from Heaven by the word of the Almighty; the heathen poets have feigned a similar story of the giants who made war against Heaven, and were hurled by the thunderbolts of Jupiter down to the earth;

Wreath my head
With flaming meteors, load my arms with thunder,
Which as I nimbly cut my cloudy way
I'll hurl on this ungrateful earth.—TATE.

TO SPRING, START, STARTLE, SHRINK.

Spring, v. To spring; start is in all probability an intensive of stir; startle is a frequentative of start; shrink is probably an intensive of sink, signifying to sink into itself.

The idea of a sudden motion is expressed by all these terms, but the circumstances and mode differ in all, spring (v. To arise) is indefinite in these respects, and is therefore the most general term. To spring and start may be either voluntary or involuntary movements, but spring is mostly voluntary, and start, which is an intensive of stir, is mostly involuntary; a person springs out of a place, or one animal springs upon another;

Death wounds to cure; we fall, we rise, we reign
Spring from our fetters, and fasten in the skies.

YOUNG

A person or animal starts from a certain point to begin running, or starts with fright from one side to the other;

A shape within the wat'ry gleam appear'd,
Bending to look on me: I started back,
It started back.—MILTON.

To startle is always an involuntary action; a ho starts by suddenly flying from the point on which he stands; but if he startles he seems to fly back on himself and stops his course;

'T is listening fear and dumb amazement,
When to the startled eye the sudden glance
Appears far south, eruptive through the cloud.

THOMSON

To spring and start therefore always carry a person farther from a given point; but startle and shrink are movements within one's self; startling is a sudden convulsion of the frame which makes a person to stand in hesitation whether to proceed or not; shrinking is a contraction of the frame within itself; 'There is a horror in the scene of a ravaged country which makes nature shrink back at the reflection.'—HERRING. Any sudden and unexpected sound makes a person startle; the approach of any frightful object makes him shrink back: spring and start are employed only in the proper sense of corporeal movements: startle and shrink are employed in regard to the movements of the mind as well as the body.

TO SHAKE, AGITATE, TOSS.

Shake, in German schütten, Latin quatio, Hebrew שָׁדַד to shed; agitate, in Latin agito, is a frequentative of ago to drive, that is, to drive different ways; toss is probably contracted from the Latin torsi, preterite of torqueo to twirl.

A motion more or less violent is signified by all these terms, which differ both in the manner and the cause of the motion. Shake is indefinite, it may differ in degree as to the violence; to agitate and toss rise in sense upon the word shake: a breeze shakes a leaf, a storm agitates the sea, and the waves toss a vessel to and fro: large and small bodies may be shaken; large bodies are agitated: a handkerchief may be shaken; the earth is agitated by an earthquake. What is shaken and agitated is not removed from its place; but what is tossed is thrown from place to place. A house may frequently be shaken, while the foundation remains good; 'An unwholesome blast of air, a cold, or a surfeit, may shake in pieces a man's hardy fabrick.'—SOUTH. The waters are most agitated while they remain within their bounds: 'We all must have observed that a speaker agitated with passion, or an actor, who is indeed strictly an imitator, are perpetually changing the tone and pitch of their voice as the sense of their words varies.'—SIR WM. JONES. A ball is tossed from hand to hand;

Toss'd all the day in rapid circles round,
Breathless I fell.—POPE.

To shake and toss are the acts either of persons or things; to agitate is the act of things, when taken in the active sense. A person shakes the hand of another, or the motion of a carriage shakes persons in general, and agitates those who are weak in frame; a child tosses his food about, or the violent motion of a vessel tosses every thing about which is in it. To shake arises from external or internal causes; we may be shaken by others, or shake ourselves from cold; to agitate and toss arise always from some external action, direct or indirect; the body may be agitated by violent concussion from without, or from the action of perturbed feelings: the body may be tossed by various circumstances, and the mind may be tossed to and fro by the violent action of the passions. Hence the propriety of using the terms in the moral application. The resolution is shaken, as the tree is by the wind :

Not my firm faith

Can by his fraud be shaken or seduc'd.—MILTON.

The mind is agitated like troubled waters; 'His mother could no longer bear the agitations of so many passions as thronged upon her.'—TATLER. A person is tossed to and fro in the ocean of life, as the vessel is tossed by the waves;

Your mind is tossing on the sea,

There where your argosies

Do overpeer the petty traffickers.—SHAKESPEARE.

SHOCK, CONCUSSION.

Shock denotes a violent shake or agitation; concussion, a shaking together. The shake is often instantaneous, but does not necessarily extend beyond the act of the moment; the concussion is permanent in its consequences, it tends to derange the system. Hence the different application of the terms: the shake may affect either the body or the mind; the concussion affects properly only the body, or corporeal objects; a violent and sudden blow produces a shake at the moment it is given; but it does not always produce a concussion: the violence of a fall will, however, sometimes produce a concussion in the brain, which may affect the intellects. Sudden news of an exceedingly painful nature will often produce a shake on the mind; but time mostly serves to wear away the effect which has been produced.

TO SHOOT, DART.

To shoot and dart, in the proper sense, are clearly distinguished from each other, as expressing different modes of sending bodies to a distance from a given point. From the circumstances of the actions arise their different application to other objects in the improper sense; as that which proceeds by shooting goes unexpectedly, and with great rapidity, forth from a body, so, in the figurative sense, a plant shoots up that comes so unexpectedly as not to be seen; a star is said to shoot in the sky, which seems to move in a shooting manner, from one place to another: a dart, on the other hand, or that which is darted, moves through the air visibly, and with less rapidity: hence the quick movements of persons or animals, are described by the word dart; a soldier darts forward to meet his antagonist; a hart darts past any one in order to make her escape.

TO REBOUND, REVERBERATE, RECOIL.

To rebound is to bound or spring back: a ball rebounds. To reverberate is to verberate or beat back: a sound reverberates when it echoes. To recoil is to coil or whirl back: a snake recoils. They preserve the same distinction in their figurative application; 'Honour is but the reflection of a man's own actions shining bright in the face of all about him, and from thence rebounding upon himself.'—SOUTHERN. 'You seemed to reverberate upon me with the beams of the sun.'—HOWEL.

Who in deep mines for hidden knowledge toils,
Like guns o'ercharg'd, breaks, misses, or recoils.

DENHAM.

TO SHAKE, TREMBLE, SHUDDER, QUIVER, QUAKE.

Shake, shudder, quiver, and quake, all come from the Latin quatio or cutio to shake, through the medium of the German schütteln, schütten, the Italian scuotere, and the like; tremble comes from the Latin temo.

To shake is a generic term, the rest are but modes of shaking: to tremble is to shake from an inward cause, or what appears to be so: in this manner a person trembles from fear, from cold, or weakness; and a leaf which is imperceptibly agitated by the air is also said to tremble: to shudder is to tremble violently: to quiver and quake are both to tremble quickly; but the former denotes rather a vibratory motion, as the point of a spear when thrown against wood; the latter a quick motion of the whole body, as in the case of bodies that have not sufficient consistency in themselves to remain still.

The rapid radiance instantaneous strikes
Th' illumin'd mountain, through the forest streams,
Shakes on the floods.—THOMSON.

The trembling pilot, from his rudder torn,
Was headlong hurl'd.—DRYDEN.

He said, and hurl'd against the mountain side
His quivering spear.—DRYDEN.

Thereto as cold and dreary as a snake,
That seem'd to tremble evermore and quake.

SPENSER

TO PALPITATE, FLUTTER, PANT, GASP.

Palpitate, in Latin palpitatus, from palpito, is a frequentative of the Greek πάλλω to vibrate; flutter is a frequentative of fly, signifying to fly backward and forward in an agitated manner; pant, probably derived from pent, and the Latin pendo to hang in a state of suspense, so as not to be able to move backward or forward, as is the case with the breath when one pants; gasp is a variation of gape, which is the ordinary accompaniment in the action of gasping.

These terms agree in a particular manner, as they respect the irregular action of the heart or lungs: the two former are said of the heart; and the two latter of the lungs or breath; to palpitate expresses that which is strong; it is a strong beating of the blood against the vessels of the heart: 'No plays have oftener filled the eyes with tears, and the breast with palpitation, than those which are variegated with interludes of mirth.'—JOHNSON. To flutter expresses that which is rapid; it is a violent and alternate motion of the blood backward and forward;

She springs aloft, with elevated pride,

Above the tangling mass of low desires,

That bind the fluttering crowd.—THOMSON.

Fear and suspense produce commonly palpitation, but joy and hope produce a fluttering: panting is, with regard to the breath, what palpating is with regard to the heart; panting is occasioned by the inflated state of the respiratory organs which renders this palpitation necessary:

All nature fades extinct, and she alone,

Heard, felt, and seen, possesses every thought,

Fills every sense, and pants in every vein.

THOMSON.

Gasping differs from the former, inasmuch as it denotes a direct stoppage of the breath; a cessation of action in the respiratory organs:

Had not the soul this outlet to the skies,

In this vast vessel of the universe,

How should we gasps, as in an empty void!

YOUNG.

ALARM, TERROUR, FRIGHT, CONSTERNATION.

Alarm, in French alermer, is compounded of al or ad and armes arms, signifying a cry to arms, a signal of danger, a call to defence; terroure, in Latin terror, comes from terreo to produce fear; fright, from the German furcht fear, signifies a state of fear: consternation, in Latin consternatus, from consterno to lay low or prostrate, expresses the mixed emotion of terroure and amazement which confounds.

Alarm springs from any sudden signal that announces the approach of danger. Terroure springs from any event or phenomenon that may serve as a prognostic of some catastrophe. It supposes a less distinct view of danger than alarm, and affords room to the imagination, which commonly magnifies objects. Alarm there fore makes us run to our defence, and terroure disarms us;

None so rencwn'd

With breathing brass to kindle fierce alarms.

DRYDEN.

'I was once in a mixed assembly, that was full of noise and mirth, when on a sudden an old woman unluckily observed, there were thirteen of us in company. The remark struck a panick terroure into several of us'—ADDISON.

Fright is a less vivid emotion than either, as it arises from the simple appearance of danger. It is more personal than either alarm or terror; for we may be alarmed or terrified for others, but we are mostly frightened for ourselves. Consternation is stronger than either terror or affright; it springs from the view of some very serious evil; 'I have known a soldier that has entered a breach affrighted at his own shadow.'—ADDISON.

The son of Pelias ceased; the chiefs around
In silence wrapt, in consternation drown'd.—POPE.

Alarm affects the feelings, terror the understanding, and fright the senses; consternation seizes the whole mind, and benumbs the faculties.

Cries alarm; horrid spectacles terrify; a tumult frightens; a sudden calamity fills with consternation.

One is filled with alarm, seized with terror, overwhelmed with fright or consternation.

We are alarmed for what we apprehend; we are terrified by what we imagine; we are frightened by what we see; consternation may be produced by what we learn.

TO DISMAY, DAUNT, APPAL.

Dismay is probably changed from the French des-mouvoir, signifying to move or pull down the spirit; daunt, changed from the Latin domitus conquered, signifies to bring down the spirit; appal, compounded of the intensive ap or ad and paleo to grow pale, signifies to make pale with fear.

The effect of fear on the spirit is strongly expressed by all these terms; but dismay expresses less than daunt, and this than appal. We are dismayed by alarming circumstances; we are daunted by terrifying; we are appalled by horrid circumstances. A severe defeat will dismay so as to lessen the force of resistance;

So flies a herd of bees, that hear, dismay'd,
The lions roaring through the midnight shade.

POPE.

The fiery glare from the eyes of a ferocious beast will daunt him who was venturing to approach;

Jove got such heroes as my sire, whose soul
No fear could daunt, nor earth, nor hell control.—POPE.
The sight of an apparition will appal the stoutest heart;

Now the last ruin the whole host appals;
Now Greece had trembled in her wooden walls,
But wise Ulysses call'd Tydides forth.—POPE.

BOLD, FEARLESS, INTREPID, UNDAUNTED.

Bold, v. Audacity; fearless signifies without fear (v. To apprehend); intrepid, compounded of in privative and trepidus trembling, marks the total absence of fear; undaunted, of in privative, and daunted, from the Latin domitatus, participle of domitare to impress with fear, signifies unimpressed or unmoved at the prospect of danger.

Boldness is positive; fearlessness is negative; we may therefore be fearless without being bold, or fearless through boldness;

Such unheard of prodigies hang o'er us,
As make the boldest tremble.—YOUNG.

Fearlessness is a temporary state: we may be fearless of danger at this, or at that time; fearless of loss, and the like;

The careful hen
Calls all her chirping family around,
Fed and defended by the fearless cock.—THOMSON.

Boldness is a characteristick; it is associated with constant fearlessness;

His party, press'd with numbers, soon grew faint,
And would have left their charge an easy prey;
While he alone, undaunted at the odds,
Though hopeless to escape, fought well and bravely.

ROWE.

Intrepidity and undauntedness denote a still higher degree of fearlessness than boldness: boldness is confident, it forgets the consequences; intrepidity is collected, it sees the danger, and faces it with composure; undauntedness is associated with unconquerable firmness and resolution; it is awed by nothing: the bold man proceeds on his enterprise with spirit and vivacity; the intrepid man calmly advances to the scene of death and destruction; 'I could not sufficiently wonder at the intrepidity of those diminutive mortals, who durst venture to walk upon my body, without trembling.'—SWIFT. The undaunted man keeps his countenance in the season of trial, in the midst of the most terrifying and overwhelming circumstances.

These good qualities may, without great care, degenerate into certain vices to which they are closely allied.

Of the three, boldness is the most questionable in its nature, unless justified by the absolute urgency of the case; in maintaining the cause of truth against the lawless and oppressive exercise of power, it is an essential quality, but it may easily degenerate into insolent defiance and contempt of superiors; it may lead to the provoking of resentment and courting of persecution. Intrepidity may become rashness if the contempt of danger lead to an unnecessary exposure of the life and person. Undauntedness, in the presence of a brutal tyrant, may serve to baffle all his malignant purposes of revenge; but the same spirit may be employed by the hardened villain to preserve himself from detection.

MANLY, MANFUL.

Manly, or like a man, is opposed to juvenile or puerile, and of course applied to those who are fitted to act the part of men; 'I love a manly freedom as much as any of the band of cashiers of kings.'—BURKE. Manful, or full of manhood, is opposed to effeminate, and is applicable to particular persons, or persons in particular cases; 'I opposed his whim manfully, which I think you will approve of.'—CUMBERLAND. A premature manliness in young persons is hardly less unseemly than a want of manfulness in one who is called upon to display his courage.

FEARFUL, DREADFUL, FRIGHTFUL, TREMENDOUS, TERRIBLE, TERRIFICK, HORRIBLE, HORRID.

Fearful here signifies full of that which causes fear (v. Alarm); dreadful, full of what causes dread (v. Apprehension); frightful, full of what causes fright (v. Afraid) or apprehension; tremendous, that which causes trembling; terrific, or terrifick, causing terror (v. Alarm); horrible, or horrid, causing horror. The application of these terms is easily to be discovered by these definitions: the first two affect the mind more than the senses; all the others affect the senses more than the mind: a contest is fearful when the issue is important, but the event doubtful;

She wept the terrors of the fearful wave,
Too oft, alas! the wandering lover's grave.

FALCONER.

The thought of death is dreadful to one who feels himself unprepared;

And dar'st thou threat to snatch my prize away,
Due to the deeds of many a dreadful day?—POPE.

The frightful is less than the tremendous; the tremendous than the terrific; the terrific than the horrible; shrieks may be frightful;

Frightful convulsions writh'd his tortur'd limbs

FENTON

The roaring of a lion is terrific;

Was this a face to be expos'd
In the most terrific and nimble stroke
Of quick, cross lightning?—SHAKESPEARE.

Thunder and lightning may be tremendous, or convulsions may be tremendous; the glare in the eye of a ferocious beast is terrific; 'Out of the limb of the murdered monarchy has arisen a vast, tremendous, unformed spectre, in a far more terrifick guise than any which ever yet overpowered the imagination of man.'—BURKE. The actual spectacle of killing is horrible or horrid;

Deck'd in sad triumph for the mournful field
O'er her broad shoulders hangs his horrid shield

POPE.

In their general application, these terms are often employed promiscuously to characterize whatever produces very strong impressions: hence we may speak of a frightful, dreadful, terrible, or horrid dream; or frightful, dreadful, or terrible tempest; dreadful, terrible, or horrid consequences.

TO APPREHEND, FEAR, DREAD.

Apprehend, in French appréhender, Latin apprehendo, compounded of ap and prehendo to lay hold of, in a moral sense signifies to seize with the understanding; fear comes in all probability through the medium of the Latin amor and vereor, from the Greek φρίσσω to feel a shuddering; dread, in Latin territo, comes from the Greek ταράσσω to trouble, signifying to fear with exceeding trouble.

These words rise progressively in their import; they mark a sentiment of pain at the prospect of evil: but the sentiment of apprehension is simply that of uneasiness; that of fear is anxiety; that of dread is wretchedness.

We apprehend an unpleasant occurrence; we fear a misfortune; we dread a calamity. What is possible is apprehended; 'Our natural sense of right and wrong produces an apprehension of merited punishment, when we have committed a crime.'—BLAIR. What is probable is feared; 'That which is feared may sometimes be avoided: but that which is regretted to-day may be regretted again to-morrow.'—JOHNSON. The symptom or prognostick of an evil is dreaded as if the evil itself were present;

All men think all men mortal but themselves,
Themselves, when some alarming shock of fate
Strikes through their wounded hearts the sudden dread.—YOUNG.

Apprehend respects things only; fear and dread relate to persons as well as things: we fear the person who has the power of inflicting pain or disgrace; we dread him who has no less the will than the power.

(Fear is a salutary sentiment in society, it binds men together in their several relations and dependencies, and affords the fullest scope for the exercise of the benevolent feelings; it is the sentiment of a child towards its parent or instructor; of a creature to its Creator; it is the companion of love and respect towards men, of adoration in erring and sinful mortals towards their Maker. Dread is altogether an irksome sentiment; with regard to our fellow-creatures, it arises out of the abuse of power: we dread the tyrant who delights in punishing and tormenting, his image haunts the breast of the unhappy subject, his shadow awakens terror as the approach of some direful misfortune: with regard to our Maker it springs from a consciousness of guilt, and the prospect of a severe and adequate punishment: the wrath of God may justly be dreaded.)

AWE, REVERENCE, DREAD

Awe, probably from the German achten, conveys the idea of regarding; reverence, in French reverence, Latin reverentia, comes from revereor to fear strongly; dread, in Saxon dræad, comes from the Latin territo to frighten, and Greek ταράσσω to trouble.

Awe and reverence both denote a strong sentiment of respect, mingled with some emotions of fear; but the former marks the much stronger sentiment of the two: dread is an unmingled sentiment of fear for one's personal security. Awe may be awakened by the help of the senses and understanding; reverence by that of the understanding only; and dread principally by that of the imagination.

Sublime, sacred, and solemn objects awaken awe; they cause the beholder to stop and consider whether he is worthy to approach them any nearer; they rivet his mind and body to a spot, and make him cautious, lest by his presence he should contaminate that which is hallowed; 'It were endless to enumerate all the passages, both in the sacred and profane writers, which establish the general sentiment of mankind concerning the inseparable union of a sacred and reverential awe with our ideas of the Divinity.'—BURKE. Exalted and noble objects produce reverence; they lead to every outward mark of obeisance and humiliation which it is possible for a man to express; 'If the voice of universal nature, the experience of all ages, the light of reason, and the immediate evidence of my senses, cannot awake me to a dependence upon my God, a reverence for his religion, and an humble opinion of myself, what a lost creature am I!'—CUMBERLAND. Terrific objects excite dread: they cause a shuddering of the animal frame, and a revulsion of the mind which is attended with nothing but pain;

To Phœbus next my trembling steps be led,
Full of religious doubts and awful dread.

DRYDEN.

When the creature places himself in the presence of the Creator; when he contemplates the immeasurable distance which separates himself, a frail and finite mortal, from his infinitely perfect Maker; he approaches with awe; even the sanctuary where he is accustomed thus to bow before the Almighty acquires the power of awakening the same emotions in his mind. Age, wisdom, and virtue, when combined in one person, are never approached without reverence; the possessor has a dignity in himself that checks the haughtiness of the arrogant, that silences the petulance of pride and self-conceit, that stills the noise and giddy mirth of the young, and communicates to all around a sobriety of mien and aspect. A grievous offender is seldom without dread; his guilty conscience pictures every thing as the instrument of vengeance, and every person as denouncing his merited sentence.

The solemn stillness of the tomb will inspire awe, even in the breast of him who has no dread of death. Children should be early taught to have a reverence for the Bible as a book, in distinction from all other books.

AFRAID, FEARFUL, TIMOROUS, TIMID.

Afraid is changed from afear'd, signifying in a state of fear; fearful, as the words of which it is compounded imply, signifies full of fear; timorous and timid come from the Latin timor fear, timidus fearful, and timeo to fear.

The first denotes a temporary state, the three last a habit of the mind.

Afraid may be used either in a physical or moral application, either as it relates to ourselves only or to others; fearful and timorous are only applied physically and personally; timid is mostly used in a moral sense.

It is the character of the fearful or timorous person to be afraid of what he imagines would hurt himself; it is not necessary for the prospect of danger to exist in order to awaken fear in such a disposition; 'To be always afraid of losing life is, indeed, scarcely to enjoy a life that can deserve the care of preservation.'—JOHNSON. It is the characteristic of the timid person to be afraid of offending or meeting with some thing painful from others; such a disposition is prevented from following the dictates of its own mind; 'He who brings with him into a clamorous multitude the timidity of reclusé speculation, will suffer himself to be driven by a burst of laughter from the fortresses of demonstration.'—JOHNSON.

Between fearful and timorous there is little distinction, either in sense or application, except that we say fearful of a thing, not timorous of a thing; 'By I know not what impatience of railery, he is wonderfully fearful of being thought too great a believer' STEELE.

Then birds in airy space might safely move,
And tim'rous hares on heaths securely rove.

DRYDEN.

TO FRIGHTEN, INTIMIDATE.

Between frighten and intimidate there is the same difference as between fright (v. Alarm) and fear (v. To apprehend); the danger that is near or before the eyes frightens; that which is seen at a distance intimidates. Hence females are oftener frightened, and men are oftener intimidated: noises will frighten; threats may intimidate: we may run away when we are frightened; we waver in our resolution when we are intimidated: we fear immediate bodily harm when we are frightened; we fear harm to our property as well as our persons when we are intimidated: frighten, therefore, is always applied to animals, but intimidate never;

And perch, a horror! on his sacred crown,
If that such profanation were permitted

Of the bystanders, who with reverend care
Fright them away.—CUMBERLAND.

Cortes, unwilling to employ force, endeavoured alternately to sooth and intimidate Montezuma.—ROBERTSON.

FORMIDABLE, DREADFUL, TERRIBLE, SHOCKING.

Formidable is applied to that which is apt to excite fear (v. To apprehend); dreadful (v. To apprehend) to what is calculated to excite dread; terrible (v. Alarm) to that which excites terror; and shocking from to shake is applied to that which violently shakes or agitates (v. To agitate). The formidable acts neither suddenly nor violently; 'France continued not only powerful but formidable to the hour of the ruin of the monarchy.'—BURKE. The dreadful may act violently, but not suddenly: thus the appearance of an army may be formidable; that of a field of battle is dreadful;

Think, timely think, on the last dreadful day.

DRYDEN.

The terrible and shocking act both suddenly and violently; but the former acts both on the senses and the imagination, the latter on the moral feelings only: thus the glare of a tiger's eye is terrible; the unexpected news of a friend's death is shocking; 'When men are arrived at thinking of their very dissolution with pleasure, how few things are there that can be terrible to them.'—STEELE. 'Nothing could be more shocking to a generous nobility, than the intrusting to mercenary hands the defence of those territories which had been acquired or preserved by the blood of their ancestors.'—ROBERTSON.

TREMBLING, TREMOUR, TREPIDATION.

All these terms are derived from the very same source (v. Agitation), and designate a general state of agitation: trembling is not only the most familiar but also the most indefinite term of the three; trepidation and tremour are species of trembling. Trembling expresses any degree of involuntary shaking of the frame, from the affection either of the body or the mind; cold, nervous affections, fear, and the like, are the ordinary causes of trembling;

And with unmanly tremblings shook the car.

POPE.

Tremour is a slight degree of trembling, which arises only from a mental affection; when the spirits are agitated, the mind is thrown into a tremour by any trifling incident; 'Laughter is a vent of any sudden joy that strikes upon the mind, which, being too volatile and strong, breaks out in this tremour of the voice.'—STEELE. Trepidation is more violent than either of the two, and springs from the defective state of the mind; it shows itself in the action, or the different movements of the body; those who have not the requisite composure of mind to command themselves on all occasions are apt to do what is required of them with trepidation; 'The ferocious insolence of Cromwell, the rugged brutality of Harrison, and the general trepidation of fear and wickedness (in the rebel parliament) would make a picture of unexampled variety.'—JOHNSON. Trembling is either an occasional or an habitual infirmity; there is no one who may not be sometimes seized with a trembling, and there are those who, from a lasting disease or from old age, are never rid of it; tremour is but occasional, and consequently depends rather on the nature of the occasion; no one who has a proper degree of modesty can make his first appearance in public without feeling a tremour: trepidation may be either occasional or habitual, but oftener the latter, since it arises rather from the weakness of the mind than the strength of the cause.

Trembling and tremulous are applied as epithets, either to persons or things: a trembling voice evinces trepidation of mind, a tremulous voice evinces a tremour of mind: notes in music are sometimes trembling; the motion of the leaves of trees is tremulous;

And rend the trembling unresisting prey.—POPE.

As thus th' effulgence tremulous I drank,
With cherish'd gaze.—THOMSON.

AGITATION, EMOTION, TREPIDATION, TREMOUR.

Agitation, in Latin agitatio, from agito, signifies the state of being agitated; emotion, in Latin emotio, from emotus, participle of emoveo, compounded of out and moveo to move, signifies the state of being moved out of rest or put in motion; trepidation, in Latin trepidatio, from trepido to tremble, compounded of tremo and pede to tremble with the feet, signifies the condition of trembling in all one's limbs from head to foot; tremour, v. Trembling.

Agitation refers either to the body or mind, emotion to the mind only; tremour mostly, and trepidation only, to the body.

Agitation of mind is a vehement struggle between contending feelings; emotion is the awakening but one feeling; which in the latter case is not so vehement as in the former. Distressing circumstances produce agitation; 'The seventh book affects the imagination like the ocean in a calm, and fills the mind of the reader without producing in it any thing like tumult or agitation.'—ADDISON (On Milton). Affecting and interesting circumstances produce emotions; 'The description of Adam and Eve as they first appeared to Satan, is exquisitely drawn, and sufficient to make the fallen angel gaze upon them with all those emotions of envy in which he is represented.'—ADDISON (On Milton).

Agitations have but one character, namely, that of violence: emotions vary with the object that awakens them; they are emotions either of pain or pleasure, of tenderness or anger; they are either gentle or strong, faint or vivid.

With regard to the body, agitation is more than trepidation, and the latter more than tremour: the two former attract the notice of the bystander; the latter is scarcely visible.

Agitations of the mind sometimes give rise to distorted and extravagant agitations of the body; emotions of terror or horror will throw the body into a trepidation; or any public misfortune may produce a trepidation among a number of persons; 'His first action of note was in the battle of Lepanto, where the success of that great day, in such trepidation of the state, made every man meritorious.'—WOTTON. Emotions of fear will cause a tremour to run through the whole frame; 'He fell into such a universal tremour of all his joints, that when going his legs trembled under him.'—HERVEY.

TO ACTUATE, IMPEL, INDUCE

Actuate, from the Latin actum an action, implies to call into action; impel, in Latin impello, is compounded of in, towards and pello to drive, signifying to drive towards an object; induce, in Latin induco, is compounded of in and duco, signifying to lead towards an object.

One is actuated by motives, impelled by passions, and induced by reason or inclination.

Whatever actuates is the result of reflection: it is a steady and fixed principle: whatever impels is momentary and vehement, and often precludes reflection: whatever induces is not vehement, though often momentary.

We seldom repent of the thing to which we are actuated; as the principle, whether good or bad, is not liable to change; 'It is observed by Cicero, that men of the greatest and the most shining parts are most actuated by ambition.'—ADDISON. We may frequently be impelled to measures which cause serious repentance;

When youth impell'd him, and when love inspir'd,

The listening nymphs his Dorick lays admir'd.

SIR WM. JONES.

The thing to which we are induced is seldom of sufficient importance to call for repentance;

Induced by such examples, some have taught
That bees have portions of ethereal thought.

DRYDEN.

Revenge actuates men to commit the most horrid deeds; anger impels them to the most imprudent actions; phlegmatic people are not easily induced to take any one measure in preference to another

TO EXCITE, INCITE, PROVOKE.

Excite, v. To awaken; incite, v. To encourage; provoke, v. To aggravate.

To excite is said more particularly of the inward feelings; incite is said of the external actions; provoke is said of both.

A person's passions are excited; he is incited by any particular passion to a course of conduct; a particular feeling is provoked, or he is provoked by some feeling to a particular step. Wit and conversation excite mirth;

Can then the sons of Greece (the sage rejoind'd)
Excite compassion in Achilles' mind?—POPE.

Men are incited by a lust for gain to fraudulent practices;

To her the god: Great Hector's soul incite
To dare the boldest Greek to single fight,
Till Greece provok'd from all her numbers show
A warrior worthy to be Hector's foe.—POPE.

Men are provoked by the opposition of others to intemperate language and intemperate measures; 'Among the other torments which this passion produces, we may usually observe, that none are greater mourners than jealous men, when the person who provoked their jealousy is taken from them.'—ADDISON. To excite is very frequently used in a physical acceptation; incite always, and provoke mostly, in a moral application. We speak of exciting hunger, thirst, or perspiration; of inciting to noble actions; of provoking impertinence, provoking scorn or resentment.

When excite and provoke are applied to similar objects, the former designates a much stronger action than the latter. A thing may excite a smile, but it provokes laughter; it may excite displeasure, but it provokes anger; it may excite joy or sorrow, but it provokes to madness.

TO PRESS, SQUEEZE, PINCH, GRIPE.

Press, in Latin pressus, participle of premo, which probably comes from the Greek πάμπυ; squeeze, in Saxon gūsan, Latin quasso, Hebrew רשע to press together; pinch is but a variation from pin, spine; gripe, from the German greifen, signifies to seize, like the word grapple or grasp, the Latin rapio, the Greek ῥάπτω to fish or catch, and the Hebrew גרפ to catch.

The forcible action of one body on another is included in all these terms. In the word press this is the only idea; the rest differ in the circumstances. We may press with the foot, the hand, the whole body, or any particular limb; one squeezes commonly with the hand; one pinches either with the fingers, or an instrument constructed in a similar form; one gripes with teeth, claws, or any instrument that can gain a hold of the object. Inanimate as well as animate objects press or pinch; but to squeeze and gripe are more properly the actions of animate objects; the former is always said of persons, the latter of animals; stones press that on which they rest their weight; a door which shuts off itself may pinch the fingers; one squeezes the hand of a friend; lobsters and many other shell-fish gripe whatever comes within their claws.

In the figurative application they have a similar distinction; we press a person by importunity, or by some coercive measure; 'All these women (the thirty wives of Orodes) pressed hard upon the old king, each soliciting for a son of her own.'—PRIDEAUX. An extortioner squeezes in order to get that which is given with reluctance or difficulty; 'Ventidius, receiving great sums from Herod to promote his interest, and at the same time greater to hinder it, squeezed each of them to the utmost, and served neither.'—PRIDEAUX. A miser pinches himself by contracting his assistance;

Better dispos'd to clothe the tatter'd wretch,
Who shrinks beneath the blast, to feed the poor
Pinch'd with afflictive want.—SOMERVILLE.

A covetous person gripes all that comes within his possession; 'How can he be envious for his felicity who is conscious that a very short time will give him up to the gripe of poverty.'—JOHNSON.

TO RUB, CHAFE, FRET, GALL.

To rub, through the medium of the northern languages, comes from the Hebrew רָבַח. It is the generic term, expressing simply the act of moving bodies when in contact with each other; to chafe, from the French chauffer, and the Latin calfacere to make hot, signifies to rub a thing until it is heated; to fret, like the word fritter, comes from the Latin frio to crumble, signifying to wear away by rubbing: to gall, from the noun gall, signifies to make as bitter or painful as gall, that is, to wound by rubbing. Things are rubbed sometimes for purposes of convenience; but they are chafed, fretted, and galled injuriously: the skin is liable to chafe from any violence; leather will fret from the motion of a carriage; when the skin is once broken, animals will become galled by a continuance of the friction. These terms are likewise used in the moral or figurative sense to denote the actions of things on the mind, where the distinction is clearly kept up. We meet with rubs from the opposing sentiments of others; 'A boy educated at home meets with continual rubs and disappointments (when he comes into the world).'—BEATTIE. The angry humours are chafed;

Accounted as we were, we both plung'd in
The troubled Tiber, chafing with the shores.
SHAKESPEARE.

The mind is fretted and made sore by the frequent repetition of small troubles and vexations;

And full of indignation frets,
That women should be such coquettes.—SWIFT

The pride is galled by humiliation and severe degradations;

Thus every poet in his kind
Is bit by him that comes behind,
Who, tho' too little to be seen,
Can tease and gall, and give the spleen.—SWIFT.

EBULLITION, EFFERVESCENCE, FERMENTATION.

These technical terms have a strong resemblance in their signification, but they are not strictly synonymous; having strong characteristic differences.

Ebullition, from the Latin ebullitio and ebullio, compounded of e and bullio to boil forth, marks the * commotion of a liquid acted upon by fire, and in chymistry it is said of two substances, which by penetrating each other occasion bubbles to rise up; effervescence, from the Latin effervescentia and effervesco to grow hot, marks the commotion which is excited in liquors by a combination of substances; such as of acids, which are mixed and commonly produce heat; fermentation, from the Latin fermentatio and fermentum or fervimentum, from ferveo to grow hot, marks the internal movement which is excited in a liquid of itself, by which its components undergo such a change or decomposition, as to form a new body.

Ebullition is a more violent action than effervescence; fermentation is more gradual and permanent than either. Water is exposed to ebullition when acted upon by any powerful degree of external heat; iron in aqua fortis occasions an effervescence; beer and wine undergo a fermentation before they reach a state of perfection.

These words are all employed in a figurative sense, which is drawn from their physical application. The passions are exposed to ebullitions, in which they break forth with all the violence that is observable in water agitated by excessive heat; 'Milbourn, indeed, a clergyman, attacked it (Dryden's Virgil), but his outrages seem to be the ebullitions of a mind agitated by stronger resentment than bad poetry can excite.'—JOHNSON. The heart and affections are exposed to effervescence when powerfully awakened by particular objects; 'Dryden's was not one of the gentle bosoms; he hardly conceived love but in its turbulent effervescence with some other desires.'—JOHNSON. Minds are said to be in a ferment which are agitated by conflicting feelings; 'The tumult of the world raises that eager fermentation of spirit which will ever be sending forth the dangerous fumes of folly.'—BLAIR. Ebullition and effervescence are applicable only to individuals; fermentation to one or many.

If the angry humours of an irascible temper be not restrained in early life, they but too frequently break forth in the most dreadful ebullitions in maturer years; religious zeal, when not constrained by the sober exercise of judgement, and corrected by sound knowledge, is an unhappy effervescence that injures the cause which it espouses, and often proves fatal to the individual by whom it is indulged: the ferment which was produced in the public mind by the French revolution exceeded every thing that is recorded in history of popular commotions in past ages, and will, it is to be hoped, never have its parallel at any future period. There can be no ebullition or fermentation without effervescence; but there may be effervescence without either of the former.

INTOXICATION, DRUNKENNESS, INFATUATION.

Intoxication, from the Latin toxicum a poison, signifies imbued with a poison; drunkenness signifies the state of having drunk overmuch; infatuation, from fatus foolish, signifies making foolish.

Intoxication and drunkenness are used either in the proper or the improper sense; infatuation in the improper sense only. Intoxication is a general state; drunkenness a particular state. Intoxication may be produced by various causes; drunkenness is produced only by an immoderate indulgence in some intoxicating liquor: a person may be intoxicated by the smell of strong liquors, or by vapours which produce a similar effect; he becomes drunk by the drinking of wine or other spirits. In the improper sense a deprivation of one's reasoning faculties is the common idea in the signification of all these terms. The intoxication and drunkenness spring from the intemperate state of the feelings; the infatuation springs from the ascendancy of the passions over the reasoning powers. A person is intoxicated with success, drunk with joy, and infatuated by an excess of vanity, or an impetuosity of character; 'This plan of empire was not taken up in the first intoxication of unexpected success.'—BURKE. Passion is the drunkenness of the mind.'—SOUTH. 'A sure destruction impends over those infatuated princes, who, in the conflict with this new and unheard of power, proceed as if they were engaged in a war that bore a resemblance to their former contests.'—BURKE.

A person who is naturally intoxicated reels and is giddy; he who is in the moral sense intoxicated is disorderly and unsteady in his conduct: a drunken man is deprived of the use of all his senses, and in the moral sense he is bewildered and unable to collect himself. An infatuated man is not merely foolish but wild: he carries his folly to the most extravagant pitch.

TO AWAKEN, EXCITE, PROVOKE, ROUSE, STIR UP.

To awaken is to make awake or alive; to excite, in Latin excito, compounded of the intensive syllables ex and cito, in Hebrew נחם to move, signifies to move out of a state of rest; provoke, from the Latin provoco to call forth, signifies to call forth the feelings; to rouse is to cause them to rise; and to stir, from the German stören, and the Latin turbo, is to put in commotion.

To excite and provoke convey the idea of producing something; rouse and stir up that of only calling into action that which previously exists; to awaken is used in either sense.

To awaken is a gentler action than to excite, and this is gentler than to provoke. We awaken by a simple effort; we excite by repeated efforts or forcible means; we provoke by words, looks, or actions. The tender feelings are awakened; affections or the passions in general are excited; the angry passions are commonly provoked. Objects of distress awaken a sentiment of pity; competition among scholars excites a spirit of emulation; taunting words provoke anger.

Awaken is applied only to the individual and what passes within him; excite is applicable to the outward circumstances of one or many; provoke is applicable to the conduct or temper of one or many. The attention is awakened by interesting sounds that strike upon the ear; the conscience is awakened by the voice of the preacher, or by passing events; 'The soul has its curiosity more than ordinarily awakened when it turns its thoughts upon the conduct of such who have behaved themselves with an equal, a resigned, a cheerful, a generous, or heroic temper in the extremity of death.'—STEELE. A commotion, a tumult, or a rebellion is excited among the people by the active efforts of individuals. 'In our Saviour was no form of comeliness than men should desire, no artifice or trick to catch applause, or to excite surprise.'—CUMBERLAND. Laughter or contempt is provoked by preposterous conduct;

See, Mercy! see with pure and loaded hands
Before thy shrine my country's genius stands.
When he whom e'en our joys provoke,
The fiend of nature join'd his yoke,
And rush'd in wrath to make our isles his prey;
Thy form from out thy sweet abode,
O'ertook him on the blasted road.—COLLINS.

To awaken is, in the moral, as in the physical sense, to call into consciousness from a state of unconsciousness; to rouse is forcibly to bring into action that which is in a state of inaction; and stir up is to bring into a state of agitation or commotion. We are awakened from an ordinary state by ordinary means; we are roused from an extraordinary state by extraordinary means; we are stirred up from an ordinary to an extraordinary state. The mind of a child is awakened by the action on its senses as soon as it is born;

The spark of noble courage now awake (awaken)
And strive your excellent self to excel.—SPENSER.

Some persons are not to be roused from their stupor by any thing but the most awful events;

Go, study virtue, rugged ancient worth;
Rouse up that flame our great forefathers felt
SHIRLEY

The passions, particularly of anger, are in some persons stirred up by trifling circumstances; 'The use of the passions is to stir up the mind, and put it upon action, to awake the understanding, and to enforce the will.'—ADDISON.

The conscience is sometimes awakened for a time, but the sinner is not roused to a sense of his danger, or to any exertions for his own safety, until an intemperate zeal is stirred up in him by means of enthusiastic preaching, in which case the vulgar proverb is verified, that the remedy is as bad as the disease. Death is a scene calculated to awaken some feeling in the most obdurate breast;

The fair
Repairs her smiles, awakens ev'ry grace,
And calls forth all the wonders of her face.—POPE

The tears and sighs of the afflicted excite a sentiment of commiseration; the most equitable administration of justice may excite murmurs among the discontented; the relation of worthy deeds may excite to honour and virtue; 'That kind of poetry which excites to virtue the greatest men, is of greatest use to human kind.'—DRYDEN. A harsh and unreasonable reproof will provoke a reply; or affronts provoke resentment;

Such acts
Of contumacy will provoke the Highest.—MILTON.

Continued provocations and affronts may rouse a sense of injuries in the meekest breast; 'The heat with which Luther treated his adversaries, though strained too far, was extremely well fitted by the providence of God to rouse up a people, the most phlegmatic of any in Christendom.'—ATTERBURY. Nothing is so calculated to stir up the rebellious spirits of men as the harangues of political demagogues; 'The turbulent and dangerous are for embroiling councils, stirring up seditions, and subverting constitutions, out of a mere restlessness of temper.'—STEELE.

TO ENCOURAGE, COUNTENANCE, SANCTION, SUPPORT.

Encourage has here the same general signification as in the preceding article; countenance signifies to keep in countenance; sanction, in French sanction,

Latin sanctio from sanctus sacred, signifies to ratify a decree or ordinance; in an extended sense to make any thing binding; support, in French supporter, Latin supporto, compounded of sup or sub and porto to bear, signifies to bear from underneath, to bear up.

These terms are allied in their application to persons or things personal; persons or things are encouraged and supported; persons are countenanced; things are sanctioned; measures or persons are encouraged and supported by every means which may forward the object; persons are countenanced in their proceedings by the apparent approbation of others; measures are sanctioned by the consent or approbation of others.

To encourage is a general and indefinite term, we may encourage a person or his conduct by various ways; 'Every man encourages the practice of that vice which he commits in appearance, though he avoids it in fact.'—HAWKESWORTH. Countenancing is a direct mode of encouragement, it consists of some outward demonstration of regard or good will towards the person; 'A good man acts with a vigour and suffers with a patience more than human, when he believes himself countenanced by the Almighty.'—BLAIR. There is most of authority in sanctioning; it is the lending of a name, an authority, or an influence, in order to strengthen and confirm the thing; 'Men of the greatest sense are always diffident of their private judgement, until it receives a sanction from the publick.'—ADDISON. There is most of assistance and co-operation in support; it is the employment of means to an end; 'The apparent insufficiency of every individual to his own happiness or safety compels us to seek from one another assistance and support.'—JOHNSON. Persons in all conditions may encourage and support; superiours only can countenance or sanction: those who countenance evil doers give a sanction to their evil deeds; those who support either an individual or a cause ought to be satisfied that they are entitled to support.

TO ENCOURAGE, ANIMATE, INCITE, IMPEL, URGE, STIMULATE, INSTIGATE.

Encourage, compounded of en or in and courage, signifies to inspire with courage; animate, in Latin animatus, participle of animare and anima the soul, signifies in the proper sense to give life, and in the moral sense to give spirit; incite, from the Latin cito, and the Hebrew נד to stir up, signifies to put into motion towards an object; impel signifies the same as in the preceding article; urge, in Latin urgeo, comes from the Greek root σπύω to set to work; stimulate, from the Latin stimulus a spur or goad; and instigate, from the Latin stigo, and Greek σίζω, signify literally to goad.

The idea of actuating, or calling into action, is common to these terms, which vary in the circumstances of the action.

Encouragement acts as a persuasive, animate as an impelling or enlivening cause: those who are weak require to be encouraged; those who are strong become stronger by being animated: the former require to have their difficulties removed, their powers renovated, their doubts and fears dispelled; the latter may have their hopes increased, their prospects brightened, and their powers invigorated; we are encouraged not to give up or slacken in our exertions; we are animated to increase our efforts: the sinner is encouraged by offers of pardon, through the merits of a Redeemer, to turn from his sinful ways; 'He would have women follow the camp, to be spectators and encouragers of noble actions.'—BURTON. The Christian is animated by the prospect of a blissful eternity, to go on from perfection to perfection; 'He that prosecutes a lawful purpose, by lawful means, acts always with the approbation of his own reason: he is animated through the course of his endeavours by an expectation which he knows to be just.'—JOHNSON.

What encourages and animates acts by the finer feelings of our nature; what incites acts through the medium of our desires: we are encouraged by kindness; we are animated by the hope of reward; we are incited by the desire of distinction or the love of gain; 'While a rightful claim to pleasure or to affluence must be procured either by slow industry or uncertain hazard, there will always be multitudes whom cowardice or impatience incite to more safe and speedy methods of getting wealth.'—JOHNSON. What impels urges, stimulates, and instigates, acts forcibly, be the cause internal or external: we are impelled and stimulated mostly by what is internal; we are urged and instigated by both the internal and external, but particularly the latter: we are impelled by motives; we are stimulated by passions; we are urged and instigated by the representations of others: a benevolent man is impelled by motives of humanity to relieve the wretched;

So Myrrha's mind, impell'd on either side,
Takes ev'ry bent, but cannot long abide.

DRYDEN.

An ardent mind is stimulated by ambition to great efforts; 'Some persons from the secret stimulations of vanity or envy, despise a valuable book, and throw contempt upon it by wholesale.'—WATTS. We are urged by entreaties to spare those who are in our power; one is instigated by malicious representations to take revenge on a supposed enemy.

We may be impelled and urged though not properly stimulated or instigated by circumstances; in this case the two former differ only in the degree of force in the impelling cause: less constraint is laid on the will when we are impelled, than when we are urged, which leaves no alternative or choice: a monarch is sometimes impelled by the state of the nation to make a peace less advantageous than he would otherwise do;

Thus, while around the wave-subjected soil
Impels the natives to repeated toil,
Industrious habits in each bosom reign.

GOLDSMITH.

A prince may be urged by his desperate condition to throw himself upon the mercy of the enemy;

What I have done my safety urg'd me to.

SHAKESPEARE.

A man is impelled, by the mere necessity of choosing, to take one road in preference to another; he is urged by his pecuniary embarrassments to raise money at a great loss.

We may be impelled, urged, and stimulated to that which is good or bad; we are never instigated to that which is good: we may be impelled by curiosity to pry into that which does not concern us; we may be urged by the entreaties of those we are connected with to take steps of which we afterward repent, or have afterward reason to approve; 'The magistrate cannot urge obedience upon such potent grounds as the minister.'—SOUTH. We may be stimulated by the desire of distinction or by necessity;

For every want that stimulates the breast
Becomes a source of pleasure when redres'd.

GOLDSMITH.

Those who are not hardened in vice require the instigation of persons more abandoned than themselves, before they will commit any desperate act of wickedness; 'There are few instigations in this country to a breach of confidence.'—HAWKESWORTH.

The encouragement and incitement are the abstract nouns either for the act of encouraging or inciting, or the thing that encourages or incites: the encouragement of laudable undertakings is itself laudable; a single word or look may be an encouragement;

For when he dies, farewell all honour, bounty,
All generous encouragement of arts.—OTWAY.

The incitement of passion is at all times dangerous, but particularly in youth; money is said to be an incitement to evil; the prospect of glory is an incitement to great actions;

Let his actions speak him, and this shield,
Let down from heaven, that to his youth will yield
Such copy of incitement.—B. JONSON.

Incentive, which is another derivative from incite, has a higher application for things that incite, being mostly applied to spiritual objects: a religious man wants no incentives to virtues; his own breast furnishes him with those of the noblest kind; 'Even the wisdom of God hath not suggested more pressing motives, more powerful incentives to charity, than these, that we shall be judged by it at the last dreadful day.'—ATTERBURY. Impulse is the derivative from impel, and denotes the act of impelling or the thing that impels; stimulus, which is the root of the word stimulate, naturally designates the instrument, namely, the spur or goad with which one is stimulated: hence we speak of acting by a blind impulse, or of wanting a stimulus to exertion; 'If these little impulses set the great wheels of devotion on work, the largeness and height of that shall not at all be prejudiced by the smallness of the occasion.'—SOUTH.

TO ENCOURAGE, ADVANCE, PROMOTE, PREFER, FORWARD.

To encourage signifies the same as in the preceding article; advance, from the Latin advocio to come near, signifies here to cause to come near a point; promote, from the Latin promoveo, signifies to move forward; prefer, from the Latin præfero, or fero and præ, to set before, signifies to set up before others; to forward is to put forward.

The idea of exerting one's influence to the advantage of an object is included in the signification of all these terms, which differ in the circumstances and mode of the action: to encourage, advance, and promote are applicable to both persons and things; prefer to persons only; forward to things only.

First, as to persons, encourage is partial as to the end, and indefinite as to the means: we may encourage a person in any thing, however trivial, and by any means: thus we may encourage a child in his rudeness, by not checking him; or we may encourage an artist or a man of letters in some great national work; but to advance, promote, and prefer are more general in their end, and specific in the means: a person may advance himself, or may be advanced by others; he is promoted and preferred only by others: a person's advancement may be the fruit of his industry, or result from the efforts of his friends; promotion and preferment are the work of one's friends; the former in regard to offices in general, the latter mostly in regard to ecclesiastical situations: it is the duty of every one to encourage, to the utmost of his power, those among the poor who strive to obtain an honest livelihood; 'Religion depends upon the encouragement of those that are to dispense and assert it.'—SOUTH. It is every man's duty to advance himself in life by every legitimate means; 'No man's lot is so unalterably fixed in this life, but that a thousand accidents may either forward or disappoint his advancement.'—HUGHES. It is the duty and the pleasure of every good man in the state to promote those who show themselves deserving of promotion; 'Your zeal in promoting my interest deserves my warmest acknowledgments.'—BEATTIE. It is the duty of a minister to accept of preferment when it offers, but it is not his duty to be solicitous for it; 'If I were now to accept preferment in the church, I should be apprehensive that I might strengthen the hands of the gainsayers.'—BEATTIE.

When taken in regard to things, encourage is used in an improper or figurative acceptance; the rest are applied properly: we encourage an undertaking by giving courage to the undertaker; 'The great encouragement which has been given to learning for some years last past, has made our own nation as glorious upon this account as for its late triumphs and conquests.'—ADDISON. But when we speak of advancing a cause, or promoting an interest, or forwarding a purpose, the terms properly convey the idea of keeping things alive, or in a motion towards some desired end: to advance is however generally used in relation to whatever admits of extension and aggrandizement; promote is applied to whatever admits of being brought to a point of maturity or perfection; 'I love to see a man zealous in a good matter, and especially when his zeal shows itself for advancing morality, and promoting the happiness of mankind.'—ADDISON. Forward is but a partial term, employed in the sense of promote in regard to particular objects; thus we advance religion or learning; we promote an art or an invention; we forward a plan; 'It behooves us not to be wanting to ourselves in forwarding the intention of nature by the culture of our minds.'—BERKELEY.

TO ENCOURAGE, EMBOLDEN.

To encourage is to give courage, and to embolden to make bold; the former impelling to action in general, the latter to that which is more difficult or dangerous: we are encouraged to persevere; the resolution is thereby confirmed: we are emboldened to begin; the spirit of enterprise is roused. Success encourages; the chance of escaping danger emboldens.

Outward circumstances, however trivial, serve to encourage;

Intrepid through the midst of danger go,
Their friends encourage and amaze the foe.

DRYDEN.

The urgency of the occasion, or the importance of the subject, serves to embolden;

Embolden'd then, nor hesitating more,
Fast, fast they plunge amid the flashing wave.

THOMSON

A kind word or a gentle look encourages the suppliant to tender his petition; where the cause of truth and religion is at stake, the firm believer is emboldened to speak out with freedom: timid dispositions are not to be encouraged always by trivial circumstances, but sanguine dispositions are easily emboldened; the most flattering representations of friends are frequently necessary to encourage the display of talent; the confidence natural to youth is often sufficient of itself to embolden men to great undertakings.

TO DETER, DISCOURAGE, DISHEARTEN.

Deter, in Latin deterreo, compounded of de and terreo, signifies to frighten away from a thing; discourage and dishearten, by the privative dis, signify to deprive of courage or heart.

One is deterred from commencing any thing, one is discouraged or disheartened from proceeding. A variety of motives may deter any one from an undertaking; but a person is discouraged or disheartened mostly by the want of success or the hopelessness of the case. The wicked are sometimes deterred from committing enormities by the fear of punishment: projectors are discouraged from entering into fresh speculations by observing the failure of others; there are few persons who would not be disheartened from renewing their endeavours, who had experienced nothing but ill success. The prudent and the fearful are alike easily to be deterred;

But thee or fear deters, or sloth detains,
No drop of all thy father warms thy veins.

POPE.

Impatient people are most apt to be discouraged; and proud people are the most apt to discourage the humble; 'The proud man discourages those from approaching him who are of a mean condition, and who must want his assistance.'—ADDISON. Faint-hearted people are easiest disheartened;

Be not disheartened then, nor cloud those looks,
That want to be more cheerful and serene,
Than when fair morning first smiles on the world.

MILTON.

The fool-hardy and the obdurate are the least easily deterred from their object; the persevering will not suffer themselves to be discouraged by particular failures; the resolute and self-confident will not be disheartened by trifling difficulties.

TO EXHORT, PERSUADE.

Exhort, in Latin exhortor, is compounded of ex and hortor, from the Greek hortai, perfect passive of hortai to excite or impel; persuade has the same signification as given under the head of Conviction.

Exhortation has more of impelling in it; persuasion more of drawing: a superiour exhort; his words carry authority with them, and rouse to action;

Their pinions still
In loose librations stretch'd, to trust the void
Trembling refuse, till down before them fly
The parent guises, and chide, exhort, command.

THOMSON

A friend or an equal persuades; he wins and draws by the agreeableness or kindness of his expressions; 'Gay's friends persuaded him to sell his share in the South Sea stock, but he dreamed of dignity and splendour.'—JOHNSON. Exhortations are employed only in matters of duty or necessity; persuasions are employed in matters of pleasure or convenience.

TO PERSUADE, ENTICE, PREVAIL UPON.

Persuade (v. Conviction) and entice (v. To allure) are employed to express different means to the same end: namely, that of drawing any one to a thing: one persuades a person by means of words; one entices him either by words or actions; one may persuade either to a good or bad thing; 'I beseech you let me have so much credit with you as to persuade you to communicate any doubt or scruple which occur to you, before you suffer them to make too deep an impression upon you.'—CLARENDON. One entices commonly to that which is bad;

If gaming does an aged sire entice,
Then my young master swiftly learns the vice.

DRYDEN.

One uses arguments to persuade, and arts to entice.

Persuade and entice comprehend either the means or the end or both: prevail upon comprehends no more than the end: we may persuade without prevailing upon, and we may prevail upon without persuading. Many will turn a deaf ear to all our persuasions, and will not be prevailed upon, although persuaded: on the other hand, we may be prevailed upon by the force of remonstrance, authority, and the like; and in this case we are prevailed upon without being persuaded. We should never persuade another to do that which we are not willing to do ourselves; credulous or good-natured people are easily prevailed upon to do things which tend to their own injury; 'Herod, hearing of Agrippa's arrival in Upper Asia, went thither to him and prevailed with him to accept an invitation.'—PRIDEAUX.

DELIGHTFUL, CHARMING.

Delightful is applied either to material or spiritual objects; charming mostly to objects of sense.

When they both denote the pleasure of the sense, delightful is not so strong an expression as charming; a prospect may be delightful or charming; but the latter raises to a degree that carries the senses away captive.

Of music we should rather say that it was charming than delightful, as it acts on the senses in so powerful a manner; 'Nothing can be more magnificent than the figure Jupiter makes in the first Iliad, nor more charming than that of Venus in the first Æneid.'—ADDISON. On the other hand, we should with more propriety speak of a delightful employment to relieve distress, or a delightful spectacle to see a family living together in love and harmony; 'Though there are several of those wild scenes that are more delightful than any artificial shows, yet we find the works of nature still more pleasant the more they resemble those of art.'—ADDISON.

BECOMING, COMELY, GRACEFUL.

Becoming, v. Becoming, decent; and comely, or come like, signifies coming or appearing as one would have it; graceful signifies full of grace.

These epithets are employed to mark in general what is agreeable to the eye. Becoming denotes less than comely, and this less than graceful: nothing can be comely or graceful which is unbecoming; although many things are becoming which are neither comely nor graceful.

Becoming respects the decorations of the person, and the exterior deportment; comely respects natural embellishments; graceful natural or artificial accomplishments: manner is becoming; figure is comely; air, figure, or attitude is graceful.

Becoming is relative; it depends on taste and opinion; on accordance with the prevailing sentiments or particular circumstances of society; comely and graceful are absolute; they are qualities felt and acknowledged by all.

What is becoming is confined to no rank; the highest and the lowest have, alike, the opportunity of doing or being that which becomes their station; 'The care of doing nothing unbecoming has accompanied the greatest minds to their last moments. Thus Cæsar gathered his robe about him that he might not fall in a manner unbecoming of himself.'—SPECTATOR. What is comely is seldom associated with great refinement and culture; 'The comeliness of person, and the decency of behaviour, add infinite weight to what is pronounced by any one.'—SPECTATOR. What is graceful is rarely to be discovered apart from high rank, noble birth, or elevation of character; 'To make the acknowledgment of a fault in the highest manner graceful, it is lucky when the circumstances of the offender place him above any ill consequences from the resentment of the person offended.'—STEELE

BEAUTIFUL, FINE, HANDSOME, PRETTY.

Beautiful, or full of beauty, in French beau, comes from beau, belle, in Latin bellus fair, and bonus or bonus good; fine, in French fin, German fein, &c. not improbably comes from the Greek φαῖνος bright, splendid, and φαῖνω to appear, because what is fine is by distinction clear; handsome, from the word hand, denotes a species of beauty in the body, as handy denotes its agility and skill; pretty, in Saxon præte adorned, German prächtigt, Swedish prätigt splendid, is connected with our words parade and pride.

Of these epithets, which denote what is pleasing to the eye, beautiful conveys the strongest meaning; it marks the possession of that in its fullest extent, of which the other terms denote the possession in part only. Fineness, handsomeness, and prettiness are to beauty as parts to a whole.

When taken in relation to persons, a woman is beautiful, who in feature and complexion possesses a grand assemblage of graces; a woman is fine, who with a striking figure unites shape and symmetry; a woman is handsome who has good features, and pretty if with symmetry of feature be united delicacy.

The beautiful is determined by fixed rules; it admits of no excess or defect; it comprehends regularity, proportion, and a due distribution of colour, and every particular which can engage the attention; the fine must be coupled with grandeur, majesty, and strength of figure; it is incompatible with that which is small; a little woman can never be fine; the handsome is a general assemblage of what is agreeable; it is marked by no particular characteristic, but the absence of all deformity.

Prettiness is always coupled with simplicity, it is incompatible with that which is large; a tall woman with masculine features cannot be pretty; "Indeed, my dear," says she, "you make me mad sometimes, so you do, with the silly way you have of treating me like a pretty idiot."—STEELE.

Beauty will always have its charms; they are, however, but attractions for the eye; they please and awaken ardent sentiments for a while; but the possessor must have something else to give her claims to lasting regard. This is, however, seldom the case. Providence has dealt out his gifts with a more even hand. Neither the beautiful, nor the fine woman have in general those durable attractions which belong either to the handsome or the pretty, who with a less inimitable tint of complexion, a less unerring proportion in the limbs, a less precise symmetry of feature, are frequently possessed of a sweetness of countenance; a vivacity in the eye, and a grace in the manner, that wins the beholder and inspires affection.

Beauty is peculiarly a female perfection; in the male sex it is rather a defect; a beautiful man will not be respected, because he cannot be respectable. The possession of beauty deprives him of his many characteristics; boldness and energy of mind; strength and robustness of limb. But though a man may not be beautiful or pretty, he may be fine or handsome; 'A handsome fellow immediately alarms jealous husbands, and every thing that looks young or gay turns their thoughts upon their wives.'—ADDISON. The same observation does not apply to the brute creation; 'It is observed among birds that nature has lavished all her ornaments upon the male, who very often appears in a most beautiful head-dress.'—ADDISON.

When relating to other objects, beautiful, fine, pretty, have a strong analogy.

With respect to the objects of nature, the beautiful is displayed in the works of creation, and wherever it appears it is marked by elegance, variety, harmony proportion; but above all by that softness, which a peculiar to female beauty; 'There is nothing that makes its way more directly to the soul than beauty, which immediately diffuses a secret satisfaction and complacency through the imagination.'—ADDISON.

The fine on the contrary is associated with the grand, and the pretty with the simple. The sky presents either a beautiful aspect, or a fine aspect; but not a pretty aspect.

A rural scene is beautiful when it unites richness and diversity of natural objects with superiour cultivation; it is fine when it presents the bolder and more impressive features of nature, consisting of rocks and mountains; it is pretty, when, divested of all that is extraordinary, it presents a smiling view of nature in the gay attire of shrubs, and many-coloured flowers, and verdant meadows, and luxuriant fields.

Beautiful sentiments have much in them to interest the affections, as well as the understanding; they make a vivid impression; fine sentiments mark an elevated mind and a loftiness of conception; they occupy the understanding, and afford scope for reflection; they make a strong impression; 'When in ordinary discourse, we say a man has a fine head, a long head, or a good head, we express ourselves metaphorically, and speak in relation to his understanding; whereas, when we say of a woman, she has a fine, a long, or a good head, we speak only in relation to her comode.'—ADDISON. Pretty ideas are but pleasing associations or combinations that only amuse for the time being, without producing any lasting impression. In the same manner expressions are termed pretty; 'An innocent creature, who would start at the name of strumpet, may think it pretty to be called a mistress.'

—SPECTATOR. We may speak of a beautiful poem, although not a beautiful tragedy; but a fine tragedy, and a pretty comedy.

Imagery may be beautiful and fine, but seldom pretty. The celestial bodies, revolving with so much regularity in their orbits, and displaying so much brilliancy of light, are beautiful objects. The display of an army drawn up in battle array; the neatness of the men; the order, complexity, and variety of their movements, and the precision in their discipline, afford a fine spectacle. An assemblage of children imitating in their amusements the system and regularity of more serious employments, and preserving at the same time the playfulness of childhood, is a pretty sight.

Handsome is applied to some objects in the sense of ample or liberal, as a handsome fortune, or handsome treatment; 'A letter dated Sept. acquaints me that the writer, being resolved to try his fortune, had fasted all that day, and that he might be sure of dreaming upon something at night, procured a handsome slice of bride cake.'—SPECTATOR.

FINE, DELICATE, NICE.

It is remarkable of the word fine (v. Beautiful), that it is equally applicable to large and small objects; delicate, in Latin delicatus, from delicæ delights, and delicæ to allure, is applied only to small objects. Fine in the natural sense denotes smallness in general. Delicate denotes a degree of fineness that is agreeable to the taste. Thread is said to be fine as opposed to the coarse and thick; silk is said to be delicate, when to fineness of texture it adds softness. The texture of a spider's web is remarkable for its fineness; that of the ermine's fur is remarkable for its delicacy. In writing, all up-strokes must be fine; but in superiour writing they will be delicately fine. When applied to colours, the fine is coupled with the grand and the strong; delicate with what is minute, soft, and fair; blue and red may be fine colours; and white and pink delicate colours. The tulip is reckoned one of the finest flowers; the white rose is a delicate flower. A fine painter delineates with boldness; but the artist who has a delicate taste, throws delicate touches into the grandest delineations.

In their moral application these terms admit of the same distinction; the fine approaches either to the strong or to the weak; 'Every thing that results from nature alone lies out of the province of instruction; and no rules that I know of will serve to give a fine form, a fine voice, or even those fine feelings, which are among the first properties of an actor.'—CRAN-

BERLAND. The delicate is a high degree of the fine, as a fine thought, which may be lofty; or a fine feeling, which is acute and tender; and delicate feeling, which exceeds the former in fineness;

Chief, lovely Spring! in thee and thy soft scenes
The smiling God is seen; while water, earth,
And air attest his bounty, which exalts

The brute creation to this finer thought.—THOMSON

'Under this head of elegance I reckon those delicate and regular works of art, as elegant buildings, or pieces of furniture.'—BURKE. The French use their word fin only in the latter sense, of acuteness, and apply it merely to the thoughts and designs of men, answering either to our word subtle, as un homme fin, or neat, as une satire fine.

Delicate is said of that which is agreeable to the sense and the taste; nice to what is agreeable to the appetite: the former is a term of refinement: the latter of epicurism and sensual indulgence. The delicate affords pleasure only to those whose thoughts and desires are purified from what is gross; the nice affords pleasure to the young, ignorant, and the sensual: thus delicate food, delicate colours, delicate shapes and form, are always acceptable to the cultivated; a meal, a show, a colour, and the like, will be nice to a child, which suits its appetite, or meets its fancy.

When used in a moral application, nice, which is taken in a good sense, approaches nearer to the signification of delicate. A person may be said to have a delicate ear in music, whose ear is offended with the smallest discordance; he may be said to have a nice taste or judgement in music, who scientifically discriminates the beauties and defects of different pieces. A person is delicate in his choice, who is guided by taste and feeling; he is nice in his choice, who adheres to a strict rule.

A point in question may be either delicate or nice; it is delicate, as it is likely to touch the tender feelings of any party; it is nice, as it involves contrary interests, and becomes difficult of determination. There are delicacies of behaviour which are learned by good breeding, but which minds of a refined cast are naturally alive to, without any particular learning; 'The commerce in the conjugal state is so delicate that it is impossible to prescribe rules for it.'—STEELE. There are niceities in the law, which none but men of superiour intellect can properly enter into and discriminate; 'The highest point of good breeding, if any one can hit it, is to show a very nice regard to your own dignity, and, with that in your heart, to express your value for the man above you.'—STEELE.

DAINTY, DELICACY.

These terms, which are in vogue among epicures, have some shades of difference in their signification not altogether undeserving of notice.

Dainty, from dain, deign, and the Latin dignus worthy, signifies the thing that is of worth or value; it is of course applied only to such things as have a superiour value in the estimation of epicures; and consequently conveys a more positive meaning than delicacy; inasmuch as a dainty may be that which is extremely delicate, a delicacy is sometimes a species of dainty; but there are many delicacies which are altogether suited to the most delicate appetite, that are neither costly nor rare, two qualities which are almost inseparable from a dainty: those who indulge themselves freely in dainties and delicacies scarcely know what it is to eat with an appetite; but those who are temperate in their use of the enjoyments of life will be enabled to derive pleasure from ordinary objects;

My landlord's cellar stocked with beer and ale,
Instantly brings the choicest liquors out,
Whether we ask'd for home-brew'd or for stout,
For mead or cider; or with dainties fed,
Ring for a flask or two of white or red.—SWIFT.

She turns, on hospitable thoughts intent,
What choice to choose for delicacy best —MILTON.

GRACE, CHARM.

Grace is altogether corporeal; charm is either corporeal or mental; the grace qualifies the action of the body; 'Savage's method of life particularly qualified him for conversation, of which he knew how to practise all the graces."—JOHNSON. The charm is an inherent quality in the body itself;

Music has charms to sooth the savage breast.

CONGREVE.

A lady moves, dances, and walks with grace; the charms of her person are equal to those of her mind.

GRACEFUL, COMELY, ELEGANT.

A graceful figure is rendered so by the deportment of the body. A comely figure has that in itself which pleases the eye. Gracefulness results from nature, improved by art; 'The first who approached her was a youth of graceful presence and courtly air, but dressed in a richer habit than had ever been seen in Arcadia.'—STEELE. Comeliness is mostly the work of nature;

'Isidas the son of Phœbias was at this time in the bloom of his youth, and very remarkable for the comeliness of his person.'—ADDISON. It is possible to acquire gracefulness by the aid of the dancing-master, but for a comely form we are indebted to nature aided by circumstances. Grace is a quality pleasing to the eye; but elegance, from the Latin eligo, electus, select and choice, is a quality of a higher nature, that inspires admiration; elegant is applicable, like graceful, to the motion of the body, or, like comely, to the person, and is extended in its meaning also to language and even to dress; 'The natural progress of the works of men is from rudeness to convenience, from convenience to elegance, and from elegance to nicety.'—JOHNSON. A person's step is graceful; his air or his movements are elegant.

Grace is in some degree a relative quality; the gracefulness of an action depends on its suitability to the occasion; elegance is a positive quality; it is, properly speaking, beauty in regard to the exterior of the person; an elegance of air and manner is the consequence not only of superior birth and station, but also of superior natural endowments.

AWKWARD, CLUMSY.

Awkward, in Saxon æwerd, compounded of æ or a adverbative and ward, from the Teutonic währen to see or look, that is, looking the opposite way, or being in an opposite direction, as toward signifies looking the same way, or being in the same direction; clumsy, from the same source as clump and lump, in German lumpisch, denotes the quality of heaviness and unseemliness.

These epithets denote what is contrary to rule and order, in form or manner. Awkward respects outward deportment; clumsy the shape and make of the object; a person has an awkward gait, or is clumsy in his whole person.

Awkwardness is the consequence of bad education; clumsiness is mostly a natural defect. Young recruits are awkward in marching, and clumsy in their manual labour.

They may be both employed figuratively in the same sense, and sometimes in relation to the same objects: when speaking of awkward contrivances, or clumsy contrivances, the latter expresses the idea more strongly than the former; 'Montaigne had many awkward imitators, who, under the notion of writing with the fire and freedom of this lively old Gascon, have fallen into confused rhapsodies and uninteresting egotisms.'—WARTON. 'All the operations of the Greeks in sailing were clumsy and unskilful.'—ROBERTSON.

AWKWARD CROSS, UNTOWARD, CROOKED, FROWARD, PERVERSE.

Awkward, v. Awkward; cross, from the noun cross, implies the quality of being like a cross; untoward signifies the reverse of toward (v. Awkward): crooked signifies the quality of resembling a crook; froward, that is, from ward, signifies running a contrary direction; perverse, Latin perversus, participle of pervert, compounded of per and verto, signifies turned aside.

Awkward, cross, untoward, and crooked are used as epithets in relation to the events of life or the disposition of the mind; froward and perverse respect only the disposition of the mind. Awkward circumstances are apt to embarrass: cross circumstances to pain; crooked and untoward circumstances to defeat. What is crooked springs from a perverted judgement; what is untoward is independent of human control. In our intercourse with the world there are always little awkward incidents arising, which a person's good sense and good nature will enable him to pass over without disturbing the harmony of society; 'It is an awkward thing for a man to print in defence of his own work against a chimera: you know not who or what you fight against.'—POPE. It is the lot of every one in his passage through life to meet with cross accidents that are calculated to ruffle the temper; but he proves himself to be the wisest whose serenity is not so easily disturbed; 'Some are indeed stopped in their career by a sudden shock of calamity, or diverted to a different direction by the cross impulse of some violent passion.'—JOHNSON. A crooked policy obstructs the prosperity of individuals, as well as of states;

There are who can, by potent magic spells,
Bend to their crooked purpose nature's laws.

MILTON.

Many men are destined to meet with severe trials in the frustration of their dearest hopes, by numberless untoward events which call for the exercise of patience; in this case the Christian can prove to himself and others the infinite value of his faith and doctrine;

The rabbins write when any Jew
Did make to God or man a vow,
Which afterward he found untoward,
Or stubborn to be kept, or too hard:
Any three other Jews o' th' nation
Might free him from the obligation.—HUDIBRAS.

When used with regard to the disposition of the mind, awkward expresses less than froward, and froward less than perverse. Awkwardness is for the most part an habitual frailty of temper; it includes certain weaknesses and particularities, pertinaciously adhered to. Sometimes it is a temporary feeling that is taken up on a particular occasion;

A kind and constant friend
To all that regularly offend,
But was implacable and awkward,
To all that interlop'd and hawker'd.—HUDIBRAS.

Crossness is a partial irritation resulting from the state of the humours, physical and mental. Frowardness and perversity lie in the will: a froward temper is capricious; it wills or wills not to please itself without regard to others: 'To fret and repine at every disappointment of our wishes is to discover the temper of froward children.'—BLAIR. Perversity lies deeper; taking root in the heart, it assumes the shape of malignity: a perverse temper is really wicked; it likes or dislikes by the rule of contradiction to another's will; 'Interference of interest, or perversity of disposition, may occasionally lead individuals to oppose, even to hate, the upright and the good.'—BLAIR. Untowardness lies in the principles; it runs counter to the wishes and counsels of another; 'Christ had to deal with a most untoward and stubborn generation.'—BLAIR.

An awkward temper is connected with self-sufficiency; it shelters itself under the sanction of what is apparently reasonable; it requires management and indulgence in dealing with it. Crossness and frowardness are peculiar to children; indiscriminate indulgence of the rising will engenders those diseases of the mind, which if fostered too long in the breast become incorrigible by any thing but a powerful sense of religion. Perversity is, however, but too commonly the result of a vicious habit, which imbibers the happiness of all who have the misfortune of coming in collision with it. Untowardness is also another fruit of these evil tempers. A froward child becomes an untoward youth, who turns a deaf ear to all the admonitions of an afflicted parent.

CAPTIOUS, CROSS, PEEVISH, PETULANT, FRETFUL.

Captious, in Latin captiosus, from capio, signifies taking or treating in an offensive manner; cross, after the noun cross, marks the temper which resembles a cross; peevish, probably changed from beish, signifies easily provoked, and ready to sting like a bee; fretful, from the word fret, signifies full of fretting; fret, which is in Saxon fretan, comes from the Latin fricatus, participle of frico to wear away with rubbing; petulant, in Latin petulans, from peto to seek, signifies seeking or catching up.

All these terms indicate an unamiable working and expression of temper. Captious marks a readiness to be offended: cross indicates a readiness to offend: peevish expresses a strong degree of crossness: fretful a complaining impatience: petulant a quick or sudden impatience. Captiousness is the consequence of misplaced pride: crossness of ill-humour; peevishness and fretfulness of a painful irritability; petulance is either the result of a naturally hasty temper or of a sudden irritability; adults are most prone to be captious; they have frequently a self-importance which is in perpetual danger of being offended; ' Captiousness and jealousy are easily offended; and to him who studiously looks for an affront, every mode of behaviour will supply it.'—JOHNSON. An undisciplined temper, whether in young or old, will manifest itself on certain occasions by cross looks and words towards those with whom they come in connexion. Spoiled children are most apt to be peevish; they are seldom thwarted in any of their unreasonable desires, without venting their ill-humour by an irritating and offending action;

I was so good-humour'd, so cheerful and gay,
My heart was as light as a feather all day.
But now I so cross and so peevish am grown,
So strangely uneasy as never was known.—BYRON.

' Peevish displeasure, and suspicions of mankind, are apt to persecute those who withdraw themselves altogether from the haunts of men.'—BLAIR. Sickly children are most liable to fretfulness; their unpleasant feelings vent themselves in a mixture of crying, complaints, and crossness; 'By indulging this fretful temper, you both aggravate the uneasiness of age, and you alienate those on whose affections much of your comfort depends.'—BLAIR. The young and ignorant are most apt to be petulant when contradicted; 'It was excellently said of that philosopher, that there was a wall or parapet of teeth set in our mouth, to restrain the petulancy of our words.'—B. JONSON.

BENT, CURVED, CROOKED, AWRY.

Bent, from bend, in Saxon bendan, is a variation of wind, in the sea phraseology wend, in German winden, &c. from the Hebrew עָנַן to wind or turn; curved is in Latin curvus, and in Greek κυρτός; crooked, v. Askew'd; awry is a variation of writhed.

Bent is here the generic term, all the rest are but modes of the bent.

What is bent is opposed to that which is straight; things may therefore be bent to any degree, but when curved they are bent only to a small degree; when crooked they are bent to a great degree. A stick is bent any way; it is curved by being bent one specific way; it is crooked by being bent different ways.

Things may be bent by accident or design;

And when too closely press'd, she quits the ground,
From her bent bow she sends a backward wound.
DRYDEN.

Things are curved by design, or according to some rule; 'Another thing observable in and from the spots is that they describe various paths or lines over the sun, sometimes straight, sometimes curved towards one pole of the sun.'—DERHAM. Things are crooked, by accident or in violation of some rule; 'It is the ennobling office of the understanding to correct the fallacious and mistaken reports of the senses, and to assure us that the staff in the water is straight, though our eye would tell us it is crooked.'—SOUTH. A stick is bent by the force of the hand; a line is curved so as to make a mathematical figure; it is crooked so as to lose all figure.

Awry marks a species of crookedness, but crooked is applied as an epithet, and awry is employed to characterize the action; hence we speak of a crooked thing and of sitting or standing awry;

Preventing fate directs the lance awry,
Which glancing only mark'd Achates' thigh.
DRYDEN.

BEND, BENT.

Both abstract nouns from the verb to bend: the one to express its proper, and the other its moral application; a stick has a bend; the mind has a bent;

His coward lips did from their colour fly,
And that same eye whose bend does awe the world,
Did lose its lustre.—SHAKESPEARE.

'The soul does not always care to be in the same bent. The faculties relieve one another by turns, and receive an additional pleasure from the novelty of those objects about which they are conversant.'—ADDISON.

A bend in any thing that should be straight is a defect; a bent of the inclination that is not sanctioned by religion is detrimental to a person's moral character and peace of mind. For a vicious bend in a natural body there are various remedies; but nothing will cure a corrupt bent of the will except religion.

TURN, BENT.

These words are only compared here in the figurative application, as respects the state of a person's inclination: the turn is therefore, as before, indefinite as to the degree; it is the first rising inclination: bent is a positively strong turn, a confirmed inclination; a child may early discover a turn for music or drawing; but the real bent of his genius is not known until he has made a proficiency in his education, and has had an opportunity of trying different things: it may be very well to indulge the turn of mind; it is of great importance to follow the bent of the mind as far as respects arts and sciences; 'I need not tell you how a man of Mr. Rowe's turn entertained me.'—POPE. 'I know the bent of your present attention is directed towards the eloquence of the bar.'—MELMOUTH (Letters of Pliny.)

TO TURN, WIND, WHIRL, TWIRL, WRITHE

To turn (v. To turn) is, as before, the generic term; the rest are but modes of turning;

How has this poison lost its wonted ways?
It should have burnt its passage, not have linger'd
In the blind labyrinths and crooked turnings
Of human composition.—DRYDEN.

To wind is to turn a thing round, or to move in a regular and circular manner;

The tracts of Providence like rivers wind,
Here run before us, there retreat behind.—HIGGINS.

To whirl is to turn a thing round in a violent manner.

Man is but man, inconstant still, and various
There's no to-morrow in him like to-day;
Perhaps the atoms, whirling in his brain,
Make him think honestly this present hour;
The next, a swarm of base, ungrateful thoughts
May mount aloft.—DRYDEN.

To twirl is to turn a thing round in any irregular and unmeaning way; 'I had used my eye to such a quick succession of objects, that, in the most precipitate twirl, I could catch a sentence out of each author.'—STEELE. To writhe is to turn round in convolutions within itself. A worm seldom moves in a straight line; it is, therefore, always turning; and sometimes it writhes in agony;

Dying, he bellowed out his dread remorse,
And writh'd with seeming anguish of the soul.
SHIRLEY.

TO TURN, BEND, TWIST, DISTORT, WRING, WREST, WRENCH.

Turn, in French tourner, comes from the Greek τροπέω to turn, and τρόπος a turner's wheel; bend, v. Bend; twist, in Saxon getwisan, German zweyen to double, comes from zwey two; distort, in Latin distortus, participle of distorqueo, compounded of dis and torqueo, signifies to turn violently aside.

To turn signifies in general to put a thing out of its place in an uneven line;

Yet still they find a future task remain,
To turn the soil and break the clods again.
DRYDEN.

To bend, and the rest, are species of turning: we turn a thing by moving it from one point to another; thus we turn the earth over: to bend is simply to change its direction; thus a stick is bent, or a body may bend its direction to a particular point;

Some to the house,
The fold and dairy, hungry, bend their flight.

THOMSON.

To twist is to bend many times, to make many turns;

But let not on thy hook the tortur'd worm,
Convulsive, twist in agonizing folds.—THOMSON.

To distort is to turn or bend out of the right course; thus the face is distorted in convulsions, or the looks may be distorted from passion or otherwise:

We saw their stern, distorted looks from far.

DRYDEN.

To wring is to twist with violence; thus linen which has been wetted is wrung; 'Our bodies are unhappily made the weapons of sin; therefore we must, by an austere course of duty, first wring these weapons out of its hands.'—SOUTH. To wrest or wrench is to separate from a body by means of twisting; thus a stick may be wrested out of the hand, or a hinge wrenched off the door;

Wresting the text to the old giant's sense,
That heaven once more must suffer violence.

DENHAM.

Wrench his sword from him.—SHAKESPEARE.

She wrench'd the jav'lin with her dying hands.

DRYDEN.

The same distinction holds good in the moral or extended application: a person is turned from his design; 'Strong passion dwells on that object which has seized and taken possession of the soul; it is too much occupied and filled by it to turn its view aside.'—BLAIR. The will of a person is bent, or the thoughts are bent, towards an object; 'Men will not bend their wits to examine whether things wherewith they have been accustomed be good or evil.'—HOOKER. The meaning of words is twisted, or by a stronger expression distorted, to serve a purpose; 'Something must be distorted, besides the intent of the divine Inditer.'—PEACOCK. A confession is wrung, or by a stronger expression wrested, from a person; 'To wring this sentence, to wrest thereby out of men's hands the knowledge of God's doctrines, is without all reason.'—ASCHEAM.

TO EXACT, EXTORT.

Exact, in Latin exactus, participle of exigo, to drive out, signifies the exercise of simple force; but extort, from extortus, participle of extorqueo to wring out, marks the exercise of unusual force. In application, therefore, the term exact signifies to demand with force; it is commonly an act of injustice: to extort signifies to get with violence, it is an act of tyranny. The collector of the revenue *exact*s when he gets from the people more than he is authorized to take: an arbitrary prince extorts from his conquered subjects whatever he can grasp at. In the figurative sense, deference, obedience, applause, and admiration are *exact*ed; 'While to the established church is given that protection and support which the interests of religion render proper and due, yet no rigid conformity is *exact*ed.'—BLAIR. A confession, an acknowledgment, a discovery, and the like, are extorted; 'If I err in believing that the souls of men are immortal, not while I live would I wish to have this delightful error extorted from me.'—STEELE.

TO CHARM, ENCHANT, FASCINATE, ENRAPTURE, CAPTIVATE.

Charm has the same signification as explained under the head of Attractions; enchant is compounded of en and chant, signifying to act upon as by the power of chanting or music; fascinate, in Latin fascino, Greek ῥακισμα, signified originally among the ancients a species of witchcraft, performed by the eyes or the tongue; enrapture, compounded of en and rapture, signifies to put into a rapture: and rapture, from the Latin rapio to seize or carry away, signifies the state of being carried away; whence to enrapture signifies to put into that state; captivate, in Latin captivatus, participle of captivo, from capio to take, signifies to take, as it were, prisoner.

The idea of an irresistible influence is common to these terms; charm expresses a less powerful effect than enchant; a charm is simply a magical verse used by magicians and sorcerers: incantation or enchantment is the use not only of verses but of any mysterious ceremonies, to produce a given effect.

To charm and enchant in this sense denote an operation by means of words or motions; to fascinate denotes an operation by means of the eyes or tongue: a person is charmed and enchanted voluntarily; he is fascinated involuntarily: the superstitious have always had recourse to charms and enchantments, for the purpose of allaying the passions of love or hatred; the Greeks believed that the malignant influence passed by fascination from the eyes or tongues of envious persons, which infected the ambient air, and through that medium penetrated and corrupted the bodies of animals and other things.

Charms and enchantments are performed by persons; fascinations are performed by animals: the former have always some supposed good in view; the latter have always a mischievous tendency: there are persons who pretend to charm away the tooth-ache, or other pains of the body: some serpents are said to have a fascinating power in their eyes, by which they can kill the animals on whom they have fixed them.

When these terms are taken in the improper sense, charm, enchant, and fascinate are employed to describe moral as well as natural operations: enrapture and captivate describe effects on the mind only: to charm, enchant, fascinate, and enrapture designate the effects produced by physical and moral objects; captivate designates those produced by physical objects only: we may be charmed, or enchanted, or enraptured, with what we see, hear, and learn; we may be fascinated with what we see or learn; we are captivated only with what we see: a fine voice, a fine prospect, or a fine sentiment, charms, enchants, or enraptures; a fine person fascinates, or the conversation of a person is fascinating; beauty, with all its accompaniments, captivates. When applied to the same objects, charm, enchant, and enrapture rise in sense: what charms produces sweet but not tumultuous emotions; in this sense music in general charms a musical ear;

So fair a landscape charm'd the wond'ring knight.

GILBERT WEST.

What enchants rouses the feelings to a high pitch of tumultuous delight; in this manner the musician is enchanted with the finest compositions of Handel when performed by the best masters; or a lover of the country is enchanted with Swiss scenery;

Trust not too much to that enchanted face:

Beauty's a charm, but soon the charm will pass.

DRYDEN.

To enrapture is to absorb all the affections of the soul; it is of too violent a nature to be either lasting or frequent: it is a term applicable only to persons of an enthusiastick character, or to particularly powerful excitements;

He play'd so sweetly, and so sweetly sung,

That on each note th' enraptur'd audience hung.

SIR WM. JONES.

What charms, enchants, and enraptures only affords pleasure for the time; what fascinates and captivates rivets the mind to the object: the former three convey the idea of a voluntary movement of the mind, as in the proper sense; the two latter imply a species of forcible action on the mind, which deprives a person of his free agency; the passions, as well as the affections, are called into play while the understanding is passive, which, with regard to fascinate, may be to the injury of the subject: a loose woman may have it in her power to fascinate, and a modest woman to captivate; 'One would think there was some kind of fascination in the eyes of a large circle of people when darting altogether upon one person.'—ADDISON.

Her form the patriot's robe conceal'd,

With studied blandishments she bow'd,

And ~~drove~~ the

TO ENSLAVE, CAPTIVATE.

To enslave is to bring into a state of slavery; to captivate is to make a captiv.

There is as much difference between these terms as between slavery and captivity: he who is a slave is fettered both body and mind; he who is a captiv is only constrained as to his body: hence to enslave is always taken in the bad sense; captivate mostly in the good sense: enslave is employed literally or figuratively; captivate only figuratively: we may be enslaved by persons, or by our gross passions; 'The will was then (before the fall) subordinate but not enslaved to the understanding.'—SOUTH. We are captivated by the charms or beauty of an object; 'Men should beware of being captivated by a kind of savage philosophy, women by a thoughtless gallantry.'—ADDISON.

ECSTASY, RAPTURE, TRANSPORT.

There is a strong resemblance in the meaning and application of these words. They all express an extraordinary elevation of the spirits, or an excessive tension of the mind; ecstasy marks a passive state, from the Greek ἐκστασις and ἐκστημι to stand, or be out of oneself, out of one's mind. Rapture, from the Latin rapi to seize or carry away; and transport, from trans and porto to carry beyond oneself, rather designate an active state, a violent impulse with which the mind hurries itself forward. Ecstasy and rapture are always pleasurable, or arise from pleasurable causes: transport respects either pleasurable or painful feelings: joy occasions ecstasies or raptures: joy and anger have their transports.

An ecstasy benumbs the faculties; it will take away the power of speech and often of thought: it is commonly occasioned by sudden and unexpected events: rapture, on the other hand, often invigorates the powers, and calls them into action; it frequently arises from deep thought: the former is common to all persons of ardent feelings, but more particularly to children, ignorant people, or to such as have not their feelings under control;

What followed was all ecstasy and trance:

Immortal pleasures round my swimming eyes did dance.—DRYDEN.

Rapture, on the contrary, is applicable to persons of superiour minds, and to circumstances of peculiar importance;

By swift degrees the love of nature works,

And warms the bosom, till at last sublim'd

To rapture and enthusiastick heat,

We feel the present Deity.—THOMSON.

Transports are but sudden bursts of passion, which generally lead to intemperate actions, and are seldom indulged even on joyous occasions except by the volatile and passionate: a reprieve from the sentence of death will produce an ecstasy of delight in the pardoned criminal. Religious contemplation is calculated to produce holy raptures in a mind strongly imbued with pious zeal: in transports of rage men have committed enormities which have cost them bitter tears of repentance ever after. The word transport is however used in the higher style in a good sense;

When all thy mercies, O my God!

My rising soul surveys,

Transported with the view, I'm lost

In wonder, love, and praise.—ADDISON.

TO ATTRACT, ALLURE, INVITE, ENGAGE.

Attract, in Latin attractum, participle of atraho, compounded of at or ad and traho, signifies to draw towards; allure, v. To allure; invite, in French inviter, Latin invito, compounded of in privative and ito to avoid, signifies the contrary of avoiding, that is, to seek or ask; engage, compounded of en or in and the French gager a pledge, signifies to bind as by a pledge.

That is attractive which draws the thoughts towards itself; that is alluring which awakens desire; that is inviting which offers persuasion; that is engaging which takes possession of the mind. The attention is attracted; the senses are allured; the understanding is invited; the whole mind is engaged. A particular sound attracts the ear; the prospect of gratification allures; we are invited by advantages which offer; we are engaged by those which already accrue.

The person of a female is attractive; female beauty involuntarily draws all eyes towards itself; it awakens admiration; 'At this time of universal migration, when almost every one considerable enough to attract regard has retired into the country, I have often been tempted to inquire what happiness is to be gained by this stated secession.'—JOHNSON. The pleasures of society are alluring; they create in the receiver an eager desire for still farther enjoyment; but when too eagerly pursued they vanish in the pursuit, and leave the mind a prey to listless uneasiness: the weather is inviting; it seems to persuade the reluctant to partake of its refreshments; 'Seneca has attempted not only to pacify us in misfortune, but almost to allure us to it by representing it as necessary to the pleasures of the mind. He invites his pupil to calamity as the Syrens allured the passengers to their coasts, by promising that he shall return with increase of knowledge.'—JOHNSON. The manners of a person are engaging; they not only occupy the attention, but they lay hold of the affections; 'The present, whatever it be, seldom engages our attention so much as what is to come.'—BLAIR.

ATTRACTIVE, ALLUREMENTS, CHARMS.

Attraction signifies the thing that attracts (v. To attract); allurement signifies the thing that allures (v. To allure); charm, from the Latin carmen a verse, signifies whatever acts by an irresistible influence, like poetry.

* Besides the synonymous signification which distinguishes these words, they are remarkable for the common property of being used only in the plural, when denoting the thing that attracts, allures, and charms. When applied to female endowments, or the influence of person on the heart: it seems that in attractions there is something natural; in allurements something artificial: in charms something moral and intellectual.

Attractions lead or draw; allurements win or entice; charms seduce or captivate. The human heart is always exposed to the power of female attractions; it is guarded with difficulty against the allurements of a coquette; it is incapable of resisting the united charms of body and mind.

Females are indebted for their attractions and charms to a happy conformation of features and figure, but they sometimes borrow their allurements from their toilet. Attractions consist of those ordinary graces which nature bestows on women with more or less liberality; they are the common property of the sex; 'This cestus was a fine party-coloured girdle, which, as Homer tells us, had all the attractions of the sex wrought into it.'—ADDISON. Allurements consist of those cultivated graces formed by the aid of a faithful looking-glass and the skilful hand of one anxious to please; 'How justly do I fall a sacrifice to sloth and luxury in the place where I first yielded to those allurements which seduced me to deviate from temperance and innocence.'—JOHNSON. Charms consist of those singular graces of nature which are granted as a rare and precious gift: they are the peculiar property of the individual possessor; 'Juno made a visit to Venus, the deity who presides over love, and begged of her as a particular favour, that she would lend her for a while those charms with which she subdued the hearts of gods and men.'—ADDISON.

Defects unexpectedly discovered tend to the diminution of attractions; allurements vanish when the artifice is discovered; charms lose their effect when time or habit have rendered them too familiar, so transitory is the influence of mere person. Attractions assail the heart and awaken the tender passion; allurements serve to complete the conquest, which will however be but of short duration if there be not more solid though less brilliant charms to substitute affection in the place of passion.

When applied as these terms may be to other objects besides the personal endowments of the female sex, attractions and charms express whatever is very amiable in themselves; allurements on the contrary whatever is hateful and congenial to the baser propensities of human nature. A courtesan who was never possessed of charms, and has lost all personal attractions, may, by the allurements of dress and manners, aided by a thousand meretricious arts, still retain the wretched power of doing incalculable mischief.

An attraction springs from something remarkable and striking; it lies in the exterior aspect, and awakens an interest towards itself: a charm acts by a secret, all-powerful, and irresistible impulse on the soul; it springs from an accordance of the object with the affections of the heart; it takes hold of the imagination, and awakens an enthusiasm peculiar to itself: an allurement acts on the senses; it flatters the passions; it enslaves the imagination. A musical society has attractions for one who is musically inclined; for music has charms to soothe the troubled soul: fashionable society has too many allurements for youth, which are not easily withstood.

The music, the eloquence of the preacher, or the crowds of hearers, are attractions for the occasional attendants at a place of worship: the society of cultivated persons, whose character and manners have been attested by the benign influence of Christianity, possess peculiar charms for those who have a congeniality of disposition; the present lax and undisciplined age is however ill-fitted for the formation of such society, or the susceptibility of such charms: people are now more prone to yield to the allurements of pleasure and licentious gratification in their social intercourse. A military life has powerful attractions for adventurous minds; glory has irresistible charms for the ambitious: the allurements of wealth predominate in the minds of the great bulk of mankind.

TO ALLURE, TEMPT, SEDUCE, ENTICE, DECOY.

Allure is compounded of the intensive syllable al or ad and lure, in French lurre, in German luder a lure or bait, signifying to hold a bait in order to catch animals, and figuratively to present something to please the senses, or the understanding; tempt, in French tenter, Latin tento to try, comes from tentus, participle of tendo to stretch, signifying by efforts to impel to action; seduce, in French seduire, Latin seduco, is compounded of se apart and duco to lead, signifying to lead any one aside; entice is probably, per metathesis, changed from incite; decoy is compounded of the Latin de and coy, in Dutch koy, German, &c. koi a cage or enclosed place for birds, signifying to draw into any place for the purpose of getting them into one's power.

We are allured by the appearances of things; we are tempted by the words of persons as well as the appearances of things; we are enticed by persuasions: we are seduced or decoyed by the influence and false arts of others.

To allure and tempt are used either in a good or bad sense; entice sometimes in an indifferent, but mostly in a bad sense; seduce and decoy are always in a bad sense. The weather may allure us out of doors: the love of pleasures may allure us into indulgencies that afterward cause repentance; 'June 26, 1284, the rats and mice by which Hamelen was infested were allured, it is said, by a piper to a contiguous river, in which they were all drowned.'—ADDISON. We are sometimes tempted upon very fair grounds to undertake what turns out unfortunately in the end: our passions are our bitterest enemies; the devil uses them as instruments to tempt us to sin; 'In our time the poor are strongly tempted to assume the appearance of wealth.'—JOHNSON. When the wicked entice us to do evil, we should turn a deaf ear to their flattering representations: those who know what is right, and are determined to practice it, will not suffer themselves to be enticed into any irregularities; 'There was a particular grove which was called "the labyrinth of coquettes," where many were enticed to the chase, but few returned with purchase.'—ADDISON. Young men are frequently seduced by the company they keep; 'There is no kind of idleness by which we are so easily seduced as that which dignifies itself by the appearance of business.'—JOHNSON. Children are decoyed away by the evil-minded, who wish to get them into their possession; 'I have heard of barbarians, who, when tempests drive ships to their coasts, decoy them to the rocks that they may plunder their lading.'—JOHNSON.

The country has its allurements for the contemplative mind: the metropolis is full of temptations. Those who have any evil project to execute will omit no enticement in order to seduce the young and inexperienced from their duty. The practice of decoying children or ignorant people into places of confinement was formerly more frequent than at present.

Allure does not imply such a powerful influence as tempt: what allures draws by gentle means; it lies in the nature of the thing that affects: what tempts acts by direct and continued efforts: it presents motives to the mind in order to produce decision; it tries the power of resistance. Entice supposes such a decisive influence on the mind, as produces a determination to act; in which respect it differs from the two former terms. Allure and tempt produce actions on the mind, not necessarily followed by any result; for we may be allured or tempted to do a thing, without necessarily doing the thing; but we cannot be enticed unless we are led to take some step. Seduce and decoy have reference to the outward action, as well as the inward movements of the mind which give rise to them: they indicate a drawing aside of the person as well as the mind; it is a misleading by false representation. Prospects are alluring, offers are tempting, words are enticing, charms are seductive.

TRY, TEMPT.

To try (v. To attempt) is to call forth one's ordinary powers; to tempt is a particular species of trial; we try either ourselves or others; we tempt others: to try is for the most part an indifferent action, a person may be tried in order to ascertain his principles or his strength;

League all your forces then, ye pow'rs above,
Join all, and try the omnipotence of Jove.

POPE.

To tempt is for the most part taken in a bad sense, men are tempted to depart from their duty;

Still the old sting remain'd, and men began
To tempt the serpent, as he tempted man.

DENHAM.

It is necessary to try the fidelity of a servant before you place confidence in him; it is wicked to tempt any one to do that which we should think wrong to do ourselves: our strength is tried by frequent experience; we are tempted by the weakness of our principles, to give way to the violence of our passions.

EXPERIENCE, EXPERIMENT, TRIAL, PROOF, TEST.

Experience, experiment, from the Latin experior, compounded of e or ex and perio or perio to bring forth, signifies the thing brought to light, or the act of bringing to light; trial signifies the act of trying, from try, in Latin tento, Hebrew תָּרַן, to explore, examine, search; proof signifies either the act of proving, from the Latin probo to make good, or the thing made good, proved to be good; test, from the Latin testis a witness, is that which serves to attest or prove the reality of a thing.

By all the actions implied in these terms, we endeavour to arrive at a certainty respecting some unknown particular: the experience is that which has been tried; the experiment is the thing to be tried: the experience is certain, as it is a deduction from the past for the service of the present; the experiment is uncertain, and serves a future purpose: experience is an unerring guide, which no man can desert without falling into error; experiments may fail, or be superseded by others more perfect.

Experience serves to lead us to moral truth, the experiment aids us in ascertaining speculative truth; we profit by experience to rectify practice; 'A man may, by experience, be persuaded that his will is free; that he can do this, or not do it.'—TILLOTSON. We make experiments in theoretical inquiries; 'Any one may easily make this experiment, and even plainly see that there is no bud in the corn which ants lay up.'—ADDISON. He, therefore, who makes experiments in mat ers of experience rejects a steady and definite mode of coming at the truth for one that is variable and uncertain, and that too in matters of the first moment; the consequences of such a mistake are obvious, and have been too fatally realized in the present age, in which experience has been set at naught by every wild speculator, who has recommended experiments to be made with all the forms of moral duty and civil society; 'It is good also not to try experiments in states, except the necessity be urgent, or the utility evident.'—BACON.

The experiment, trial, and proof have equally the character of uncertainty; but the experiment is employed only in matters of an intellectual nature; the trial is employed in matters of a personal nature, on physical as well as mental objects; the proof is employed in moral subjects: we make an experiment in order to know whether a thing be true or false; we make a trial in order to know whether it be capable or incapable, convenient or inconvenient, useful or the contrary; we put a thing to the proof in order to determine whether it be good or bad, real or unreal: experiments tend to confirm our opinions; they are the handmaids of science; the philosopher doubts every position which cannot be demonstrated by repeated experiments; 'That which showeth them to be wise, is the gathering of principles out of their own particular experiments; and the framing of our particular experiments, according to the rule of their principles, shall make us such as they are.'—HOOKER. Trials are of absolute necessity in directing our conduct, our taste, and our choice; we judge of our strength or skill by trials; we judge of the effect of colours by trials, and the like;

But he himself betook another way,
To make more trial of his hardiment,
And seek adventures, as he with prince Arthur went.
SPENSER.

The proof determines the judgement, as in common life, according to the vulgar proverb, 'The proof of the pudding is in the eating'; so in the knowledge of men and things, the proof of men's characters and merits is best made by observing their conduct;

O goodly usage of those ancient times!
In which the sword was servant unto right:
When not for malice and contentious crimes,
But all for praise and proof of manly might.

SPENSER.

The experiment is a sort of trial; 'When we are searching out the nature or properties of any being by various methods of trial, this sort of observation is called experiment.'—WATTS. The proof results from the trial; 'My paper gives a timorous writer an opportunity of putting his abilities to the proof.'—ADDISON. When the word test is taken in the sense of a trial, as in the phrases to stand the test, or to make a test, it derives its meaning from the chymical process of refining metals in a test or cupel, testa being in Italian the name of this vessel. The test is therefore a positive and powerful trial;

All thy vexations
Were but my trials of thy love, and thou
Hast strangely stood the test.—SHAKESPEARE.

When the test is taken for the means of trying or proving, it bears a similar signification;

Unerring nature, still divinely bright,
One clear, unchang'd and universal light,
Life, force, and beauty, must to all impart
At once the source, and end, and test of every art.

POPE.

Hence this word is used in the legal sense for the proof which a man is required to give of his religious creed.

ATTEMPT, TRIAL, ENDEAVOUR, ESSAY, EFFORT.

Attempt, in French attenter, Latin attento, from at or ad and tento, signifies to try at a thing; trial comes from try (v. Experience); endeavour, compounded of en and the French devoir to owe, signifies to try according to one's duty; essay, in French essayer, comes probably from the German ersuchen, compounded of er and suchen to seek, written in old

German suchen, and is doubtless connected with sehen to see or look after, signifying to aspire after, to look up to; effort, in French effort, from the Latin effert, present tense of effero, compounded of e or ex and fero, signifies a bringing out or calling forth the strength.

To attempt is to set about a thing with a view of effecting it; to try is to set about a thing with a view of seeing the result. An attempt respects the action with its object; a trial is the exercise of power. We always act when we attempt; we use the senses and the understanding when we try. We attempt by trying, but we may try without attempting: when a thief attempts to break into a house he first tries the locks and fastenings to see where he can most easily gain admittance.

Men attempt to remove evils; they try experiments. Attempts are perpetually made by quacks, whether in medicine, politics, or religion, to recommend some scheme of their own to the notice of the public; which are often nothing more than trials of skill to see who can most effectually impose on the credulity of mankind. Spirited people make attempts; persevering people make trials; players attempt to perform different parts; and try to gain applause.

An endeavour is a continued attempt. Attempts may be fruitless; trials may be vain; endeavours, though unavailing, may be well meant. Many attempts are made which exceed the abilities of the attempter; trials are made in matters of speculation, the results of which are uncertain; endeavours are made in the moral concerns of life. People attempt to write books; they try various methods; and endeavour to obtain a livelihood.

An essay is used altogether in a figurative sense for an attempt or endeavour; it is an intellectual exertion. A modest writer apologizes for his feeble essay to contribute to the general stock of knowledge and cultivation; hence short treatises which serve as attempts to illustrate any point in morals are termed essays, among which are the finest productions in our language from the pen of Addison, Steele, and their successors. An effort is to an attempt as a means to an end; it is the very act of calling forth those powers which are employed in an attempt. In attempting to make an escape, a person is sometimes obliged to make desperate efforts.

Attempts at imitation expose the imitator to ridicule when not executed with peculiar exactness; 'A natural and unconstrained behaviour has something in it so agreeable that it is no wonder to see people endeavouring after it; but at the same time it is so very hard to hit, when it is not born with us, that people often make themselves ridiculous in attempting it.'—ADDISON. Trials of strength are often foolhardy; in some cases attended with mischievous consequences to the trier;

To bring it to the trial, will you dare
Our pipes, our skill, our voices to compare?

DRYDEN.

Honest endeavours to please are to be distinguished from idle attempts to catch applause; 'Whether or no (said Socrates on the day of his execution)—God will approve of my actions I know not; but this I am sure of, that I have at all times made it my endeavour to please him.'—ADDISON. The first essays of youth ought to meet with indulgence, in order to afford encouragement to rising talents; 'This treatise prides itself in no higher a title than that of an essay, or imperfect attempt at a subject.'—GLANVILLE. Great attempts, which require extraordinary efforts either of body or mind, always meet with an adequate share of public applause; 'The men of sagacity bestir himself to distress his enemy by methods probable and reducible to reason; so the same reason will fortify his enemy to elude these his regular efforts: but your fool projects with such notable inconsistency, that no course of thought can evade his machinations.'—STEELE.

ATTEMPT, UNDERTAKING, ENTERPRISE.

An attempt is the thing attempted (v. To attempt); an undertaking, from undertake, or take in hand, is the thing taken in hand; an enterprise, from the French enterpris, participle of entreprendre to undertake, has the same original sense.

The idea of something set about to be completed is common to all these terms. An attempt is less complicated than an undertaking; and that less arduous than an enterprise. Attempts are the common exertions of power for obtaining an object: an undertaking involves in it many parts and particulars which require thought and judgement: an enterprise has more that is hazardous and dangerous in it; it requires resolution. Attempts are frequently made on the lives and property of individuals; undertakings are formed for private purposes; enterprises are commenced for some great national object.

Nothing can be effected without making the attempt; attempts are therefore often idle and unsuccessful, when they are made by persons of little discretion, who are eager to do something without knowing how to direct their powers;

Why wilt thou rush to certain death and rage,

In rash attempts beyond thy tender age?—DRYDEN.

Undertakings are of a more serious nature, and involve a man's serious interests; if begun without adequate means of bringing them to a conclusion, they too frequently bring ruin by their failure on those who are concerned in them; 'When I hear a man complain of his being unfortunate in all his undertakings, I shrewdly suspect him for a very weak man in his affairs.'—ADDISON. Enterprises require personal sacrifices rather than those of interest; he who does not combine great resolution and perseverance with considerable bodily powers, will be ill-fitted to take part in grand enterprises.

The present age has been fruitful in attempts to bring premature genius into notice: literary undertakings have of late degenerated too much into mere commercial speculations: a state of war gives birth to naval and military enterprises; a state of peace is most favourable to those of a scientific nature;

There would be few enterprises of great labour or hazard undertaken, if we had not the power of magnifying the advantages which we persuade ourselves to expect from them.—JOHNSON.

FOOLHARDY, ADVENTUROUS, RASH.

Foolhardy signifies having the hardihood of a fool; adventurous, ready to venture; rash, in German rasch, which signifies swift, comes from the Arabick raaschen to go swiftly.

The foolhardy expresses more than the adventurous; and the adventurous than the rash.

The foolhardy man ventures in defiance of consequences: the adventurous man ventures from a love of the arduous and the bold; the rash man ventures for want of thought: 'courage and boldness become foolhardihood when they lead a person to run a fruitless risk; an adventurous spirit sometimes leads a man into unnecessary difficulties; but it is a necessary accompaniment of greatness. There is not so much design, but there is more violence and impetuosity in rashness than in foolhardihood: the former is the consequence of an ardent temper which will admit of correction by the influence of the judgement; but the latter comprehends the perversion of both the will and the judgement.

An infidel is foolhardy, who risks his future salvation for the mere gratification of his pride;

If any yet be so foolhardy,

T' expose themselves to vain jeopardy,

If they come wounded off and lame,

No honour 's got by such a main.—BUTLER.

Alexander was an adventurous prince, who delighted in enterprises in proportion as they presented difficulties; he was likewise a rash prince, as was evinced by his jumping into the river Cydnus while he was hot, and by his leaping over the wall of Oxydrace and exposing himself singly to the attack of the enemy;

'Twas an old way of recreating,

Which learned butchers called bearbaiting,

A bold, advent'rous exercise.—BUTLER.

Why wilt thou, then, renew the vain pursuit,

And rashly catch at the forbidden fruit?

TO ENDEAVOUR, AIM, STRIVE, STRUGGLE.

To endeavour (v. Attempt) is general in its object; aim (v. Aim) is particular; we endeavour to do what ever we set about; we aim at doing something which we have set before ourselves as a desirable object. To strive (v. Strife) is to endeavour earnestly; to struggle, which is a frequentative of strive, is to strive earnestly.

An endeavour springs from a sense of duty; we endeavour to do that which is right, and avoid that which is wrong: aiming is the fruit of an aspiring temper; the object aimed at is always something superiour either in reality or imagination, and calls for particular exertion: striving is the consequence of an ardent desire; the thing striven for is always conceived to be of importance: struggling is the effect of necessity; it is proportioned to the difficulty of attainment, and the resistance which is opposed to it; the thing struggled for is indispensably necessary.

Those only who endeavour to discharge their duty to God and their fellow-creatures can expect real tranquillity of mind; 'T is no uncommon thing, my good Sancho, for one half of the world to use the other half like brutes, and then endeavour to make em so.'—STERNE. Whoever aims at the acquirement of great wealth or much power opens the door for much misery to himself;

However men may aim at elevation,

'T is properly a female passion.—SHENSTONE.

As our passions are acknowledged to be the greatest enemies when they obtain the ascendancy, we should always strive to keep them under our control;

All understand their great Creator's will,

Strive to be happy, and in that fulfil,

Mankind excepted, lord of all beside,

But only slave to folly, vice, and pride.

JENYNS.

There are some men who struggle through life to obtain a mere competence; and yet die without succeeding in their object;

So the boat's brawny crew the current stem,

And slow advancing struggle with the stream.

DRYDEN.

We ought to endeavour to correct faults, to aim at attaining Christian perfection, to strive to conquer bad habits: these are the surest means of saving us from the necessity of struggling to repair an injured reputation.

ENDEAVOUR, EFFORT, EXERTION.

The idea of calling our powers into action is common to these terms: endeavour (v. Attempt) expresses little more than this common idea, being a term of general import: effort, from the Latin effort, from effero to bring forth, signifying the bringing out of power; and exertion, in Latin ezero, signifying the putting forth power, are particular modes of endeavour; the former being a special strong endeavour, the latter a continued strong endeavour. The endeavour is called forth by ordinary circumstances, the effort and exertion by those which are extraordinary. The endeavour flows out of the condition of our being and constitution; as rational and responsible agents we must make daily endeavours to fit ourselves for an hereafter; as willing and necessitous agents, we use our endeavours to obtain such things as are agreeable or needful for us: when a particular emergency arises we make a great effort; and when a serious object is to be obtained we make suitable exertions.

The endeavour is indefinite both as to the end and the means: the end may be immediate or remote, the means may be either direct or indirect: but in the effort the end is immediate; the means are direct and personal: we may either make an endeavour to get into a room, or we may make an endeavour to obtain a situation in life, or act our part well in a particular situation; 'To walk with circumspection and steadiness in the right path ought to be the constant endeavour of every rational being.'—JOHNSON. We make efforts to speak, or we make efforts to get through a crowd, or we make efforts to overcome our feelings; 'The influence of custom is such, that to conquer it will require the utmost efforts of fortitude and virtue.'—JOHNSON. The endeavour may call forth one or many powers; the effort calls forth but one power: the endeavour to please in society is laudable, if it do not lead to vicious compliances; it is a laudable effort of fortitude to suppress our complaints in the moment of suffering. The exertion is as comprehensive in its meaning as the endeavour, and as positive as the effort; but the endeavour is most commonly, and the effort always, applied to individuals only; whereas the exertion is applicable to nations as well as individuals. A tradesman uses his best endeavours to please his customers; a combatant makes desperate efforts to overcome his antagonist; a candidate for literary or parliamentary honours uses great exertions to surpass his rival; a nation uses great exertions to raise a navy or extend its commerce; 'The discomfitures which the republic of assassins has suffered have uniformly called forth new exertions.'—BURKE.

TO EXERT, EXERCISE.

The employment of some power or qualification that belongs to oneself is the common idea conveyed by these terms; but exert (v. Endeavour) may be used for what is internal or external of oneself; exercise, in Latin exerceo, from ex and arceo, signifying to drive or force out, is employed only for that which forms an express part of oneself: hence we speak of exerting one's strength, or exerting one's voice, or exerting one's influence; of exercising one's limbs, exercising one's understanding, or exercising one's tongue; 'How has Milton represented the whole Godhead, exerting itself towards man in its full benevolence, under the threefold distinction of a Creator, a Redeemer, and Comforter.'—ADDISON. 'God made no faculty, but also provided it with a proper object upon which it might exercise itself.'—SOUTH.

Exert conveys simply the idea of calling forth into action; exercise always conveys the idea of repeated or continued exertion coupled with that of the purpose or end for which it is made: thus a person who calls to another exerts his voice; he who speaks aloud for any length of time exercises his lungs. When the will has exerted an act of command upon any faculty of the soul, or a member of the body, it has done all that the whole man, as a moral agent, can do for the actual exercise or employment of such a faculty or member.

TO EXERCISE, PRACTISE.

Exercise signifies the same as in the preceding article; practise, from the Greek πράσσω to do, signifies to perform a part.

These terms are equally applied to the actions and habits of men; but we exercise in that where the powers are called forth; we practise in that where frequency and habitude of action is requisite: we exercise an art; we practise a profession; 'The Roman tongue was the study of their youth; it was their own language they were instructed and exercised in.'—LOCKE. 'A woman that practis'd physick in man's clothes.'—TATLER. 'We may both exercise or practise a virtue; but the former is that which the particular occurrence calls forth, and which seems to demand a peculiar effort of the mind; the latter is that which is done daily and ordinarily: thus we in a peculiar manner are said to exercise patience, fortitude, or forbearance; to practise charity, kindness, benevolence, and the like; 'Every virtue requires time and place, a proper object, and a fit conjuncture of circumstances for the due exercise of it.'—ADDISON. 'All men are not equally qualified for getting money; but it is in the power of every one alike to practise this virtue (of thrift).'—BUDGELL.

A similar distinction characterizes these words as nouns: the former applying solely to the powers of the body or mind; the latter solely to the mechanical operations: the health of the body and the vigour of the mind are alike impaired by the want of exercise; 'Reading is to the mind what exercise is to the body.'—ADDISON. In every art practise is an indispensable requisite for acquiring perfection;

Long practice has a sure improvement found,
With kindled fires to burn the barren ground.

DRYDEN.

The exercise of the memory is of the first importance in the education of children; constant practice in writing is almost the only means by which the art of penmanship is acquired.

CUSTOM, FASHION, MANNER, PRACTICE.

Customs, fashions, and manners are all employed for communities of men: custom (v. Custom, habit) respects established and general modes of action, fashion, in French façon, from facio to do or make, regards partial and transitory modes of making or doing things; manner, in the limited sense in which it is here taken, signifies the manner or mode of men's living or behaving in their social intercourse.

Custom is authoritative; it stands in the place of law, and regulates the conduct of men in the most important concerns of life: fashion is arbitrary and capricious, it decides in matters of trifling import: manners are rational; they are the expressions of moral feelings. Customs are most prevalent in a barbarous state of society; fashions rule most where luxury has made the greatest progress; manners are most distinguishable in a civilized state of society.

Customs are in their nature as unchangeable as fashions are variable; manners depend on cultivation and collateral circumstances: customs die away or are abolished; fashions pass away, and new ones take their place; manners are altered either for the better or the worse: endeavours have been successfully employed in several parts of India to abolish the custom of infanticide, and that of women sacrificing themselves on the funeral piles of their husbands; 'The custom of representing the grief we have for the loss of the dead by our habits, certainly had its rise from the real sorrow of such as were too much distressed to take the care they ought of their dress.'—STEELE. The votaries of fashion are not contented with giving the law for the cut of the coat, or the shape of the bonnet, but they wish to intrude upon the sphere of the scholar or the artist, by prescribing in matters of literature and taste;

Of beasts, it is confess'd, the ape
Comes nearest us in human shape:
Like man, he imitates each fashion,
And malice is his ruling passion.—SWIFT.

The influence of public opinion on the manners of a people has never been so strikingly illustrated as in the instance of the French nation during and since the Revolution;

Their arms, their arts, their manners, I disclose,
And how they war, and whence the people rose.

DRYDEN

Practice, in Latin practicus, Greek πρακτικός, from πράσσω to do, signifies actual doing or the thing done, that is by distinction the regularly doing, or the thing regularly done, in which sense it is most analogous to custom; but practice simply conveys the idea of actual performance; custom includes also the accessory idea of repetition at stated periods: a practice must be defined as frequent or unfrequent, regular or irregular; but a custom does not require to be qualified by any such epithets: it may be the practice of a person to do acts of charity, as the occasion requires; but when he uniformly does a particular act of charity at any given period of the year, it is properly denominated his custom; 'Savage was so touched with the discovery of his real mother, that it was his frequent practice to walk in the dark evenings for several hours before her door, with hopes of seeing her as she might cross her apartments with a candle in her hand.'—JOHNSON.

Both practice and custom are general or particular, but the former is absolute, the latter relative; the practice may be adopted by a number of persons without reference to each other; but a custom is always followed either by imitation or prescription; the practice of gaming has always been followed by the vicious part of society; but it is to be hoped for the honour of man that it will never become a custom.

CUSTOM, HABIT.

Custom signifies the same as in the preceding article; habit, in Latin habitus, from habeo to have, marks the state of having or holding.

Custom is a frequent repetition of the same act; 'It is the custom of the Mahometans, if they see any printed or written paper upon the ground, to take it up and lay it aside carefully, as not knowing but it may contain some piece of the Alcoran."—ADDISON. Habit the effect of such repetition; 'If a loose and careless life has brought a man into habits of dissipation, and led him to neglect those religious duties which he owed to his Maker, let him return to the regular worship of God.'—BLAIR. The custom of rising early in the morning is conducive to the health, and may in a short time become such a habit as to render it no less agreeable than it is useful.

Custom applies to men collectively or individually; habit applies to the individual only. Every nation has customs peculiar to itself; 'I dare not shock my readers with the description of the customs and manners of these barbarians (the Hottentots).'—HUGHES. Every individual has habits peculiar to his age, station, and circumstances.

Custom, in regard to individuals, supposes an act of the will; habit implies an involuntary movement: a custom is followed; a habit is acquired: whoever follows the custom of imitating the look, tone, or gesture of another, is liable to get the habit of doing the same himself: as habit is said to be second nature, it is of importance to guard against all customs to which we do not wish to become habituated: the drunkard is formed by the custom of drinking intemperately, until he becomes habituated to the use of spirituous liquors: the profane swearer who accustoms himself in early life to utter the oaths which he hears, will find it difficult in advanced years to break himself of the habit of swearing; the love of imitation is so powerful in the human breast, that it leads the major part of mankind to follow custom even in ridiculous things: Solomon refers to the power of habit when he says, 'train up a child in the way in which he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it:' a power which cannot be employed too early in the aid of virtue and religion. 'The force of education is so great, that we may mould the minds and manners of the young into what shape we please, and give the impressions of such habits, as shall ever afterward remain.'—ATTERBURY.

Customary and habitual, the epithets derived from these words, admit of a similar distinction: the customary action is that which is repeated after the manner of a custom; 'This customary superiority grew too delicate for truth, and Swift, with all his penetration, allowed himself to be delighted with low flattery.'—JOHNSON. The habitual action is that which is done by the force of habit; 'We have all reason to believe that, amid numberless infirmities which attend humanity, what the great Judge will chiefly regard is the habitual prevailing turn of our heart and life.'—BLAIR.

COMMON, VULGAR, ORDINARY, MEAN.

Common, in French commun, Latin communis, from com and munus the joint office or property of many, has regard to the multitude of objects; vulgar, in French vulgaire, Latin vulgaris, from vulgus the people, has regard to the number and quality of the persons; ordinary, in French ordinaire, Latin ordinarius, from ordo the order or regular practice, has regard to the repetition or disposition of things; mean expresses the same as medium or moderate, from which it is derived.

Familiar use renders things common, vulgar, and ordinary; but what is mean is so of itself; the common, vulgar, and ordinary are therefore frequently, though not always, mean; and on the contrary, what is mean is not always common, vulgar, or ordinary; consequently, in the primitive sense of these words, the first three are not strictly synonymous with the last; monsters are common in Africa; vulgar reports are little to be relied on; it is an ordinary practice for men to make light of their word.

Common is unlimited in its application; it includes both vulgar and ordinary; the latter are said in reference to persons only, common with regard to persons or things: an opinion is either common or vulgar; an employment is either common or ordinary: it was long a vulgarly received notion, that the sun turned round the earth: it is the ordinary pursuit of astronomers to observe the motions of the heavenly bodies: disputes on religion have rendered many facts vulgar or common, which were formerly known only to the learned; on that account it is now become an ordinary or a common practice for men to dispute about religion, and even to frame a new set of doctrines for themselves.

In the figurative sense, in which they convey the idea of low value, they are synonymous with mean: 'what is to be seen, heard, or enjoyed by every body is common, and naturally of little value, since the worth of objects frequently depends upon their scarcity and the difficulty of obtaining them: 'Men may change their climate, but they cannot their nature. A man that goes out a fool cannot ride or sail himself into common sense.'—ADDISON. What is peculiar to common people is vulgar, and consequently worse than common; it is supposed to belong to those who are ignorant and depraved in taste as well as in morals; 'The poet's thought of directing Satan to the sun, which in the vulgar opinion of mankind, is the most conspicuous part of the creation, and the placing in it an angel, is a circumstance very finely contrived.'—ADDISON. What is done and seen ordinarily may be done and seen easily; it requires no abilities or mental acquirements: it has nothing striking in it, it excites no interest; 'A very ordinary telescope shows us that a house is itself a very lousy creature.'—ADDISON. What is mean is even below that which is ordinary; there is something defective in it;

Under his forming hands a creature grew,
Manlike, but diff'rent sex, so lovely fair,
That what seem'd fair in all the world seem'd now
Mean, or in her sum'd up.—MILTON.

Common is opposed to rare and refined; vulgar to polite and cultivated; ordinary to the distinguished; mean to the noble: a common mind busies itself with common objects; vulgar habits are easily contracted from a slight intercourse with vulgar people; an ordinary person is seldom associated with elevation of character; and a mean appearance is a certain mark of a degraded condition, if not of a degraded mind.

COMMONLY, GENERALLY, FREQUENTLY, USUALLY.

Commonly, in the form of common (v. Common); generally, from general, and the Latin genus the kind, respects a whole body in distinction from an individual; frequently, from frequent, in French frequent, Latin frequens, from the old Latin frago, in Greek ᾠδὴ to go or turn about, signifies properly a crowding; usually, from usual and use, signifies accustoming to use or custom.

What is commonly done is an action common to all: 'It is commonly observed among soldiers and seamen, that though there is much kindness, there is little grief.'—JOHNSON. What is generally done is the action of the greatest part: 'It is generally not so much the desire of men, sunk into depravity, to deceive the world, as themselves.'—JOHNSON. What is frequently done is either the action of many, or an action many times repeated by the same person; 'It is too frequently the pride of students to despise those amusements and recreations which give to the rest of mankind strength of limbs and cheerfulness of heart.'—JOHNSON. What is usually done is done regularly by one or many; 'The inefficacy of advice is usually the fault of the counsellor.'—JOHNSON.

Commonly is opposed to rarely, generally and frequently to occasionally or seldom; usually to casually; men commonly judge of others by themselves; those who judge by the mere exterior are generally deceived; but notwithstanding every precaution, one is frequently exposed to gross frauds; a man of business usually repairs to his counting-house every day at certain hour.

GENERAL, UNIVERSAL.

The general is to the universal what the part is to the whole. What is general includes the greater part or number; what is universal includes every individual or part. The general rule admits of many exceptions; the universal rule admits of none. Human government has the general good for its object: the government of Providence is directed to universal good. General is opposed to particular, and universal to individual. A scientific writer will not content himself with general remarks, when he has it in his power to enter into particulars; the universal complaint which we hear against men for their pride, shows that in every individual it exists to a greater or less degree. It is a general opinion that women are not qualified for scientific pursuits; but Madame Dacier, Mrs. Carter, and many female writers, form exceptions, no less honourable to their whole sex, than to themselves in particular: it is a universal principle, that children ought to honour their parents; the intention of the Creator in this respect is manifested in such a variety of forms as to admit of no question. General philosophy considers the properties common to all bodies, and regards the distinct properties of particular bodies, only inasmuch as they confirm abstract general views. Universal philosophy depends on universal science or knowledge, which belongs only to the infinite mind of the Creator. General grammar embraces in it all principles that are supposed to be applicable to all languages: universal grammar is a thing scarcely attainable by the stretch of human power. What man can become so thoroughly acquainted with all existing languages, as to reduce all their particular idioms to any system?

USAGE, CUSTOM, PRESCRIPTION.

The usage is what one has been long used to do; custom (v. Custom) is what one generally does; prescription is what one is prescribed to do. The usage acquires force and sanction by dint of time; 'With the national assembly of France, possession is nothing, law and usage are nothing.'—BURKE. The custom acquires sanction by the frequency of its being done or the numbers doing it;

For since the time of Saturn's holy reign,
His hospitable customs we retain.—DRYDEN.

The prescription acquires force by the authority which prescribes it, namely, the universal consent of mankind; 'If in any case the shackles of prescription could be wholly shaken off, on what occasion should it be expected but in the selection of lawful pleasure?'—JOHNSON. Hence it arises that customs vary in every age, but that usage and prescription supply the place of written law.

POSSIBLE, PRACTICABLE, PRACTICAL.

Possible, from the Latin possum to be able, signifies properly to be able to be done; practicable, from practice (v. To exercise) signifies to be able to be put in practice; hence the difference between possible and practicable is the same as between doing once, or doing as a rule. There are many things possible which cannot be called practicable, but what is practicable must in its nature be possible. The possible depends solely on the power of the agent; 'How can we, without supposing ourselves under the constant care of a Supreme Being, give any possible account for that nice proportion which we find in every great city between the deaths and births of its inhabitants?'—ADDISON. The practicable depends on circumstances; 'He who would aim at practicable things should turn upon allaying our pain, rather than promoting our sorrow.'—STEELE. A child cannot say how much it is possible for him to learn until he has tried. Schemes have sometimes every thing to recommend them to notice, but that which is of the first importance, namely, their practicability.

The practicable is that which may or can be practised: the practical is that which is to be practised. the former therefore applies to that which men devise to carry into practice; the latter to that which they have to practise: projectors ought to consider what is practicable; divines and moralists have to consider what is practical. The practicable is opposed to the impracticable; the practical to the theoretic or speculative; 'Practical cunning shows itself in political matters.'—SOUTH.

MAY, CAN

May is in German mögen to wish, Greek παύω to desire, from the connexion between wishing and complying with a wish; can derives possibility, may liberty and probability: he who has sound limbs can walk; but he may not walk in times which are prohibited;

For who can match Achilles? he who can
Must yet be more than hero, more than man.

POPE.

Thou canst not call him from the Stygian shore,
But thou, alas! mayst live to suffer more.—POPE.

AIM, OBJECT, END.

Aim is in all probability a variation of home, in old German haim. It is the home which the marksman wishes to reach; it is the thing aimed at; the particular point to which one's efforts are directed; which is had always in view, and to the attainment of which every thing is made to bend; object, from the Latin objectus, participle of ob and jacio to lie in the way, is more vague; it signifies the thing that lies before us; we pursue it by taking the necessary means to obtain it; it becomes the fruit of our labour; end in the improper sense of end is still more general, signifying the thing that ends one's wishes and endeavours; it is the result not only of action, but of combined action; it is the consummation of a scheme; we must take the proper measures to arrive at it.

It is the aim of every good Christian to live in peace; 'Cunning has only private, selfish aims, and sticks at nothing which may make them succeed.'—ADDISON. It is a mark of dulness or folly to act without an object; 'We should sufficiently weigh the objects of our hope, whether they be such as we may reasonably expect from them what we propose in their fruition.'—ADDISON. Every scheme is likely to fail, in which the means are not adequate to the end; 'Liberty and truth are not in themselves desirable, but only as they relate to a farther end.'—BERKELEY.

We have an aim; we propose to ourselves an object; we look to the end. An aim is attainable, an object worthy, an end important.

TO AIM, POINT, LEVEL.

Aim, signifying to take aim (v. Aim), is to direct one's view towards a point; point, from the noun point, signifies to direct the point to any thing; level, from the adjective level, signifies to put one thing on a level with another.

Aim expresses more than the other two words, inasmuch as it denotes a direction towards some minute point in an object, and the others imply direction towards the whole objects themselves. We aim at a bird; we point a cannon against a wall; we level a cannon at a wall. Pointing is of course used with most propriety in reference to instruments that have points; it is likewise a less decisive action than either aiming or levelling. A stick or a finger may be pointed at a person, merely out of derision; but a blow is levelled or aimed with an express intent of committing an act of violence;

Their heads from aiming blows they bear afar,
With clashing gauntlets then provoke the war.

DRYDEN

He calls on Bacchus, and propounds the prize:
The groom his fellow-groom at butts defies,
And bends his bow, and levels with his eyes.

DRYDEN.

The same analogy is kept up in their figurative application.

The shafts of ridicule are but too often aimed with little effect against the follies of fashion; 'Another kind there is, which although we desire for itself, as health and virtue, and knowledge, nevertheless they are not the last mark whereto we aim, but have their further end whereto they are referred.'—HOOKER. Remarks which seem merely to point at others, with out being expressly addressed to them, have always a bad tendency;

The story silly points at you.—CUMBERLAND.

It has hitherto been the fate of infidels to level their battery of sneers, declamation, and sophistry against the Christian religion only to strengthen the conviction of its sublime truths in the minds of mankind at large; 'In contemplation of which verity, St. Gregory Nazianzen, observing the declension from it, introduced in his times by the ambition of some prelates, did vent that famous exclamation, "O that there were not a all any presidency, or any preference in place and tyrannical enjoyment of prerogatives!" which earnest wish he surely did not mean to level against the ordinance of God, but against that which lately began to be intruded by men.—BARROW.

TO AIM, ASPIRE.

Aim (v. Aim) includes efforts as well as views, in obtaining an object; aspire, from as or ad to or after and spiro to breathe, comprehends views, wishes, and hopes to obtain an object.

We aim at a certain proposed point, by endeavouring to gain it; 'Whether zeal or moderation be the point we aim at, let us keep fire out of the one, and frost out of the other.'—ADDISON. We aspire after that which we think ourselves entitled to, and flatter ourselves with gaining; 'The study of those who in the time of Shakspeare aspired to plebeian learning was laid upon adventures, giants, dragons, and enchantments.'—JOHNSON.

Many men aim at riches and honour;

Lo, here the world is bliss; so here the end
To which all men do aim, rich to be made,
Such grace now to be happy is before thee laid.
SPENSER.

It is the lot of but few to aspire to a throne;

Aspiring to be gods, if angels fell,
Aspiring to be angels, men rebel.—POPE.

We aim at what is attainable by ordinary efforts; we aspire after what is great and unusual. An emulous youth aims at acquiring the esteem of his teachers; he aspires to excel all his competitors in literary attainments.

TENDENCY, DRIFT, SCOPE, AIM.

Tendency, from to tend, denotes the property of tending towards a certain point, which is the characteristic of all these words, but this is applied only to things; and drift, from the verb to drive; scope, from the Greek σκέπτομαι to look; and aim, from the verb to aim (v. Aim); all characterize the thoughts of a person looking forward into futurity, and directing his actions to a certain point. Hence we speak of the tendency of certain principles or practices as being pernicious; the drift of a person's discourse; the scope which he gives himself either in treating of a subject, or in laying down a plan; or a person's aim to excel, or aim to supplant another, and the like. The tendency of most writings for the last-five and twenty years has been to unhinge the minds of men; 'It is no wonder if a great deal of knowledge, which is not capable of making a man wise, has a natural tendency to make him vain and arrogant.'—ADDISON. Where a person wants the services of another, whom he dares not openly solicit, he will discover his wishes by the drift of his discourse;

This said, the whole audience soon found out his drift,
The convention was summoned in favour of Swift.
SWIFT.

A man of a comprehensive mind will allow himself full scope in digesting his plans for every alteration which circumstances may require when they come to be developed; 'Merit in every rank has the freest scope (in England).'
—BLAIR. Our desires will naturally give a cast to all our aims; and so long as they are but innocent, they are necessary to give a proper stimulus to exertion;

Each nobler aim, repress'd by long control,
Now sinks at last or feebly mans the soul.
GOLDSMITH.

OBJECT, SUBJECT.

Object, in Latin objectus, participle of objicere to lie in the way, signifies the thing that lies in one's way; subject, in Latin subjectus, participle of subjicere to lie under, signifies the thing forming the groundwork.

The object puts itself forward; the subject is in the background: we notice the object; we observe or reflect on the subject: objects are sensible; the subject is altogether intellectual; the eye, the ear, and all the senses, are occupied with the surrounding objects: the memory, the judgement, and the imagination are supplied with subjects suitable to the nature of the operations.

When object is taken for that which is intellectual, it retains a similar signification; it is the thing that presents itself to the mind; it is seen by the mind's eye: the subject, on the contrary, is that which must be sought for, and when found it engages the mental powers: hence we say an object of consideration, an object of delight, an object of concern; a subject of reflection, a subject of mature deliberation, the subject of a poem, the subject of grief, of lamentation, and the like. When the mind becomes distracted by too great a multiplicity of objects, it can fix itself on no one individual object with sufficient steadiness to take a survey of it; in like manner, if a child have too many objects set before it, for the exercise of its powers, it will acquire a familiarity with none;

He whose sublime pursuit is God and truth,
Burns like some absent and impatient youth,
To join the object of his warm desires.—JENYNS.

Religion and politics are interesting, but delicate subjects of discussion; 'The hymns and odes (of the inspired writers) excel those delivered down to us by the Greeks and Romans, in the poetry as much as in the subject.'—ADDISON.

MATTER, MATERIALS, SUBJECT.

Matter and materials are both derived from the same source, namely, the Latin materia, which comes in all probability from mater, because matter, from which every thing is made, acts in the production of bodies like a mother; subject, in Latin subjectum, participle of subjicere to lie, signifies the thing lying under and forming the foundation.

Matter in the physical application is taken for all that composes the sensible world in distinction from that which is spiritual, or discernible only by the thinking faculty; hence matter is always opposed to mind.

In regard to materials it is taken in an indivisible as well as a general sense; the whole universe is said to be composed of matter, though not of materials; 'It seems probable to me, that God in the beginning formed matter in solid, hard, impenetrable, moveable particles.'—NEWTON. On the other hand, materials consist of those particular parts of matter which serve for the artificial production of objects; 'The materials of that building very fortunately ranged themselves into that delicate order that it must be very great chance that parts them.'—TILLOTSON. Matter is said of those things which are the natural parts of the universe: a house, a table, and a chair consist of materials, because they are works of art; but a plant, a tree, an animal body, consist of matter, because they are the productions of nature.

The distinction of these terms in their moral application is very similar: the matter which composes a moral discourse is what emanates from the author. The materials are those with which one is furnished by others. The style of some writers is so indifferent that they disgrace the matter by the manner;

Son of God, Saviour of men! thy name
Shall be the copious matter of my song.—MILTON.

Periodical writers are furnished with materials for their productions out of the daily occurrences in the political and moral world; 'Simple ideas, the materials of all our knowledge, are suggested to the mind only by sensation and reflection.'—LOCKE. 'The principal materials of our comfort or uneasiness lie within ourselves.'—BLAIR. Writers of dictionaries endeavour to compress as much matter as possible into a small space; they draw their materials from other writers.

Matter seems to bear the same relation to subject as the whole does to any particular part, as it respects moral objects: the subject is the groundwork of the matter; the matter is that which flows out of the subject: the matter is that which we get by the force of invention; the subject is that which offers itself to notice: many persons may therefore have a subject which they can offer by way of illustrating this subject; but it is not possible to have matter without a subject: hence the word matter is taken for the substance, and for that which is substantial; the subject is taken for that which engages the attention; we speak of a subject of conversation and matter for deliberation; a subject of inquiry, a matter of curiosity. Nations in a barbarous state afford but little matter worthy to be recorded in history;

Whence tumbled headlong from the height of life,
They furnish matter for the tragick muse.

THOMSON.

People who live a secluded life and in a contracted sphere have but few subjects to occupy their attention; Love hath such a strong virtual force that when it tasteth on a pleasing subject it sets the imagination at a strange fit of working.—HOWELL.

TO ALLUDE, REFER, HINT, SUGGEST.

Allude, in Latin alludo, is compounded of al or ad and ludo to sport, that is, to say any thing in a sportive or cursory manner; refer, in Latin refero, signifies to bring back, that is, to bring back a person's recollection to any subject by an indirect mention of it; hint may very probably be changed from hind or behind, or in German hinten, signifying to convey from behind, or in an obscure manner; suggest, in Latin suggestus, participle of suggero, is compounded of sub and gero to bring under or near, and signifies to bring forward in an indirect or casual manner.

To allude is not so direct as to refer, but it is more clear and positive than either hint or suggest.

We allude to a circumstance by introducing something collaterally allied to it; we refer to an event by expressly introducing it into one's discourse; we hint at a person's intentions by darkly insinuating what may possibly happen; we suggest an idea by some poetical expressions relative to it.

There are frequent allusions in the Bible to the customs and manners of the East; 'I need not inform my reader that the author of Hudibras alludes to this strange quality in that cold climate, when, speaking of abstracted notions clothed in a visible shape, he adds that apt simile, "Like words congeal'd in northern air."—ADDISON. It is necessary to refer to certain passages of a work when we do not expressly copy them; 'Those causes the divine historian refers us to, and not to any productions out of nothing.'—BURNET. It is mostly better in conversation to be entirely silent upon a subject, than to hint at what cannot be entirely explained; 'It is hinted that Augustus had in mind to restore the commonwealth.'—CUMBERLAND. Many improvements have owed their origin to some ideas casually suggested in the course of conversation; 'This image of misery, in the punishment of Tantalus, was perhaps originally suggested to some poet by the conduct of his patron.'—JOHNSON.

Allude and refer are always said with regard to things that have positively happened, and mostly such as are indifferent; hint and suggest have mostly a personal relation to things that are precarious. The whole drift of a discourse is sometimes unintelligible for want of knowing what is alluded to; although many persons and incidents are referred to with their proper names and dates. It is the part of the slanderer to hint at things discreditable to another, when he does not dare to speak openly; and to suggest doubts of his veracity which he cannot positively charge.

TO HINT, SUGGEST, INTIMATE, INSINUATE.

Hint, v. To allude; suggest, v. To allude; to intimate is to make one intimate, or specially acquainted with, to communicate one's most inward thoughts; insinuate, from the Latin sinus the bosom, is to introduce gently into the mind of another.

All these terms denote indirect expressions of what passes in one's own mind. We hint at a thing from fear and uncertainty; we suggest a thing from prudence and modesty; we intimate a thing from indiscretion; a thing is insinuated from artifice. A person who wants to get at the certain knowledge of any circumstance hints at it frequently in the presence of those who can give him the information; a man who will not offend others by an assumption of superiour wisdom, suggests his ideas on a subject instead of setting them forth with confidence; when a person's mind is not made up on any future action, he only intimates what may be done; he who has any thing offensive to communicate to another, will choose to insinuate it, rather than declare it in express terms. Hints are thrown out; they are frequently characterized as broken;

Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike.—POPE

Suggestions are offered; they are frequently termed idle or ill-grounded;

We must suggest to the people, in what hatred
He still hath held them.—SHAKESPEARE

Intimations are given, and are either slight or broad;

'T is Heav'n itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man.—ADDISON.

Insinuations are thrown out; they are commonly designated as slanderous, malignant, and the like; 'Let it not be thought that what is here said insinuates any thing to the discredit of Greek and Latin criticism.'—WARBURTON.

To hint is taken either in a bad or an indifferent sense; it is commonly resorted to by tale-bearers, mischief-makers, and all who want to talk of more than they know: it is rarely necessary to have recourse to hints in lieu of positive inquiries and declarations, unless the term be used in regard to matters of science or morals, when it designates loose thoughts, casually offered, in distinction from those which are systematized and formally presented: upon this ground, a distinguished female writer of the present day modestly entitles her book, 'Hints towards forming the Character of a Young Princess.' To suggest is oftener used in the good than the bad sense: while one suggests doubts, queries, difficulties, or improvements in matters of opinion, it is truly laudable, particularly for young persons; but to suggest any thing to the disadvantage of another is even worse than to speak ill of him openly, for it bespeaks cowardice as well as ill-nature. To intimate is taken either in a good or an indifferent sense; it commonly passes between relatives or persons closely connected, in the communication of their half-formed intentions or of doubtful intelligence; but to insinuate is always taken in a bad sense; it is the resource of an artful and malignant enemy to wound the reputation of another, whom he does not dare openly to accuse. A person is said to take a hint, to follow a suggestion, to receive an intimation, to disregard an insinuation.

TO REFER, RELATE, RESPECT, REGARD.

Refer, from the Latin re and fero, signifies literally to bring back; and relate, from the participle relatus of the same verb, signifies brought back: the former is, therefore, transitive, and the latter intransitive. One refers a person to a thing; one thing refers, that is, refers a person, to another thing: one thing relates, that is, related, to another. To refer is an arbitrary act, it depends upon the will of an individual; we may refer a person to any part of a volume, or to any work we please: to relate is a conditional act, it depends on the nature of things; nothing relates to another without some point of accordance between the two; orthography relates to grammar, that is, by being a part of the grammatical science. Hence it arises that refer, when employed for things, is commonly said of circumstances that carry the memory to events or circumstances; relate is said of things that have a natural connexion: the religious festivals and ceremonies of the Roman Catholics have all a reference to some events that happened in the early periods of Christianity; 'Our Saviour's words (in his sermon on the mount) all refer to the Pharisees' way of speaking.'—SOUTH. The notes and observations at the end of a book relate to what has been inserted in the text; 'Homer artfully interweaves, in the several succeeding parts of his poem, an account of every thing material which relates to his princes.'—ADDISON.

Refer and relate carry us back to that which may be very distant; but respect and regard turn our views to that which is near. The object of the actions of referring and relating is indirectly acted upon, and consequently stands in the oblique case; we refer to an object; a thing relates to an object: but the object of the action respect and regard is directly acted upon, therefore it stands in the accusative or objective case: to respect or regard a thing, not to a thing. What respects comprehends in it more than what relates. To relate is to respect; but to respect is not always to relate: the former includes every species of affinity or accordance; the latter only that which flows out of the properties and circumstances of things: when a number of objects are brought together, which fitly associate, and properly relate the one to the other, they form a grand whole, as in the case of any scientific work which is digested into a system; when all the incidental circumstances which respect either moral principles or moral conduct are properly weighed, they will enable one to form a just judgement.

Respect is said of objects in general; regard mostly of that which enters into the feelings: laws respect the general welfare of the community; 'Religion is a pleasure to the mind, as respects practice.'—SOUTH. The due administration of the laws regards the happiness of the individual; 'What I have said regards only the vain part of the sex.'—ADDISON.

TO REVERT, RETURN.

Revert is the Latin, and return the English word; the former is used however only in few cases, and the latter in general cases: they are allied to each other in the moral application; a speaker reverts to what has already passed on a preceding day; he returns after a digression to the thread of his discourse: we may always revert to something different, though more or less connected with that which we are discussing; we always return to that which we have left: we turn to something by reverting to it; we continue the same thing by returning to it;

Whatever lies or legendary tales
May taint my spotless deeds, the guilt, the shame,
Will back revert on the inventor's head.

SHIRLEY.

One day, the soul supine with ease and fulness
Revels secure, and fondly tells herself
The hour of evil can return no more.—ROWE.

TO GLANCE AT, ALLUDE TO.

Glance, probably from the Teutonic glæntzen to shine, signifies to make a thing appear like a ray of light in an oblique direction: allude has the same general meaning as in the preceding article (v. To allude).

These terms are nearly allied in the sense of indirectly referring to any object, either in written or verbal discourse: but glance, expresses a cursory and latent action; allude, simply an indirect but undisguised action: ill-natured satirists are perpetually glancing at the follies and infirmities of individuals; 'Entering upon his discourse, Socrates says, he does not believe any of the most comick genius can censure him for talking upon such a subject (the immortality of the soul) at such a time (that of death).' This passage, I think, evidently glances upon Aristophanes, who writ a comedy on purpose to ridicule the discourses of that divine philosopher.'—ADDISON. The Scriptures are full of allusions to the manners and customs of the Easterns; 'The author, in the whole course of his poem, has infinite allusions to places of Scripture.'—ADDISON. He who attempts to write an epitome of universal history must take but a hasty glance at the most important events.

GLIMPSE, GLANCE.

The glimpse is the action of the object appearing to the eye; the glance is the action of the eye seeking the object: one catches a glimpse of an object; one casts a glance at an object: the latter therefore is properly the means for obtaining the former, which is the end: we get a glimpse by means of a glance. The glimpse is the hasty, imperfect, and sudden view which we get of an object: the glance is the hasty and imperfect view which we take of an object: the former may depend upon a variety of circumstances; the latter depends upon the will of the agent. We can seldom do more than get a glimpse of objects in a carriage that is going with rapidity: 'Of the state with which practice has not acquainted us, we snatch a glimpse, we discern a point, and regulate the rest by passion and by fancy.'—JOHNSON. When we do not wish to be observed to look, we take but a glance of an object;

Here passion first I felt,
Commotion strange! In all enjoyments else
Superiour unmov'd; here only weak
Against the charm of beauty's pow'rful glance.
MILTON.

TO INSINUATE, INGRATIATE.

Insinuate (v. To hint) and ingratiate, from gratus grateful or acceptable, are employed to express the endeavour to gain favour; but they differ in the circumstances of the action. A person who insinuates adopts every art to steal into the good will of another; but he who ingratiates adopts unnatural means to conciliate good will. A person of insinuating manners wins upon another imperceptibly, even so as to convert dislike into attachment; a person with ingratiating manners procures good will by a permanent intercourse. Insinuate and ingratiate differ in the motive, as well as the mode, of the action: the motive is, in both cases, self-interest; but the former is unlawful, and the latter allowable. In proportion as the object to be attained by another's favour is base, so is it necessary to have recourse to insinuation; 'At the isle of Rhé he insinuated himself into the very good grace of the Duke of Buckingham.'—CLARENDON. While the object to be attained is that which may be avowed, ingratiating will serve the purpose; 'My resolution was now to ingratiate myself with men whose reputation was established.'—JOHNSON. Low persons insinuate themselves into the favour of their superiors, in order to obtain an influence over them; it is commendable in a young person to wish to ingratiate himself with those who are entitled to his esteem and respect.

Insinuate may be used in the improper sense for unconscious agents; ingratiate is always the act of a conscious agent. Water will insinuate itself into every body that is in the smallest degree porous; 'The same character of despotism insinuated itself into every court of Europe.'—BURKE. There are few persons of so much apathy, that it may not be possible, one way or another, to ingratiate one's self into their favour.

INSINUATION, REFLECTION.

These both imply personal remarks, or such remarks as are directed towards an individual; but the former is less direct and more covert than the latter. The insinuation always deals in half words; the reflection is commonly open. They are both levelled at the individual with no good intent: but the insinuation is general, and may be employed to convey any unfavourable sentiment; the reflection is particular, and commonly passes between intimates, and persons in close connexion.

The insinuation respects the honour, the moral character, or the intellectual worth, of the object; 'The prejudiced admirers of the ancients are very angry at the least insinuation that they had any idea of our barbarous tragi-comedy.'—TWINING. The reflection respects the particular conduct or feelings of an individual towards another; 'The ill-natured man gives utterance to reflections which a good-natured man stifles.'—ADDISON. Envious people throw out insinuations to the disparagement of others, whose merits they dare not openly question; when friends quarrel, they deal largely in reflections on the past.

PERTINENT, RELEVANT.

Pertinent, from the Latin pertinere to pertain or appertain, signifies belonging or relating to any subject in hand; relevant, from the Latin relevare to relieve or assist, signifies coming in aid or support of a subject. Remarks are pertinent when they bear on any question, and, on the other hand, they are impertinent when they have nothing to do with the question; 'Here I shall seem a little to digress, but you will by and-by find it pertinent.'—BACON. Matter in a discourse, and arguments are relevant, when they serve to strengthen a cause, and, on the other hand, they are irrelevant when they in no wise answer this end; 'Having showed you that we differ about the meaning of Scripture, and are like to do so, certainly there ought to be a rule or a judge between us, to determine our differences, or at least to make our probations and arguments relevant."—K. CHARLES (Letter to A. Henderson). What is relevant is therefore, properly speaking, that which is pertinent, so as to aid a cause.

TO LABOUR, TAKE PAINS OR TROUBLE, USE ENDEAVOUR.

Labour, in Latin labor, comes, in all probability, from labo to falter or faint, because labour causes faintness; to take pains is to expose oneself to the pains; and to take the trouble is to impose the trouble; endeavour, v. To endeavour.

The first three terms suppose the necessity for a painful exertion: but to labour (v. Work) expresses more than to take pains, and this more than to take trouble; to use endeavour excludes every idea of pain or inconvenience: great difficulties must be conquered; great perfection or correctness requires pains: a concern to please will give trouble; but we use endeavours wherever any object is to be obtained, or any duty to be performed. To labour is either a corporeal or a mental action; to take pains is principally an effort of the mind or the attention; to take trouble is an effort either of the body or mind: a faithful minister of the Gospel labours to instil Christian principles into the minds of his audience, and to heal all the breaches which the angry passions make between them: when a child is properly sensible of the value of improvement, he will take the utmost pains to profit by the instruction of the master: he who is too indolent to take the trouble to make his wishes known to those who would comply with them, cannot expect others to trouble themselves with inquiring into their necessities: a good name is of such value to every man that he ought to use his best endeavours to preserve it unblemished; 'They (the Jews) were fain to take pains to rid themselves of their happiness; and it cost them labour and violence to become miserable.'—SOUTH. 'A good conscience hath always enough to reward itself, though the success fall not out according to the merit of the endeavour.'—HOWEL.

WORK, LABOUR, TOIL, DRUDGERY, TASK.

Work, in Saxon weorc, Greek ἔργον, comes doubtless from the Hebrew אָרַב to weave; labour, in Latin labor, signifies the same as in the preceding article (v. To labour); toil is probably connected with till; drudgery is connected with drag, signifying painful labour.

Work is the general term, as including that which calls for the exertion of our strength: labour differs from it in the degree of exertion required; it is hard work: toil expresses a still higher degree of painful exertion: drudgery implies a mean and degrading work;

The hiring thus

With labour drudges out the painful day.—ROWE.

* Every member of society must work for his support, if he is not in independent circumstances: the poor are obliged to labour for their daily subsistence; some are compelled to toil incessantly for the pittance which they earn: drudgery falls to the lot of those who are the lowest in society. A man wishes to complete his work; he is desirous of resting from his labour; he seeks for a respite from his toil; he submits to drudgery.

Work is more or less voluntary, but task, in French tasche, and Italian tassa, is a work imposed by others;

Relieves me from my task of servile toil,

Daily in the common prison else enjoined me.

MILTON.

In its improper application it may be taken in a good sense for a work which one has imposed on oneself;

No happier task these faded eyes pursue,

To read and weep is all they now can do.—POPE.

WORK, OPERATION.

Work, which is derived from the Hebrew, as in the preceding article, denotes either the act of working, or the result of that act: in both cases it is a simple exertion of power; as when speaking of the works of creation or of art and mechanical skill; as the works of the artist and artisan;

O, fairest of creation! last and best

Of all God's works! creature, in whom excels

Whatever can to sight or thought be form'd,

Holy, divine, good, amiable, or sweet,

How art thou lost!—MILTON.

Nor was the work impair'd by storms alone,

But felt the approaches of too warm a sun.—POPE

Operation (v. Action) denotes the act of operating and is a combined exertion, being the effect of method and skill; as in the case of the surgeon, who performs an operation; or a natural process, as the operations of thought, or the operation of vegetation; 'Speculative painting, without the assistance of manual operation, can never attain to perfection, but slothfully languishes; for it was not with his tongue that Apelles performed his noble works.'—DRYDEN. 'There are in men operations natural, rational, supernatural, some politick, some finally ecclesiastick.'—HOOKER.

Between the verbs to work and operate there is even a nicer distinction, both being used in the sense of a process, physical, moral, or intellectual: but work always conveys the idea of the exertion of power, and operate that of a gradual course of action: so water works its way under ground; things operate on the mind by various ways;

Some deadly draught, some enemy to life,

Boils in my bowels, and works out my soul.

DRYDEN

Sometimes a passion seems to operate,

Almost in contradiction to itself.—SHIRLEY.

SERVANT, DOMESTICK, MENIAL, DRUDGE.

In the term servant is included the idea of the service performed; 'A servant dwells remote from all knowledge of his lord's purposes.'—SOUTH. In the term domestick, from domus a house, is included the idea of one belonging to the house or family; 'Montezuma was attended by his own domesticks, and served with his usual state.'—ROBERTSON. In the word menial, from manus the hand, is included the idea of labour; 'Some were his (King Charles') own menial servants, and ate bread at his table before they lifted up their heel against him.'—SOUTH. The term drudge includes drudgery; 'He who will be vastly rich must resolve to be a drudge all his days.'—SOUTH. We hire a servant at a certain rate, and for a particular service; we are attached to our domesticks according to their assiduity and attention to our wishes; we employ as a menial one who is unfit for a higher employment; and a drudge in any labour, however hard and disagreeable.

SERVITUDE, SLAVERY, BONDAGE.

Servitude expresses less than slavery, and this less than bondage.

Servitude, from servio, conveys simply the idea of performing a service, without specifying the principle upon which it is performed. Among the Romans servus signified a slave, because all who served were literally slaves, the power over the person being almost unlimited. The mild influence of Christianity has corrected men's notions with regard to their rights, as well as their duties, and established servitude on the just principle of a mutual compact, without any infraction on that most precious of all human gifts, personal liberty; 'It is fit and necessary that some persons in the world should be in love with a splendid servitude.'—SOUTH. Slavery, which marks a condition incompatible with the existence of this invaluable endowment, is a term odious to the Christian ear; it had its origin in the grossest state of society: the word being derived from the German slave, or Slavonians, a fierce and intrepid people, who made a long stand against the Germans, and, being at last defeated, were made slaves. Slavery, therefore, includes not only servitude, but also the odious circumstance of the entire subjection of one individual to another; a condition which deprives him of every privilege belonging to a free agent, and a rational creature; and which forcibly bends the will and affections of the one to the humour of the other, and converts a thinking being into a mere senseless tool in the hands of its owner. Slavery unfortunately remains, though barbarism has ceased. Christianity has taught men their true end and destination; but it has not yet been able to extinguish that inordinate love of dominion, which is an innate propensity in the human breast. There are those who take the name of Christians, and yet cling to the practice of making their fellow-creatures an article of commerce. Some delude themselves with the idea that they can ameliorate the condition of those over whom they have usurped this unlicensed power; but they forget that he who begins to be a slave ceases to be a man; that slavery is the extinction of our nobler part; and the abuse even of that part in us which we have in common with the brutes; 'So different are the geniuses which are formed under Turkish slavery and Grecian liberty.'—ADDISON.

Bondage, from to bind, denotes the state of being bound, that is, slavery in its most aggravated form, in which, to the loss of personal liberty, is added cruel treatment; the term is seldom applied in its proper sense to any persons but the Israelites in Egypt. In a figurative sense, we speak of being a slave to our passions, and under the bondage of sin, in which cases the terms preserve precisely the same distinction;

Our cage
We make a choir, as doth the prison'd bird,
And sing our bondage freely.—SHAKESPEARE.

The same distinction exists between the epithets servile and slavish, which are employed only in the moral application. He who is servile has the mean character of a servant, but he is still a free agent; but he who is slavish is bound and fettered in every possible form;

That servile path thou nobly dost decline,
Of tracing word by word, and line by line.
Those are the labour'd births of slavish brains,
Not the effect of poetry but pains.—DENHAM.

PRODUCTION, PERFORMANCE, WORK.

When we speak of any thing as resulting from any specified operation, we term it a production; as the production of an author, signifying what he has produced by the effort of his mind: Homer's Iliad is esteemed as one of the finest productions of the imagination. When we speak of any thing as executed or performed by some person we term it a performance, as a drawing or a painting is denominated the performance of a particular artist. The term production cannot be employed without specifying or referring to the source from which it is produced, or the means by which it is produced,—as the production of art, the production of the inventive faculty, the production of the mind, &c.;

Nature, in her productions slow, aspires
By just degrees to reach perfection's height.
SOMERVILLE.

A performance cannot be spoken of without referring to the individual by whom it has been performed; hence we speak of this or that person's performance; 'The performances of Pope were burnt by those whom he had, perhaps, selected as most likely to publish them.'—JOHNSON. When we wish to specify any thing that results from work or labour, it is termed a work: in this manner we either speak of the work of one's hands, or a work of the imagination, a work of time, a work of magnitude; 'Yet there are some works which the author must consign unpublished to posterity.'—JOHNSON. The production results from a complicated operation; the performance consists of simple action; the work springs from active exertion: Shakespeare's plays are termed productions, as they respect the source from which they came, namely, his genius; they might be called his performances, as far as respected the performance or completion of some task or specific undertaking; they would be called his works, as far as respected the labour which he bestowed upon them. The composition of a book is properly a production, when it is original matter; the sketching of a landscape, or drawing a plan, is a performance; the compilation of a history is a work.

ESSAY, TREATISE, TRACT, DISSERTATION.

All these words are employed by authors to characterize compositions varying in their form and contents. Essay, which signifies a trial or attempt (v. Attempt) is here used to designate in a specific manner an author's attempt to illustrate any point. It is most commonly applied to small detached pieces, which contain only the general thoughts of a writer on any given subject, and afford room for amplification into details; although by Locke in his "Essay on the Understanding," Beattie in his "Essay on Truth," and other authors, it is modestly used for their connected and finished endeavours to elucidate a doctrine: 'It is my frequent practice to visit places of resort in this town, to observe what reception my works meet with in the world; it being a privilege asserted by Monsieur Montaigne and others, of vain-glorious memory, that we writers of essays may talk of ourselves.'—STEELE.

A treatise is more systematic than an essay; it treats on the subject in a methodical form, and conveys the idea of something laboured, scientific, and instructive; 'The very title of a moral treatise has something in it austere and shocking to the careless and inconsiderate.'—ADDISON. A tract is only a species of small treatise, drawn up upon particular occasions, and published in a separate form. They are both derived from the Latin tractus, participle of traho to draw, manage, or handle; 'I desire my reader to consider every particular paper or discourse as a distinct tract by itself.'—ADDISON. Dissertation, from dissero to argue, is with propriety applied to performances of an argumentative nature; 'A modern philosopher, quoted by Monsieur Bayle in his learned dissertation on the souls of brutes, says, Deus est anima brutorum, God himself is the soul of brutes.'—ADDISON.

Essays are either moral, political, philosophical, or literary: they are the crude attempts of the youth to digest his own thoughts; or they are the more mature attempts of the man to communicate his thoughts to others. Of the former description are the prize essays in schools; and of the latter are the essays innumerable which have been published on every subject, since the days of Bacon to the present day. Treatises are mostly written on ethical, political, or speculative subjects, such as Fenelon's, Milton's, or Locke's treatises on education; De Lolme's treatise on the constitution of England; Colquhoun's treatise on the police. Dissertations are employed on disputed points of literature, as Bentley's dissertation upon the epistles of Phalaris, De Pauw's dissertations on the Egyptians and Chinese. Tracts are ephemeral productions, mostly on political and religious subjects, which seldom survive the occasion which gave them birth. Of this description are the pamphlets which daily issue from the press, for or against the measures of government, or the public measures of any particular party.

The essay is the most popular mode of writing; it suits the writer who has not either talent or inclination to pursue his inquiries farther, and it suits the generality of readers who are amused with variety and superficiality: the treatise is adapted for the student; he will not be contented with the superficial essay, when more ample materials are within his reach; the tract is formed for the political partisan; it receives its interest from the occurrence of the motive; the dissertation interests the disputant.

PRODUCTION, PRODUCE, PRODUCT.

The term production expresses either the act of producing or the thing produced; product and produce express only the thing produced: the production of a tree from a seed, is one of the wonders of nature; the produce of a thing is said to be considerable or other wise.

In the sense of the thing produced, production is applied to every individual thing that is produced by another: in this sense a tree is a production; produce and product are applied only to those productions which are to be turned to a purpose: the former in a collective sense, and in reference to some particular object; the latter in an abstract and general sense; the aggregate quantity of grain drawn from a field is termed the produce of the field; but corn, hay, vegetables and fruits in general, are termed products or the earth: the naturalist examines all the productions of nature; 'Nature also, as if desirous that so bright a production of her skill should be set in the fairest light, had bestowed on king Alfred every bodily accomplishment.'—HUME. The husbandman looks to the produce of his lands; 'A storm of hail, I am informed, has destroyed all the produce of my estate in Tuscany.'—MELMOUTH (Letters of Cicero). The topographer and traveller inquire about the products of different countries; 'Our British products are of such kinds and quantities as can turn the balance of trade to our advantage.'—ADDISON.

There is the same distinction between these terms in their improper, as in their proper, acceptation: a production is whatever results from an effort, physical or mental, as a production of genius, a production of art, and the like; 'What would become of the scrupulous consumptive productions, furnished by our men of wit and learning?'—SWIFT. The produce is the amount or aggregate result from physical or mental labour: thus, whatever the husbandman reaps from the cultivation of his land is termed the produce of his labour; whatever results from any public subscription or collection is, in like manner, the produce; 'This tax has already been so often tried, that we know the exact produce of it.'—ADDISON. The product is seldom employed except in regard to the mental operation of figures, as the product from multiplication, but it may be used precisely in the sense of production; 'I cannot help thinking the Arabian tales the product of some woman's imagination.'—ATTEBURY.

TO BEAR, YIELD.

Bear, in Saxon baran, old German beran, Latin pario, and Hebrew בָּרָא bara to create; yield, v. To afford.

Bear conveys the idea of creating within itself; yield that of giving from itself. Animals bear their young; inanimate objects yield their produce. An apple-tree bears apples; the earth yields fruits.

Bear marks properly the natural power of bringing forth something of its own kind; yield is said of the result or quantum brought forth: shrubs bear leaves, flowers, or berries, according to their natural properties;

No keel shall cut the waves for foreign ware,
For every soil shall ev'ry product bear.—DRYDEN.

Flowers yield seeds plentifully or otherwise as they are favoured by circumstances;

Nor Bactria, nor the richer Indian fields,
Nor all the gummy stores Arabia yields,
Nor any foreign earth of greater name,
Can with sweet Italy contend in fame.—DRYDEN.

TO BEAR, CARRY, CONVEY, TRANSPORT.

Bear, from the sense of generating (v. To bear, yield), has derived that of retaining; carry, in French charier, probably from the Latin currus, Greek καρπός or κάρπος to run, or κίπος, in Hebrew כָּרָא kara to meet, signifies to move a thing from one place to another; convey, in Latin convehio, is compounded of con and veho to carry with one; transport, in French transporter, Latin transporto, compounded of trans over and porto to carry, signifies to carry to a distance.

To bear is simply to take the weight of any substance upon one's self; to carry is to remove that weight from the spot where it was: we always bear in carrying, but we do not always carry when we bear. Both may be applied to things as well as persons: whatever receives the weight of any thing bears it; whatever is caused to move with any thing carries it. That which cannot be easily borne must be burdensome to carry: in extremely hot weather it is sometimes irksome to bear the weight even of one's clothing; Virgil praises the pious Æneas for having carried his father on his shoulders in order to save him from the sacking of Troy. Weak people or weak things are not fit to bear heavy burdens: lazy people prefer to be carried rather than to carry any thing.

Since bear is confined to personal service it may be used in the sense of carry, when the latter implies the removal of any thing by means of any other body.

The bearer of any letter or parcel is he who carries it in his hand;

In hollow wood thy floating armies bear.—DRYDEN

The carrier of parcels is he who employs a conveyance; 'A whale, besides those seas and oceans in the several vessels of his body which are filled with innumerable shoals of little animals, carries about him a whole world of inhabitants.'—ADDISON. Hence the word bear is often very appropriately substituted for carry, as Virgil praises Æneas for bearing his father on his shoulders.

Convey and transport are species of carrying. Carry in its particular sense is employed either for personal exertions or actions performed by the help of other means; convey and transport are employed for such actions as are performed not by immediate personal intervention or exertion: a porter carries goods on his knot; goods are conveyed in a wagon or a cart; they are transported in a vessel.

Convey expresses simply the mode of removing; transport annexes to this the idea of the place and the distance. Merchants get the goods conveyed into their warehouses, which they have had transported from distant countries. Pedestrians take no more with them than what they can conveniently carry: could armies do the same, one of the greatest obstacles to the indulgence of human ambition would be removed; for many an incursion into a peaceful country is defeated for the want of means to convey provisions sufficient for such numbers; and when mountains or deserts are to be traversed, another great difficulty presents itself in the transportation of artillery;

Love cannot, like the wind, itself convey
To fill two sails, though both are spread one way
HOWARD.

It is customary at funerals for some to bear the pall and others to carry wands or staves; the body itself is conveyed in a hearse, unless it has to cross the ocean, in which case it is transported in a vessel; 'It is to navigation that men are indebted for the power of transporting the superfluous stock of one part of the earth to supply the wants of another.'—ROBERTSON.

TO BRING, FETCH, CARRY.

To bring, in German, &c. bringen, is supposed to be contracted from beringen, and ringen or regen to move; fetch is not improbably connected with the verb search, signifying to send for or go after; carry v. To bear, carry.

To bring is simply to take with one's self from the place where one is; to fetch is to go first to a place and then bring the thing away; to fetch therefore is a species of bringing; whatever is heard at hand is brought; whatever is at a distance must be fetched. The porter at an inn brings a parcel, the servant fetches it.

Bring always respects motion towards the place in which the agent or speaker resides; 'What appeared to me wonderful was that none of the ants came home without bringing something.'—ADDISON. Fetch denotes a motion both to and from; 'I have said before that those ants which I did so particularly consider, fetched their corn out of a garret.'—ADDISON. Carry denotes always a motion directly from the place or at a distance from the place; 'How great is the hardship of a poor ant, when she carries a grain of corn to the second story, climbing up a wall with her head downwards.'—ADDISON. A servant brings the parcel home which his master has sent him to fetch; he carries a parcel from home. A carrier carries parcels to and from a place, but he only brings parcels to any place.

Bring is an action performed at the option of the agent; fetch and carry are mostly done at the command of another. Hence the old proverb, 'He who will fetch will carry,' to mark the character of the gossip and tale-bearer, who reports what he hears from two persons in order to please both parties.

TO AFFORD, YIELD, PRODUCE.

Afford is probably changed from afferred, and comes from the Latin affero, compounded of af or ad and fero, signifying to bring to a person; yield, in Saxon geldan, German gelten to pay, restore, or give the to breed, or bring forth; produce, in Latin produco, compounded of pro forth and duco to bring, signifies to bring out or into existence.

With afford is associated the idea of communicating a part or property of some substance, to a person: meat affords nourishment to those who make use of it; the sun affords light and heat to all living creatures; 'The generous man in the ordinary acceptation, without respect of the demands of his family, will soon find upon the foot of his account that he has sacrificed to fools, knaves, flatterers, or the deservedly unhappy, all the opportunities of affording any future assistance where it ought to be.'—STEELE.

Yielding is the natural operation of any substance to give up or impart the parts or properties inherent in it; it is the natural surrender which an object makes of itself; trees yield fruit; the seed yields grain; some sorts of grain do not yield much in particular soils;

Their vines a shadow to their race shall yield,
And the same hand that sowed shall reap the field.

POPE.

Produce conveys the idea of one thing causing another to exist, or to spring out of it; it is a species of creation, the formation of a new substance: the earth produces a variety of fruits; confined air will produce an explosion;

Their sharpen'd ends in earth their footing place,
And the dry poles produce a living race.—DRYDEN.

In the moral application they are similarly distinguished: nothing affords so great a scope for ridicule as the follies of fashion; 'This is the consolation of all good men unto whom his ubiquity affordeth continual comfort and security.'—BROWN. Nothing yields so much satisfaction as religion. 'The mind of man desireth evermore to know the truth, according to the most infallible certainty which the nature of things can yield.'—HOOKER. Nothing produces so much mischief as the vice of drunkenness;

Thou all this good of evil shalt produce.—MILTON.

The history of man does not afford an instance of any popular commotion that has ever produced such atrocities and atrocious characters as the French revolution.

Religion is the only thing that can afford true consolation and peace of mind in the season of affliction and the hour of death. The recollection of past incidents, particularly those which have passed in our infancy, produces the most pleasurable sensations in the mind.

BUSINESS, OCCUPATION, EMPLOYMENT, ENGAGEMENT, AVOCATION.

Business signifies what makes busy (v. Active, busy); occupation, from occupy, in French occuper, Latin occupo, that is, ob and capio, signifies that which serves or takes possession of a person or thing to the exclusion of other things; employment, from employ, in French employer, Latin implico, Greek εμπλέκω, signifies that which engages or fixes a person; engagement also signifies what engages or binds a person; avocation, in Latin avocatio, from a and voco, signifies the thing that calls off from another thing.

Business occupies all a person's thoughts as well as his time and powers; occupation and employment occupy only his time and strength: the first is mostly regular, it is the object of our choice; the second is casual, it depends on the will of another. Engagement is a partial employment, avocation a particular engagement: an engagement prevents us from doing any thing else; an avocation calls off or prevents us from doing what we wish.

Every tradesman has a business, on the diligent prosecution of which depends his success in life; 'The materials are no sooner wrought into paper, but they are distributed among the presses, where they again set innumerable artists at work, and furnish business to another mystery.'—ADDISON. Every mechanic has his daily occupation, by which he maintains his family; 'How little must the ordinary occupations of men seem to one who is engaged in so noble a pursuit as the assimilation of himself to the Deity.'—BERKELEY. Every labourer has an employment which is fixed for him; 'Creatures who have the labours of the mind, as well as those of the body, to furnish them with employments.'—GUARDIAN.

Business and occupation always suppose a serious object. Business is something more urgent and important than occupation: a man of independent fortune has no occasion to pursue business, but as a rational agent he will not be contented to be without an occupation.

Employment, engagement, and avocation leave the object undefined. An employment may be a mere diversion of the thoughts, and a wasting of the hours in some idle pursuit; a child may have its employment, which may be its play in distinction from its business, 'I would recommend to every one of my readers the keeping a journal of their lives for one week, and setting down punctually their whole series of employments during that space of time.'—ADDISON. An engagement may have no higher object than that of pleasure; the idlest people have often the most engagements: the gratification of curiosity, and the love of social pleasure, supply them with an abundance of engagements; 'Mr. Baretti being a single man, and entirely clear from all engagements, takes the advantage of his independence.'—JOHNSON. Avocations have seldom a direct trifling object, although it may sometimes be of a subordinate nature, and generally irrelevant: numerous avocations are not desirable; every man should have a regular pursuit, the business of his life, to which the principal part of his time should be devoted: avocations therefore of a serious nature are apt to divide the time and attention to a hurtful degree; 'Sorrow ought not to be suffered to increase by indulgence, but must give way after a stated time to social duties and the common avocations of life.'—JOHNSON.

A person who is busy has much to attend to, and attends to it closely; a person who is occupied has a full share of business without any pressure; he is opposed to one who is idle: a person who is employed has the present moment filled up; he is not in a state of inaction: the person who is engaged is not at liberty to be otherwise employed; his time is not his own; he is opposed to one at leisure.

BUSINESS, TRADE, PROFESSION, ART.

These words are synonymous in the sense of a calling, for the purpose of a livelihood; business (v. Business) is general; trade, signifying that which employs the time by way of trade; profession, or that which one professes to do by way of employment; and art, signifying that which is practised in the way of the arts, are particular; all trade is business, but all business is not trade.

Buying and selling of merchandise is inseparable from trade; but the exercise of one's knowledge and experience, for purposes of gain, constitutes a business; when learning or particular skill is required, it is a profession; and when there is a peculiar exercise of art, it is an art: every shopkeeper and retail dealer carries on a trade; 'Some persons, indeed, by the privilege of their birth and quality, are above a common trade and profession, but they are not hereby exempted from all business, and allowed to live unprofitably to others.'—TILLOTSON. Brokers, manufacturers, bankers, and others, carry on business; 'Those who are determined by choice to any particular kind of business are indeed more happy than those who are determined by necessity.'—ADDISON. Clergymen, medical, or military men, follow a profession; 'No one of the sons of Adam ought to think himself exempt from labour or industry; those to whom birth or fortune may seem to make such an application unnecessary, ought to find out some calling or profession, that they may not lie as a burthen upon the species.'—ADDISON. Musicians and painters follow an art; 'The painter understands his art.'—SWIFT.

BUSINESS, OFFICE, DUTY.

Business is what one prescribes to one's self; office, in French office, Latin officium, from officio, or ob and facio, signifying to do for, or on account of any one is prescribed by another; duty, from the Latin debitum and debeo to owe, signifying what is due, is prescribed or enjoined by a fixed rule of propriety: mercantile concerns are the business which a man takes upon himself, the management of parish concerns is an office imposed upon a person often, much against his inclination; the maintenance of a family is a duty which a man's conscience enjoins upon him to perform.

Business and duty are public or private; office is mostly of a public nature: a minister of state, by virtue of his office, has always public business to perform;

But now the feather'd youth their former bounds
Ardent disdain, and, weighing off their wings,
Demand the free possession of the sky.
This one glad office more, and then dissolves
Parental love at once, now heedless grown.

THOMSON.

But men in general have only private business to transact; 'It is certain, from Suetonius, that the Romans thought the education of their children a business properly belonging to the parents themselves.'—BUNSELL. A minister of religion has public duties to perform in his ministerial capacity; every other man has personal or relative duties, which he is called upon to discharge according to his station; 'Discretion is the perfection of reason, and a guide to us in all the duties of life.'—ADDISON.

AFFAIR, BUSINESS, CONCERN.

Affair, in French affaire, from à and faire to be done, signifies that which is to be done or is in hand; business, from busy (v. Active), signifies the thing that makes or interests a person, or with which he is busy or occupied; concern, in French concerner, Latin concerno, compounded of con and cerno to look, signifies the thing looked at, thought of, or taken part in.

An affair is what happens; a business is what is done; a concern is what is felt. An affair is general; it respects one, many, or all; every business and concern is an affair, though not vice versa. Business and concern are personal; business is that which engages the attention; concern is that which interests the feelings, prospects, and condition, advantageously or otherwise. An affair is interesting; a business is serious; a concern momentous. The usurpation of power is an affair which interests a nation; 'I remember in Tully's epistle, in the recommendation of a man to an affair which had no manner of relation to money, it is said, you may trust him, for he is a frugal man.'—STEELE. The adjusting of a difference is a business most suited to the ministers of religion; 'We may indeed say that our part does not suit us, and that we could perform another better; but this, says Epictetus, is not our business.'—ADDISON. To make our peace with our Maker is the concern of every individual; 'The sense of other men ought to prevail over us in things of less consideration; but not in concerns where truth and honour are engaged.'—STEELE.

Affairs are administered; business is transacted; concerns are managed. The affairs of the world are administered by a Divine Providence. Those who are in the practice of the law require peculiar talents to fit them for transacting the complicated business which perpetually offers itself. Some men are so involved in the affairs of this world, as to forget the concerns of the next, which ought to be nearest and dearest to them.

TO AFFECT, CONCERN.

Affect, in French affecter, Latin affectum, participle of affecto, compounded of ad and facio to do or act, signifies to act upon; concern, v. Affair.

Things affect us which produce any change in our outward circumstances; they concern us if only connected with our circumstances in any shape.

Whatever affects must concern; but all that concerns does not affect. The price of corn affects the interest of the seller: and therefore it concerns him to keep it up, without regard to the public good or injury.

Things affect either persons or things; but they concern persons only. Rain affects the hay or corn; and these matters concern every one more or less.

Affect and concern have an analogous meaning likewise, when taken for the influence on the mind. We are *affect*ed by things when our *affect*ions only are awakened by them; we are *concern*ed when our understanding and wishes are engaged.

We may be *affect*ed either with joy or sorrow. 'We see that every different species of sensible creatures has its different notions of beauty, and that each of them is *affect*ed with the beauties of its own kind.'—ADDISON. We are *concern*ed only in a painful manner:

Without concern he hears, but hears from far,
Of tumults, and descents, and distant war.

DRYDEN.

People of tender sensibility are easily *affect*ed; irritable people are *concern*ed about trifles. It is natural for every one to be *affect*ed at the recital of misfortunes; but there are people of so cold and selfish a character as not to be *concern*ed about any thing which does not immediately affect their persons or property.

INTEREST, CONCERN.

The interest, from the Latin interesse to be among, or have a part or a share in a thing, is more comprehensive than concern (v. Affair). We have an interest in whatever touches or comes near to our feelings or our external circumstances; we have a concern in that which respects our external circumstances. The interest is that which is agreeable; it consists of either profit, advantage, gain, or amusement; it binds us to an object, and makes us think of it: the concern, on the other hand, is something involuntary or painful. We have a concern in that which we are obliged to look to, which we are bound to from the fear of losing or of suffering. It is the interest of every man to cultivate a religious temper; it is the concern of all to be on their guard against temptation; 'O give us a serious comprehension of that one great interest of others as well as ourselves.'—HAMMOND.

And could the marble rocks but know,
They'd strive to find some secret way unknown
Maugre the senseless nature of the stone,
Their pity and concern to show.—POMFREY

OFFICE, PLACE, CHARGE, FUNCTION

Office, in Latin officium, from officio, or officio, signifies either the duty performed or the situation in which the duty is performed. Place comprehends no idea of duty, for there may be sinecure places which are only nominal offices, and designate merely a relationship with the government: every office therefore of a public nature is in reality a place, yet every place is not an office. The place of secretary of state is likewise an office, but that of ranger of a park is a place only and not an office. The office is held; the place is filled: the office is given or intrusted to a person; the place is granted or conferred: the office reposes a confidence, and imposes a responsibility; the place gives credit and influence: the office is bestowed on a man from his qualification; the place is granted to him by favour, or as a reward for past services: the office is more or less honourable;

You have contriv'd to take
From Rome all season'd office, and to wind
Yourself into a power tyrannical.—SHAKESPEARE.

The place is more or less profitable;
When rogues like these (a sparrow cries)
To honours and employment rise,
I court no favour, ask no place.—GAY.

In an extended application of the terms office and place, the latter has a much lower signification than that of the former, since the office is always connected with the State; but the place is a private concern; the office is a place of trust, but the place may be a place for menial labour; the offices are multiplied in time of war; the places for domestic service are more numerous in a state of peace and prosperity. The office is frequently taken not with any reference to the place occupied, but simply to the thing done; this brings it nearer in signification to the term charge (v. Care). An office imposes a task, or some performance;

'T is all men's office to speak patience
To those that wring under the load of sorrow.
SHAKESPEARE.

A charge imposes a responsibility; we have always something to do in office, always something to look after in a charge; 'Denham was made governor of Farnham Castle for the king, but he soon resigned that charge and retreated to Oxford.'—JOHNSON. The office is either public or private, the charge is always of a private and personal nature: a person performs the office of a magistrate, or of a minister; he undertakes the charge of instructing youth, or of being a guardian, or of conveying a person's property from one place to another. The office is that which is assigned by another; function is properly the act of discharging or completing an office or business, from fungo, viz. finem and ago to put an end to or bring to a conclusion; it is extended in its acceptation to the office itself or the thing done, in which case the idea of duty predominates, as the functions of a minister of state or of a minister of the gospel; 'The ministry is not now bound to any one tribe; now none is secluded from that function of any degree, state, or calling.'—WHITGIFT. The office in its strict sense is performed only by conscious or intelligent agents, who act according to their instructions; the function, on the other hand, is sometimes an operation of unconscious objects according to the laws of nature. The office of a herald is to proclaim public events or to communicate circumstances from one public body to another: the function of the tongue is to speak; that of the ear, to hear; that of the eye, to see. The word office is sometimes employed in the same application by the personification of nature, which assigns an office to the ear, to the tongue, to the eye, and the like. When the frame becomes overpowered by a sudden shock, the tongue will frequently refuse to perform its office; 'The two offices of memory are collection and distribution.'—JOHNSON. When the animal functions are impeded for a length of time, the vital power ceases to exist;

Nature within me seems,
In all her functions, weary of herself.—MILTON.

PROCEEDING, PROCESS, PROGRESS.

The manner of performing actions for the attainment of a given end is the common idea comprehended in these terms. Proceeding is the most general, as it simply expresses the general idea of the manner of going on; the rest are specific terms, denoting some particularity in the action, object, or circumstance. The proceeding is said commonly of such things as happen in the ordinary way of doing business; 'What could be more fair, than to lay open to an enemy all that you wished to obtain, and to desire him to imitate your ingenious proceeding?'—BURKE. Process is said of such things as are done by rule: the former is considered in a moral point of view; the latter in a scientific or technical point of view; the freemasons have bound themselves together by a law of secrecy not to reveal some part of their proceedings; the process by which paper is made has undergone considerable improvements since its first invention;

Saturnian Juno now, with double care,
Attends the fatal process of the war.—DRYDEN.

The proceeding and progress both refer to the moral actions of men; but the proceeding simply denotes the act of going on, or doing something; the progress denotes an approximation to the end: the proceeding may be only a partial action, comprehending both the beginning and the end; but the progress is applied to that which requires time, and a regular succession of action, to bring it to a completion; that is a proceeding in which every man is tried in a court of law; that is a progress which one makes in learning, by the addition to one's knowledge: hence we do not talk of the proceeding of life, but of the progress of life; 'Devotion bestows that enlargement of heart in the service of God, which is the greatest principle both of perseverance and progress in virtue.'—BLAIR.

PROCEEDING, TRANSACTION.

Proceeding signifies literally the thing that proceeds; and transaction the thing transacted; the former is, therefore, of something that is going forward; the latter of something that is already done: we are witnesses to the whole proceeding; we inquire into the whole transaction. The proceeding is said of every event or circumstance which goes forward through the agency of men; the transaction or ly comprehends those matters which have been deliberately transacted or brought to a conclusion; in this sense we use the word proceeding in application to an affray in the street; and the word transaction to some commercial negotiation that has been carried on between certain persons. The proceeding marks the manner of proceeding; as when we speak of the proceedings in a court of law; 'The proceedings of a council of old men in an American tribe, we are told, were no less formal and sagacious than those in a senate in more polished republics.'—ROBERTSON. The transaction marks the business transacted; as the transactions on the Exchange; 'It was Bothwell's interest to cover, if possible, the whole transaction under the veil of darkness and silence.'—ROBERTSON. A proceeding may be characterized as disgraceful; a transaction as iniquitous.

TRADE, COMMERCE, TRAFFICK, DEALING.

Trade, in Italian tratto, Latin tracto to treat, signifies the transaction of business; commerce, v. Inter-course; traffick, in French traffique, Italian traffico, compounded of tra or trans and facio, signifies to make over from one to another; dealing, from the verb to deal, in German theilen to divide, signifies to put in parts according to a certain ratio, or at a given price.

The leading idea in trade is that of carrying on business for purposes of gain; the rest are but modes of trade: commerce is a mode of trade by exchange; traffick is a sort of personal trade, a sending from hand to hand; dealing is a bargaining or calculating kind of trade. Trade is either on a large or small scale; commerce is always on a large scale: we may trade retail or wholesale; we always carry on commerce by wholesale: trade is either within or without the country; commerce is always between different countries: there may be a trade between two towns; but there is a commerce between England and America, between France and Germany: hence it arises that the general term trade is of inferior import when compared with commerce. The commerce of a country, in the abstract and general sense, conveys more to our mind, and is a more noble expression, than the trade of the country, as the merchant ranks higher than the tradesman, and a commercial house, than a trading concern;

Instructed ships shall sail to quick commerce,
By which remotest regions are ally'd;
Which makes one city of the universe,
Where some may gain, and all may be supply'd
DRYDEN.

Nevertheless the word trade may be used in the same general and enlarged sense; 'Trade, without enlarging the British territories, has given us a kind of additional empire.'—ADDISON. Trade may be altogether domestic, and between neighbours; the traffick is that which goes forward between persons at a distance: in this manner there may be a great traffick between two towns or cities, as between London and the capitals of the different counties;

The line of Ninus this poor comfort brings,
We sell their dust, and traffick for their kings.
DRYDEN.

Trade may consist simply in buying and selling according to a stated valuation; dealings are carried on in matters that admit of a variation: hence we speak of dealers in wool, in corn, seeds, and the like, who buy up portions of these goods, more or less, according to the state of the market.

These terms will also admit of an extended application: hence we speak of the risk of trade, the narrowness of a trading spirit: the commerce of the world, a legal or illicit commerce; to make a traffick of honours, of principles, of places, and the like; plain dealing or underhand dealing.

INTERCOURSE, COMMUNICATION, CONNECTION, COMMERCE.

Intercourse, in Latin intercursus, signifies literally a running between; communication, the act of communicating or having some things in common; conexio is the state of being connected or linked together; commerce, from com and merx a merchandise, signifies literally an exchange of merchandise and generally an interchange.

The intercourse and commerce subsist only between persons; the communication and connexion between persons and things. The intercourse with persons may be carried on in various forms; either by an interchange of civilities, which is a friendly intercourse; an exchange of commodities, which is a commercial intercourse; or an exchange of words, which is a verbal and partial intercourse; 'The world is maintained by intercourse.'—SOUTH. The communication, in this sense, is a species of intercourse; namely, that which consists in the communication of one's thoughts to another; 'How happy is an intellectual being, who, by prayer and meditation, opens this communication between God and his own soul.'—ADDISON. The connexion consists of a permanent intercourse, since one who has a regular intercourse for purposes of trade with another is said to have a connexion with him, or to stand in connexion with him. There may, therefore, be a partial intercourse or communication where there is no connexion, nothing to bind or link the parties to each other; but there cannot be a connexion which is not kept up by continual intercourse: 'A very material part of our happiness or misery arises from the connexions we have with those around us.'—BLAIR.

The commerce is a species of general but close intercourse; it may consist either of frequent meeting and regular co-operation, or in cohabitation: in this sense we speak of the commerce of men one with another, or the commerce of man and wife, of parents and children, and the like; 'I should venture to call politeness benevolence in trifles, or the preference of others to ourselves, in little, daily, and hourly occurrences in the commerce of life.'—CHATHAM.

As it respects things, communication is said of places in the proper sense; connexion is used for things in the proper or improper sense: there is said to be a communication between two rooms when there is a passage open from one to the other; one house has a connexion with another when there is a common passage or thoroughfare to them: a communication is kept up between two countries by means of regular or irregular conveyances; a connexion subsists between two towns when the inhabitants trade with each other, intermarry, and the like.

INTERCHANGE, EXCHANGE, RECIPROCITY.

Interchange is a frequent and mutual exchange (v. Change); exchange consists of one act only; an interchange consists of many acts: an interchange is used only in the moral sense; exchange is used mostly in the proper sense; an interchange of civilities keeps alive good will; 'Kindness is preserved by a constant interchange of pleasures.'—JOHNSON. An exchange of commodities is a convenient mode of trade; 'The whole course of nature is a great exchange.'—SOUTH.

Interchange is an act; reciprocity is an abstract property: by an interchange of sentiment, friendships are engendered; the reciprocity of good services is what renders them doubly acceptable to those who do them, and to those who receive them; 'The services of the poor, and the protection of the rich, become reciprocally necessary.'—BLAIR.

MUTUAL, RECIPROCAL.

Mutual, in Latin mutuus, from mutuo to change, signifies exchanged so as to be equal or the same on both sides; reciprocal, in Latin reciprocus, from recipio to take back, signifies giving backward and forward by way of return. Mutual supposes a sameness in condition at the same time: reciprocal supposes an alternation or succession of returns. * Exchange is free and voluntary; we give in exchange, and this action is mutual; return is made either according to law or equity; it is obligatory, and when equally obligatory on each in return it is reciprocal. Voluntary disinterested services rendered to each other are mutual: imposed or merited services, returned from one to the other, are reciprocal: friends render one another mutual services; the services between servants and masters are reciprocal. The husband and wife pledge their faith to each other mutually; they are reciprocally bound to keep their vow of fidelity. The sentiment is mutual, the tie is reciprocal. Mutual applies mostly to matters of will and opinion, a mutual affection, a mutual inclination to oblige, a mutual interest for each other's comfort, a mutual concern to avoid that which will displease the other; these are the sentiments which render the marriage state happy; 'The soul and spirit that animates and keeps up society is mutual trust.'—SOUTH. Reciprocal ties, reciprocal bonds, reciprocal rights, reciprocal duties; these are what every one ought to bear in mind as a member of society, that he may expect of no man more than what in equity he is disposed to return; 'Life cannot subsist in society but by reciprocal concessions.'—JOHNSON. Mutual applies to nothing but what is personal; reciprocal is applied to things remote from the idea of personality, as reciprocal verbs, reciprocal terms, reciprocal relations, and the like.

TO CHANGE, EXCHANGE, BARTER, SUBSTITUTE.

Change, v. To change, alter; exchange is compounded of e or ex and change, signifying to change in the place of another; barter is supposed to come from the French barater, a sea term for indemnification, and also for circumvention; hence it has derived the meaning of a mercenary exchange; substitute, in French substitut, Latin substitutus, from sub and statuo, signifies to place one thing in the room of another.

The idea of putting one thing in the place of another is common to all these terms, which vary in the manner and the object. Change is the generic, the rest are specific terms: whatever is exchanged, bartered, or substituted, is changed; but not vice versa. Change is applied in general to things of the same kind, or of different kinds; exchange to articles of property or possession; barter to all articles of merchandise; substitute to all matters of service and office.

Things rather than persons are the proper objects for changing and exchanging, although whatever one has a control over may be changed or exchanged; a king may change his ministers; governments exchange prisoners of war. Things only are the proper objects for barter; but, to the shame of humanity, there are to be found people who will barter their countrymen, and even their relatives, for a paltry trinket.

Substituting may either have persons or things for an object; one man may be substituted for another, or one word substituted for another.

The act of changing or substituting requires but one person for an agent; that of exchanging and bartering requires two: a person changes his things or substitutes one for another; but one person exchanges or barters with another.

Change is used likewise intransitively, the others always transitively; things change of themselves, but persons always exchange, barter, or substitute things. Changing is not advisable, it is seldom advantageous; there is a greater chance of changing for the worse, than for the better; it is set on foot by caprice oftener than by prudence and necessity;

Those who beyond sea go will sadly find

They change their climate only, not their mind.

CREECH.

Exchanging is convenient; it is founded not so much on the intrinsic value of things, as their relative utility to the parties concerned; its end is mutual accommodation; 'Our English merchant converts the tin of his own country into gold, and exchanges its wool for rubies.'—ADDISON. Bartering is profitable; it proceeds upon a principle of mercantile calculation; the productiveness, and not the worth of the thing is considered; its main object is gain;

If the great end of being can be lost,

And thus perverted to the worst of crimes;

Let us shake off deprav'd humanity,

Exchange conditions with the savage brute,

And for his blameless instinct barter reason.

HAYWARD

Substituting is a matter of necessity; it springs from the necessity of supplying a deficiency by some equivalent; it serves for the accommodation of the party whose place is filled up; 'Let never insulted beauty admit a second time into her presence the wretch who has once attempted to ridicule religion, and to substitute other aids to human frailty.'—HAWKSWORTH.

In the figurative application these terms bear the same analogy to each other. A person changes his opinions; but a proneness to such changes evinces a want of firmness in the character. The good king at his death exchanges a temporal for an eternal crown. The mercenary trader barters his conscience for paltry pelf. Men of dogmatical tempers substitute assertion for proof, and abuse for argument.

TO EXCHANGE, BARTER, TRUCK, COMMUTE.

To exchange (v. To change) is the general term signifying to take one for another, or put one thing in the place of another; the rest are but modes of exchanging; to barter (v. To change) is to exchange one article of trade for another; to truck, from the Greek τροχάω to wheel, signifying to bandy about, is a familiar term to express a familiar action for exchanging one article of private property for another; commute, from the Latin syllable com or contra and *mut*o to change, signifies an exchanging one mode of punishment for another. We may exchange one book for another, or one moral object for another;

Pleasure can be exchanged only for pleasure.

HAWKSWORTH.

Traders barter trinkets for gold dust; so also in the figurative sense men barter their consciences for gold; 'Some men are willing to barter their blood for lucre.'—BURKE. Coachmen or stablemen truck a whip for a handkerchief;

Shows all her secrets of house-keeping,

For candles how she trucks her dripping.—SWIFT.

The government commute the punishment of death for that of banishment; 'Henry levied upon his vassals in Normandy a sum of money in lieu of their service, and this commutation, by reason of the great distance, was still more advantageous to his English vassals.'—HUME.

TO BUY, PURCHASE, BARGAIN, CHEAPEN.

Buy, in Saxon byegean, is in all probability connected with bargain; purchase, in French pourchasser, like the word pursue, poursuivre, comes from the Latin persequor, signifying to obtain by a particular effort; bargain, in Welch bargen, is most probably connected with the German borgen to borrow, and bürge a surety; cheapen is in Saxon ceapan, German kaufen, Dutch *koop*en to buy, &c.

Buy and purchase have a strong resemblance to each other, both in sense and application; but the latter is a term of more refinement than the former: buy may always be substituted for purchase without impropriety; but purchase would be sometimes ridiculous in the familiar application of buy; the necessities of life are bought; luxuries are purchased.

The characteristic idea of buying is that of expending money according to a certain rule, and for a particular purpose; that of purchasing is the procuring the thing; the propensity of buying whatever comes in one's way is very injurious to the circumstances of some people; 'It gives me very great scandal to observe, wherever I go, how much skill, in buying all manner of things, there is necessary to defend yourself from being cheated.'—STEELE. What it is not convenient to procure for ourselves, we may commission another to purchase for us; so in the figurative acceptance we may purchase our pleasures at a dear rate;

Pirates may make cheap pennyworths of their pillage And purchase friends.—SHAKESPEARE.

Buying implies simply the exchange of one's money for a commodity; bargaining and cheapening have likewise respect to the price: to bargain is to make a specific agreement as to the price;

So York must sit, and fret, and bite his tongue,
While his own lands are bargain'd for, and sold.

SHAKESPEARE.

To cheapen is not only to lower the price asked, but to deal in such things as are cheap: trade is supported by buyers; bargainers and cheapeners are not acceptable customers: mean people are prone to bargaining; poor people are obliged to cheapen; 'You may see many a smart rhetorician turning his hat in his hands, moulding it into several different cocks, examining sometimes the lining, and sometimes the button, during the whole course of his harangue. A deaf man would think he was cheapening a beaver, when perhaps he is talking of the fate of the British nation.'—ADDISON

ARTICLE, CONDITION, TERM.

Article, in French article, Latin articulus a joint or a part of a member; condition, in French condition, Latin conditio, from condo to build or form, signifies properly the thing framed; term, in French terme, Latin terminus a boundary, signifies the point to which one is fixed.

These words agree in their application to matters of compact, or understanding between man and man. Article and condition are used in both numbers; terms only in the plural in this sense: the former may be used for any point individually; the latter for all the points collectively: article is employed for all matters which are drawn out in specific articles or points; as the articles of an indenture, of a capitulation, or an agreement. Condition respects any point that is admitted as a ground of obligation or engagement: it is used for the general transactions of men, in which they reciprocally bind themselves to return certain equivalents. The word terms is employed in regard to mercantile transactions; as the terms of any bargain, the terms of any agreement, the terms on which any thing is bought or sold.

Articles are mostly voluntary; they are admitted by mutual agreement: conditions are frequently compulsory, sometimes hard; they are submitted to from policy or necessity: terms are dictated by interest or equity; they are fair, or unfair, according to the temper of the parties; they are submitted or agreed to. Articles are drawn up between parties who have to co-operate; 'In the mean time, they have ordered the preliminary treaty to be published, with observations on each article, in order to quiet the minds of the people.'—STEELE. Men undertake particular offices on condition of receiving a stipulated remuneration

The Trojan by his word is bound to take

The same conditions which himself did make.

DRYDEN.

Men enter into dealings with each other on definite and precise terms;

Those mountains fill'd with firs, that lower land

If you consent, the Trojans shall command;

Call'd into part of what is ours, and there,

On terms agreed, the common country share.

DRYDEN.

Clergymen subscribe to the articles of the established church before they are admitted to perform its sacred functions; in so doing they are presumed to be free agents; but they are not free to swerve from these articles while they remain in the church, and receive its emoluments: in all auctions there are certain conditions with which all must comply who wish to receive the benefits of the sale: in the time of war it is the business of the victor to prescribe terms to the vanquished; with the latter it is a matter of prudence whether they shall be accepted or rejected.

TRADER, MERCHANT, TRADESMAN.

Trader signifies in general any one who deals in goods, whether in a large or a small way, and is used therefore in the most extended sense;

Now the victory's won,
We return to our lasses like fortunate traders,
Triumphant with spoils.—DRYDEN.

Merchant signifies one dealing in foreign merchandise and, for the most part, in a large way;

France hath flaw'd the league, and bath attach'd
Our merchants' goods at Bourdeaux.—SHAKESPEARE

Hence these two terms may be used in contradistinction to each other; 'Many traders will necessitate merchants to trade for less profit, and consequently be more frugal.'—CHILD (On Trade). A tradesman is a retail dealer who commonly exposes his goods in a public shop; 'From a plain tradesman in a shop, he is now grown a very rich country gentleman.'—ARBUTHNOT.

ARTIST, ARTISAN, ARTIFICER, MECHANICK.

Artist is a practiser of the fine arts; artisan is a practiser of the vulgar arts; artificer, from ars and facio, is one who does or makes according to art; mechanick is an artisan in the mechanick arts.

The artist ranks higher than the artisan: the former requires intellectual refinement in the exercise of his art; the latter requires nothing but to know the general rules of his art. The musician, painter, and sculptor are artists; 'If ever this country saw an age of artists, it is the present; her painters, sculptors, and engravers are now the only schools properly so called.'—CUMBERLAND. The carpenter, the sign-painter, and the blacksmith are artisans; 'The merchant, tradesman, and artisan will have their profit upon all the multiplied wants, comforts, and indulgences of civilized life.'—CUMBERLAND. The artificer is an intermediate term between the artist and the artisan: manufacturers are artificers; and South, in his sermons, calls the Author of the universe the great Artificer; 'Man must be in a certain degree the artificer of his own happiness; the tools and materials may be put into his hands by the bounty of Providence, but the workmanship must be his own.'—CUMBERLAND. The mechanick is that species of artisan who works at arts purely mechanical, in distinction from those which contribute to the completion and embellishment of any objects; on this ground a shoemaker is a mechanick, but a common painter is a simple artisan; 'The concurring assent of the world in preferring gentlemen to mechanicks seems founded in that preference which the rational part of our nature is entitled to above the animal.'—BARTLETT.

WRITER, PENMAN, SCRIBE.

Writer is an indefinite term; every one who writes is called a writer; but none are penmen but such as are expert at their pen. Many who profess to teach writing are themselves but sorry writers: the best penmen are not always the best teachers of writing. The scribe is one who writes for the purpose of copying: he is therefore an official writer.

WRITER, AUTHOR.

Writer refers us to the act of writing; author to the act of inventing. There are therefore many writers, who are not authors; but there is no author of books who may not be termed a writer: compilers and contributors to periodical works are writers, but not authors. Poets and historians are more properly termed authors than writers.

FARMER, HUSBANDMAN, AGRICULTURIST.

Farmer, from the Saxon feorm food, signifies one managing a farm, or cultivating the ground for a subsistence;

To check this plague, the skilful farmer chaff
And blazing straw before his orchard burns.

—THOMSON.

Husbandman is one following husbandry, that is, the tillage of land by manual labour; the farmer, therefore conducts the concern, and the husbandman labours under his direction;

Old husbandmen I at Sabinnum know,
Who, for another year, dig, plough, and sow.

—DENHAM.

Agriculturist, from the Latin ager a field, and colo to till, signifies any one engaged in the art of cultivation. The farmer is always a practitioner; the agriculturist may be a mere theorist: the farmer follows husbandry solely as a means of living; the agriculturist follows it as a science: the former tills the land upon given admitted principles; the latter frames new principles, or alters those that are established. Between the farmer and the agriculturist there is the same difference as between practice and theory: the former may be assisted by the latter, so long as they can go hand in hand; but in the case of a collision, the farmer will be of more service to himself and his country than the agriculturist: farming brings immediate profit from personal service; agriculture may only promise future, and consequently contingent, advantages; 'An improved and improving agriculture, which implies a great augmentation of labour, has not yet found itself at a stand.'—BURKE.

RURAL, RUSTICK.

Although both these terms, from the Latin rus country, signify belonging to the country; yet the former is used in a good, and the latter in a bad or an indifferent sense. Rural applies to all country objects, except man; it is, therefore, always connected with the charms of nature: rustick applies only to persons, or what is personal, in the country, and is, therefore, always associated with the want of culture. Rural scenery is always interesting; but the rustick manners of the peasants have frequently too much that is uncultivated and rude in them to be agreeable: a rural habitation may be fitted for persons in a higher station;

E'en now, methinks, as pondering here I stand,
I see the rural virtues leave the land.

—GOLDSMITH

A rustick cottage is adapted only for the poorer inhabitants of the country; 'The freedom and laxity of a rustick life produces remarkable particularities of conduct.'—JOHNSON.

COUNTRYMAN, PEASANT, SWAIN, HIND, RUSTICK, CLOWN.

Countryman, that is, a man of the country, or one belonging to the country, is the general term applicable to all inhabiting the country, in distinction from a townsman; peasant, in French paysan, from pays, is employed in the same sense for any countryman among the inhabitants of the Continent, and is in consequence used in poetry or the grave style; swain in the Saxon signified a labourer, but it has acquired, from its use in poetry, the higher signification of a shepherd; hind may in all probability signify one who is in the back ground, an inferior; rustick, from rus the country, signifies one born and bred in the country; clown, contracted from colonus a husbandman, signifies of course a menial in the country.

All these terms are employed as epithets to persons, and principally to such as live in the country; the term countryman is taken in an indifferent sense, and may comprehend persons of different descriptions; it designates nothing more than habitual residence in the country; 'Though considering my former condition, I may now be called a countryman: yet you cannot call me a rustick (as you would imply in your letter) as long as I live in so civil and noble a family.'—HOWELL. The other terms are employed for the lower orders of countrymen, but with collateral ideas favourable or unfavourable annexed to them. The peasant is a countryman who follows rural occupations for a livelihood. He is commonly considered as a labourer, and contracted in his education; 'If by the poor measures and proportions of a man we may take an estimate of this great action (our Saviour's coming in the flesh), we shall quickly find how irksome it is to flesh and blood "to have been happy," to descend some steps lower, to exchange the estate of a prince for that of a peasant.'—SOUTH. Swain, hind, both convey the idea of innocence in an humble station, and are therefore always employed in poetry in a good sense;

As thus the snows arise, and foul and fierce
All winter drives along the darken'd air,
In his own loose revolving fields the swain
Disaster'd stands.—THOMSON.

The lab'ring hind his oxen shall disjoin.

—DRYDEN.

Rustick and clown both convey the idea of that uncouth rudeness and ignorance which is in reality found among the lowest orders of countrymen;

In arguing too the parson own'd his skill,
For ev'n tho' vanquish'd he could argue still.

While words of learned length and thundering sound
Amaz'd the gazing rusticks rang'd around.
GOLDSMITH.

Th' astonish'd mother finds a vacant nest,
By the hard hand of unrelenting clouds
Robb'd.—THOMSON.

CULTIVATION, TILLAGE, HUSBANDRY.

Cultivation has a much more comprehensive meaning than either tillage or husbandry;

O softly swelling hills
On which the power of cultivation lies,
And joys to see the wonders of his toil.
THOMSON.

Tillage is a mode of cultivation that extends no farther than the preparation of the ground for the reception of the seed; cultivation includes the whole process by which the produce of the earth is brought to maturity. We may till without cultivating, but we cannot cultivate, as far as respects the soil, without tillage; 'The south-east parts of Britain had already before the age of Cæsar made the first and most requisite step towards a civil settlement: and the Britons by tillage and agriculture had there increased to a great multitude.'—HUME. Husbandry is more extensive in its meaning than tillage, but not so extensive as cultivation; 'We find an image of the two states, the contemplative and the active, figured out in the persons of Abel and Cain, by the two primitive trades, that of the shepherd and that of the husbandman.'—BACON.

Tillage respects the act only of tilling the ground; husbandry is employed for the office of cultivating for domestick purposes. A cultivator is a general term, defined only by the object that is cultivated, as the cultivator of the grape, or the olive; a tiller is a labourer in the soil who performs that office for another; a husbandman is an humble species of cultivator, who himself performs the whole office of cultivating the ground for domestick purposes.

SEAMAN, WATERMAN, SAILOR, MARINER, BOATMAN, FERRYMAN.

All these words denote persons occupied in navigation; the seaman, as the word implies, follows his business on the sea; the waterman is one who gets his livelihood on fresh water; 'Many a lawyer who makes but an indifferent figure at the bar might have made a very elegant waterman.'—SOUTH. The sailor and the mariner are both specifick terms to designate the seaman; every sailor and mariner is a seaman; although every seaman is not a sailor or mariner; the former is one who is employed about the laborious part of the vessel; the latter is one who traverses the ocean to and fro, who is attached to the water and passes his life upon it.

Men of all ranks are denominated seamen, whether officers or men, whether in a merchantman or in a king's ship;

Thus the toss'd seaman, after boist'rous storms,
Lands on his country's breast.—LEE.

Sailor is only used for the common men, or, in the sea phrase, for those before the mast, particularly in vessels of war; hence our sailors and soldiers are spoken of as the defenders of our country;

Through storms and tempests so the sailor drives.
SHIRLEY.

A mariner is an independent kind of seaman who manages his own vessel and goes on an expedition on his own account; fishermen and those who trade along the coast are in a particular manner distinguished by the name of mariners;

Welcome to me, as to a sinking mariner
The lucky plank that bears him to the shore.
LEE.

Waterman, boatman, and ferryman are employed for persons who are engaged with boats; but the term waterman is specifically applied to such whose business it is to let out their boats and themselves for a given time; the boatman may use a boat only occasionally for the transfer of goods; a ferryman uses a boat only for the conveyance of persons or goods across a particular river or piece of water.

MARITIME, MARINE, NAVAL, NAUTICAL.

Maritime and marine, from the Latin mare a sea, signifies belonging to the sea; naval, from navis a ship, signifies belonging to a ship; and nautical, from nauta a sailor, signifies belonging to a sailor, or to navigation.

Countries and places are denominated maritime from their proximity to the sea, or their great intercourse by sea; hence England is called the most maritime nation in Europe; 'Octavianus reduced Lepidus to a necessity to beg his life, and be content to lead the remainder of it in a mean condition at Circeii, a small maritime town among the Latins.'—PRIDEAUX. Marine is a technical term, employed by persons in office, to denote that which is officially transacted with regard to the sea in distinction from what passes on land: hence we speak of the marines as a species of soldiers acting by sea, of the marine society, or marine stores; 'A man of a very grave aspect required notice to be given of his intention to set out on a certain day on a submarine voyage.'—JOHNSON.

Naval is another term of art as opposed to military, and used in regard to the arrangements of government or commerce: hence we speak of naval affairs, naval officers, naval tactics, and the like; 'Sextus Pompey having together such a naval force as made up 350 vessels, seized Sicily.'—PRIDEAUX. Nautical is a scientifick term, connected with the science of navigation, or the management of vessels; hence we talk of nautical instruction, of nautical calculations; 'He elegantly showed by whom he was drawn, which depicted the nautical compass with aut mages, aut magna.'—CAMDEN. The maritime laws of England are essential for the preservation of the naval power which it has so justly acquired. The marine of England is one of its glories. The naval administration is one of the most important branches of our government in the time of war. Nautical tables, and nautical almanacks have been expressly formed for the benefit of all who apply themselves to nautical subjects.

MARTIAL, WARLIKE, MILITARY, SOLDIER LIKE.

Martial, from Mars, the god of war, is the Latin term for belonging to war: warlike signifies literally like war, having the image of war. In sense these terms approach so near to each other, that they may be easily admitted to supply each other's place; but custom, the lawgiver of language, has assigned an office to each that makes it not altogether indifferent how they are used. Martial is both a technical and a more comprehensive term than warlike; on the other hand, warlike designates the temper of the individual more than martial: we speak of martial array, martial preparations, martial law, a court martial;

An active prince, and prone to martial deeds.
DRYDEN.

We speak of a warlike nation, meaning a nation who is fond of war; a warlike spirit or temper, also a warlike appearance, inasmuch as the temper is visible in the air and carriage of a man;

Last from the Volscians fair Camilla came,
And led her warlike troops, a warrior dame.
DRYDEN.

Military, from miles a soldier, signifies belonging to a soldier, and soldier-like like a soldier. Military in comparison with martial is a term of particular import; martial having always a reference to war in general, and military to the proceedings consequent upon that: hence we speak of military in distinction from naval, as military expeditions, military movements, and the like; 'The Tiascalans were, like all unpolished nations, strangers to military order and discipline.'—ROBERTSON. In characterizing the men, we should say that they had a martial appearance; but in speaking of a particular place, we should say it had a military appearance, if there were many soldiers in it.

Military, compared with soldier-like, is used for the body, and the latter for the individual. 'The whole army is termed the military : the conduct of an individual is soldier-like or otherwise ; 'The fears of the Spaniards led them to presumptuous and unsoldier-like discussions concerning the propriety of their general's measures.'—ROBERTSON.

TO PAINT, DEPICT, DELINEATE, SKETCH.

Paint and depict both come from the Latin pingo, to represent forms and figures : as a verb to paint is either literally to represent figures on paper, or to represent circumstances and events by means of words ; to depict is used only in this latter sense, but the former word expresses a greater exercise of the imagination than the latter : it is the art of the poet to paint nature in lively colours ; it is the art of the historian or narrator to depict a real scene of misery in strong colours. As nouns, painting rather describes the action or operation, and picture the result.

When we speak of a good painting, we think particularly of its execution as to drapery, disposition of colours, and the like ;

The painting is almost the natural man,
He is but outside.—SHAKESPEARE.

When we speak of a fine picture, we refer immediately to the object represented, and the impression which it is capable of producing on the beholder ; 'A picture is a poem without words.'—ADDISON. Paintings are confined either to oil paintings or paintings in colours ; but every drawing, whether in pencil, in crayons, or in India ink, may produce a picture ; and we have likewise pictures in embroidery, pictures in tapestry, and pictures in Mosaic.

Delineate, in Latin delineatus participle of delinco, signifies literally to draw the lines which include the contents ; sketch is in the German skizze, Italian schizzo.

Both these terms are properly employed in the art of drawing, and figuratively applied to moral subjects to express a species of descriptions : a delineation expresses something more than a sketch ; the former conveying not merely the general outlines or more prominent features, but also as much of the details as would serve to form a whole ; the latter, however, seldom contains more than some broad touches, by which an imperfect idea of the subject is conveyed.

A delineation therefore may be characterized as accurate, and a sketch as hasty or imperfect : an attentive observer who has passed some years in a country may be enabled to give an accurate delineation of the laws, customs, manners, and character of its inhabitants : 'When the Spaniards first arrived in America expresses were sent to the emperor of Mexico in painting, and the news of his country delineated by the strokes of a pencil.'—ADDISON. A traveller who merely passes through a country can give only a hasty sketch from what passes before his eyes ; 'Sketch out a rough draught of my country, that I may be able to judge whether a return to it be really eligible.'—ATTENBURY.

SKETCH, OUTLINES.

A sketch may form a whole ; outlines are but a part : the sketch may comprehend the outlines and some of the particulars ; outlines, as the term bespeaks, comprehend only that which is on the exterior surface : the sketch in drawing, may serve as a landscape, as it presents some of the features of a country ; but the outlines serve only as bounding lines, within which the sketch may be formed. So in the moral application we speak of the sketches of countries, characters, manners, and the like, which serve as a description ; but of the outlines of a plan, of a work, a project, and the like, which serve as a basis on which the subordinate parts are to be formed : barbarous nations present us with rude sketches of nature ; an abridgment is little more than the outlines of a larger work ;

In few, to close the whole,
The moral muse has shadow'd out a sketch
Of most our weakness needs believe or do.

YOUNG.

This is the outline of the fable (King Lear).—JOHNSON.

ASTRONOMY, ASTROLOGY.

Astronomy is compounded of the Greek ἀστρον and νόμος, signifying the laws of the stars, or a knowledge of their laws ; astrology, from ἀστρον and λόγος, signifies a reasoning on the stars.

The  astronomer* studies the course and movement of the stars ; the astrologer reasons on their influence.

The former observes the state of the heavens, marks the order of time, the eclipses and the revolutions which arise out of the established laws of motion in the immense universe : the latter predicts events, draws horoscopes, and announces all the vicissitudes of rain and snow, heat and cold, &c. The astronomer calculates and seldom errs, as his calculations are built on fixed rules and actual observations ; the astrologer deals in conjectures, and his imagination often deceives him. The astronomer explains what he knows, and merits the esteem of the learned ; the astrologer hazards what he thinks, and seeks to please.

A thirst for knowledge leads to the study of astronomy : an inquietude about the future has given rise to astrology. Many important results for the arts of navigation, agriculture, and of civil society in general, have been drawn from astronomical researches : many serious and mischievous effects have been produced on the minds of the ignorant, from their faith in the dreams of the astrologer.

FACTOR, AGENT.

Though both these terms, according to their origin, imply a maker or doer, yet, at present, they have a distinct signification : the word factor is used in a limited, and the word agent in a general sense : the factor only buys and sells on the account of others ; 'Their devotion (that is of the puritanical rebels) served all along but as an instrument to their avarice, as a factor or under agent to their extortion.'—SOUTH. The agent transacts every sort of business in general ; 'No expectations, indeed, were then formed from renewing a direct application to the French regicides through the agent general for the humiliation of sovereigns.'—BURKE. Merchants and manufacturers employ factors abroad to dispose of goods transmitted ; lawyers are frequently employed as agents in the receipt and payment of money, the transfer of estates, and various other pecuniary concerns.

FREIGHT, CARGO, LADING, LOAD, BURDEN.

Freight, through the northern languages in all probability comes from the Latin fero to bring, signifying the thing brought ; cargo, in French cargaison, probably a variation from carriage, is employed for all the contents of a vessel, with the exception of the persons that it carries ; lading and load (in German laden to load), comes most probably from the word last a burden, signifying the burden or weight imposed upon any carriage ; burden, which through the medium of the northern languages, comes from the Greek φόρος, and φέρω to carry, conveys the idea of weight which is borne by the vessel.

A captain speaks of the freight of his ship as that which is the object of his voyage, by which all who are interested in it are to make their profit ; the value and nature of the freight are the first objects of consideration : he speaks of the lading as the thing which is to fill the ship ; the quantity, and weight of the lading, are to be taken into the consideration : he speaks of the cargo as that which goes with the ship, and belongs as it were to the ship ; the amount of the cargo is that which is first thought of : he speaks of the burden as that which his vessel will bear ; it is the property of the ship which is to be estimated.

The ship-broker regulates the freight : the captain and the crew dispose the lading ; the agent sees to the disposal of the cargo : the ship-builder determines the burden : the carrier looks to the load which he has to carry. The freight must consist of such merchandise as will pay for the transport and risk : the lading must consist of such things as can be most conveniently stowed ; the value of a cargo depends not only on the nature of the commodity, but the market to which it is carried ; the burden of a vessel is estimated by the number of tons which it can carry. Freight and burden may sometimes be used in a figurative application;

Haste, my dear father (’tis no time to wait),
And load my shoulders with a willing freight.
DRYDEN.

The surging air receives
Its plummy burden.—THOMSON.

MERCANTILE, COMMERCIAL.

Mercantile, from merchandise, respects the actual transaction of business, or a transfer of merchandise by sale or purchase; commercial comprehends the theory and practice of commerce; hence we speak in a peculiar manner of a mercantile house, a mercantile town, a mercantile situation, and the like; ‘Such is the happiness, the hope of which seduced me from the duties and pleasures of a mercantile life.’—JOHNSON. But of a commercial education, a commercial people, commercial speculations, and the like; ‘The commercial world is very frequently put into confusion by the bankruptcy of merchants.’—JOHNSON.

VENAL, MERCENARY, HIRELING.

Venal, from the Latin venalis, signifies saleable or ready to be sold, which, applied as it commonly is to persons, is a much stronger term than mercenary. A venal man gives up all principle for interest; a mercenary man seeks his interest without regard to principle: venal writers are such as write in favour of the cause that can promote them to riches or honours; a servant is commonly a mercenary who gives his services according as he is paid: those who are loudest in their professions of political purity are the best subjects for a minister to make venal:

The minister, well pleas’d at small expense
To silence so much rude impertinence,
With squeeze and whisper yields to his demands,
And on the venal list enroll’d he stands.—JENYNS.

mercenary spirit is engendered in the minds of those who devote themselves exclusively to trade; ‘For their assistance they repair to the northern steel, and bring in an unnatural, mercenary crew.’—SOUTH.

Hireling from hire, and mercenary from merx wages, are applied to any one who follows a sordid employment; but hireling may sometimes be taken in its proper and less reproachful sense, for one who is hired as a servant to perform an allotted work; but in general they are both reproachful epithets: the former having particular reference to the meanness of the employment, and the latter to the sordid character of the person.

Hireling prints are those which are in the pay of a party; ‘It was not his carrying the bag which made Judas a thief and a hireling.’—SOUTH. A mercenary principle will sometimes actuate men in the highest station; ‘These soldiers were not citizens, but mercenary, sordid deserters.’—BURKE.

COMMODITY, GOODS, MERCHANDISE, WARE.

These terms agree in expressing articles of trade under various circumstances.

Commodity, in Latin commoditas, signifies in its abstract sense convenience, and in an extended application the thing that is convenient or fit for use, which being also saleable, the word has been employed for the thing that is sold; goods, which denotes the thing that is good, has derived its use from the same analogy in its sense as in the former case; merchandise, in French merchandise, Latin mercatura or merx, Hebrew מַרְכָּא to sell, signifies a saleable matter: ware, in Saxon ware, German, &c. waare, signifies properly any thing manufactured, and, by an extension of the sense, an article for sale.

Commodity is employed only for articles of the first necessity; it is the source of comfort and object of industry. Goods is applied to every thing belonging to tradesmen, for which there is a stipulated value: they are sold retail, and are the proper objects of trade. Merchandise applies to what belongs to merchants; it is the object of commerce. Wares are manufactured, and may be either goods or merchandise. A country has its commodities; a shopkeeper his goods, a merchant his merchandise; a manufacturer his wares.

The most important commodities in a country are what are denominated staple commodities, which constitute its main riches: yet, although England has fewer of such commodities than almost any other nation, it has been enabled, by the industry and energy of its inhabitants, the peculiar excellence of its government, and its happy insular situation, not only to obtain the commodities of other countries, but to increase their number, for the convenience of the whole world and its own aggrandizement: ‘Men must have made some considerable progress towards civilization before they acquired the idea of property so as to be acquainted with the most simple of all contracts, that of exchanging by barter one rude commodity for another.’—ROBERTSON. It is the interest of every tradesman to provide himself with such goods as he can recommend to his customers; the proper choice of which depends on judgement and experience; ‘It gives me very great scandal to observe, wherever I go, how much skill in buying all manner of goods there is necessary to defend yourself from being cheated.’—STEELE. The conveyance of merchandise into England is always attended with considerable risk, as they must be transported by water: on the continent it is very slow and expensive, as they are generally transported by land; ‘If we consider this expensive voyage, which is undertaken in search of knowledge, and how few there are who take in any considerable merchandise; how hard is it, that the very small number who are distinguished with abilities to know how to vend their wares, should suffer being plundered by privateers under the very cannon that should protect them!’—ADDISON. All kinds of wares are not the most saleable commodities, but earthen ware claims a preference over every other.

GOODS, FURNITURE, CHATELLETS, MOVABLES, EFFECTS.

All these terms are applied to such things as belong to an individual; the first term is the most general both in sense and application; all the rest are species.

Furniture comprehends all household goods; where fore in regard to an individual, supposing the house to contain all he has, the general is put for the specific term, as when one speaks of a person’s moving his goods for his furniture: but in the strict sense goods comprehends more than furniture, including not only that which is adapted for the domestic purposes of a family, but also every thing which is of value to a person: the chairs and tables are a part of furniture; papers, books, and money are included among his goods; it is obvious, therefore, that goods, even in its most limited sense, is of wider import than furniture; ‘Now I give up my shop and dispose of all my poetical goods at once; I must therefore desire that the publick would please to take them in the gross, and that every body would turn over what he does not like.’—PRIOR. ‘Considering that your houses, your place and furniture, are not suitable to your quality, I conceive that your expense ought to be reduced to two-thirds of your estate.’—WENTWORTH.

Chattels, which is probably changed from cattle, is a term not in ordinary use, but still sufficiently employed to deserve notice. It comprehends that species of goods which is in a special manner separated from one’s person and house; a man’s cattle, his implements of husbandry, the alienable rights which he has in land or buildings, are all comprehended under chattels; hence the propriety of the expression to seize a man’s goods and chattels, as denoting the disposable property which he has about his person or at a distance. Sometimes this word is used in the singular number, and also in the figurative;

Honour’s a lease for lives to come,
And cannot be extended from
The legal tenant; ’tis a chattel
Not to be forfeited in battle.—HUDIBRAS

Movables comprehends all the other terms in the limited application to property, as far as it admits of being removed from one place to the other; it is opposed either to fixtures, when speaking of furniture, or to land as contrasted to goods and chattels; ‘There can be no doubt but that moveables of every kind become sooner appropriated than the permanent, substantial soil.'—BLACKSTONE.

Effects is a term of nearly as extensive a signification as goods, but not so extensive in application: whatever a man has that is of any supposed value, or convertible into money, is entitled his goods; whatever a man has that can effect, produce, or bring forth money by sale, is entitled his effects: goods therefore is applied only to that which a man has at his own disposal; effects more properly to that which is left at the disposal of others. A man makes a sale of his goods on his removal from any place; his creditors or executors take care of his effects either on his bankruptcy or decease: goods, in this case, is seldom employed but in the limited sense of what is removeable; but effects includes every thing personal, freehold, and copyhold; 'The laws of bankruptcy compel the bankrupt to give up all his effects to the use of the creditors without any concealment.'—BLACKSTONE.

GOODS, POSSESSIONS, PROPERTY.

All these terms are applicable to such things as are the means of enjoyment; but the former term respects the direct quality of producing enjoyment, the latter two have regard to the subject of the enjoyment: we consider goods as they are real or imaginary, adapted or not adapted for the producing of real happiness; those who abound in the goods of this world are not always the happiest; 'The worldling attaches himself wholly to what he reckons the only solid goods, the possession of riches and influence.'—BLAIR. Possessions must be regarded as they are lasting or temporary; he who is anxious for earthly possessions forgets that they are but transitory and dependent upon a thousand contingencies; 'While worldly men enlarge their possessions, and extend their connexions, they imagine they are strengthening themselves.'—BLAIR. Property is to be considered as it is legal or illegal, just or unjust; those who are anxious for great property are not always scrupulous about the means by which it is to be obtained.

For numerous blessings yearly shower'd,
And property with plenty crown'd,
Accept our pious praise.—DRYDEN.

The purity of a man's Christian character is in danger from an overweening attachment to earthly goods; no wise man will boast the multitude of his possessions, when he reflects that if they do not leave him, the time is not far distant when he must leave them; the validity of one's claim to property which comes by inheritance is better founded than any other.

RICHES, WEALTH, OPULENCE, AFFLUENCE.

Riches, in German reichthum, from reiche a kingdom, comes from the Latin rego to rule; because riches and power are intimately connected; wealth, from well, signifies well being; opulence, from the Latin opes riches, denotes the state of having riches; affluence, from the Latin ad and fluo, denotes either the act of riches flowing in to a person, or the state of having riches to flow in.

Riches is a general term denoting any considerable share of property, but without immediate reference to a possessor; wealth denotes the prosperous condition of the possessor; opulence characterizes the present possession of great riches; affluence denotes the increasing wealth of the individual. Riches is a condition opposed to poverty; the whole world is divided into rich and poor; 'Riches are apt to betray a man into arrogance.'—ADDISON. Wealth is that positive and substantial share in the goods of fortune which distinguish an individual from his neighbours, by putting him in possession of all that is commonly desired and sought after by man;

His best companions innocence and health,
And his best riches ignorance of wealth.

GOLDSMITH.

He who has much money has great wealth;

Along the lawn where scatter'd hamlets rose,
Unwieldily wealth and cumb'rous pomp repose.

GOLDSMITH.

Opulence is likewise a positively great share of riches, but refers rather to the external possessions, than to the whole condition of the man. He who has much land, much cattle, many houses, and the like, is properly denominated opulent; 'Our Saviour did not choose for himself an easy and opulent condition.'—BLAIR. Affluence is a term peculiarly applicable to the fluctuating condition of things which flow in in quantities, or flow away in equally great quantities; 'Prosperity is often an equivocal word denoting merely affluence of possession.'—BLAIR. Hence we do not say that a man is opulent, but that he is affluent in his circumstances.

Wealth and opulence are applied to individuals, or communities: affluence is applicable only to an individual. The wealth of a nation must be procured by the industry of the inhabitants; the opulence of a town may arise from some local circumstance in its favour, as its favourable situation for trade and the like; he who lives in affluence is apt to forget the uncertain tenure by which he holds his riches; we speak of riches as to their effects upon men's minds and manners; it is not every one who knows how to use them. We speak of wealth as it raises a man in the scale of society; the wealthy merchant is an important member of the community: we speak of opulence as it indicates the flourishing state of the individual: an opulent man shows unquestionable marks of his opulence around him: we speak of affluence to characterize the abundance of the individual, we show our affluence by the style of our living.

MONEY, CASH.

Money comes from the Latin moneta, which signified stamped coin, from monere to advise, to inform of its value, by means of an inscription or stamp; cash, from the French caisse a chest, signifies that which is put in a chest.

Money is applied to every thing which serves as a circulating medium: cash is, in a strict sense, put for coin only: bank notes are money; guineas and shillings are cash: all cash is therefore money, but all money is not cash. The only money the Chinese have are square bits of metal, with a hole through the centre, by which they are strung upon a string: travellers on the Continent must always be provided with letters of credit, which may be turned into cash as convenience requires.

TO HEAP, PILE, ACCUMULATE, AMASS

To heap signifies to form into a heap, which through the medium of the northern languages is derivable from the Latin copia plenty. To pile is to form into a pile, which, being a variation of pole, signifies a high raised heap. To accumulate, from the Latin cumulus a heap, signifies to put heap upon heap. To amass is literally to form into a mass.

To heap is an indefinite action: it may be performed with or without order: to pile is a definite action done with design and order; thus we heap stones, or pile wood: to heap may be to make into large or small heaps;

Within the circles arms and tripods lie,
Ingots of gold and silver heap'd on high.

DRYDEN.

To pile is always to make something considerable;

This would I celebrate with annual games,
With gifts on altars pil'd, and holy flames.

DRYDEN.

Children may heap sticks together; men pile loads of wood together. To heap and pile are used mostly in the physical, accumulate and amass in the physical or moral acceptation; the former is a species of heaping, the latter of piling: we accumulate whatever is brought together in a loose manner; we amass that which can coalesce: thus a man accumulates guineas; he amasses wealth.

To accumulate and to amass are not always the acts of conscious agents: things may accumulate or amass; water or snow accumulates by the continual accession of fresh quantities; the ice amasses in rivers until it is frozen over: so in the moral acceptation, evils, abuses, and the like, accumulate; corruption amasses.

* Vide Trusler: "Money, cash."

When overwhelmed with an accumulation of sorrows, the believer is never left comfortless; 'These odes are marked by glittering accumulations of ungraceful ornaments.'—JOHNSON. The industrious inquirer may collect a mass of intelligence; 'Sir Francis Bacon, by an extraordinary force of nature, compass of thought, and indefatigable study, had amassed to himself such stores of knowledge as we cannot look upon without amazement.'—HUGHES.

STOCK, STORE.

Stock, from stick, stoke, stow, and stuff, signifies any quantity laid up; store, in Welch stor, comes from the Hebrew סתר to hide.

The ideas of wealth and stability being naturally allied, it is not surprising that stock, which expresses the latter idea, should also be put for the former, particularly as the abundance here referred to serves as a foundation in the same manner as stock in the literal sense does to a tree.

Store likewise implies a quantity; but agreeable to the derivation of the word, it implies an accumulated quantity. Any quantity of materials which is in hand may serve as a stock for a given purpose; thus a few shillings with some persons may be their stock in trade; any quantity of materials brought together for a given purpose may serve as a store; thus the industrious ant collects a store of grain for the winter: we judge of a man's substantial property by the stock of goods which he has on hand; we judge of a man's disposable property by the store which he has. The stock is that which must increase of itself; it is the source and foundation of industry: the store is that which we must add to occasionally; it is that from which we draw in time of need. By a stock we gain riches; by a store we guard against want: a stock requires skill and judgement to make the proper application; a store requires foresight and management to make it against the proper season. It is necessary for one who has a large trade to have a large stock; and for him who has no prospect of supply to have a large store.

The same distinction subsists between these words in their moral application; he who wishes to speak a foreign language must have a stock of familiar words; stores of learning are frequently lost to the world for want of means and opportunity to bring them forth to public view; 'It will not suffice to rally all one's little utmost into one's discourse, which can constitute a divine. Any man would then quickly be drained; and his short stock would serve but for one meeting in ordinary converse; therefore there must be store, plenty, and a treasure, lest he turn broker in divinity.'

—SOUTH.

As verbs, to stock and to store both signify to provide; but the former is a provision for the present use, and the latter for some future purpose: a tradesman stocks himself with such articles as are most saleable; a fortress or a ship is stored: a person stocks himself with patience, or stores his memory with knowledge.

TO TREASURE, HOARD.

The idea of laying up carefully is common to these verbs; but to treasure is to lay up for the sake of preserving; to hoard, to lay up for the sake of accumulating; we treasure up the gifts of a friend; the miser hoards up his money: we attach a real value to that which we treasure; a fictitious value to that which is hoarded. To treasure is used either in the proper or improper sense; to hoard only in the proper sense: we treasure a book on which we set particular value, or we treasure the words or actions of another in our recollection; 'Fancy can combine the ideas which memory has treasured.'—HAWKSWORTH. The miser hoards in his coffers whatever he can scrape together;

Hoard ev'n beyond the miser's wish abound.
GOLDSMITH.

PLENTIFUL, PLENTIOUS, ABUNDANT, COPIOUS, AMPLE.

Plentiful and plenteous signify the presence of plenty, plenitude, or fulness; abundance, in Latin abundantia, from abundo to overflow, compounded of the intensive ab and undo a wave, signifies flowing over in great quantities like the waves; copious, in Latin copiosus, from copia, or con, and opes a stock, signifies having a store; ample, in Latin amplus, from the Greek ἀνὰ πλεον, signifies over-full.

Plentiful and plenteous differ only in use; the former being most employed in the familiar, the latter in the grave style.

Plenty fills; abundance does more, it leaves a superfluity; as that, however, which fills suffices as much as that which flows over, the term abundance is often employed promiscuously with that of plenty: we can indifferently say a plentiful harvest, or an abundant harvest. Plenty is, however, more frequent in the literal sense for that which fills the body; abundance, for that which fills the mind, or the desire of the mind. A plenty of provisions is even more common than an abundance; a plenty of food; a plenty of corn, wine, and oil;

The resty knaves are overrun with ease,
As plenty ever is the nurse of faction.—ROWE.

But an abundance of words; an abundance of riches; an abundance of wit and humour. In certain years fruit is plentiful, and at other times grain is plentiful: in all cases we have abundant cause for gratitude to the Giver of all good things;

And God said, let the waters generate Reptile with spawn abundant, living soul.

MILTON.

Copious and ample are modes either of plenty or abundance; the former is employed in regard to what is collected or brought into one point: the ample is employed only in regard to what may be narrowed or expanded. A copious stream of blood, or a copious flow of words, equally designate the quantity which is collected together;

Smooth to the shelving brink a copious flood
Rolls fair and placid.—THOMSON.

As an ample provision, an ample store, an ample share marks that which may at pleasure be increased or diminished;

Peaceful beneath primeval trees, that cast
Their ample shade o'er Niger's yellow stream,
Leans the huge elephant, wisest of brutes.

THOMSON.

FULNESS, PLENITUDE.

Although plenitude is no more than a derivative from the Latin for fulness, yet the latter is used either in the proper sense to express the state of objects that are full, or in the improper sense to express great quantity, which is the accompaniment of fulness; the former only in the higher style and in the improper sense: hence we say in the fulness of one's heart, in the fulness of one's joy, or the fulness of the God-head bodily; but the plenitude of glory, the plenitude of power;

All mankind
Must have been lost, adjudg'd to death and hell,
By doom severe, had not the Son of God,
In whom the fulness dwells of love divine,
His dearest meditation thus renew'd.—MILTON.

'The most beneficent Being is he who hath an absolute fulness of perfection in himself, who gave existence to the universe, and so cannot be supposed to want that which he communicated without diminishing from the plenitude of his own power and happiness.'—GROVE.

FERTILE, FRUITFUL, PROLIFICK.

Fertile, in Latin fertilis, from fero to bear, signifies capable of bearing or bringing to light; fruitful signifies full of fruit, or containing within itself much fruit; prolifick is compounded of proles and facio to make a progeny.

Fertile expresses in its proper sense the faculty of sending forth from itself that which is not of its own nature, and is peculiarly applicable to the ground which causes every thing within itself to grow up;

Why should I mention those, whose oozy soil
Is render'd fertile by the o'erflowing Nile.

JENYNS.

Fruitful expresses a state containing or possessing abundantly that which is of the same nature; it is, therefore, peculiarly applicable to trees, plants, vegetables, and whatever is said to bear fruit;

When first the soil receives the fruitful seed,
Make no delay, but cover it with speed.—DRYDEN.

Prolifick expresses the faculty of generating; it conveys therefore the idea of what is creative, and is peculiarly applicable to animals; 'All dogs are of one species they mingling together in generation, and the breed of such mixtures being prolifick.'—RAY. We may say that the ground is either fertile or fruitful, but not prolifick: we may speak of a female of any species being fruitful and prolifick, but not fertile; we may speak of nature as being fruitful, but neither fertile nor prolifick. A country is fertile as it respects the quality of the soil; it is fruitful as it respects the abundance of its produce: it is possible, therefore, for a country to be fruitful by the industry of its inhabitants, although not fertile by nature.

An animal is said to be fruitful as it respects the number of young which it has; it is said to be prolifick as it respects its generative power. Some women are more fruitful than others; but there are many animals more prolifick than human creatures. The lands in Egypt are rendered fertile by means of mud which they receive from the overflowing of the Nile: they consequently produce harvests more fruitful than in almost any other country. Among the Orientals barrenness was reckoned a disgrace, and every woman was ambitious to be fruitful: there are some insects, particularly among the noxious tribes, which are so prolifick, that they are not many hours in being before they begin to breed.

In the figurative application they admit of a similar distinction. A man is fertile in expedients who readily contrives upon the spur of the occasion; he is fruitful in resources who has them ready at his hand; his brain is prolifick if it generates an abundance of new conceptions. A mind is fertile which has powers that admit of cultivation and expansion; 'To every work Warburton brought a memory full fraught, together with a fancy fertile of combinations.'—JOHNSON. An imagination is fruitful that is rich in stores of imagery; a genius is prolifick that is rich in invention. Females are fertile in expedients and devices; ambition and avarice are the most fruitful sources of discord and misery in publick and private life; 'The philosophy received from the Greeks has been fruitful in controversies, but barren of works.'—BACON. Novel-writers are the most prolifick class of authors;

Parent of light! all-seeing sun,
Prolifick beam, whose rays dispense
The various gifts of Providence.—GAY.

LARGELY, COPIOUSLY, FULLY.

Largely (v. Great) is here taken in the moral sense, and, if the derivation given of it be true, in the most proper sense; copiously comes from the Latin copia plenty, signifying in a plentiful degree; fully signifies in a full degree; to the full extent, as far as it can reach.

Quantity is the idea expressed in common by all these terms; but largely has always a reference to the freedom of the will in the agent; copiously qualifies actions that are done by inanimate objects; fully qualifies the actions of a rational agent, but it denotes a degree or extent which cannot be surpassed.

A person deals largely in things, or he drinks large draughts; rivers are copiously supplied in rainy seasons; a person is fully satisfied, or fully prepared. A bountiful Providence has distributed his gifts largely among his creatures; 'There is one very faulty method of drawing up the laws, that is, when the case is largely set forth in the preamble.'—BACON. Blood flows copiously from a deep wound when it is first made;

The youths with wine the copious goblets crown'd,
And pleas'd dispense the flowing bowls around.

POPE.

When a man is not fully convinced of his own insufficiency, he is not prepared to listen to the counsel of others; 'Every word (in the Bible) is so weighty that ought to be carefully considered by all that desire fully to understand the sense.'—BEVERIDGE.

PROFUSION, PROFUSENESS.

Profusion, from the Latin profundo to pour forth is taken in relation to unconscious objects, which pour forth in great plenty; profuseness is taken from the same, in relation to conscious agents, who likewise pour forth in great plenty. The term profusion, therefore, is put for plenty itself, and the term profuse, ness as a characteristic of persons in the sense of extravagance.

At the hospitable board of the rich there will naturally be a profusion of every thing which can gratify the appetite;

Ye glittering towns with wealth and splendour
crown'd,

Ye fields where summer spreads profusion round,
For me your tributary stores combine.—GOLDSMITH.

When men see an unusual degree of profusion, they are apt to indulge themselves in profuseness; 'I was convinced that the liberality of my young companions was only profuseness.'—JOHNSON.

EXTRAVAGANT, PRODIGAL, LAVISH, PROFUSE.

Extravagant, from extra and vagans, signifies in general wandering from the line; and prodigal, from the Latin prodigus and prodigo to launch forth, signifies in general to send forth, or give out in great quantities; lavish comes probably from the Latin labo to wash, signifying to wash away in waste; profuse, from the Latin profusus, participle of profundo to pour forth, signifies pouring out freely.

The idea of using immoderately is implied in all these terms, but extravagant is the most general in its meaning and application. The extravagant man spends his money without reason; the prodigal man spends it in excesses; the former errs against plain sense, the latter violates the moral law: the extravagant man will ruin himself by his follies; the prodigal by his vices. One may be extravagant with a small sum where it exceeds one's means; one cannot be prodigal but with large sums.

Extravagance is practised by both sexes; prodigality is peculiarly the vice of the male sex. Extravagance is opposed to meanness; prodigality to avarice. Those who know the true value of money, as contributing to their own enjoyments, or those of others, will guard against extravagance. Those who lay a restraint on their passions, can never fall into prodigality.

Extravagant and prodigal serve to designate habitual as well as particular actions; lavish and profuse are employed only in particular: hence we say to be lavish of one's money, one's presents, and the like; to be profuse in one's entertainments, both of which may be modes of extravagance. An extravagant man, however, in the restricted sense, mostly spends upon himself to indulge his whims and idle fancies; but a man may be lavish and profuse upon others from a misguided generosity.

In a moral use of these terms, a man is extravagant in his praises who exceeds either in measure or application; 'No one is to admit into his petitions to his Maker, things superfluous and extravagant.'—SOUTH. He is prodigal of his strength who consumes it by an excessive use;

Here patriots live, who for their country's good,
In fighting fields were prodigal of blood.

DRYDEN.

He is lavish of his compliments who deals them out so largely and promiscuously as to render them of no service;

See where the winding vale its lavish stores
Irriouous spreads.—THOMSON.

He is profuse in his acknowledgments who repeats them oftener, or delivers them in more words, than are necessary; 'Cicero was most liberally profuse in commending the ancients and his contemporaries.'—ADDISON (after Plutarch).

Extravagant and profuse are said only of individuals; prodigal and lavish may be said of many in a general sense. A nation may be prodigal of its resources; a government may be lavish of the publick money, as an individual is extravagant with his own and profuse in what he gives another.

ENOUGH, SUFFICIENT.

Enough, in German genug, comes from genügen, to satisfy; sufficient, in Latin sufficiens, participle of sufficio, compounded of sub and facio, signifies made or suited to the purpose.

He has enough whose desires are satisfied; he has sufficient whose wants are supplied. We may therefore frequently have sufficiency when we have not enough. A greedy man is commonly in this case, he has never enough, although he has more than a sufficiency. Enough is said only of physical objects of desire; sufficient is employed in a moral application, for that which serves the purpose. Children and animals never have enough food, nor the miser enough money;

My loss of honour's great enough,
Thou need'st not brand it with a scoff.

BUTLER.

It is requisite to allow sufficient time for every thing that is to be done, if we wish it to be done well; 'The time present seldom affords sufficient employment for the mind of man.'—ADDISON.

EXCESS, SUPERFLUITY, REDUNDANCY.

Excess is that which exceeds any measure; superfluity from super and fluo to flow over; and redundancy, from redundo to stream back or over, signifies an excess of a good measure. We may have an excess of heat or cold, wet or dry, when we have more than the ordinary quantity; but we have a superfluity of provisions when we have more than we want. Excess is applicable to any object; but superfluity and redundancy are species of excess. Superfluity is applicable in a particular manner to that which is an object of our desire; and redundancy to matters of expression or feeling. We may have an excess of prosperity or adversity; 'It is wisely ordered in our present state that joy and fear, hope and grief, should act alternately as checks and balances upon each other, in order to prevent an excess in any of them.'—BLAIR. We may have a superfluity of good things; 'When by force or policy, by wisdom, or by fortune, property and superiority were introduced and established, then they whose possessions swelled above their wants naturally laid out their superfluities on pleasure.'—JOHNSON. There may be a redundancy of speech or words; 'The defect or redundance of a syllable might be easily covered in the recitation.'—TYRWHITT.

EXCESSIVE, IMMODERATE, INTEMPERATE.

The excessive is beyond measure; the immoderate, from modus a mode or measure, is without measure; the intemperate, from tempus a time or term, is that which is not kept within bounds.

Excessive designates excess in general; immoderate and intemperate designate excess in moral agents. The excessive lies simply in the thing which exceeds any given point: the immoderate lies in the passions which range to a boundless extent: the intemperate lies in the will which is under no control. Hence we speak of an excessive thirst physically considered: an immoderate ambition or lust of power: an intemperate indulgence, an intemperate warmth. Excessive admits of degrees; what is excessive may exceed in a greater or less degree: immoderate and intemperate mark a positively great degree of excess; the former still higher than the latter: immoderate is in fact the highest conceivable degree of excess.

The excessive use of any thing will always be attended with some evil consequence; 'Who knows not the languor that attends every excessive indulgence in pleasure?'—BLAIR. The immoderate use of wine will rapidly tend to the ruin of him who is guilty of the excess; 'One of the first objects of wish to every one is to maintain a proper place and rank in society: this among the vain and ambitious is always the favourite aim. With them it arises to immoderate expectations founded on their supposed talents and imagined merits.'—BLAIR. The intemperate use of wine will proceed by a more gradual but not less sure process to his ruin; 'Let no wantonness of youthful spirits, nor compliance with the intemperate mirth of others, ever betray you into profane sallies.'—BLAIR.

Excessive designates what is partial; immoderate is used oftener for what is partial than what is habitual; intemperate oftener for what is habitual than what is partial. A person is excessively displeased on particular occasions: he may be an immoderate eater at all times, or only immoderate in that which he likes: he is intemperate in his language when his anger is intemperate; or he leads an intemperate life. The excesses of youth do but too often settle into confirmed habits of intemperance.

EXUBERANT, LUXURIANT.

Exuberant, from the Latin exuberans or ex and ubero, signifies very fruitful or superabundant; luxuriant, in Latin luxurians, from laxus, signifies expanding with unrestrained freedom. These terms are both applied to vegetation in a flourishing state; but exuberance expresses the excess, and luxuriance the perfection: in a fertile soil where plants are left unrestrained to themselves there will be an exuberance:

Another Flora there of bolder hues
And richer sweets, beyond our garden's pride
Plays o'er the fields, and showers with sudden hand
Exuberant spring.—THOMSON.

Plants are to be seen in their luxuriance only in seasons that are favourable to them;

On whose luxurious herbage, half conceal'd,
Like a fall'n cedar, far diffus'd his train,
Cas'd in green scales, the crocodile extends.

THOMSON.

In the moral application, exuberance of intellect is often attended with a restless ambition that is incompatible both with the happiness and advancement of its possessor; 'His similes have been thought too exuberant and full of circumstances.'—POPE. Luxuriance of imagination is one of the greatest gifts which a poet can boast of; 'A fluent and luxuriant speech becomes youth well, but not age.'—BACON.

EMPTY, VACANT, VOID, DEVOID.

Empty, in Saxon empti, is not improbably derived from the Latin inopis poor or wanting; vacant, in Latin vacans or vaco, comes from the Hebrew קקק to draw out or exhaust; void and devoid, in Latin vi duus and Greek lōtos, signifies solitary or bereft.

Empty is the term in most general use; vacant, void, and devoid are employed in particular cases: empty and vacant have either a proper or an improper application; void or devoid only a moral acceptance.

Empty, in the natural sense, marks an absence of that which is substantial, or adapted for filling; vacant designates or marks the absence of that which should occupy or make use of a thing. That which is hollow may be empty; that which respects any space may be vacant. A house is empty which has no inhabitants; a seat is vacant which is without an occupant: a room is empty which is without furniture; a space on paper is vacant which is free from writing.

In the figurative application empty and vacant have a similar analogy: a dream is said to be empty, or a title empty, &c.;

To honour Thetis' son he bends his care,
And plunge the Greeks in all the woes of war.
Then bids an empty phantom rise to sight,
And thus commands the vision of the night.

POPE.

A stare is said to be vacant, or an hour vacant; 'An inquisitive man is a creature naturally very vacant of thought in itself, and therefore forced to apply itself to foreign assistance.'—STEELE. Void or devoid are used in the same sense as vacant, as qualifying epithets, but not prefixed as adjectives, and always followed by some object: thus we speak of a creature as void of reason; and of an individual as devoid of common sense;

My next desire is, void of care and strife,
To lead a soft, secure, inglorious life.—DRYDEN.

We Tyrians are not so devoid of sense,
Nor so remote from Phœbus' influence.—DRYDEN.

VACANCY, VACUITY, INANITY.

Vacancy and vacuity both denote the space unoccupied, or the abstract quality of being unoccupied. Inanity, from the Latin inanis, denotes the abstract quality of emptiness, or of not containing any thing; hence the former terms vacancy and vacuity are used in an indifferent or bad sense; inanity always in a bad sense: there may be a vacancy in the seat, or a vacancy in the mind, or a vacancy in life, which we may or may not fill up as we please;

How is't

That thus you bend your eye on vacancy

And with th' incorporal air do hold discourse?

SHAKESPEARE.

Vacuties are supposed to be interspersed among the particles of matter, or, figuratively, they may be supposed to exist in the soul and in other objects; 'There are vacuties in the happiest life, which it is not in the power of the world to fill.'—BLAIR. Inanity of character denotes the want of the essentials that constitute a character; 'When I look up and behold the heavens, it makes me scorn the world and the pleasures thereof, considering the vanity of these and the inanity of the other.'—HOWELL.

HOLLOW, EMPTY.

Hollow, from hole, signifies being like a hole; empty, v. Empty.

Hollow respects the body itself; the absence of its own material produces hollowness: empty respects foreign bodies; their absence in another body constitutes emptiness. Hollowness is therefore a preparative to emptiness, and may exist independently of it; but emptiness presupposes the existence of hollowness: what is empty must be hollow; but what is hollow need not be empty. Hollowness is often the natural property of a body; emptiness is a contingent property: that which is hollow is destined by nature to contain; but that which is empty is deprived of its contents by a casualty: a nut is hollow for the purpose of receiving the fruit: it is empty if it contain no fruit.

They are both employed in a moral acceptance, and in a bad sense; the hollow, in this case, is applied to what ought to be solid or sound; and empty to what ought to be filled: a person is hollow whose goodness lies only at the surface, whose fair words are without meaning; a truce is hollow which is only an external cessation from hostilities;

He seem'd

For dignity compos'd, and high exploit;

But all was false and hollow.—MILTON.

A person is empty who is without the requisite portion of understanding and knowledge; an excuse is empty which is unsupported by fact and reason; a pleasure is empty which cannot afford satisfaction;

The creature man

Condemn'd to sacrifice his childish years

To babbling ignorance and empty fears.—PRIOR.

TO SPEND, EXHAUST, DRAIN.

Spend, contracted from expend, in Latin expendo to pay away, signifies to give from oneself; exhaust, from the Latin exhauro to draw out, signifies to draw out all that there is; drain, a variation of draw, signifies to draw dry.

The idea of taking from the substance of any thing is common to these terms; but to spend is to deprive in a less degree than to exhaust, and that in a less degree than to drain: every one who exerts himself, in that degree spends his strength; if the exertions are violent he exhausts himself; a country which is drained of men is supposed to have no more left. To spend may be applied to that which is either external or inherent in a body;

Your tears for such a death in vain you spend,
Which straight in immortality shall end.

DENHAM.

Exhaust applies to that which is inherent or essential; drain to that which is external of the body in which it is contained; 'Teaching is not a flow of words nor the draining of an hour-glass.'—SOUTH. We may speak of spending our wealth, our resources, our time, and the like. The strength, the vigour, or the voice is exhausted; 'Many of our provisions for ease or happiness are exhausted by the present day.'—JOHNSON. Draining is applied in its proper application to a vessel which is drained of its liquid; or, in extended application, to a treasury which is drained of money. Hence arises this farther distinction, that to spend and to exhaust may tend, more or less, to the injury of a body; but to drain may be to its advantage. Inas much as what is spent or exhausted may be more or less essential to the soundness of a body, it cannot be parted with without diminishing its value, or even destroying its existence; as when a fortune is spent it is gone, or when a person's strength is exhausted he is no longer able to move: on the other hand, to drain, though a more complete evacuation, is not always injurious, but sometimes even useful to a body; as when the land is drained of a superabundance of water.

TO SPEND OR EXPEND, WASTE, DISSIPATE, SQUANDER.

Spend and expend are variations from the Latin expendo; but spend may be used in the sense of turning to some purpose, or making use of; to expend carries with it likewise the idea of exhausting; and waste moreover, comprehends the idea of exhausting to no good purpose: we spend money when we purchase any thing with it; we expend it when we lay it out in large quantities, so as essentially to diminish its quantity: individuals spend what they have; government expends vast sums in conducting the affairs of a nation; all persons waste their property who have not sufficient discretion to use it well: we spend our time, or our lives, in any employment;

Then having spent the last remains of light,

They give their bodies due repose at night.

DRYDEN.

We expend our strength and faculties upon some arduous undertaking; 'The king of England wasted the French king's country, and thereby caused him to expend such sums of money as exceeded the debt.'—HAYWARD. Men are apt to waste their time and talents in trifles;

What numbers, guiltless of their own disease,

Are snatch'd by sudden death, or waste by slow decrees!—JENYNS.

Dissipate, in Latin dissipatus, from dissipo, that is, dis and spo, in Greek σπο to scatter, signifies to scatter different ways, that is, to waste by throwing away in all directions: squander, which is a variation of wander, signifies to make to run wide apart. Both these terms, therefore, denote modes of wasting; but the former seems peculiarly applicable to that which is wasted in detail upon different objects, and by a distraction of the mind; the latter respects rather the act of wasting in the gross, in large quantities, by planless profusion: young men are apt to dissipate their property in pleasures;

He pitied man, and much he pitied those Whom falsely smiling fate has curs'd with means

To dissipate their days in quest of joy.

ARMSTRONG.

The open, generous, and thoughtless are apt to squander their property; 'To how many temptations are all, but especially the young and gay, exposed to squander their whole time amid the circles of levity'—BLAIR.

TO SPREAD, SCATTER, DISPERSE.

Spread (v. To spread) applies equally to divisible or indivisible bodies; we spread our money on the table, or we may spread a cloth on the table: but scatter which, like shatter, is a frequentative of shake, is applicable to divisible bodies only; we scatter corn on the ground. To spread may be an act of design or otherwise, but mostly the former; as when we spread books or papers before us: scatter is mostly an act without design; a child scatters the papers on the floor. When taken, however as an act of design, it is done without order; but spread is an act done in order: thus hay is spread out to dry, but corn is scattered over the land.

All in a row
Advancing broad, or wheeling round the field,
They spread their breathing harvest to the sun.
THOMSON.

Each leader now his scatter'd force conjoins.
POPE.

Things may spread in one direction, or at least without separation; but they disperse (v. To dispel) in many directions, so as to destroy the continuity of bodies: a leaf spreads as it opens in all its parts, and a tree also spreads as its branches increase; but a multitude disperses, an army disperses. Between scatter and disperse there is no other difference than that one is immethodical and involuntary, the other systematick and intentional: flowers are scattered along a path, which accidentally fall from the hand; a mob is dispersed by an act of authority: sheep are scattered along the hills; religious tracts are dispersed among the poor: the disciples were scattered as sheep without a shepherd, after the delivery of our Saviour into the hands of the Jews; they dispersed themselves, after his ascension, over every part of the world;

Straight to the tents the troops dispersing bend.
POPE.

TO SPREAD, EXPAND, DIFFUSE.

Spread, in Saxon spredan, Low German spredan, High German spreiten, is an intensive of breit broad, signifying to stretch wide; expand, in Latin expando, compounded of ex and pando to open, and the Greek φαίνω to show or make appear, signifies to open out wide; diffuse, v. Diffuse.

To spread is the general, the other two are particular terms. To spread may be said of any thing which occupies more space than it has done, whether by a direct separation of its parts, or by an accession to the substance; but to expand is to spread by means of separating or unfolding the parts: a mist spreads over the earth; a flower expands its leaves; a tree spreads by the growth of its branches; the opening bud expands when it feels the genial warmth of the sun.

Spread and expand are used likewise in a moral application; diffuse is seldom used in any other application: spread is here, as before, equally indefinite as to the mode of the action; every thing spreads, and it spreads in any way;

See where the winding vale its lavish'd stores
Irriguous spreads.—THOMSON.

Expansion is that gradual process by which an object opens or unfolds itself after the manner of a flower;

As from the face of heaven the shatter'd clouds
Tumultuous rove, th' interminable sky
Sublimar swells, and o'er the world expands
A purer azure.—THOMSON.

Diffusion is that process of spreading which consists literally in pouring out in different ways;

Th' uncurling floods diffus'd
In glassy breadth, seem, through delusive lapse,
Forgetful of their course.—THOMSON.

Evils spread, and reports spread; the mind expands, and prospects expand; knowledge diffuses itself, or cheerfulness is diffused throughout a company.

TO DILATE, EXPAND.

Dilate, in Latin dilato, from di apart and latius, wide, that is, to make very wide; expand, v. To spread, in the preceding article.

The idea of drawing any thing out so as to occupy a greater space is common to these terms in opposition to contracting. Dilate is an intransitive verb; expand is transitive or intransitive; the former marks the action of any body within itself; the latter an external action on any body. A bladder dilates on the admission of air, or the heart dilates with joy; knowledge expands the mind, or a person's views expand with circumstances. In the circulation of the blood through the body, the vessels are exposed to a perpetual dilatation and contraction: the gradual expansion of the mind by the regular modes of communicating knowledge to youth is unquestionably to be desired; but the sudden expansion of a man's thoughts from a comparative state of ignorance by any powerful action is very dangerous;

The conscious heart of charity would warm,
And her wide wish benevolence dilate.
THOMSON.

'The poet (Thomson) leads us through the appearances of things as they are successively varied by the vicissitudes of the year, and imparts to us so much of his own enthusiasm that our thoughts expand with his imagery.'—JOHNSON.

TO SPREAD, CIRCULATE, PROPAGATE, DISSEMINATE.

To spread (v. To spread, expand) is said of any object material or spiritual; the rest are mostly employed in the moral application. To spread is to extend to an indefinite width;

Love would between the rich and needy stand,
And spread heaven's bounty with an equal hand.
WALLER.

To circulate is to spread within a circle; thus news spreads through a country; but a story circulates in a village, or from house to house, or a report is circulated in a neighbourhood.

Our God, when heaven and earth he did create,
Form'd man, who should of both participate;
If our lives' motions theirs must imitate,
Our knowledge, like our blood, must circulate.
DENHAM.

Spread and circulate are the acts of persons or things; propagate and disseminate are the acts of persons only. A thing spreads and circulates, or it is spread and circulated by some one; it is always propagated and disseminated by some one. Propagate, from the Latin propago a breed, and disseminate, from semen a seed, are here figuratively employed as modes of spreading, according to the natural operations of increasing the quantity of any thing which is implied in the first two terms. What is propagated is supposed to generate new subjects; as when doctrines, either good or bad, are propagated among the people so as to make them converts;

He shall extend his propagated sway
Beyond the solar year, without the starry way.
DRYDEN.

What is disseminated is supposed to be sown in different parts; thus principles are disseminated among youth; 'Nature seems to have taken care to disseminate her blessings among the different regions of the world.'—ADDISON.

TO DISPEL, DISPERSE, DISSIPATE.

Dispel, from the Latin pello to drive, signifying to drive away, is a more forcible action than to disperse, which signifies merely to cause to come asunder: we destroy the existence of a thing by dispelling it; we merely destroy the junction or cohesion of a body by dispersing it: the sun dispels the clouds and darkness;

As when a western whirlwind, charg'd with storms,
Dispers the gathering clouds that Notus forms.
POPE.

The wind disperses the clouds, or a surgeon disperses a tumour; but the clouds and the tumour may both gather again:

The foe dispers'd, their bravest warriors kill'd,
Fierce as a whirlwind now I swept the field.
POPE.

Dispelling and dispersing are frequently natural and regular operations; dissipating is oftentimes a violent and disorderly proceeding. Dissipate, in Latin dissipatum, participle of dissipo, compounded of dis and the obsolete sipo, in Greek αἰθω, was originally applied to fluids, whence the word siphon takes its rise. 'The word dissipate therefore denotes the act of scattering after the manner of fluids which are thus lost; whence that which is dissipated loses its existence as an aggregate body; 'The heat at length grows so great, that it again dissipates and bears off those corpuscles which it brought.'—WOODWARD. In the same manner wealth is said to be dissipated when

It is lost to the owner by being spent. These terms admit of a similar distinction in the moral acceptance;

If the night
Have gather'd aught of evil, or conceal'd
Disperse it, as now light dispels the dark.—MILTON.

When the thoughts are dissipated the mind is as it were lost; 'I have begun two or three letters to you by snatches, and been prevented from finishing them by a thousand avocations and dissipations.'—SWIFT.

Dispel is used figuratively; disperse only in the natural sense: gloom, ignorance, and the like, are dispelled; books, people, papers, and the like, are dispersed.

TO POUR, SPILL, SHED.

Pour is probably connected with pore, and the Latin preposition per through, signifying to make to pass as it were through a channel; spill and splash, and the German spülen are probably onomatopœias; shed comes from the German scheiden to separate, signifying to cast from.

We pour with design; we spill by accident: we pour water over a plant or a bed; we spill it on the ground. To pour is an act of convenience; to spill and shed are acts more or less hurtful; the former is to cause to run in small quantities; the latter in large quantities: we pour wine out of a bottle into a glass; but the blood of a person is said to be spilled or shed when his life is violently taken away: what is poured is commonly no part of the body from whence it is poured; but what is shed is no other than a component part; hence trees are said to shed their leaves, animals their hair, or human beings to shed tears; 'Poesy is of so subtle a spirit, that in the pouring out of one language into another, it will evaporate.'—DENHAM.

O reputation! dearer far than life,
Thou precious balsam, lovely sweet of smell,
Whose cordial drops once spill'd by some rash hand,
Not all the owner's care, nor the repenting toil
Of the rude spiller, can collect.—SEWEL.

'Herod acted the part of a great mourner for the deceased Aristobulus, shedding abundance of tears.'—PRIDEAUX.

POVERTY, INDIGENCE, WANT, NEED, PENURY.

Poverty marks the condition of being poor; indigence, in Latin indigentia, comes from indigeo and the Greek ἐδωαι to want, signifying in the same manner as the word want, the abstract condition of wanting; need, v. Necessity; penury, in Latin penuria, comes in all probability from the Greek πενυς poor.

Poverty is a general state of fortune opposed to that of riches; in which one is abridged of the conveniences of life: indigence is a particular state of poverty, which rises above it in such a degree, as to exclude the necessities as well as the conveniences of life; want and need are both partial states, that refer only to individual things which are wanting to any one. Poverty and indigence comprehend all a man's external circumstances; but want, when taken by itself, denotes the want of food or clothing, and is opposed to abundance; need, when taken by itself, implies the want of money, or any other useful article; but they are both more commonly taken in connexion with the object which is wanted, and in this sense they are to the two former as species to the genus. Poverty and indigence are permanent states; want and need are temporary: poverty and indigence are the order of Providence, they do not depend upon the individual, and are, therefore, not reckoned as his fault; want and need arise more commonly from circumstances of one's own creation, and tend frequently to one's discredit. What man has not caused, man cannot so easily obviate; poverty and indigence cannot, therefore, be removed at one's will: but want and need are frequently removed by the aid of others. Poverty is that which one should learn to bear, so as to lessen its pains; 'That the poverty of the Highlanders is gradually diminished cannot be mentioned among the unpleasant consequences of subjection.'—JOHNSON

Indigence is a calamity which the compassion of others may in some measure alleviate, if they cannot entirely remove it; 'If we can but raise him above indigence. a moderate share of good fortune and merit will be sufficient to open his way to whatever else we can wish him to obtain.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero). Want, when it results from intemperance or extravagance, is not altogether entitled to any relief;

Want is a bitter and a hateful good,
Because its virtues are not understood;
Yet many things, impossible to thought,
Have been by need to full perfection brought.

DRYDEN.

But need, when it arises from casualties that are independent of our demerits, will always find friends.

It is a wise distribution of Providence which has made the rich and poor to be mutually dependent upon each other, and both to be essential to the happiness of the whole. Among all descriptions of indigent persons, none are more entitled to charitable attention than those who in addition to their wants suffer under any bodily infirmity. The old proverb says, 'That waste makes want,' which is daily realized among men without making them wiser by experience. 'A friend in need,' according to another vulgar proverb, 'is a friend indeed,' which, like all proverbial sayings, contains a striking truth; for nothing can be more acceptable than the assistance which we receive from a friend when we stand in need of it; 'God grant we never may have need of you.'—SHAKESPEARE. All these terms may be used, either in a general or in a particular sense, to denote a privation of things in general or a partial privation. Penury is used to denote a privation of things in general, but particularly of things most essential for existence; 'The penury of the ecclesiastical state.'—HOOKER.

Sometimes am I a king,
Then treason makes me with myself a beggar;
And so I am; then crushing penury
Persuades me, I was better when a king.

SHAKESPEARE.

NECESSITY, NEED.

Necessity (v. Necessary) respects the thing wanted; need, in German noth, probably from the Greek ἀνάγκη necessity, the person wanting. There would be no necessity for punishments, if there were not evil doers; he is peculiarly fortunate who finds a friend in time of need. Necessity is more pressing than need: the former places us in a positive state of compulsion to act; it is said to have no law, it prescribes the law for itself; the latter yields to circumstances, and leaves us in a state of deprivation. We are frequently under the necessity of going without that of which we stand most in need; 'Where necessity ends, curiosity begins.'—JOHNSON. 'One of the many advantages of friendship is, that one can say to one's friend the things that stand in need of pardon.'—POPE.

From these two nouns arise two epithets for each, which are worthy of observation, namely, necessary and needful, necessitous and needy. Necessary and needful are both applicable to the thing wanted; necessitous and needy to the person wanting. Necessary is applied to every object indiscriminately; needful only to such objects as supply temporary or partial wants. Exercise is necessary to preserve the health of the body; restraint is necessary to preserve that of the mind; assistance is needful for one who has not sufficient resources in himself: it is necessary to go by water to the continent: money is needful for one who is travelling.

The dissemination of knowledge is necessary to dispel the ignorance which would otherwise prevail in the world;

It seems to me most strange that men should fear
Seeing that death, a necessary end,
Will come when it will come.—SHAKESPEARE

It is needful for a young person to attend to the instructions of his teacher, if he will improve;

Time, long expected, eas'd us of our load,
And brought the needful presence of a god.

DRYDEN.

Necessitous expresses more than needy: the former comprehends a general state of necessity or deficiency

In the thing that is wanted or needful; needy expresses only a particular condition. The poor are in a necessitous condition who are in want of the first necessities, or who have not wherewithal to supply the most pressing necessities; 'Steele's imprudence of generosity, or vanity of profusion, kept him always incurably necessitous.'—JOHNSON. Adventurers are said to be needy, when their vices make them in need of that which they might otherwise obtain; 'Charity is the work of heaven, which is always laying itself out on the needy and the impotent.'—SOUTH. It is charity to supply the wants of the necessitous, but those of the needy are sometimes not worthy of one's pity.

POOR, PAUPER.

Poor and pauper are both derived from the Latin pauper, which comes from the Greek πaupos small. Poor is the term of general use; pauper is a term of particular use: a pauper is a poor man who lives upon alms or the relief of the parish: the former is, therefore, indefinite in its meaning; the latter conveys a reproachful idea. The word poor is used as a substantive only in the plural number; pauper is a substantive both in the singular and plural: the poor of a parish are, in general, a heavy burden on the inhabitants; there are some persons who are not ashamed to live and die as paupers.

NECESSITIES, NECESSARIES.

Necessity, in Latin necessitas, and necessary, in Latin necessarius, from nece, or ne and cesso, signify not to be yielded or given up. Necessity is the mode or state of circumstances, or the thing which circumstances render necessary; the necessary is that which is absolutely and unconditionally necessary.

Art has ever been busy in inventing things to supply the various necessities of our nature, and yet there are always numbers who want even the first necessities of life. Habit and desire create necessities; nature only requires necessities; a voluptuary has necessities which are unknown to a temperate man; the poor have in general little more than necessities; 'Those whose condition has always restrained them to the contemplation of their own necessities will scarcely understand why nights and days should be spent in study.'—JOHNSON. 'To make a man happy, virtue must be accompanied with at least a moderate provision of all the necessities of life, and not disturbed by bodily pains.'—BUDGELL.

TO WANT, NEED, LACK.

To be without is the common idea expressed by these terms: but to want is to be without that which contributes to our comfort, or is an object of our desire; to need is to be without that which is essential for our existence or our purposes. To lack, which is probably a variation from leak, and a term not in frequent use, expresses little more than the general idea of being without, unaccompanied by any collateral idea. From the close connexion which subsists between desiring and want, it is usual to consider what we want as artificial, and what we need as natural and indispensable. What one man wants is a superfluity to another; but that which is needed by one is in like circumstances needed by all: tender people want a fire when others would be glad not to have it; all persons need warm clothing and a warm house in the winter.

To want and need may extend indefinitely to many or all objects; to lack, or be deficient, is properly said of a single object: we may want or need every thing; we lack one thing, we lack this or that; a rich man may lack understanding, virtue, or religion. He who wants nothing is a happy man; 'To be rich is to have more than is desired, and more than is wanted.'—JOHNSON. He who needs nothing, may be happy if he wants no more than he has;

The old from such affairs are only freed,
Which vig'rous youth and strength of body need.

DENHAM.

Contentment is often the only thing a man lacks to make him happy;

See the mind of beastly man!

That hath so soon forgot the excellence
Of his creation, when he life began,
That now he chooseth with vile difference
To be a beast and lacke intelligence.—SPENSER

TO INCREASE, GROW.

Increase, from the Latin in and cresco, signifies to grow upon or grow to a thing, to become one with it; grow, in Saxon growan, very probably comes from, or is connected with, the Latin crevi, perfect of cresco to increase or grow.

The idea of becoming larger is common to both these terms: but the former expresses the idea in an unqualified manner: and the latter annexes to this general idea also that of the mode or process by which this is effected. To increase is either a gradual or an instantaneous act; to grow is a gradual process: a stream increases by the addition of other waters; it may come suddenly or in course of time, by means of gentle showers or the rushing in of other streams; but if we say that the river or stream grows, it is supposed to grow by some regular and continual process of receiving fresh water, as from the running in of different rivulets or smaller streams. To increase is either a natural or an artificial process; to grow is always natural: money increases but does not grow, because it increases by artificial means: corn may either increase or grow: in the former case we speak of it in the sense of becoming larger or increasing in bulk; in the latter case we consider the mode of its increasing, namely, by the natural process of vegetation. On this ground we say that a child grows when we wish to denote the natural process by which his body arrives at its proper size; but we may speak of his increasing in stature, in size, and the like;

Then, as her strength with years increas'd, began

To pierce aloft in air the soaring swan.—DRYDEN.

For this reason likewise increase is used in a transitive as well as intransitive sense; but grow always in an intransitive sense: we can increase a thing, though not properly grow a thing, because we can make it larger by whatever means we please; but when it grows it makes itself larger. 'Bones, after full growth, continue at a stay; as for nails, they grow continually.'—BACON.

In their improper acceptance these words preserve the same distinction: 'trade increases' bespeaks the simple fact of its becoming larger; but 'trade grows' implies that gradual increase which flows from the natural concurrence of circumstances. The affections which are awakened in infancy grow with one's growth; here is a natural and moral process combined;

Children, like tender oziars, take the bow,
And, as they first are fashion'd, always grow
DRYDEN.

The fear of death sometimes increases as one grows old; the courage of a truly brave man increases with the sight of danger: here is a moral process which is both gradual and immediate, but in both cases produced by some foreign cause.

I have enlarged on these two words the more because they appear to have been involved in some considerable perplexity by the French writers Girard and Robaud, who have entered very diffusely into the distinction between the words croître and augmenter, corresponding to increase and grow; but I trust that from the above explanation, the distinction is clearly to be observed.

INCREASE, ADDITION, ACCESSION, AUGMENTATION.

Increase is here as in the former article the generic term (v. To increase): there will always be increase where there is augmentation, addition, and accession, though not vice versa.

Addition is to increase as the means to the end: the addition is the artificial mode of making two things into one; the increase is the result: when the value of one figure is added to another, the sum is increased; hence a man's treasures experience an increase by the addition of other parts to the main stock. Addition is an intentional mode of increasing; accession is an accidental mode: one thing is added to another, and thereby increased; but an accession takes place of itself; it is the coming or joining of one thing to another so as to increase the whole. A merchant increases his property by adding his gains in trade every year to the mass; but he receives an accession of property either by inheritance or any other contingency. In the same manner a monarch increases his dominions by adding one territory to another, or by various accessions of territory which fall to his lot.

When we speak of an increase, we think of the whole and its relative magnitude at different times;

At will I crop the year's increase,
My latter life is rest and peace.—DRYDEN.

When we speak of an addition, we think only of the part and the agency by which this part is joined; 'The ill state of health into which Tullia is fallen is a very severe addition to the many and great disquietudes that afflict my mind.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero). When we speak of an accession, we think only of the circumstance by which one thing becomes thus joined to another; 'There is nothing in my opinion more pleasing in religion than to consider that the soul is to shine for ever with new accessions of glory.'—ADDISON. Increase of happiness does not depend upon increase of wealth; the miser makes daily additions to the latter without making any to the former: sudden accessions of wealth are seldom attended with any good consequences, as they turn the thoughts too violently out of their sober channel, and bend them too strongly on present possessions and good fortune.

Augmentation is another term for increase, which differs less in sense than in application: the latter is generally applied to all objects that admit such a change; but the former is applied only to objects of higher import or cases of a less familiar nature. We may say that a person experiences an increase or an augmentation in his family; or that he has had an increase or an augmentation of his salary, or that there is an increase or augmentation of the number: in all which cases the former term is most adapted to the colloquial, and the latter to the grave style.

TO ENLARGE, INCREASE, EXTEND.

Enlarge signifies literally to make large or wide, and is applied to dimension and extent; increase, from the Latin increasco to grow to a thing, is applicable to quantity, signifying to become greater in size by the junction of other matter; extend, in Latin extendo, or ex and tendo, signifies to stretch out, that is, to make greater in space. We speak of enlarging a house, a room, premises, or boundaries; of increasing the property, the army, the capital, expense, &c.; of extending the boundaries of an empire. We say the hole or cavity enlarges, the head or bulk enlarges, the number increases, the swelling, inflammation, and the like, increase: so likewise in the figurative sense, the views, the prospects, the powers, the ideas, and the mind, are enlarged;

Great objects make
Great minds, enlarging as their views enlarge,
Those still more godlike, as these more divine.

YOUNG.

Pain, pleasure, hope, fear, anger, or kindness, is increased; 'Good sense alone is a sedate and quiescent quality, which manages its possessions well, but does not increase them.'—JOHNSON. Views, prospects, connexions, and the like, are extended;

The wise extending their inquiries wide,
See how both states are by connexion tied;
Fools view but part, and not the whole survey,
So crowd existence all into a day.—JENYNS.

TO REACH, STRETCH, EXTEND.

Reach, through the medium of the northern languages, as also the Latin rego in the word porrigo, and the Greek ῥέγω, comes from the Hebrew רקע to draw out. and ארץ length; stretch is but an intensive of reach; extend, v. To extend.

The idea of drawing out in a line is common to these terms, but they differ in the mode and circumstances of the action. To reach and to stretch are employed only for drawing out in a straight line, that is, lengthwise; extend may be employed to express the drawing out in all directions. In this sense a wall is said to reach a certain number of yards; a neck of land is said to stretch into the sea; a wood extends many miles over a country. As the act of persons, in the proper sense, they differ still more widely; reach and stretch signify drawing to a given point, and for a given end: extend has no such collateral meaning. We reach in order to take hold of something; we stretch in order to surmount some object; a person reaches with his arm in order to get down a book; he stretches his neck in order to see over another person: in both cases we might be said simply to extend the arm or the neck, where the collateral circumstance is not to be expressed.

In the improper application, they have a similar distinction: to reach is applied to the movements which one makes to a certain end, and is equivalent to arriving at, or attaining. A traveller strives to reach his journey's end as quickly as possible; an ambitious man aims at reaching, the summit of human power or honour; 'The whole power of cunning is privative; to say nothing, and to do nothing, is the utmost of its reach.'—JOHNSON. To stretch is applied to the direction which one gives to another object, so as to bring it to a certain point; a ruler stretches his power or authority to its utmost limits;

Plains immense
Lie stretch'd below interminable meads.
THOMSON.

To extend retains its original unqualified meaning; as when we speak of extending the meaning or application of a word, of extending one's bounty or charity, extending one's sphere of action, and the like;

Our life is short, but to extend that span
To vast eternity is virtue's work.—SHAKESPEARE

SIZE, MAGNITUDE, GREATNESS, BULK.

Size, from the Latin cisus and cado to cut, signifies that which is cut or framed according to a certain proportion; magnitude, from the Latin magnitudo, answers literally to the English word greatness; bulk, v. Bulky.

Size is a general term including all manner of dimension or measurement; magnitude is employed in science or in an abstract sense to denote some specific measurement; greatness is an unscientific term applied in the same sense to objects in general; size is indefinite, it never characterizes any thing either as large or small; but magnitude and greatness always suppose something great; and bulk denotes a considerable degree of greatness: things which are diminutive in size will often have an extraordinary degree of beauty, or some other adventitious perfection to compensate the deficiency;

Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size.—DRYDEN.

Astronomers have classed the stars according to their different magnitudes;

Then form'd the moon,
Globose, and every magnitude of stars.—MILTON.

Greatness is considered by Burke as one source of the sublime; 'Awe is the first sentiment that rises in the mind at the first view of God's greatness.'—BLAIR. Bulk is that species of greatness which destroys the symmetry, and consequently the beauty, of objects;

His huge bulk on seven high volumes roll'd.

DRYDEN

BULKY, MASSIVE OR MASSY.

Bulky denotes having bulk, which is connected with our words, belly, body, bilge, bulge, &c., and the German balg; massive, in French massif, from mass, signifies having a mass or being like a mass, which, through the German masse, Latin massa, Greek μάζα dough, comes from μάσσω to knead, signifying made into a solid substance.

Whatever is bulky has a prominence of figure, what is massive has compactness of matter. The bulky, therefore, though larger in size, is not so weighty as the massive; 'In Milton's time it was suspected that the whole creation languished, that neither trees nor animals had the height or bulk of their predecessors.'—JOHNSON.

His pond'rous shield,
Ethereal temper, massy, large, and round,
Behind him cast.—MILTON.

Hollow bodies commonly have a bulk; none but solid bodies can be massive.

A vessel is bulky in its form; lead, silver, and gold, massive.

LARGE, WIDE, BROAD.

Large (v. Great) is applied in a general way to express every dimension; it implies not only abundance in solid matter, but also freedom in the space, or extent of a plane superficies; wide, in German weit, is most probably connected with the French wide, and the Latin viduus empty, signifying properly an empty or open space unincumbered by any obstructions; broad, in German breit, probably comes from the noun bret, board; because it is the peculiar property of a board, that is to say, it is the width of what is particularly long. Many things are large, but not wide; as a large town, a large circle, a large ball, a large nut: other things are both large and wide; as a large field, or a wide field: a large house, or a wide house: but the field is said to be large from the quantity of ground it contains; it is said to be wide both from its figure, or the extent of its space in the cross directions; in like manner, a house is large from its extent in all directions; it is said to be wide from the extent which it runs in front: some things are said to be wide which are not denominated large; that is, either such things as have less bulk and quantity than extent of plane surface; as ell wide cloth, a wide opening, a wide entrance, and the like; or such as have an extent of space only one way; as a wide road, a wide path, a wide passage, and the like;

Wide was the wound,
But suddenly with flesh fill'd up and heal'd.
MILTON.

What is broad is in sense, and mostly in application, wide, but not vice versa: a ribbon is broad; a ledge is broad; a ditch is broad; a plank is broad; the brim of a hat is broad; or the border of any thing is broad: on the other hand, a mouth is wide, but not broad; apertures in general are wide, but not broad. The large is opposed to the small; the wide to the close; the broad to the narrow. In the moral application, we speak of largeness in regard to liberality;

Shall grief contract the largeness of that heart,
In which nor fear nor anger has a part?
WALLER.

Wide and broad only in the figurative sense of space or size: as a wide difference; or a broad line of distinction; 'The wider a man's comforts extend, the *broad*er is the mark which he spreads to the arrows of misfortune.'—BLAIR.

GREAT, LARGE, BIG.

Great, derived through the medium of the northern languages from the Latin crassus thick, and creSCO to grow, is applied to all kinds of dimensions in which things can grow or increase; large, in Latin largus wide, is probably derived from the Greek λα and πειν to flow plentifully; for largior signifies to give freely, and large has in English a similar sense; it is properly applied to space, extent, and quantity; big, from the German bauch belly, and the English bulk, denotes great as to expansion or capacity. A house, a room, a heap, a pile, an army, &c., is great or large; 'At one's first entrance into the Pantheon at Rome, how the imagination is filled with something great and amazing; and at the same time how little in proportion one is affected with the inside of a Gothick cathedral, although it be five times larger than the other.'—ADDISON. An animal or a mountain is great or big; a road, a city, a street, and the like, is termed rather great than large; 'An animal no bigger than a mite cannot appear perfect to the eye, because the sight takes it in at once.'—ADDISON. 'We are not a little pleased to find every green leaf swarm with millions of animals, that at their largest growth are not visible to the naked eye.'—ADDISON. Great is used generally in the improper sense; large and big are used only occasionally: a noise, a distance, a multitude, a number, a power, and the like, is termed great, but not large; we may, however, speak of a large portion, a large share, a large quantity; or of a mind big with conception, or of an event big with the fate of nations; 'Among all the figures of architecture, there are none that have a greater air than the concave and the convex.'—ADDISON.

Sure he that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before and after, gave us not,
That capability and godlike reason,
To rust in us unus'd.—SHAKESPEARE.

Amazing clouds on clouds continual heap'd,
Or whirl'd tempestuous by the gusty wind,
Or silent borne along heavy and slow,
With the big stores of streaming oceans charg'd.
THOMSON.

ENORMOUS, HUGE, IMMENSE, VAST.

Enormous, from e and norma a rule, signifies out of rule or order; huge is in all probability connected with high, which is hoog in Dutch; immense, in Latin immensus, compounded of in privative and mensus measured, signifies not to be measured; vast, in French vaste, Latin vastus, from vaco to be vacant, open, or wide, signifies extended in space.

Enormous and huge are peculiarly applicable to magnitude; immense and vast to extent, quantity, and number. Enormous expresses more than huge, as immense expresses more than vast: what is enormous exceeds in a very great degree all ordinary bounds; what is huge is great only in the superlative degree. The enormous is always out of proportion; the huge is relatively extraordinary in its dimensions. Some animals may be made enormously fat by a particular mode of feeding: to one who has seen nothing but level ground common hills will appear to be huge mountains;

The Thracian Acamus his falchion found,
And hew'd the enormous giant to the ground.
POPE.

Great Arethous, known from shore to shore,
By the huge knotted iron mace he bore,
No lance he shook, nor bent the twanging bow,
But broke with this the battle of the foe.
POPE.

The immense is that which exceeds all calculation. the vast comprehends only a very great or unusual excess. The distance between the earth and sun may be said to be immense: the distance between the poles is vast;

Well was the crime, and well the vengeance sparr'd,
E'en power immense had found such battle hard.
POPE.

Just on the brink they neigh and paw the ground,
And the turf trembles, and the skies resound;
Eager they view'd the prospect dark and deep,
Vast was the leap, and headlong hung the steep.
POPE.

Of all these terms huge is the only one confined to the proper application, and in the proper sense of size: the rest are employed with regard to moral objects. We speak only of a huge animal, a huge monster, a huge mass, a huge size, a huge bulk, and the like; but we speak of an enormous waste, an immense difference, and a vast number.

The epithets enormous, immense, and vast are applicable to the same objects, but with the same distinction in their sense. A sum is enormous which exceeds in magnitude not only every thing known, but every thing thought of or expected; a sum is immense that scarcely admits of calculation; a sum is vast which rises very high in calculation. The national debt of England has risen to an enormous amount: the revolutionary war has been attended with an immense loss of blood and treasure to the different nations of Europe: there are individuals who, while they are expending vast sums on their own gratifications, refuse to contribute any thing to the relief of the necessitous

ENORMOUS, PRODIGIOUS, MONSTROUS.

Enormous, v. Enormous; prodigious comes from prodigy, in Latin prodigium, which in all probability comes from prodigo to lavish forth, signifying literally breaking out in excess or extravagance; monstrous, from monster, in Latin monstrum, and monstro to show or make visible, signifies remarkable, or exciting notice.

The enormous contradicts our rules of estimating and calculating: the prodigious raises our minds beyond their ordinary standard of thinking: the monstrous contradicts nature and the course of things. What is enormous excites our surprise or amazement;

Jove's bird on sounding pinions beat the skies,
A bleeding serpent of enormous size,
His talons truss'd, alive and curling round,
He stung the bird whose throat receiv'd the wound.

POPE

What is prodigious excites our astonishment; 'I dreamed that I was in a wood of so prodigious an extent, and cut into such a variety of walks and alleys, that all mankind were lost and bewildered in it.'—ADPISON. What is monstrous does violence to our senses and understanding;

Nothing so monstrous can be said or feign'd
But with belief and joy is entertain'd.—DRYDEN.

There is something enormous in the present scale upon which property, whether publick or private, is amassed and expended: the works of the ancients in general, but the Egyptian pyramids in particular, are objects of admiration, on account of the prodigious labour which was bestowed on them: ignorance and superstition have always been active in producing monstrous images for the worship of his blind votaries.

LITTLE, SMALL, DIMINUTIVE.

Little, in Low German litje, Dutch littel, is, in all probability, connected with light, in Saxon leoht, old German lihto, Swedish lät, &c.; small is, with some variations, to be found in most of the northern dialects, in which it signifies, as in English, a contracted space or quantity; diminutive, in Latin diminutivus, signifies made small.

Little is properly opposed to the great (v. Great), small to the large, and diminutive is a species of the small, which is made so contrary to the course of things: a child is said to be little as respects its age as well as its size; it is said to be small as respects its size only; it is said to be diminutive when it is exceedingly small considering its age: little children cannot be left with safety to themselves; small children are pleasanter to be nursed than large ones: If we look down from any very great height the largest men will look diminutive; 'The talent of turning men into ridicule, and exposing to laughter those one converses with, is the qualification of little, ungenerous tempers.'—ADPISON. 'He whose knowledge is at best but limited, and whose intellect proceeds by a small, diminutive light, cannot but receive an additional light by the conceptions of another man.'—SOUTH.

SPACE, ROOM.

Space, in Latin spatium, Greek γάδιον, Æol. σπάδιον a race ground; room, in Saxon rum, &c. Hebrew ramah a wide place.

These are both abstract terms, expressive of that portion of the universe which is supposed not to be occupied by any solid body: space is a general term, which includes within itself that which infinitely surpasses our comprehension; room is a limited term, which comprehends those portions of space which are artificially formed: space is either extended or bounded; room is always a bounded space: the space between two objects is either natural, incidental, or designedly formed;

The man of wealth and pride
Takes up a space that many poor supplied.

GOLDSMITH.

The room is that which is the fruit of design, to suit the convenience of persons;

For the whole world, without a native home,
Is nothing but a prison of a larger room.—COWLEY.

There is a sufficient space between the heavenly bodies to admit of their moving without confusion; the value of a house essentially depends upon the quantity of room which it affords: in a row of trees there must always be vacant spaces between each tree; in a coach there will be only room for a given number of persons.

Space is only taken in the natural sense; room is also employed in the moral application: in every person there is ample room for amendment or improvement.

AMPLE, SPACIOUS, CAPACIOUS.

Ample, in French ample, Latin amplus, probably comes from the Greek ἀναπλέως full; spacious, in French spacieux, Latin spaciosus, comes from spatium a space, implying the quality of having space; capacious, in Latin capax, from capio to hold, signifies the quality of being able to hold.

These epithets convey the analogous ideas of extent in quantity, and extent in space. Ample is figuratively employed for whatever is extended in quantity; spacious is literally used for whatever is extended in space; capacious is literally and figuratively employed to express extension in both quantity and space. Stores are ample, room is ample, an allowance is ample: a room, a house, a garden is spacious: a vessel or hollow of any kind is capacious; the soul, the mind, and the heart are capacious.

Ample is opposed to scanty, spacious to narrow capacious to small. What is ample suffices and satisfies; it imposes no constraint; 'The pure consciousness of worthy actions, abstracted from the views of popular applause, is to a generous mind an ample reward.'—HUGHES. What is spacious is free and open, it does not confine;

These mighty monarchies, that had o'erspread
The spacious earth, and stretch'd their conqu'ring arms
From pole to pole by ensnaring charms
Were quite consumed.—MAY.

What is capacious readily receives and contains; it is spacious, liberal, and generous;

Down sunk, a hollow bottom broad and deep
Capacious bed of waters.—MILTON.

Although sciences, arts, philosophy, and languages afford to the mass of mankind ample scope for the exercise of their mental powers without recurring to mysterious or fanciful researches, yet this world is hardly spacious enough for 'the range of the intellectual faculties: the capacious minds of some are no less capable of containing than they are disposed for receiving whatever spiritual food is offered them.

DEPTH, PROFUNDITY.

Depth, from deep, dip, or dive, the Greek δύπρω, and the Hebrew טָבַח to dive, signifies the point under water which is dived for; profundity, from profound, in Latin profundus, compounded of pro or procul far, and fundus the bottom, signifies remoteness from the surface of any thing.

These terms do not differ merely in their derivation, but depth is indefinite in its signification; and profundity is a positive and considerable degree of depth. Moreover, the word depth is applied to objects in general; 'By these two passions of hope and fear, we reach forward into futurity, and bring up to our present thoughts objects that lie in the remotest depths of time.'—ADPISON. Profundity is confined in its application to moral objects: thus we speak of the depth of the sea, or the depth of a person's learning; but his profundity of thought; 'The peruser of Swift will want very little previous knowledge: it will be sufficient that he is acquainted with common words and common things; he is neither required to mount elevations nor to explore profundities.'—JOHNSON.

OBLONG, OVAL.

Oblong, in Latin oblongus, from the intensive syllable ob, signifies very long, longer than broad: oval, from the Latin ovum, signifies egg-shaped.

The oval is a species of the oblong: what is oval is oblong; but what is oblong is not always oval. Ob-long is peculiarly applied to figures formed by right lines, that is, all rectangular parallelograms, except squares, are oblong ; but the oval is applied to curvilinear oblong figures, as ellipses, which are distinguished from the circle : tables are oftener oblong than oval ; garden beds are as frequently oval as they are oblong.

ROUNDNESS, ROTUNDITY.

Roundness and rotundity both come from the Latin rotundus and rota a wheel, which is the most perfectly round body that is formed : the former term is however applied to all objects in general ; the latter only to solid bodies which are round in all directions : one speaks of the roundness of a circle, the roundness of the moon, the roundness of a tree ; but the rotundity of a man's body which projects in a round form in all directions, and the rotundity of a full cheek, or the rotundity of a turnip ;

Bracelets of pearls gave roundness to her arms.

PRIOR.

'Angular bodies lose their points and asperities by frequent friction, and approach by degrees to uniform rotundity.'—JOHNSON.

OUTWARD, EXTERNAL, EXTERIOUR.

Outward, or inclined to the out, after the manner of the out, indefinitely describes the situation ; external, from the Latin externus and extra, is more definite in its sense, since it is employed only in regard to such objects as are conceived to be independent of man as a thinking being : hence, we may speak of the outward part of a building, of a board, of a table, a box, and the like ; but of external objects acting on the mind, or of an external agency ; 'The controversy about the reality of external evils is now at an end.'—JOHNSON. Exterior is still more definite than either, as it expresses a higher degree of the outward or external ; the former being in the comparative, and the two latter in the positive degree : when we speak of any thing which has two coats, it is usual to designate the outermost by the name of the exterior ; when we speak simply of the surface, without reference to any thing behind, it is denominated external : as the exterior coat of a walnut, or the external surface of things. In the moral application the external or outward is that which comes simply to the view ; but the exterior is that which is prominent, and which consequently may conceal something :

But when a monarch sins, it should be secret,

To keep exterior show of sanctity,

Maintain respect, and cover bad example.—DRYDEN.

A man may sometimes neglect the outside, who is altogether mindful of the in ;

And though my outward state misfortune hath Depress'd thus low, it cannot reach my faith.

DENHAM.

A man with a pleasing exterior will sometimes gain more friends than those who have more solid merit.

INSIDE, INTERIOUR.

The term inside may be applied to bodies of any magnitude, small or large ; interiour is peculiarly appropriate to bodies of great magnitude. We may speak of the inside of a nut-shell, but not of its interiour : on the other hand, we speak of the interiour of St. Paul's, or the interiour of a palace ; 'As for the inside of their nest, none but themselves were concerned in it, according to the inviolable laws established among those animals (the ants).'—ADDISON. 'The gates are drawn back, and the interiour of the fane is discovered.'—CUMBERLAND. This difference of application is not altogether arbitrary : for inside literally signifies the side that is inward ; but interiour signifies the space which is more inward than the rest, which is enclosed in an enclosure : consequently cannot be applied to any thing but a large space that is enclosed.

'THICK, DENSE.

Between thick and dense there is little other difference, than that the latter is employed to express that species of thickness which is philosophically considered as the property of the atmosphere in a certain condition ; hence we speak of thick in regard to hard or soft bodies, as a thick board or thick cotton ; solid or liquid, as a thick cheese or thick milk : but the term dense only in regard to the air in its various forms, as a dense air, a dense vapour, a dense cloud ; 'I have discovered, by a long series of observations, that invention and elocution suffer great impediments from dense and impure vapours.'—JOHNSON.

THIN, SLENDER, SLIGHT, SLIM.

Thin, in Saxon thinne, German dünn, Latin tener, from tendo, in Greek τενω to extend or draw out, and the Hebrew נסה ; slender, slight, and slim are all variations from the German schlank, which are connected with the words slime and sling, as also with the German schlingen to wind or wreath, and schlange a serpent, designating the property of length and smallness, which is adapted for bending or twisting.

Thin is the generic term, the rest are specific : thin may be said of that which is small and short, as well as small and long ; slender is always said of that which is small and long at the same time : a board is thin which wants solidity or substance ; a poplar is slender because its tallness is disproportionate to its magnitude or the dimensions of its circumference. Thinness is sometimes a natural property ; slight and slim are applied to that which is artificial : the leaves of trees are of a thin texture ; a board may be made slight by continually planing ; a paper box is very slim. Thinness is a good property sometimes ; thin paper is frequently preferred to that which is thick : slightness and slimness, which is a greater degree of slightness, are always defects ; that which is made slight is unfit to bear the stress that will be put upon it ; that which is slim is altogether unfit for the purpose proposed ; a carriage that is made slight is quickly broken, and always out of repair ; paper is altogether too slim to serve the purpose of wood.

These terms admit of a similar distinction in the moral application ; 'I have found dulness to quicken into sentiment in a thin ether.'—JOHNSON. 'Very slender differences will sometimes part those whom beneficence has united.'—JOHNSON. 'Friendship is often destroyed by a thousand secret and slight competitions.'—JOHNSON.

TO ABATE, LESSEN, DIMINISH, DECREASE.

Abate, from the French abatre, signified originally to beat down, in the active sense, and to come down, in the neuter sense ; diminish, or, as it is sometimes written, minish, from the Latin diminuo, and minuo to lessen, and minus less, expresses, like the verb lessen, the sense of either making less or becoming less ; decrease is compounded of the privative de and crease, in Latin creresco to grow, signifying to grow less.

The first three are used transitively or intransitively ; the latter only intransitively.

Abate respects the vigour of action : a person's fever is abated or abates ; the violence of the storm abates ; pain and anger abate ; 'My wonder abated, when upon looking around me, I saw most of them attentive to three Syrens clothed like goddesses, and distinguished by the names of Sloth, Ignorance, and Pleasure.'—ADDISON. Lessen and diminish are both applied to size, quantity, and number ; but the former mostly in the proper and familiar sense, the latter in the figurative and higher acceptance ; the size of a room or garden is lessened ; the credit and respectability of a person is diminished.

Nothing is so calculated to abate the ardour of youth as grief and disappointment ; 'Tully was the first who observed that friendship improves happiness and abates misery.'—ADDISON. An evil may be lessened when it cannot be removed by the application of remedies ;

He sought fresh fountains in a foreign soil ;

The pleasure lessened the attending toil.—ADDISON.

Nothing diminishes the lustre of great deeds more than cruelty ; 'If Parthenissa can now possess her own mind, and think as little of her beauty, as she ought to have done when she had it, there will be no great diminution of her charms.'—HUGHES.

The passion of an angry man ought to be allowed to abate before any appeal is made to his understanding; we may lessen the number of our evils by not dwelling upon them. Objects apparently diminish according to the distance from which they are observed.

To decrease is to diminish for a continuance: a retreating army will decrease rapidly when exposed to all the privations and hardships attendant on forced marches, it is compelled to fight for its safety: some things decrease so gradually that it is some time before they are observed to be diminished;

These leaks shall then decrease; the sails once more Direct our course to some relieving shore.

FALCONER.

In the abstract sense the word lessening is mostly supplied by diminution: it will be no abatement of sorrow to a generous mind to know that the diminution of evil to itself has been produced by the abridgment of good to another.

TO OVERFLOW, INUNDATE, DELUGE.

What overflows simply flows over; what inundates, from in and unda a wave, flows into; what deluges, from diluo, washes away.

The overflow bespeaks abundance; whatever exceeds the measure of contents must flow over, because it is more than can be held: to inundate bespeaks not only abundance, but vehemence; when it inundates it flows in faster than is desired, it fills to an inconvenient height: to deluge bespeaks impetuosity; a deluge irresistibly carries away all before it. This explanation of these terms in their proper sense will illustrate their improper application: the heart is said to overflow with joy, with grief, with bitterness, and the like, in order to denote the superabundance of the thing; 'I am too full of you not to overflow upon those I converse with.'—POPE. A country is said to be inundated by swarms of inhabitants, when speaking of numbers who intrude themselves to the annoyance of the natives; 'There was such an inundation of speakers, young speakers in every sense of the word, that neither my Lord Germaine, nor myself, could find room for a single word.'—GIBBON. The town is said to be deluged with publications of different kinds, when they appear in such profusion and in such quick succession as to supersede others of more value;

At length corruption, like a general flood,
Shall deluge all.—POPE.

TO FLOW, STREAM, GUSH.

Flow, in Latin fluo, and Greek ῥέω or φλῶ, to be in a ferment, is in all probability connected with ῥέω, which signifies literally to flow; stream, in German strömen, from riemen a thong, signifies to run in a line; gush comes from the German giessen, &c. to pour out with force.

Flow is here the generic term: the two others are specific terms expressing different modes: water may flow either in a large body or in a long but narrow course; the stream in a long, narrow course only: thus, waters flow in seas, rivers, rivulets, or in a small pond; they stream only out of spouts or small channels: they flow gently or otherwise; they stream gently; but they gush with violence: thus, the blood flows from a wound when it comes from it in any manner; it streams from a wound when it runs as it were in a channel; it gushes from a wound when it runs with impetuosity, and in as large quantities as the cavity admits;

Down his wan cheek a briny torrent flows.—POPE.

Fires stream in lightning from his sanguine eyes.
POPE.

Sunk in his sad companions' arms he lay,
And in short pantings sobb'd his soul away
(Like some vile worm extended on the ground),
While his life's torrent gush'd from out the wound.

POPE.

FLUID, LIQUID.

Fluid, from fluo to flow, signifies that which from its nature flows; liquid, from liquesco to melt, signifies that which is melted. These words may be employed as epithets to the same objects; but they have a distinct office which they derive from their original meaning: when we wish to represent a thing as capable of passing along in a stream or current, we should denominate it a fluid;

Or serve they as a flow'ry verge to bind
The fluid skirts of that same wat'ry cloud,
Lest it again dissolve, and show'r the earth.

MILTON

When we wish to represent the body as passing from a congealed to a dissolved state, we should name it a liquid;

As when the fig's press'd juice, infus'd in cream,
To curds coagulates the liquid stream.—POPE.

Water and air are both represented as fluids from their general property of flowing through certain spaces; but ice when thawed becomes a liquid and melts; lead when melted is also a liquid: the humours of the animal body, and the juices of trees, are fluids; what we drink is a liquid, as opposed to what we eat which is solid.

LIQUID, LIQUOR, JUICE, HUMOUR.

Liquid (v. Fluid) is the generic term; liquor, which is but a variation from the same Latin verb, liquesco, whence liquid is derived, is a liquid which is made to be drunk: juice, in French jus, is a liquid that issues from bodies; and humour, in Latin humor, from humor, and the Greek ῥέω to run, is a species of liquid which flows in bodies and forms a constituent part of them. All natural bodies consist of liquids or solids, or a combination of both;

How the bee
Sits on the bloom, extracting liquid sweet.

MILTON

Liquor serves to quench the thirst as food satisfies the hunger;

They who Minerva from Jove's head derive,
Might make old Homer's scull the muse's hive,
And from his brain that Helicon distill,
Whose racy liquor did his offspring fill.—DENHAM.

The juices of bodies are frequently their richest parts;

Give me to drain the cocoa's milky bowl,
And from the palm to draw its freshening wine,
More bounteous far than all the frantick juice
Which Bacchus pours.—THOMSON.

The humours are commonly the most important parts of any animal body; 'The perspicuity of the humours of the eye transmit the rays of light.'—STEELE. Liquid and liquor belong peculiarly to vegetable substances; humour to animal bodies; and juice to either; water is the simplest of all liquids; wine is the most inviting of all liquors; the orange produces the most agreeable juice; the humours of both men and brutes are most liable to corruption, whence the term is very frequently applied to fluids of the body when in a corrupt state: 'He denied himself nothing that he had a mind to eat or drink, which gave him a body full of humours, and made his fits of the gout frequent and violent.'—TEMPLE.

STREAM, CURRENT, TIDE.

A fluid body in a progressive motion is the object described in common by these terms; stream is the most general, the other two are but modes of the stream; stream, in Saxon stream, in German strom, is an onomatopoeia which describes the prolongation of any body in a narrow line along the surface: a current from curro to run, is a running stream; and a tide from tide, in German zeit time, is a periodical stream or current. All rivers are streams which are more or less gentle according to the nature of the ground through which they pass; the force of the current is very much increased by the confinement of any water between rocks, or by means of artificial impediments. The tide is high or low, strong or weak, at different hours of the day; when the tide is high the current is strongest.

From knowing the proper application of the terms their figurative use becomes obvious; a stream of air, or a stream of light is a prolonged body of air or light; a current of air is a continued stream that has rapid motion; streets and passages which are open at each extremity are the channels of such currents. In the moral sense the tide is the ruling fashion or propensity of the day; it is in vain to stem the tide of folly; it is wiser to get out of its reach;

When now the rapid stream of eloquence
Bears all before it, passion, reason, sense,
Can its dread thunder, or its lightning's force,
Derive their essence from a mortal source.

JENYNS.

With secret course, which no loud storms annoy,
Glides the smooth current of domestic joy.

GOLDSMITH.

There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which taken at the flood leads on to fortune.

SHAKESPEARE.

SPRING, FOUNTAIN, SOURCE.

The spring denotes that which springs; the word, therefore, carries us back to the point from which the water issues. Fountain, in Latin fons, from fundo to pour out, signifies the spring which is visible on the face of the earth: and source (v. Origin) is said of that which is not only visible, but runs along the earth. Springs are to be found by digging a sufficient depth in all parts of the earth: in mountainous countries, and also in the East, we read of fountains which form themselves, and supply the surrounding parts with refreshing streams: the sources of rivers are always to be traced to some mountain.

These terms are all used in a figurative sense: in the Bible the gospel is depicted as a spring of living waters; the eye as a fountain of tears; 'The heart of the citizen is a perennial spring of energy to the state.'

—BURKE.

Eternal king! the author of all being,
Fountain of light, thyself invisible.—MILTON.

In the general acceptance the source is taken for the channel through which any event comes to pass, the primary cause of its happening: a war is the source of many evils to a country; an imprudent step in the outset of life is oftentimes the source of ruin to a young person;

These are thy blessings, industry! rough power!
Yet the kind source of every gentle art.—THOMSON.

TO SPRINKLE, BEDEW.

To sprinkle is a frequentative of spring, and denotes either an act of nature or design: to bedew is to cover with dew, which is an operation of nature. By sprinkling, a liquid falls in sensible drops upon the earth; by bedewing, it covers by imperceptible drops: rain besprinkles the earth; dew bedews it. So likewise, figuratively, things are sprinkled with flour; the cheeks are bedewed with tears.

TO SPROUT, BUD.

Sprout, in Saxon sprytan, Low German sprouten, is doubtless connected with the German spritzen to spurt, spreiten to spread, and the like; to bud is to put forth buds; the noun bud is a variation from button, which it resembles in form. To sprout is to come forth from the stem; to bud, to put forth in buds.

TO SPURT, SPOUT.

To spurt and spout are, like the German spritzen, variations of spreiten to spread (v. To spread), and springen to spring (v. To arise); they both express the idea of sending forth liquid in small quantities from a cavity; the former, however, does not always include the idea of the cavity, but simply that of springing up; the latter is however confined to the circumstance of issuing forth from some place; dirt may be spruted in the face by means of kicking it up; or blood may be spruted out of a vein when it is opened, water out of the mouth, and the like; but a liquid spouts out from a pipe. To spurt is a sudden action arising from a momentary impetus given to a liquid either intentionally or incidentally; the beer will spurt from a barrel when the vent peg is removed: to spout is a continued action produced by a perpetual impetus which the liquid receives equally from design or accident; the water spouts out from a pipe which is denominated a spout, or it will spurt out from any cavity in the earth, or in a rock which may resemble a spout;

Far from the parent stream it boils again
Fresh into day, and all the glittering hill
Is bright with spouting rills.—THOMSON.

A person may likewise spout water in a stream from his mouth. Hence the figurative application of these terms; any sudden conceit which compels a person to an eccentric action is a spurt, particularly if it springs from ill-humour or caprice; a female will sometimes take a spurt and treat her intimate friends very coldly, either from a fancied offence or a fancied superiority; to spout, on the other hand, is to send forth a stream of words in imitation of the stream of liquid, and is applied to those who affect to turn speakers, in whom there is commonly more sound than sense.

TO PLUNGE, DIVE.

Plunge is but a variation of pluck, pull, and the Latin pello to drive or force forward; dive is but a variation of dip, which, in under various forms, to be found in the northern languages.

One plunges sometimes in order to dive; but one may plunge without diving, and one may dive without plunging: to plunge is to dart head foremost into the water: to dive is to go to the bottom of the water, or towards it: it is a good practice for bathers to plunge into the water when they first go in, although it is not advisable for them to dive; ducks frequently dive into the water without ever plunging. Thus far they differ in their natural sense; but in the figurative application they differ more widely: to plunge, in this case is an act of rashness: to dive is an act of design; a young man hurried away by his passions will plunge into every extravagance when he comes into possession of his estate; 'The French plunged themselves into these calamities they suffer, to prevent themselves from settling into a British constitution.'—BURKE

People of a prying temper seek to dive into the secret of others;

How he did seem to dive into their hearts
With humble and familiar courtesy.

SHAKESPEARE.

WAVE, BILLOW, SURGE, BREAKER.

Wave, from the Saxon waegan, and German wiegen to weigh or rock, is applied to water in an undulating state; it is, therefore, the generic term, and the rest are specific terms;

The wave behind impels the wave before.—POPE.

Those waves which swell more than ordinarily are termed billows, which is derived from bulge or bilge, and German balg, the paunch or belly;

I saw him beat the billows under him,
And ride upon their backs.—SHAKESPEARE.

Those waves which rise higher than usual are termed surges, from the Latin surgo to rise;

He flies aloft, and with impetuous roar
Pursues the foaming surges to the shore.

DRYDEN.

Those waves which dash against the shore, or against vessels with more than ordinary force, are termed breakers;

Now on the mountain wave on high they ride,
Then downward plunge beneath th' involving tide,
Till one who seems in agony to strive
The whirling breakers heave on shore alive.

FALCONER.

BREEZE, GALE, BLAST, GUST, STORM, TEMPEST, HURRICANE.

All these words express the action of the wind, in different degrees and under different circumstances.

Breeze, in Italian brezza, is in all probability an onomatopoeia for that kind of wind peculiar to southern climates; gale is probably connected with call and yell, denoting a sonorous wind; blast, in German geblasen, participle of blasen, signifies properly the act of blowing, but by distinction it is employed for any strong effort of blowing; gust is immediately of ice landish origin, and expresses the phenomena which are characteristic of the northern climates; but in all probability it is a variation of gush, signifying a violent stream of wind; storm, in German sturm, from stören to put in commotion, like gust, describes the phenomenon of northern climates; tempest, in Latin tempestus, or tempus a time or season, describes that season or sort of weather which is most remarkable, but at the same time most frequent, in southern climates; hurricane has been introduced by the Spaniards into European languages from the Caribbee islands; where it describes that species of tempestuous wind, most frequent in the tropical climates.

A breeze is gentle; a gale is brisk, but steady; we have breezes in a calm summer's day: the mariner has favourable gales which keep the sails on the stretch;

Gradual sinks the breeze

Into a perfect calm.—THOMSON.

What happy gale

Blows you to Padua here from old Verona?

SHAKESPEARE.

A blast is impetuous; the exhalations of a trumpet, the breath of bellows, the sweep of a violent wind, are blasts. A gust is sudden and vehement; gusts of wind are sometimes so violent as to sweep every thing before them while they last;

As when fierce northern blasts from th' Alps descend,

From his firm roots with struggling gusts to rend

An aged sturdy oak, the rustling sound

Grows loud.—DENHAM.

Storm, tempest, and hurricane include other particulars besides wind.

A storm throws the whole atmosphere into commotion; it is a war of the elements, in which wind, rain, hail, and the like, conspire to disturb the heavens; tempest is a species of storm, which has also thunder and lightning to add to the confusion. Hurricane is a species of storm, which exceeds all the rest in violence and duration;

Through storms and tempests so the sailor drives,

While every element in combat strives;

Loud roars the thunder, fierce the lightning flies,

Winds wildly rage, and billows tear the skies.

SHIRLEY.

So where our wide Numidian wastes extend,

Sudden th' impetuous hurricanes descend,

Wheels through the air in circling eddies play,

Tear up the sands, and sweep whole plains away.

ADDISON.

Gust, storm, and tempest, which are applied figuratively, preserve their distinction in this sense. The passions are exposed to gusts and storms, to sudden bursts, or violent and continued agitations; the soul is exposed to tempests when agitated with violent and contending emotions;

Stay these sudden gusts of passion,

That hurry you away.—Rowe.

I burn, I burn! The storm that 's in my mind

Kindles my heart, like fires provok'd by wind.

LANDSDOWN.

All deaths, all tortures, in one pang combin'd,

Are gentle, to the tempest of my mind.—THOMSON.

TO HEAVE, SWELL.

Heave is used either transitively or intransitively, as a reflexive or a neuter verb; swell is used only as a neuter verb. Heave implies raising, and swell implies distension: they differ therefore very widely in sense, but they sometimes agree in application. The bosom is said both to heave and to swell; because it happens that the bosom swells by heaving; the waves are likewise said to heave themselves or to swell, in which there is a similar correspondence between the actions: otherwise most things which heave do not swell, and those which swell do not heave;

He heaves for breath, he staggers to and fro,

And clouds of issuing smoke his nostrils loudly blow.

DRYDEN.

Meantime the mountain billows to the clouds,

In dreadful tumult, swell'd surge above surge.

THOMSON.

TO LIFT, HEAVE, HOIST.

Lift is in all probability contracted from levatus participle of levo to lift, which comes from levis light, because what is light is easily borne up; heave, in Saxon heavian, German heben, &c. comes from the absolute participle ha, signifying high, because to heave is to set upon high; hoist, in French hausser, Low German hissen, is a variation from the same source as heave.

The idea of making high is common to all these words, but they differ in the objects and the circumstances of the action; we lift with or without an effort: we heave and hoist always with an effort; we lift a child up to let him see any thing more distinctly, workmen heave the stones or beams which are used in a building; sailors hoist the long boat into the water. To lift and hoist are transitive verbs; they require an agent and an object: heave is intransitive, it may have an inanimate object for an agent: a person lifts his hand to his head; when whales are killed, they are hoisted into vessels: the bosom heaves when it is oppressed with sorrow, the waves of the sea heave when they are agitated by the wind;

What god so daring in your aid to move,

Or lift his hand against the force of Jove?—POPE.

Murm'ring they move, as when old Ocean roars,

And heaves huge surges to the trembling shores.

POPE.

The reef enwrap'd, th' inserted knittles tied,

To hoist the shorten'd sail again they tried.

FALCONER.

TO LIFT, RAISE, ERECT, ELEVATE, EXALT.

Lift, v. To lift; raise, signifies to cause to rise; erect, in Latin erectus, participle of erigo, or e and rego, probably from the Greek ὀρέγω, signifies literally to extend or set forth in the height; elevate is a variation from the same source as lift; exalt comes from the Latin altus high, and the Hebrew alah to ascend, and signifies to cause to be high (v. High).

The idea of making one thing higher than another is common to these verbs, which differ in the circumstances of the action. To lift is to take off from the ground, or from any spot where it is supposed to be fixed; to raise and erect are to place in a higher position, while in contact with the ground: we lift up a stool; we raise a chair, by giving it longer legs; we erect a monument by heaping one stone on another;

Now rosy morn ascends the court of Jove,

Lifts up her light, and opens day above.—POPE.

Such a huge bulk as not twelve bards could raise,

Twelve starveling bards of these degenerate days.

POPE.

From their assistance happier walls expect,

Which, wand'ring long, at last thou shalt erect.

DRYDEN.

Whatever is to be carried is lifted; whatever is to be situated higher is to be raised; whatever is to be constructed above other objects is erected. A ladder is lifted upon the shoulders to be conveyed from one place to another; a standard ladder is raised against a building; a scaffolding is erected.

These terms are likewise employed in a moral acceptance; exalt and elevate are used in no other sense. Lift expresses figuratively the artificial action of setting aloft; as in the case of lifting a person into notice: to raise preserves the idea of making higher by the accession of wealth, honour, or power; as in the case of persons who are raised from beggary to a state of affluence: to erect retains its idea of artificially constructing, so as to produce a solid as well as lofty mass; as in the case of erecting a tribunal, erecting a system of spiritual dominion. A person cannot lift himself, but he may raise himself; individuals lift or raise up each other; but communities, or those only who are invested with power, have the opportunity of erecting.

To lift is seldom used in a good sense; to raise is used in a good or an indifferent sense: to elevate and exalt are always used in the best sense. A person is seldom lifted up for any good purpose, or from any merit in himself; it is commonly to suit the ends of party that people are lifted into notice, or lifted into office; on the same ground, if a person is lifted up in his own imagination, it is only his pride which gives him the elevation; 'Our successes have been great, and our hearts have been much lifted up by them, so that we have reason to humble ourselves.'—ATTENBURY. A person may be raised for his merits, or raise himself by his industry, in both which cases he is entitled to esteem; or he may with propriety be raised in the estimation of himself or others;

Rais'd in his mind the Trojan hero stood,
And long'd to break from out his ambient cloud.

DRYDEN.

One is elevated by circumstances, but still more so by one's character and moral qualities; one is rarely exalted but by means of superiour endowments; 'Prudence operates on life in the same manner as rules on composition; it produces vigilance rather than elevation.'—JOHNSON.

A creature of a more exalted kind
Was wanting yet, and then was man design'd.

DRYDEN.

To elevate may be the act of individuals for themselves; to exalt must be the act of others. There are some to whom elevation of rank is due, and others who require no adventitious circumstances to elevate them; the world have always agreed to exalt great power, great wisdom, and great genius.

HIGH, TALL, LOFTY.

High, in German hoch, &c. comes in all probability from the Hebrew יָלַח, the king of the Amalekites, so called on account of his size, and is connected with the Latin gigas; tall, in Welch tal, is derived by Davis from the Hebrew תָּלַל to elevate; lofty is doubtless derived from lift, and that from the Latin levatus raised.

High is the term in most general use, which expresses likewise in the most unqualified manner to express the idea of extension upwards, which is common to them all. Whatever is tall and lofty is high, but every thing is not tall or lofty which is high. Tall and lofty both designate a more than ordinary degree of height; but tall is peculiarly applicable to what shoots up or stands up in a perpendicular direction: while lofty is said of that which is extended in breadth as well as in height; that which is lifted up or raised by an accretion of matter or an expansion in the air. By this rule we say that a house is high, a chimney tall, a room lofty.

Trees are in general said to be high which exceed the ordinary standard of height; they are opposed to the low;

High at their head he saw the chief appear,
And bold Merion to excite their rear.—POPE.

A poplar is said to be tall, not only from its exceeding other trees in height, but from its perpendicular and spiral manner of growing is opposed to that which is bulky;

Prostrate on earth their beauteous bodies lay,
Like mountain firs, as tall and straight as they.

POPE.

A man and a horse are likewise said to be tall; but a hedge, a desk, and other common objects, are high. A hill is high, but a mountain is lofty; churches are in general high, but the steeples or the domes of cathedrals are lofty, and their spires are tall;

E'en now, O king! 't is giv'n thee to destroy
The lofty towers of wide-extended Troy.—POPE.

With the high is associated no idea of what is striking; but the tall is coupled with the aspiring or that which strives to out-top: the lofty is always coupled with the grand, and that which commands admiration.

High and lofty have a moral acceptance, but tall is taken in the natural sense only: high and lofty are applied to persons or what is personal, with the same difference in degree as before: a lofty title or lofty pretension conveys more than a high title or a high pretension. Men of high rank should have high ideas of virtue and personal dignity, and keep themselves clear from every thing low and mean;

When you are tried in scandal's court,
Stand high in honour, wealth, or wit,
All others who inferior sit
Conceive themselves in conscience bound
To join and drag you to the ground.—SWIFT

A lofty ambition often soars too high to serve the purpose of its possessor, whose fall is the greater when he finds himself compelled to descend;

Without thee, nothing lofty can I sing,
Come, then, and with thyself thy genius bring.
DRYDEN.

TO HEIGHTEN, RAISE, AGGRAVATE.

To heighten is to make higher (v. Haughty). To raise is to cause to rise (v. To arise). To aggravate (v. To aggravate) is to make heavy. Heighten refers more to the result of the action of making higher; raise to the mode: we heighten a house by raising the roof; as raising conveys the idea of setting up aloft, which is not included in the word heighten; 'Purity and virtue heighten all the powers of fruition.'—BLAIR. On the same ground a headdress may be said to be heightened, which is made higher than it was before; and a chair or a table is raised that is set upon something else; but in speaking of a wall, we may say, that it is either heightened or raised, because the operation and result must in both cases be the same; 'I would have our conceptions raised by the dignity of thought and sublimity of expression, rather than by a train of robes or a plume of feathers.'—ADDISON. In the improper sense of these terms they preserve a similar distinction: we heighten the value of a thing; we raise its price: we heighten the grandeur of an object; we raise a family.

Heighten and aggravate have connexion with each other only in application to offences: the enormity of an offence is heightened, the guilt of the offender is aggravated by particular circumstances. The horrors of a murder are heightened by being committed in the dead of the night; the guilt of the perpetrator is aggravated by the addition of ingratitude to murder, 'The counsels of pusillanimity are very rarely put off, while they are always sure to aggravate the evils from which they would fly.'—BURKE.

TO ANIMATE, INSPIRE, ENLIVEN, CHEER, EXHILARATE.

To animate is to give life (v. To encourage); inspire, in French inspirer, Latin inspirare, compounded of in and spiro, signifies to breathe life or spirit into any one; enliven, from en or in and liven, has the same sense; cheer, in French chère, Flemish cière the countenance, Greek χαρά joy, signifies the giving joy or spirit; exhilarate, in Latin exhilaratus, participle of exhilaro, from hilaris, Greek ἡράς joyful, Hebrew עָלַל to exult or leap for joy, signifies to make glad.

Animate and inspire imply the communication of the vital or mental spark; enliven, cheer, and exhilarate signify actions on the mind or body. To be animated, in its physical sense, is simply to receive the first spark of animal life in however small a degree; for there are animated beings in the world possessing the vital power in an infinite variety of degrees and forms;

Through subterranean cells
Where searching sunbeams scarce can find a way,
Earth animated heaves.—THOMSON.

To be animated in the moral sense is to receive the smallest portion of the sentient or thinking faculty; which is equally varied in thinking beings: animation therefore never conveys the idea of receiving any strong degree of either physical or moral feeling; 'The more to animate the people, he stood on high, from whence he might best be heard, and cried unto them with a loud voice.'—KNOLLES. To inspire, on the contrary, expresses the communication of a strong moral sentiment or passion: hence to animate with courage is a less forcible expression than to inspire with courage: we likewise speak of inspiring with emulation or a thirst for knowledge; not of animating with emulation or a thirst for knowledge;

Each gentle breast with kindly warmth she moves,
Inspires new flames, revives extinguished loves.
DRYDEN ON MAY

To enliven respects the mind; cheer relates to the heart; exhilarate regards the spirits, both animal and mental, they all denote an action on the frame by the communication of pleasurable emotions: the mind is enlivened by contemplating the scenes of nature; the imagination is enlivened by the reading of poetry;

To grace each subject with enlivening wit.
ADDISON.

The benevolent heart is cheered by witnessing the happiness of others; 'The creation is a perpetual feast to a good man; every thing he sees cheers and delights him.'—ADDISON. The spirits are exhilarated by the convivialities of social life;

Nor rural sights alone, but rural sounds
Exhilarate the spirit.—COWPER.

Conversation enlivens society; the conversation of a kind and considerate friend cheers the drooping spirits in the moments of trouble; unexpected good news is apt to exhilarate the spirits.

ANIMATION, LIFE, VIVACITY, SPIRIT.

Animation and life do not differ either in sense or application, but the latter is more in familiar use. They express either the particular or general state of the mind; vivacity and spirit express only the habitual nature and state of the feelings.

A person of no animation is divested of the distinguishing characteristic of his nature, which is mind; a person of no vivacity is a dull companion; a person of no spirit is unfit to associate with others.

A person with animation takes an interest in every thing; a vivacious man catches at every thing that is pleasant and interesting; a spirited man enters into plans, makes great exertions, and disregards difficulties.

A speaker may address his audience with more or less animation according to the disposition in which he finds it; 'The British have a lively, animated aspect.'—STEELE. A painter may be said by his skill to throw life into his picture;

The very dead creation from thy touch
Assumes a mimic life.—THOMSON.

A man of a vivacious temper diffuses his vivacity into all his words and actions; 'His vivacity is seen in doing all the offices of life, with readiness of spirit, and propriety in the manner of doing them.'—STEELE. A man of spirit suits his measures to the exigency of his circumstances;

Farewell the big war,
The spirit-stirring drum, th' ear-piercing fife.
SHAKESPEARE.

LIFELESS, DEAD, INANIMATE.

Lifeless and dead suppose the absence of life where it has once been; inanimate supposes its absence where it has never been; a person is said to be lifeless or dead from whom life has departed; the material world consists of objects which are by nature inanimate; 'We may in some sort be said to have a society even with the inanimate world.'—BURKE. Lifeless is negative; it signifies simply without life, or the vital spark; dead is positive; it denotes an actual and perfect change in the object. We may speak of a lifeless corpse, when speaking of a body which sinks from a state of animation into that of inanimation;

Nor can his lifeless nostril please,
With the once ravishing smell.—COWLEY.

We speak of dead bodies to designate such as have undergone an entire change; 'A brute and a man are another thing, when they are alive and when they are dead.'—HALES. A person, therefore, in whom animation is suspended, is, for the time being, lifeless, in appearance at least, although we should not say dead.

In the moral acceptance, lifeless and inanimate respect the spirits; dead respects the moral feeling. A person is said to be lifeless who has lost the spirits which he once had; he is said to be inanimate when he is naturally wanting in spirits; a person who is lifeless is unfitted for enjoyment; he who is dead to moral sentiment is totally bereft of the essential properties of his nature. The epithet dead is sometimes applied in the sense of having the stillness of death;

How dead the eternal kingdom lies!—THOMSON

TO CHEER, ENCOURAGE, COMFORT.

Cheer has the same signification as given under the head of To animate; encourage, compounded of en and courage, signifies to inspire with courage; comfort, compounded of com or cum, and fortis strong, signifies to invigorate or strengthen.

To cheer regards the spirits; to encourage the resolution: the sad require to be cheered; the timid to be encouraged. Mirthful company is suited to cheer those who labour under any depression; 'Every eye bestows the cheering look of approbation upon the humble man.'—CUMBERLAND. The prospect of success encourages those who have any object to obtain; 'Complaisance produces good nature and mutual benevolence, encourages the timorous, soothes the turbulent, humanizes the fierce, and distinguishes a society of civilized persons from savages.'—ADDISON.

To cheer and comfort have both regard to the spirits, but the latter differs in degree and manner: to cheer expresses more than to comfort; the former signifying to produce a lively sentiment, the latter to lessen or remove a painful one: we are cheered in the moments of despondency, whether from real or imaginary causes; we are comforted in the hour of distress;

Sleep seldom visits sorrow,
When it does, it is a comforter.—SHAKESPEARE

Cheering is mostly effected by the discourse of others; comforting is effected by the actions, as well as the words, of others. Nothing tends more to cheer the drooping soul than endearing expressions of tenderness from those we love; the most effectual means of comforting the poor and afflicted, is by relieving their wants; 'There are writers of great distinction who have made it an argument for providence, that the whole earth is covered with green, rather than with any other colour, as being such a right mixture of light and shade, that comforts and strengthens the eye, instead of weakening or grieving it.'—ADDISON. The voice of the benevolent man is cheering to the aching heart; his looks encourage the sufferer to disclose his griefs; his hand is open to administer relief and comfort.

TO CONSOLE, SOLACE, COMFORT

Console and solace are derived from the same source, in French consoler, Latin consolor and solatum, possibly from solum the ground, which nourishes all things; to comfort signifies to afford comfort (v. To cheer).

Console and solace denote the relieving of pain; comfort marks both the communication of positive pleasure and the relief of pain. We console others with words; we console or solace ourselves with reflections; we comfort by words or deeds. Console is used on more important occasions than solace. We console our friends when they meet with afflictions; we solace ourselves when we meet with disasters; we comfort those who stand in need of comfort.

The greatest consolation which we can enjoy on the death of our friends is derived from the hope that they have exchanged a state of imperfection and sorrow for one that is full of pure and unmixed felicity; 'In afflictions men generally draw their consolation out of books of morality, which indeed are of great use to fortify and strengthen the mind against the impressions of sorrow.'—ADDISON. It is no small solace to us in the midst of all our troubles, to consider that they are not so bad as that they might not have been worse; 'He that undergoes the fatigue of labour must solace his weariness with the contemplation of its reward.'—JOHNSON. The comforts which a person enjoys may be considerably enhanced by the comparison with what he has formerly suffered; 'If our afflictions are light, we shall be comforted by the comparison we make between ourselves and our fellow-sufferers.'—ADDISON.

COMFORT, PLEASURE.

Comfort (v. To cheer), that genuine English word, describes what England only affords: we may find pleasure in every country; but comfort is to be found in our own country only: the grand feature in comfort is substantiality; in that of pleasure is warmth. Pleasure is quickly succeeded by pain; it is the lot of humanity that to every pleasure there should be an alloy: comfort is that portion of pleasure which seems to lie exempt from this disadvantage; it is the most durable sort of pleasure.

Comfort must be sought for at home; pleasure is pursued abroad: comfort depends upon a thousand nameless trifles which daily arise; it is the relief of a pain, the heightening of a gratification, the supply of a want, or the removal of an inconvenience;

Thy growing virtues justified my cares,
And promis'd comfort to my silver hairs.—POPE.

Pleasure is the companion of luxury and abundance; it dwells in the palaces of the rich and the abodes of the voluptuary: but comfort is within the reach of the poorest, and the portion of those who know how to husband their means, and to adapt their enjoyments to their habits and circumstances in life. Comfort is less than pleasure in the detail; it is more than pleasure in the aggregate.

SYMPATHY, COMPASSION, COMMISERATION, CONDOLENCE.

Sympathy, from the Greek σὺν or σύν with, and πάθος feeling, has the literal meaning of fellow-feeling, that is, a kindred or like feeling, or feeling in comparison with another. Compassion, from com and patior to suffer; commiseration, from the Latin com and miseria misery; condolence, from the Latin con and doleo to grieve, signify a like suffering, or a suffering in company. Hence it is obvious, that according to the derivation of the words sympathy may be said either of pleasure or pain, the rest only of that which is painful. Sympathy preserves its original meaning in its application, for we laugh or cry by sympathy; this may, however, be only a merely physical affection; 'You are not young, no more am I; go to, then, there's sympathy; you are merry, so am I; ha! ha! then there's more sympathy; you love sack, and so do I; would you!'—SHAKESPEARE. Hence it is that the word sympathy may be taken for a secret alliance or kindred feeling between two minds or between the mind and other objects;

Or sympathy or some connatural force,
Powerful at greatest distance to unite,
With secret amity, things of like kind,
By secretest conveyance.—MILTON.

That mind and body often sympathize
Is plain; such is this union nature ties.—JENYNS.

But sympathy when taken in a sense the most closely allied to compassion, does not go beyond the feeling another's pleasures or pains; we may sympathize with others without essentially serving them; 'Their countrymen were particularly attentive to all their story, and sympathized with their heroes in all their adventures.'—ADDISON. Compassion, on the other hand, not only a moral, but an active feeling; if we feel compassion, we naturally turn our thoughts towards relieving the object;

'Among those whom honest lives can recommend,
Our justice more compassion should extend.

DENHAM.

Compassion is awakened by any sort of suffering, but particularly those which are attributable to misfortune; 'The good-natured man is apt to be moved with compassion for those misfortunes and infirmities, which another would turn into ridicule.'—ADDISON. Commiseration is a stronger feeling awakened by deep distress, above all by the troubles which people bring on themselves; a criminal going to suffer the penalty of the law demands commiseration;

She indeed weeping; and her lovely plight
Immoveable, till peace obtain'd from fault
Acknowledg'd and deplor'd, in Adam wrought
Commiseration.—MILTON.

And the calamities of human life equally call for commiseration;

Then must we those who groan beneath the weight
Of age, disease, or want, commiserate?—DENHAM.

Compassion may be awakened in the minds of persons of very unequal condition; commiseration supposes a certain distance, at least in the external condition of the parties; he who commiserates being set above the chance of falling into the calamities of him who is commiserated: whence it is represented as the feeling which our wretchedness excites in the Supreme Being. Condolence supposes an entire equality; it excludes every thing but what flows out of the courtesy and good-will of one friend to another, and is called forth by events which the parties on either side are equally exposed to; we condole with a person on the death of a relative; 'Why should I think that all that devout multitude, which so lately cried Hosanna in the streets, did not also bear their part in these public condolences (on the crucifixion of our Saviour).'
—HALL.

Rather than all must suffer, some must die,
Yet nature must condole their misery.—DENHAM

GRACIOUS, MERCIFUL, KIND.

Gracious, when compared to merciful, is used only in the spiritual sense; the latter is applicable to the conduct of man as well as of the Deity.

Grace is exerted in doing good to an object that has merited the contrary; mercy is exerted in withholding the evil which has been merited. God is gracious to his creatures in affording them not only an opportunity to address him, but every encouragement to lay open their wants to him; their unworthiness and sinfulness are not made impediments of access to him. God is merciful to the vilest of sinners, and lends an ear to the smallest breath of repentance; in the moment of executing vengeance he stops his arm at the voice of supplication: he expects the same mercy to be extended by man towards his offending brother.

Grace, in the lofty sense in which it is here admitted, cannot with propriety be made the attribute of any human being, however elevated his rank: nothing short of infinite wisdom as well as goodness can be supposed capable of doing good to offenders without producing ultimate evil;

He heard my vows, and graciously decreed
My grounds to be restor'd, my former flocks to feed.
—DRYDEN.

Were a king to attempt any display of grace by bestowing favours on criminals, his conduct would be highly injurious to the interests of society; but when we speak of the Almighty as dispensing his goods to sinners, and even courting them by every act of endearment to lay aside their sins, we clearly perceive that this difference arises from the infinite disparity between him and us; which makes that "his ways are not our ways, nor are his thoughts our thoughts." I am inclined therefore to think that in our language we have made a peculiarly just distinction between grace and mercy, by confining the former to the acts of the Almighty, and applying the latter indiscriminately to both; for it is obvious that mercy as far as it respects the suspension of punishment, lies altogether within the reach of human discretion;

He that's merciful
Unto the bad is cruel to the good.—RANDOLPH.

Gracious, when compared with kind, differs principally as to the station of the persons to whom it is applied. Gracious is altogether confined to superiors; kind is indiscriminately employed for superiors and equals: a king gives a gracious reception to the nobles who are presented to him; one friend gives a kind reception to another by whom he is visited. Gracious is a term in peculiar use at court, and among princes; it necessarily supposes a voluntary descent from a lofty station, to put oneself, for the time being, upon a level with those to whom one speaks: it comprehends, therefore, condescension in manner, affability in address; 'So gracious hath God been to us, that he hath made those things to be our duty which naturally tend to our felicity.'—TILLOTSON. Kindness is a domestic virtue: it is found mostly among those who have not so much ceremonial to dispense with; it is the display of our good-will not only in the manner, but in the action itself; it is not confined to the tone of the voice, the gesture of the body, or the mode of expression;

but extends to actual services in the closest relations of society; a master is kind to his servants in the time of their sickness; friends who are kind to one another have perpetual opportunities of displaying their kindness in various little offices;

Love! that would all men just and temp'rate make,
Kind to themselves and others for his sake.

WALLER.

PITY, COMPASSION.

The pain which one feels at the distresses of another is the idea that is common to the signification of both these terms, but they differ in the object that causes the distress. Pity, which is probably changed from piety, is excited principally by the weakness or degraded condition of the subject: compassion (v. Sympathy) by his uncontrollable and inevitable misfortunes. We pity a man of a weak understanding who exposes his weakness: we compassionate the man who is reduced to a state of beggary and want. Pity is kindly extended by those in higher condition to such as are humble in their outward circumstances; the poor are at all times deserving of pity when their poverty is not the positive fruit of vice;

Others extended naked on the floor,
Exil'd from human pity here they lie,
And know no end of misery till they die.

POMFRET.

Compassion is a sentiment which extends to persons in all conditions; the good Samaritan had compassion on the traveller who fell among thieves;

His fate compassion in the victor bred;
Stern as he was, he yet rever'd the dead.—POPE.

Pity, though a tender sentiment, is so closely allied to contempt, that an ingenuous mind is always loath to be the subject of it, since it can never be awakened but by some circumstances of inferiority; it hurts the honest pride of a man to reflect that he can excite no interest but by provoking a comparison to his own disadvantage: on the other hand, such is the general infirmity of our natures, and such our exposure to the casualties of human life, that compassion is a pure and delightful sentiment, that is reciprocally bestowed and acknowledged by all with equal satisfaction.

PITY, MERCY.

The feelings we indulge, and the conduct we adopt, towards others who suffer for their demerits, is the common idea which renders these terms synonymous; but pity lays hold of those circumstances which do not affect the moral character, or which diminish the culpability of the individual: mercy lays hold of those external circumstances which may diminish punishment. Pity is often a sentiment unaccompanied with action; mercy is often a mode of action unaccompanied with sentiment: we have or take pity upon a person, but we show mercy to a person. Pity is bestowed by men in their domestic and private capacity; mercy is shown in the exercise of power: a master has pity upon his offending servant by passing over his offences, and affording him the opportunity of amendment, or an individual may feel a sentiment towards another whom he thinks in a degraded situation.

I pity from my soul unhappy men,
Compell'd by want to prostitute their pen.

ROSCOMMON.

The magistrate shows mercy to a criminal by abridging his punishment; 'Examples of justice must be made for terror to some; examples of mercy for comfort to others; the one procures fear, and the other love.'—BACON. Pity lies in the breast of an individual, and may be bestowed at his discretion: mercy is restricted by the rules of civil society; it must not interfere with the administration of justice. Young offenders call for great pity, as their offences are often the fruit of inexperience and bad example, rather than of depravity: mercy is an imperative duty in those who have the power of inflicting punishment, particularly in cases where life and death are concerned.

Pity and mercy are likewise applied to the brute creation with a similar distinction: pity shows itself in relieving real misery, and in lightening burdens; mercy is displayed in the measure of pain which one inflicts. One takes pity on a poor ass to whom one gives fodder to relieve hunger; 'An ant dropped into the water; a wood-pigeon took pity on her, and threw her a little bough.'—L'ESTRANGE. One shows a brute mercy by abstaining to lay heavy stripes upon its back;

Cowards are cruel, but the brave
Love mercy, and delight to save.—GAY.

These terms are moreover applicable to the Deity, in regard to his creatures, particularly man. God takes pity on us as entire dependants upon him: he extends his mercy towards us as offenders against him: he shows his pity by relieving our wants; he shows his mercy by forgiving our sins.

PITIABLE, PITEOUS, PITIFUL.

These three epithets drawn from the same word have shades of difference in sense and application; pitiable signifies deserving of pity; piteous, moving pity; pitiful, full of that which awakens pity: a condition is pitiable which is so distressing as to call forth pity; a cry is piteous which indicates such distress as can excite pity; a conduct is pitiful which marks a character entitled to pity.

The first of these terms is taken in the best sense of the term pity; the last two in its unfavourable sense: what is pitiable in a person is independent of any thing in himself; circumstances have rendered him pitiable; 'Is it then impossible that a man may be found who without criminal ill intention, or pitiable absurdity, shall prefer a mixed government to either of the extremes?'—BURKE. What is piteous and pitiful in a man arises from the helplessness and imbecility or worthlessness of his character; the former respects that which is weak; the latter that which is worthless in him: when a poor creature makes piteous moans, it indicates his incapacity to help himself as he ought to do out of his troubles, or at least his impatience under suffering;

I have in view, calling to mind with heed
Part of our sentence, that thy seed shall bruise
The serpent's head; piteous amends, unless
Be meant, whom I conjecture, our grand foe.

MILTON.

When a man of rank has recourse to pitiful shifts to gain his ends, he betrays the innate meanness of his soul; 'Bacon wrote a pitiful letter to King James I not long before his death.'—HOWELL.

CLEMENCY, LENITY, MERCY.

Clemency is in Latin clementia, signifying mildness; lenity, in Latin lenitas, comes from lenis soft, or lavis smooth, and the Greek λεῖος mild; mercy, in Latin misericordia, compounded of miseria and cordis, i. e. affliction of the heart, signifies the pain produced by observing the pain of others.

Clemency and lenity are employed only towards offenders; mercy towards all who are in trouble, whether from their own fault, or any other cause.

Clemency lies in the disposition; lenity and mercy in the act; the former as respects superiors in general, the latter in regard to those who are invested with civil power: a monarch displays his clemency by showing mercy; a master shows lenity by not inflicting punishment where it is deserved.

Clemency is arbitrary on the part of the dispenser, flowing from his will independent of the object on whom it is bestowed;

We wretched Trojans, toss'd on ev'ry shore,
From sea to sea, thy clemency implore;
Forbid the fires our shipping to deface,
Receive th' unhappy fugitives to grace.—DRYDEN.

Lenity and mercy are discretionary, they always have regard to the object and the nature of the offence, or misfortunes; lenity therefore often serves the purposes of discipline, and mercy those of justice by forgiveness, instead of punishment; but clemency defeats its end by forbearing to punish where it is needful; 'The King (Charles II.) with lenity of which the world has had perhaps no other example, declined to be the judge or avenger of his own or his father's wrongs.'—JOHNSON.

The gods (if gods to goodness are inclin'd,
If acts of mercy touch their heav'nly mind),
And more than all the gods, your gen'rous heart,
Conscious of worth, requite its own desert.

DRYDEN.

A mild master who shows clemency to a faithless servant by not bringing him to justice, often throws a worthless wretch upon the public to commit more atrocious depredations. A well-timed lenity sometimes recalls an offender to himself, and brings him back to good order. Upon this principle, the English constitution has wisely left in the hands of the monarch the discretionary power of showing mercy in all cases that do not demand the utmost rigour of the law.

SOFT, MILD, GENTLE, MEEK.

Soft, in Saxon soft, German sanft, comes most probably from the Saxon sib, Gothic sef, Hebrew שָׁנָה rest; mild, in Saxon milde, German milde, &c. Latin mollis, Greek μέλις, comes from μέλι honey; gentle, v. Gentle; meek, like the Latin mitis, may in all probability come from the Greek μέτω to makeless, signifying to make one's self small, to be humble.

Soft and mild are employed both in the proper and the improper application; meek only in the moral application: soft is opposed to the hard; mild to the sharp or strong. All bodies are said to be soft which yield easily to the touch or pressure, as a soft bed, the soft earth, soft fruit;

Soft stillness, and the night,
Become the touches of sweet harmony.

SHAKESPEARE.

Some bodies are said to be mild which act weakly, but pleasantly, on the taste, as mild fruit, or a mild cheese; or on the feelings, as mild weather;

Sylvia's like autumn ripe, yet mild as May,
More bright than noon, yet fresh as early day.

POPE.

Some things are said to be gentle, which in their nature might be boisterous as the winds;

As when the woods by gentle winds are stirr'd.

DRYDEN.

In the improper application, soft, mild, and gentle may be applied to that which acts weakly upon others, or is easily acted upon by others; meek is said of that only which is acted upon easily by others: in this sense they are all employed as epithets, to designate either the person, or that which is personal.

In the sense of acting weakly, but pleasantly, on others, soft, mild, and gentle are applied to the same objects, but with a slight distinction in the sense: the voice of a person is either soft or mild; it is naturally soft, it is purposely made mild; a soft voice strikes agreeably upon the ear; a mild voice, when assumed by those who have authority, dispels all fears in the minds of inferiours. A person moves either softly or gently, but in the first case he moves with but little noise, in the second he moves with a slow pace. It is necessary to go softly in the chamber of the sick, that they may not be disturbed; it is necessary for a sick person to move gently, when he first attempts to get abroad after his confinement, or at least his impatience under suffering;

Pray you tread softly, that the blind mole may not Hear a foot fall.—SHAKESPEARE.

Close at mine ear one call'd me forth to walk,
With gentle voice.—MILTON.

To tread softly is an art which is acquired from the dancing-master; to go gently is a voluntary act: we may go a gentle or a quick pace at pleasure. Words are either soft, mild, or gentle: a soft word falls lightly upon the person to whom it is addressed; it does not excite any angry sentiment; the proverb says, "A soft answer turneth away wrath." A reproof is mild when it falls easily from the lips of one who has power to oppress and wound the feelings; a censure, an admonition, or a hint, is gentle, which bears indirectly on the offender, and does not expose the whole of his infirmity to view: a kind father always tries the efficacy of mild reproofs; a prudent friend will always try to correct our errors by gentle remonstrances.

In like manner we say that punishments are mild which inflict but a small portion of pain; they are opposed to those which are severe: those means of correction are gentle, which are opposed to those that are violent. It requires discretion to know how to inflict punishment with the due proportion of mildness and severity; it will be fruitless to adopt gentle means of correction, when there is not a power of resorting to those which are violent in case of necessity. Persons, or their manners, are termed soft, mild, and gentle, but still with similar distinctions: a soft address, a soft air, and the like, are becoming or not, according to the sex: in that which is denominated the softer sex, these qualities of softness are characteristick excellencies; but even in this sex they may degenerate, by their excess, into insipidity: and in the male sex they are compatible only in a small degree with manly firmness of carriage. Mild manners are peculiarly becoming in superiours, whereby they win the love and esteem of those who are in inferior stations;

Nothing reserv'd or sullen was to see,
But sweet regards, and pleasing sanctity;
Mild was his accent, and his action free.

DRYDEN.

Gentle manners are becoming in all persons who take a part in social life: gentleness is, in fact, that due medium of softness which is alike suitable to both sexes, and which it is the object of polite education to produce; 'He had such a gentle method of reproving their faults, that they were not so much afraid as ashamed to repeat them.'—ATTERBURY.

In the sense of being acted on easily, the disposition is said to be not only soft, mild, and gentle, but also meek: softness of disposition and character is an in firmity both in the male and female, but particularly in the former; it is altogether incompatible with that steadiness and uniformity of conduct which is requisite for every man who has an independent part to act in life;

However soft within themselves they are,
To you they will be valiant by despair.

DRYDEN.

A man of a soft disposition often yields to the entreaties of others, and does that which his judgement condemns; mildness of disposition unfits a man altogether for command, and is to be clearly distinguished from that mildness of conduct which is founded on principle;

If that mild and gentle god thou be,
Who dost mankind below with pity see.

DRYDEN.

Gentleness, as a part of the character, is not so much to be recommended as gentleness from habit; human life contains so much in itself that is rough, that the gentle disposition is unable to make that resistance which is requisite for the purposes of self defence.

Still she retains
Her maiden gentleness, and oft at eve
Visits the herds.—MILTON.

Meekness is a Christian virtue forcibly recommended to our practice by the example and precepts of our blessed Saviour; it consists not only in an unresisting, but a forgiving temper, a temper that is unruffled by injuries and provocations: it is, however, an infirmity, if it springs from a want of spirit, or an unconsciousness of what is due to ourselves: meekness, therefore, as a natural temper, sinks into meanness and servility; but when, as an acquired temper, built upon principle, and moulded into a habit of the mind, it is the grand distinctive characteristic of the religion we profess.

Gentle and meek are likewise applied to animals; the former to designate that easy flow of spirits which fits them for being guided in their movements, and the latter to mark that passive temper, that submits to every kind of treatment, however harsh, without an indication even of displeasure. A horse is gentle, as opposed to one that is spirited; the former is devoid of that impetus in himself to move, which renders the other ungovernable: the lamb is a pattern of meekness, and yields to the knife of the butcher without a struggle or a groan;

How meek, how patient, the mild creature lies,
What softness in its melancholy face,
What dumb-complaining innocence appears!

THOMSON.

GENTLE, TAME.

Gentleness lies rather in the natural disposition; tameness is the effect either of art or circumstances. Any unbroken horse may be gentle, but not tame: a horse that is broken in will be tame, but not always gentle.

Gentle (v. Gentel) signifies literally well-born, and is opposed either to the fierce or the rude; 'Gentleness and gentility are the same thing, and if they are not the same words, they come from one and the same original, from whence likewise is deduced the word gentleman.'—PEGGE. Tame, in German zähm, from zähm a bridle, signifies literally curbed or kept under, and is opposed either to the wild or the spirited.

Animals are in general said to be gentle which show a disposition to associate with man, and conform to his will: they are said to be tame, if either by compulsion or habit they are brought to mix with human society. Of the first description there are individuals in almost every species which are more or less entitled to the name of gentle; of the latter description are many species, as the dog, the sheep, the hen, and the like;

This said, the hoary king no longer staid,
But on his car the slaughter'd victims laid;
Then seiz'd the reins, his gentle steeds to guide,
And drove to Troy, Antenor at his side.—POPE.
For Orpheus' lute could soften steel and stone,
Make tigers tame, and huge Leviathans.

SHAKESPEARE.

In the moral application gentle is always employed in the good, and tame in the bad sense: a gentle spirit needs no control; it amalgamates freely with the will of another: a tame spirit is without any will of its own; it is alive to nothing but submission; it is perfectly consistent with our natural liberty to have gentleness, but tameness is the accompaniment of slavery. The same distinction marks the use of these words when applied to the outward conduct or the language: gentle bespeaks something positively good; tame bespeaks the want of an essential good: the former is allied to the kind, the latter to the abject and mean qualities which naturally flow from the compression or destruction of energy and will in the agent. A gentle expression is devoid of all acrimony, and serves to turn away wrath: a tame expression is devoid of all force or energy, and ill calculated to inspire the mind with any feeling whatever. In giving counsel to an irritable and conceited temper, it is necessary to be gentle: tame expressions are nowhere such striking deformities as in a poem or an oration; 'Gentleness stands opposed, not to the most determined regard to virtue and truth, but to harshness and severity, to pride and arrogance.'—BLAIR. 'Though all wanton provocations, and contemptuous insolence, are to be diligently avoided, there is no less danger in timid compliance and tame resignation.'—JOHNSON.

DOCILE, TRACTABLE, DUCTILE.

Docile, in Latin docilis, from doceo to teach, is the Latin term for ready to be taught; tractable, from the Latin trahō to draw, signifies ready to be drawn; and ductile, from duco to lead, ready to be led.

The idea of submitting to the directions of another is comprehended in the signification of all these terms: docility marks the disposition to conform our actions in all particulars to the will of another, and lies altogether in the will; tractability and ductility are modes of docility, the former in regard to the conduct, the latter in regard to the principles and sentiments; docility is in general applied to the ordinary actions of the life, where simply the will is concerned; 'The Persians are not wholly void of martial spirit; and if they are not naturally brave, they are at least extremely docile, and might with proper discipline be made excellent soldiers.'—SIR WM. JONES. Tractability is applicable to points of conduct in which the judgement is concerned; ductility to matters in which the character is formed: a child ought to be docile with its parents at all times. A person ought to be tractable when acting under the direction of his superior: 'The people without being servile, must be tractable.'—BURKE. A young person ought to be ductile to imbine good principles: the want of docility may spring from a defect in the disposition: the want of tractableness may spring either from a defect in the temper, or from self-conceit; the want of ductility lies altogether in a natural stubbornness of character: docility, being altogether independent of the judgement, is applicable to the brutes as well as to men;

Their reindeer form their riches; these their tents,
Their robes, their beds, and all their homely wealth,
Supply their wholesome fare, and cheerful cups;
Obscure as at their call, the docile tribe
Yield to the sledge their necks.—THOMSON.

Tractableness and ductility are applicable mostly to thinking and rational objects only, though sometimes extended to inanimate or moral objects: the ox is a docile animal; the humble are tractable; youth is ductile; 'The will was then (before the fall) ductile and pliant to all the motions of right reason.'—SOUTH

FLEXIBLE, PLIABLE, PLIANT, SUPPLE.

Flexible, in Latin flexibilis, from flecto to bend, signifies able to be bent; pliable signifies able to be plied or folded; pliant, plying, bending, or folding; supple, in French souple, from the intensive syllable sub and ply, signifies very pliable.

* Flexible is used in a natural or moral sense; pliable in the familiar and natural sense only; pliant in the higher and moral application only: what can be bent in any degree as a stick is flexible; what can be bent as wax, or folded like cloth, is pliable. Supple, whether in a proper or a figurative sense, is an excess of pliability; what can be bent backward and forward, like osier twig, is supple.

In the moral application, flexible is indefinite both in degree and application; it may be greater or less in point of degree: whereas pliant supposes a great degree of pliability; and suppleness, a great degree of pliancy or pliability: it applies likewise to the outward actions, to the temper, the resolution, or the principles; but pliancy is applied to the principles, or the conduct dependent upon those principles; suppleness to the outward actions and behaviour only. A temper is flexible which yields to the entreaties of others; the person or character is pliant when it is formed or moulded easily at the will of another; a person is supple who makes his actions and his manners bend according to the varying humours of another: the first belongs to one in a superior station who yields to the wishes of the applicant; the latter two belong to equals or inferiors who yield to the influence of others.

Flexibility may be either good or bad, according to circumstances; when it shortens the duration of resentments it produces a happy effect; but flexibility is not a respectable trait in a master or a judge, who ought to be guided by higher motives than what the momentary impulse of feeling suggests: pliancy is very commendable in youth, when it leads them to yield to the counsels of the aged and experienced; but it may sometimes make young men the more easy victims to the seductions of the artful and vicious: suppleness is in no case good, for it is flexibility either in indifferent matters, or such as are expressly bad. A good-natured man is flexible; a weak and thoughtless man is pliant; a parasite is supple.

Flexibility is frequently a weakness, but never a vice; it always consults the taste of others, sometimes to its own inconvenience, and often in opposition to its judgement; 'Forty-four is an age at which the mind begins less easily to admit new confidence, and the will to grow less flexible.'—JOHNSON. Pliancy is often both a weakness and a vice; it always yields for its own pleasure, though not always in opposition to its sense of right and wrong: 'As for the bending and forming the mind, we should doubtless do our utmost to render it pliable, and by no means stiff and refractory.'—BACON. 'The future is pliant and ductile.'—JOHNSON. Suppleness is always a vice, but never a weakness; it seeks its gratification to the injury of another by flattering his passions; 'Charles I. wanted suppleness and dexterity to give way to the encroachments of a popular assembly.'—HUME. Flexibility is opposed to firmness; pliancy to steadiness; suppleness to rigidity.

* Vide Roubaud: "Flexible, souple, droné."

TO ALLAY, SOOTH, APPEASE, ASSUAGE, MITIGATE.

To allay is compounded of al or ad, and lay to lay to or by, signifying to lay a thing to rest, to abate it; sooth probably comes from sweet, which is in Swedish söt, Low German, &c. söt, and is doubtless connected with the Hebrew šad to allure, invite, compose; appease, in French apaiser, is compounded of ap or ad and paiz peace, signifying to quiet; assuage is compounded of as or ad and suage, from the Latin suasi, perfect of suadeo to persuade, signifying to treat with gentleness, or to render easy; mitigate, from the Latin mitis gentle, signifies to make gentle or easy to be borne.

All these terms indicate a lessening of something painful. In a physical sense a pain is allayed by an immediate application; it is soothed by affording ease and comfort in other respects, and diverting the mind from the pain. Extreme heat or thirst is allayed; 'Without expecting the return of hunger, they eat for an appetite, and prepare dishes not to allay, but to excite it.'—ADDISON. Extreme hunger is appeased;

The rest

They cut in legs and fillets, for the feast,
Which drawn and served, their hunger they appease.

DRYDEN

A punishment or sentence is mitigated;

I undertook

Before thee, and, not repenting, this obtain
Of right, that I may mitigate their doom.

MILTON.

In a moral sense one allays what is fervid and vehement;

If by your art you have

Put the wild waters in this war, allay them.

SHAKESPEARE.

One sooths what is distressed; 'Nature has given all the little arts of soothing and blandishing to the female.'—ADDISON. One appeases what is tumultuous and boisterous; 'Charon is no sooner appeased, and the triple-headed dog laid asleep, but Aeneas makes his entrance into the dominions of Pluto.'—ADDISON. One assuages grief or afflictions; 'If I can any way assuage private inflammations, or allay publick ferments, I shall apply myself to it with the utmost endeavours.'—ADDISON. One mitigates pains, or what is rigorous and severe; 'All it can do is, to devise how that which must be endured may be mitigated.'—HOOKER. Nothing is so calculated to allay the fervour of a distempered imagination, as prayer and religious meditation: religion has every thing in it which can sooth a wounded conscience by presenting it with the hope of pardon, that can appease the angry passions by giving us a sense of our own sinfulness and need of God's pardon, and that can assuage the bitterest griefs by affording us the brightest prospect of future bliss.

TO ALLEVIATE, RELIEVE.

Alleviate, in Latin alleviatus, participle of allevio, is compounded of the intensive syllable al or ad, and levo to lighten, signifying to lighten by making less; relieve, from the Latin relevo, is re and levo to lift up, signifying to take away or remove.

A pain is alleviated by making it less burdensome; a necessity is relieved by supplying what is wanted. Alleviate respects our internal feelings only; relieve our external circumstances. That alleviates which affords ease and comfort; that relieves which removes the pain. It is no alleviation of sorrow to a feeling mind, to reflect that others undergo the same suffering; 'Half the misery of human life might be extinguished, would men alleviate the general curse they lie under, by mutual offices of compassion, benevolence, and humanity.'—ADDISON. A change of position is a considerable relief to an invalid, wearied with confinement;

Now sinking underneath a load of grief,
From death alone she seeks her last relief.

DRYDEN.

Condolence and sympathy tend greatly to alleviate the sufferings of our fellow-creatures; it is an essential part of the Christian's duty to relieve the wants of his indigent neighbour.

APPEASE, CALM, PACIFY, QUIET, STILL.

Appease, v. To allay; calm, in French calmer, from almus fair, signifies to make fair; pacify, in Latin pacifico, compounded of pax and facio, signifies to make peace or peaceable; quiet, in French quiet, Latin quietus, from quies rest, signifies to put to rest; still, signifies to make still.

To appease is to put an end to a violent motion; to calm is to produce a great tranquillity. * The wind is appeased; the sea is calmed. With regard to persons it is necessary to appease those who are in transports of passion, and to calm those who are in trouble, anxiety, or apprehension.

Appease respects matters of force or violence;

A lofty city by my hand is rais'd,

Pygmalion punish'd, and my lord appeased

DRYDEN

Calm respects matters of inquietude and distress;

All-powerful harmony, that can assuage

And calm the sorrows of the phrensed wretch

MARSH.

One is appeased by a submissive behaviour, and calmed by the removal of danger.

Pacify corresponds to appease, and quiet to calm. In sense they are the same, but in application they differ. Appease and calm are used only in reference to objects of importance; pacify and quiet may be applied to those of a more familiar nature. The uneasy humours of a child are pacified, or its groundless fears are quieted.

Still is a loftier expression than any of the former terms; serving mostly for the grave or poetick style. It is an onomatopoeia for restraining or putting to silence that which is noisy and boisterous;

My breath can still the winds,

Uncloud the sun, charm down the swelling sea,

And stop the floods of heaven.—BEAUMONT

PEACE, QUIET, CALM, TRANQUILLITY.

Peace, in Latin pax, may either come from pactio an agreement or compact which produces peace, or it may be connected with pausa, and the Greek pausa to cease, because a cessation of all violent action and commotion enters into the idea of peace; quiet, in Latin quietus, probably from keipai to lie down, signifies a lying posture which best promotes quiet; calm signifies the state of being calm; tranquillity, in Latin tranquillitas, from tranquillus, that is, trans, the intensive syllable, and quillus or quietus, signifies altogether or exceedingly quiet.

Peace is a term of more general application, and more comprehensive meaning than the others; it respects either communities or individuals; but quiet respects only individuals or small communities. Nations are said to have peace, but not quiet; persons or families may have both peace and quiet. Peace implies an exemption from publick or private broils; quiet implies a freedom from noise or interruption. Every well-disposed family strives to be at peace with its neighbours, and every affectionate family will naturally act in such a manner as to promote peace among all its members; 'A false person ought to be looked upon as a publick enemy, and a disturber of the peace of mankind.'—SOUTH. The quiet of a neighbourhood is one of its first recommendations as a place of residence, 'A paltry tale-bearer will discompose the quiet of a whole family.'—SOUTH.

Peace and quiet, in regard to individuals, have like wise a reference to the internal state of the mind; but the former expresses the permanent condition of the mind, the latter its transitory condition. Serious matters only can disturb our peace; trivial matters may disturb our quiet: a good man enjoys the peace of a good conscience; 'Religion directs us rather to secure inward peace than outward ease, to be more careful to avoid everlasting torments than light affliction.'—TILLOTSON. The best of men may have unavoidable cares and anxieties which disturb his quiet:

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Appaiser, calmer"

Indulgent quiet, pow'r serene,
Mother of peace, and joy, and love.—HUGHES.

There can be no peace where a man's passions are perpetually engaged in a conflict with each other; there can be no quiet where a man is embarrassed in his pecuniary affairs.

Calm is a species of quiet, which respects objects in the natural or the moral world; it indicates the absence of violent motion, as well as violent noise; it is that state which more immediately succeeds a state of agitation. As storms at sea are frequently preceded as well as succeeded, by a dead calm, so political storms have likewise their calms which are their attendants, if not their precursors; 'Cheerfulness banishes all anxious care and discontent, soothes and composes the pious, and keeps the soul in a perpetual calm.'—ADDISON. Peace, quiet, and calm have all respect to the state contrary to their own; they are properly cessations either from strife, from disturbance, or from agitation and tumult. Tranquillity, on the other hand, is taken more absolutely: it expresses the situation as it exists in the present moment, independently of what goes before or after; it is sometimes applicable to society, sometimes to natural objects, and sometimes to the mind. The tranquillity of the state cannot be preserved unless the authority of the magistrates be upheld; the tranquillity of the air and of all the surrounding objects is one thing which gives the country its peculiar charms; the tranquillity of the mind in the season of devotion contributes essentially to produce a suitable degree of religious fervour; 'By a patient acquiescence under painful events for the present, we shall be sure to contract a tranquillity of temper.'—CUMBERLAND.

As epithets, these terms bear the same relation to each other: people are peaceable as they are disposed to promote peace in society at large, or in their private relations; they are quiet, inasmuch as they abstain from every loud expression, or are exempt from any commotion in themselves: they are calm, inasmuch as they are exempt from the commotion which at any given moment rages around them; they are tranquil, inasmuch as they enjoy an entire exemption from every thing which can discompose. A town is peaceable as respects the disposition of the inhabitants; it is quiet, as respects its external circumstances, or freedom from bustle and noise: an evening is calm when the air is lulled into a particular stillness, which is not interrupted by any loud sounds: a scene is tranquil which combines every thing calculated to soothe the spirits to rest.

PEACEABLE, PEACEFUL, PACIFICK.

Peaceable is used in the proper sense of the word peace, as it expresses an exemption from strife or contest (v. Peace); but peaceful is used in its improper sense, as it expresses an exemption from agitation or commotion. Persons or things are peaceable; things, particularly in the higher style, are peaceful: a family is designated as peaceable, in regard to its inhabitants; 'I know that my peaceable disposition already gives me a very ill figure here' (at Ratishon).—LADY W. MONTAGUE. A house is designated as a peaceful abode, as it is remote from the bustle and hurry of a multitude;

Still as the peaceful walks of ancient night,
Silent as are the lamps that burn in tombs.

SHAKESPEARE.

Pacifick signifies either making peace, or disposed to make peace, and is applied mostly to what we do to others. We are peaceable when we do not engage in quarrels of our own; we are pacifick if we wish to keep peace, or make peace, between others. Hence the term peaceable is mostly employed for individual or private concerns, and pacifick most properly for national concerns: subjects ought to be peaceable, and monarchs pacifick; 'The most peaceable way for you, if you do take a thief, is to let him show himself, and steal out of your company.'—SHAKESPEARE. 'The tragical and untimely death of the French monarch put an end to all pacifick measures with regard to Scotland'.—ROBERTSON.

CALM, COMPOSED, COLLECTED.

Calm, v. To appease; composed, from the verb compose, marks the state of being composed; and collected, from collect, the state of being collected.

These terms agree in expressing a state; but calm respects the state of the feelings, composed the state of the thoughts and feelings, and collected the state of the thoughts more particularly.

Calmness is peculiarly requisite in seasons of distress, and amid scenes of horror; composure, in moments of trial, disorder, and tumult; collectedness, in moments of danger. Calmness is the companion of fortitude; no one whose spirits are easily disturbed can have strength to bear misfortune: composure is an attendant upon clearness of understanding; no one can express himself with perspicuity whose thoughts are any way deranged: collectedness is requisite for a determined promptitude of action; no one can be expected to act promptly who cannot think fixedly.

It would argue a want of all feeling to be calm on some occasions, when the best affections of our nature are put to a severe trial;

'T is godlike magnanimity to keep,
When most provok'd, our reason calm and clear.

THOMSON.

Composedness of mind associated with the detection of guilt, evinces a hardened conscience, and an insensibility to shame; 'A moping lover would grow a pleasant fellow by that time he had rid thrice about the island (Anticyra); and a hair-brained rake, after a short stay in the country, go home again a composed grave, worthy gentleman.'—STEELE. Collectedness of mind has contributed in no small degree to the preservation of some persons' lives, in moments of the most imminent peril;

Be collected,

No more amazement.—SHAKESPEARE

CALM, PLACID, SERENE.

Calm, v. To appease; placid, in Latin placidus, from placere to please, signifies the state of being pleased, or free from uneasiness; serene, in Latin serenus, comes most probably from the Greek εὐφρην peace, signifying a state of peace.

Calm and serene are applied to the elements; placid only to the mind. Calmness respects only the state of the winds, serenity that of the air and heavens: the weather is calm when it is free from agitation: it is serene when free from noise and vapour. Calm respects the total absence of all perturbation; placid the ease and contentment of the mind; serene clearness and composure of the mind.

As in the natural world a particular agitation of the wind is succeeded by a calm, so in the mind of man, when an unusual effervescence has been produced, it commonly subsides into a calm;

Preach patience to the sea, when jarring winds
Throw up the swelling billows to the sky!
And if your reasons mitigate her fury,
My soul will be as calm.—SMITH.

Placidity and serenity have more that is even and regular in them; they are positively what they are. Calm is a temporary state of the feelings; placid and serene are habits of the mind. We speak of a calm state; but a placid and serene temper. Placidity is more of a natural gift; serenity is acquired: people with not very ardent desires or warmth of feeling will evince placidity; they are pleased with all that passes inwardly or outwardly; 'Placid and soothing is the remembrance of a life passed with quiet, innocence, and elegance.'—STEELE. Nothing contributes so much to serenity of mind as a pervading sense of God's good providence, which checks all impatience, softens down every asperity of humour, and gives a steady current to the feelings: 'Every one ought to fence against the temper of his climate or constitution, and frequently to indulge in himself those considerations which may give him a serenity of mind.'—ADDISON.

EASE, QUIET, REST, REPOSE.

Ease comes immediately from the French aise glad and that from the Greek αἰσθησις young, fresh; quiet in Latin quietus, comes probably from the Greek κεῖμαι to lie down, signifying a lying posture; rest, in German rast, comes from the Latin restito to stand still or make a halt; repose comes from the Latin reposit, perfect of repono to place back, signifying the state of placing one's self backward or downward.

'The idea of a motionless state is common to all these terms: ease and quiet respect action on the body; rest and repose respect the action of the body: we are easy or quiet when freed from any external agency that is painful; we have rest or repose when the body is no longer in motion.

Ease denotes an exemption from any painful agency in general; quiet denotes an exemption from that in particular, which noise, disturbance, or the violence of others may cause; we are easy or at ease, when the body is in a posture agreeable to itself, or when no circumjacent object presses unequally upon it: we are quiet when there is an agreeable stillness around: our ease may be disturbed either by internal or external causes; our quiet is most commonly disturbed by external objects; we may have ease from pain, bodily or mental; we have quiet at the will of those around us: a sick person is often far from enjoying ease, although he may have the good fortune to enjoy the most perfect quiet: a man's mind is often uneasy from its own faulty constitution; it suffers frequent disquietudes from the vexatious tempers of others: let a man be in ever such easy circumstances, he may still expect to meet with disquietudes in his dealings with the world: wealth and contentment are the great promoters of ease;

By this we plainly view the two imposthumes
That choke a kingdom's welfare; ease and wantonness.—BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

Retirement is the most friendly to quiet:

But easy quiet, a secure retreat,
A harmless life that knows not how to cheat,
With homebred plenty the rich owner bless,
And rural pleasures crown his happiness.—DRYDEN.

Rest simply denotes the cessation of motion; repose is that species of rest which is agreeable after labour; we rest as circumstances require; in this sense, our Creator is said to have rested from the work of creation; 'Like the sun, it had light and agility; it knew no rest but in motion, no quiet but in activity.'—SOUTH. Repose is a circumstance of necessity; the weary seek repose; there is no human being to whom it is not sometimes indispensable;

I all the livelong day
Consume in meditation deep, recluse
From human converse; nor at shut of eve
Enjoy repose.—PHILLIPS.

We may rest in a standing posture; we can repose only in a lying position; the dove which Noah first sent out could not find rest for the sole of its foot; soldiers who are hotly pursued by an enemy, have no time nor opportunity to take repose: the night is the time for rest; the pillow is the place for repose. Rest may be properly applied to things and persons;

The peaceful peasant to the wars is press'd,
The fields lie fallow in inglorious rest.—DRYDEN.

Repose may be employed figuratively in the same sense;

Nor can the tortur'd wave here find repose,
But raging still amid the shaggy rocks,
Now flashes o'er the scatter'd fragments.
THOMSON.

EASE, EASINESS, FACILITY, LIGHTNESS.

Easy, (v. Ease) denotes either the abstract state of a person or quality of a thing; easiness, from easy, signifying having ease, denotes simply an abstract quality which serves to characterize the thing: a person enjoys ease, or he has an easiness of disposition: 'Ease is the utmost that can be hoped from a sedentary and inactive habit.'—JOHNSON. 'His yielding unto them in one thing might happily put them in hope, that time would breed the like easiness of condescending further unto them.'—HOOKER. Easy is said of that which is borne, or that which is done; easiness and facility, from the Latin facilis easy, most commonly of that which is to be done; the former in application to the thing as before, the latter either to the person or the thing: we speak of the easiness of the task, but of a person's facility in doing it: we judge of the easiness of a thing by comparing it with others more difficult; 'Nothing is more subject to mistake and disappointment than anticipated judgement, concerning the easiness or difficulty of any undertaking.'—JOHNSON. We judge of a person's facility by comparing him with others, who are less skilful; 'Every one must have remarked the facility with which the kindness of others is sometimes gained by those to whom he never could have imparted his own.'—JOHNSON.

Easy and lightness are both said of what is to be borne; the former in a general, the latter in a particular sense. Whatever presses in any form is not easy; that which presses by excess of weight is not light: a coat may be easy from its make; it can be light only from its texture. A work is easy which requires no great exertion either of body or mind; 'The service of God, in the solemn assembly of saints, is a work, though easy, yet withal very weighty, and of great respect.'—HOOKER. A work is light which requires no effort of the body;

Well pleas'd were all his friends, the task was light,
The father, mother, daughter, they invite.

DRYDEN.

The same distinction exists between their derivatives, to ease, facilitate, and lighten; to ease is to make easy or free from pain, as to ease a person of his labour; to facilitate is to render a thing more practicable or less difficult, as to facilitate a person's progress; to lighten is to take off an excessive weight, as to lighten a person's burdens.

EASY, READY

Easy (v. Ease, easiness) signifies here a freedom from obstruction in ourselves; ready, in German bereit, Latin paratus, signifies prepared.

Easy marks the freedom of being done; ready the disposition or willingness to do; the former refers mostly to the thing or the manner, the latter to the person: the thing is easy to be done; the person is ready to do it: it is easy to make professions of friendship in the ardour of the moment; but every one is not ready to act up to them, when it interferes with his convenience or interest.

As epithets, both are opposed to difficult, but agreeable to the above explanation of the terms; the former denotes a freedom from such difficulties or obstacles as lie in the nature of the thing itself; the latter an exemption from such as lie in the temper and character of the person; hence we say a person is easy of access whose situation, rank, employments, or circumstances, do not prevent him from admitting others to his presence; he is ready to hear when he himself throws no obstacles in the way, when he lends a willing ear to what is said. So likewise a task is said to be easy; a person's wit, or a person's reply, to be ready: a young man who has birth and fortune, wit and accomplishments, will find an easy admittance into any circle; 'An easy manner of conversation is the most desirable quality a man can have.'—STEELE. The very name of a favourite author will be a ready passport for the works to which it may be affixed;

The scorpion, ready to receive thy laws,
Yields half his region and contracts his claws.

DRYDEN.

When used adverbially, they bear the same relation to each other. A man is said to comprehend easily who from whatever cause finds the thing easy to be comprehended; he pardons readily who has a temper ready to pardon.

TO RECLINE, REPOSE.

To recline is to lean back; to repose is to place one's self back: he who reclines reposes; but we may recline without reposing: when we recline we put ourselves into a particular position;

For consolation on his friend reclin'd.—FALCONER.

When we repose we put ourselves into that position which will be most easy;

I first awak'd, and found myself repos'd
Under a shade, on flowers.—MILTON

HARD, DIFFICULT, ARDUOUS.

Hard is here taken in the improper sense of trouble caused, and pains taken, in which sense it is a much stronger term than difficult, which, from the Latin difficilis, compounded of the privative dis and facilis, signifies merely not easy. Hard is therefore positive, and difficult negative. A difficult task cannot be got through without exertion, but a hard task requires great exertion. Difficult is applicable to all trivial matters which call for a more than usual portion either of labour or thought; 'As Swift's years increased, his fits of giddiness and deafness grew more frequent, and his deafness made conversation difficult.'—JOHNSON. Hard is applicable to those which are of the highest importance, and accompanied with circumstances that call for the utmost stretch of every power;

Antigones, with kisses, often tried

To beg this present in his beauty's pride,
When youth and love are hard to be denied.

DRYDEN.

It is a difficult matter to get admittance into some circles of society; it is a hard matter to find societies that are select: it is difficult to decide between two fine paintings which is the finest; it is a hard matter to come at any conclusion on metaphysical subjects. A child mostly finds it difficult to learn his letters: there are many passages in classical writers which are hard to be understood by the learned.

Arduous, in Latin arduus lofty, from ardeo to burn, because flame ascends upwards, denotes set on high or out of reach except by great efforts; arduous expresses a high degree of difficulty. What is difficult requires only the efforts of ordinary powers to surmount;

Whatever melting metals can conspire,
Or breathing bellows, or the forming fire,
Is freely yours: your anxious fears remove,
And think no task is difficult to love.—DRYDEN.

But what is arduous is set above the reach of common intellect, and demands the utmost stretch of power both physical and mental; 'The translation of Homer was an arduous undertaking, and the translator entered upon it with a candid confession that he was utterly incapable of doing justice to Homer.'—CUMBERLAND. A child may have a difficult exercise which he cannot perform without labour and attention: the man who strives to remove the difficulties of learners undertakes an arduous task. It is difficult to conquer our own passions: it is arduous to control the unruly and contending wills of others.

HARDLY, SCARCELY.

What is hard is not common, and in that respect scarce: hence the idea of unfrequency assimilates these terms both in signification and application. In many cases they may be used indifferently; but where the idea of practicability predominates, hardly seems more proper; and where the idea of frequency predominates, scarcely seems preferable. One can hardly judge of a person's features by a single and partial glance; 'I do not expect, as long as I stay in India, to be free from a bad digestion, the "morbus literatorum," for which there is hardly any remedy but abstinence from food, literary and culinary.'—SIR WM. JONES. We scarcely ever see men lay aside their vices from a thorough conviction of their enormity; 'In this assembly of princes and nobles [the Congress of the Hague], to which Europe has perhaps scarcely seen any thing equal, was formed the grand alliance against Lewis.'—JOHNSON. But in general sentences it may with equal propriety be said, hardly one in a thousand, or scarcely one in a thousand, would form such a conclusion.

TO HELP, ASSIST, AID, SUCCOUR, RELIEVE.

Help, in Saxon helpan, German helfen, probably comes from the Greek βοηθάνω to do good to; assist, in Latin assistere, or ad and sisto, signifies to place one's self by another so as to give him our strength; aid, in Latin adjuvo, that is, the intensive syllable ad and juvo, signifies to profit towards a specific end: succour, in Latin succurro, signifies to run to the help of any one; relieve, v. To alleviate.

The idea of communicating to the advantage of another is common to all these terms. Help is the generic term; the rest specific: help may be substituted for the others, and in many cases where they would not be applicable. The first three are employed either to produce a positive good or to remove an evil; the two latter only to remove an evil. We help a person to prosecute his work, or help him out of a difficulty; we assist in order to forward a scheme, or we assist a person in the time of his embarrassment; we aid a good cause, or we aid a person to make his escape; we succour a person who is in danger; we relieve him in time of distress. To help and assist respect personal service, the former by corporeal, the latter by corporeal or mental labour: one servant helps another by taking a part in his employment; one author assists another in the composition of his work. We help up a person's load, we assist him to rise when he has fallen: we speak of a helper or a helpmate in mechanical employments, of an assistant to a professional man;

Their strength united best may help to bear.—POPE.

'T is the first sanction nature gave to man,

Each other to assist in what they can.—DENHAM.

To assist and aid are used for services directly or indirectly performed; but assist is said only of individuals, aid may be said of bodies as well as individuals. One friend assists another with his purse, with his counsel, his interest, and the like; 'She no sooner yielded to adultery, but she agreed to assist in the murder of her husband.'—BROWNE. One person aids another in carrying on a scheme; or one king, or nation, aids another with armies and subsidies;

Your private right, should impious power invade,
The peers of Ithaca would rise in aid.—POPE.

We come to the assistance of a person when he has met with an accident; we come to his aid when contending against numbers. Assistance is given, aid is sent.

To succour is a species of immediate assistance, which is given on the spur of the occasion; the good Samaritan went to the succour of the man who had fallen among thieves;

Patroclus on the shore,
Now pale and dead, shall succour Greece no more.

POPE.

So in like manner we may succour one who calls us by his cries; or we may succour the poor whom we find in circumstances of distress;

My father
Flying for succour to his servant Banister,
Being distress'd, was by that wretch betrayed.

SHAKSPERE.

The word relieve has nothing in common with succour except that they both express the removal of pain, but the latter does not necessarily imply any mode by which this is done, and therefore excludes the idea of personal interference.

All these terms, except succour, may be applied to things as well as persons; we may walk by the help of a stick; 'A man reads his prayers out of a book, as a means to help his understanding and direct his expressions.'—STILLINGFLEET. We read with the assistance of glasses; 'Acquaintance with method will assist one in ranging human affairs.'—WATTS. We learn a task quickly by the aid of a good memory;

Wise, weighty counsels aid a state distress'd.—POPE

We obtain relief from medicine; 'An unbeliever feels the whole pressure of a present calamity, without being relieved by the memory of any thing that is past, or the prospect of any thing that is to come.'—ADDISON.

To help or assist is commonly an act of good nature; to aid, frequently an act of policy; to succour or relieve, an act of generosity or humanity. Help is necessary for one who has not sufficient strength to perform his task; assistance is necessary when a person's time or talent is too much occupied to perform the whole of his office; aid is useful when it serves to give strength and efficacy to our operations; succour is timely when it serves to ward off some danger; relief is salutary when it serves to lessen pain or want. When a person meets with an accident, he requires the help of the by-standers, the assistance of his friends, and the aid of a medical man; it is noble to succour an enemy; it is charitable to relieve the wretched.

TO SECOND, SUPPORT.

To second is to give the assistance of a second person; to support is to bear up on one's own shoulders. To second does not express so much as to support; we second only by our presence, or our word; but we support by our influence, and all the means that are in our power: we second a motion by a simple declaration of our assent to it; we support a motion by the force of persuasion; so likewise we are said always to second a person's views when we give him openly our countenance by declaring our approbation of his measures;

The blasting vollied thunder made all speed,

And seconded thy else not dreaded spear.—MILTON.

And we are said to support him when we give the assistance of our purse, our influence, or any other thing essential for the attainment of an end;

Impeachments NO can best resist,

And AYE support the civil list.—GAY.

ABETTOR, ACCESSARY, ACCOMPLICE.

Abettor, or one that abets, gives aid and encouragement by counsel, promises, or rewards. An accessary, or one added and annexed, takes an active though subordinate part; an accomplice, from the word accomplish, implies the principal in any plot, who takes a leading part and brings it to perfection; abettors propose, accessaries assist, accomplices execute. The abettor and accessary, or the abettor and accomplice, may be one and the same person; but not so the accessary and accomplice.

In every grand scheme there must be abettors to set it on foot, accessaries to co-operate, and accomplices to put it into execution. In the gunpowder plot there were many secret abettors, some noblemen who were accessaries, and Guy Fawkes the principal accomplice; 'I speak this with an eye to those cruel treatments which men of all sides are apt to give the characters of those who do not agree with them. How many men of honour are exposed to public obloquy and reproach? Those therefore who are either the instruments or abettors in such infernal dealings ought to be looked upon as persons who make use of religion to support their cause, not their cause to promote religion.'—ADDISON. 'Why are the French obliged to lend us a part of their tongue before we can know they are conquered? They must be made accessaries to their own disgrace, as the Britons were formerly so artificially wrought in the curtain of the Roman theatre, that they seemed to draw it up in order to give the spectators an opportunity of seeing their own defeat celebrated on the stage.'—ADDISON.

Either he picks a purse, or robs a house,

Or is accomplice with some knavish gang.

CUMBERLAND.

REDRESS, RELIEF.

Redress, like address (v. Accost) in all probability comes from the Latin dirigo, signifying to direct or bring back to the former point; relief, v. To help.

Redress is said only with regard to matters of right and justice; relief to those of kindness and humanity: by power we obtain redress; by active interference we obtain a relief: an injured person looks for redress to the government; an unfortunate person looks for relief to the compassionate and kind: what we suffer through the oppression or wickedness of others can only be redressed by those who have the power of dispensing justice; whenever we suffer, in the order of Providence, we may meet with some relief from those who are more favoured. Redress applies to public as well as private grievances; 'Instead of redressing grievances, and improving the fabric of their state, the French were made to take a very different course.'—BURKE. Relief applies only to private distresses;

This one

Relief the vanquish'd have, to hope for none.

DENHAM

Under a pretence of seeking redress of grievances, mobs are frequently assembled to the disturbance of the better disposed; under a pretence of soliciting charitable relief, thieves gain admittance into families

TO CURE, HEAL, REMEDY

Cure, in Latin curo, signifies to take care of, that is by distinction, to take care of that which requires particular care, in order to remove an evil; heal, in German heilen, comes from heil whole, signifying to make whole that which is unsound; remedy, in Latin re medium, is compounded of re and medeo to cure or heal, which comes from the Greek ὑπόμας and ἔμολα Media, the country which contained the greatest number of healing plants. The particle re is here but an intensive.

To cure is employed for what is out of order; to heal for that which is broken: diseases are cured, wounds are healed; the former is a complex, the latter is a simple process. Whatever requires to be cured is wrong in the system; it requires many and various applications internally and externally;

If the frail body feels disorder'd pangs,

Then drugs medicinal can give us ease;

The soul no Æsculapian medicine can cure

GENTLEMAN

Whatever requires to be healed is occasioned externally by violence, and requires external applications. In a state of refinement men have the greatest number of disorders to be cured; in a savage state there is more occasion for the healing art.

Cure is used as properly in the moral as the natural sense; heal in the moral sense is altogether figurative. The disorders of the mind are cured with greater difficulty than those of the body. The breaches which have been made in the affections of relatives towards each other can be healed by nothing but a Christian spirit of forbearance and forgiveness;

Scarcely an ill to human life belongs,

But what our follies cause, or mutual wrongs;

Or if some stripes from Providence we feel,

He strikes with pity, and but wounds to heal.

JENYNS.

To remedy, in the sense of applying remedies, has a moral application, in which it accords most with cure. Evils are either cured or remedied, but the former are of a much more serious nature than the latter. The evils in society require to be cured; an omission, a deficiency, or a mischief, requires to be remedied.

When bad habits become inveterate they are put out of the reach of cure. It is an exercise for the ingenuity of man to attempt to remedy the various troubles and inconveniences which are daily occurring; 'Every man has frequent grievances which only the solicitude of friendship will discover and remedy.'—JOHNSON.

CURE, REMEDY.

Cure (v. To cure) denotes either the act of curing, or the thing that cures. Remedy is mostly employed for the thing that remedies. In the former sense the remedy is to the cure as the means to the end; a cure is performed by the application of a remedy. That is incurable for which no remedy can be found; but a cure is sometimes performed without the application of any specific remedy. The cure is complete when the evil is entirely removed; the remedy is sure which by proper application never fails of effecting the cure. The cure of disorders depends upon the skill of the physician and the state of the patient; the efficacy of remedies depends upon their suitable choice and application; but a cure may be defeated or a remedy made of no avail by a variety of circumstances independent of either.

Cure is sometimes employed for the thing that cures, but only in the sense of what infallibly cures. Quacks always hold forth their nostrums as infallible cures, not for one but for every sort of disorder;

Why should he choose these miseries to endure

If death could grant an everlasting cure?

'Tis plain there 's something whispers in his ear

(Tho' fain he 'd hide it) he has much to fear.

JENYNS

Experience has fatally proved that the remedy in most cases where quack medicines are applied is worse than the disease; 'The difference between poisons and remedies is easily known by their effects; and common reason soon distinguishes between virtue and vice.'—SWIFT.

HEALTHY, WHOLESOME, SALUBRIOUS, SALUTARY.

Healthy signifies not only having health, but also causing health, or keeping in health; wholesome, like the German heilsam, signifies making whole, keeping whole or sound; salubrious and salutary, from the Latin salus safety or health, signify likewise contributive to health or good in general.

These epithets are all applicable to such objects as have a kindly influence on the bodily constitution: healthy is the most general and indefinite; it is applied to exercise, to air, situation, climate, and most other things, but food, for which wholesome is commonly substituted: the life of a farmer is reckoned the most healthy; 'You are relaxing yourself with the healthy and manly exercise of the field.'—SIR WM. JONES. The simplest diet is reckoned the most wholesome;

Here laid his scrip with wholesome viands fill'd;
There, listening every noise, his watchful dog.

THOMSON.

Healthy and wholesome are rather negative in their sense; salubrious and salutary are positive: that is healthy and wholesome which serves to keep one in health; that is salubrious which serves to improve the health; and that is salutary which serves to remove a disorder: climates are healthy or unhealthy, according to the constitution of the person; 'Gardening or husbandry, and working in wood, are fit and healthy recreations for a man of study or business.'—LOCKE. Water is a wholesome beverage for those who are not drowsical; bread is a wholesome diet for man; 'False decorations, fuscuses, and pigments deserve the imperfections that constantly attend them, being neither commodious in application, nor wholesome in their use.'—BACON. The air and climate of southern France has been long famed for its salubrity, and has induced many invalids to repair thither for the benefit of their health; 'If that fountain (the heart) be once poisoned, you can never expect that salubrious streams will flow from it.'—BLAIR. The effects have not been equally salutary in all cases: it is the concern of government that the places destined for the public education of youth should be in healthy situations; that their diet should be wholesome rather than delicate; and that in all their disorders care should be taken to administer the most salutary remedies.

Wholesome and salutary have likewise an extended and moral application; healthy and salubrious are employed only in the proper sense: wholesome in this case seems to convey the idea of making whole again what has been unsound; 'So the doctrine contained be but wholesome and edifying, a want of exactness in speaking may be overlooked.'—ATTERBURY. But salutary retains the idea of improving the condition of those who stand in need of improvement; 'A sense of the Divine presence exerts this salutary influence of promoting temperance and restraining the disorders incident to a prosperous state.'—BLAIR. Correction is wholesome which serves the purpose of amendment without doing any injury to the body; instruction or admonition is salutary when it serves the purpose of strengthening good principles and awakening a sense of guilt or impropriety: laws and punishments are wholesome to the body politic, as diet is to the physical body; restrictions are salutary in checking irregularities.

SAFE, SECURE.

Safe, in Latin salvus, comes from the Hebrew שלם shalom to be tranquil; secure, v. Certain.

Safety implies exemption from harm, or the danger of harm; secure, the exemption from danger; a person may be safe or saved in the midst of a fire, if he be untouched by the fire; but he is, in such a case, the reverse of secure. In the sense of exemption from danger, safety expresses much less than security: we may be safe without using any particular measures; but none can reckon on any degree of security without great precaution: a person may be very safe on the top of a coach in the daytime; but if he wish to secure himself, at night, from falling off, he must be fastened; 'It cannot be safe for any man to walk upon a precipice, and to be always on the very border of destruction.'—SOUTH. 'No man can rationally account himself secure unless he could command all the chances of the world.'—SOUTH.

CERTAIN, SURE, SECURE.

Certain, in French certain, Latin certus, comes from cerno to perceive, because what we see or perceive is supposed to be put beyond doubt; sure and secure are variations of the same word, in French sur, German sicher, Low German seker, &c., Latin securus, this is compounded of se (sine) apart, and cura, signifying without care, requiring no care.

Certain respects matters of fact or belief; sure and secure the quality or condition of things. A fact is certain, a person's step is sure, a house is secure. Certain is opposed to dubious, sure to wavering, secure to dangerous. A person is certain who has no doubt remaining in his mind; 'It is very certain that a man of sound reason cannot forbear closing with religion upon an impartial examination of it.'—ADDISON. A person is sure whose conviction is steady and unchangeable; 'When these everlasting doors are thrown open, we may be sure that the pleasures and beauties of this place will infinitely transcend our present hopes and expectations, and that the glorious appearance of the throne of God will rise infinitely beyond whatever we are able to conceive of it.'—ADDISON. A person feels himself secure when the prospect of danger is removed;

Weigh well the various terms of human fate,
And seek by mercy to secure your state.

DRYDEN.

When applied to things, certain is opposed to what is varying and irregular; sure to what is unerring; secure is used only in its natural sense. It is a defect in the English language, that there are at present no certain rules for its orthography or pronunciation; the learner, therefore, is at a loss for a sure guide. Amid opposing statements it is difficult to ascertain the real state of the case. No one can ensure his life for a moment, or secure his property from the contingencies to which all sublunary things are exposed.

SOUND, SANE, HEALTHY.

Sound and sane, in Latin sanus, come probably from sanguis the blood, because in that lies the seat of health or sickness; healthy signifies here the state of being in health.

Sound is extended in its application to all things that are in the state in which they ought to be, so as to preserve their vitality; thus, animals and vegetables are said to be sound when in the former there is nothing amiss in their limbs or vital parts, and in the latter in their root. By a figurative application, wood and other things may be said to be sound when they are entirely free from any symptom of decay, or mixture of corruption; in this sense the heart is said to be sound; 'He hath a heart as sound as a bell, and his tongue is the clapper, for what his heart thinks, his tongue speaks.'—SHAKESPEARE. Sane is applicable to human beings, in the same sense, but with reference to the mind; a sane person is opposed to one that is insane;

How pregnant, sometimes, his replies are!
A happiness that often madness hits on,
Which sanity and reason could not be
So prosperously delivered of.—SHAKESPEARE.

The mind is also said to be sound when it is in a state to form right opinions;

But Capys, and the rest of sounder mind,
The fatal present to the flames design'd.

DRYDEN.

Healthy expresses more than either sound or sane; we are healthy in every part, but we are sound in that which is essential for life; he who is sound may live, but he who is healthy enjoys life; 'But the course of succession (to the crown) is the healthy habit of the British constitution.'—BURKE.

DISORDER, DISEASE, DISTEMPER, MALADY.

Disorder signifies the state of being out of order; disease, the state of being ill at ease; distemper, the state of being out of temper, or out of a due temperament; malady, from the Latin malus evil, signifies an ill.

All these terms agree in their application to the state of the animal body. Disorder is, as before (v. To disorder), the general term, and the others specific. In this general sense disorder is altogether indefinite; but in its restricted sense it expresses less than all the rest; it is the mere commencement of a disease: disease is also more general than the other terms, for it comprehends every serious and permanent disorder in the animal economy, and is therefore of universal application. The disorder is slight, partial, and transitory; the disease is deep-rooted and permanent. The disorder may lie in the extremities: the disease lies in the humours and the vital parts. Occasional headaches, colds, or what is merely cutaneous, are termed disorders; fevers, dropsies, and the like, are diseases. Distemper is used for such particularly as throw the animal frame most completely out of its temper or course, and is consequently applied properly to virulent disorders, such as the small-pox. Malady has less of a technical sense than the other terms; it refers more to the suffering than to the state of the body. There may be many maladies where there is no disease; but diseases are themselves in general maladies. Our maladies are frequently born with us; but our diseases may come upon us at any time of life. Blindness is in itself a malady, and may be produced by a disease in the eye. Our disorders are frequently cured by abstaining from those things which caused them; the whole science of medicine consists in finding out suitable remedies for our diseases; our maladies may be lessened with patience, although they cannot always be alleviated or removed by art.

All these terms may be applied with a similar distinction to the mind as well as the body. The disorders are either of a temporary or a permanent nature; but unless specified to the contrary, are understood to be temporary; 'Strange disorders are bred in the mind of those men whose passions are not regulated by virtue.'—ADDISON. Diseases consist in vicious habits; 'The jealous man's disease is of so malignant a nature that it converts all it takes into its own nourishment.'—ADDISON. Our distempers arise from the violent operations of passion; 'A person that is crazed, though with pride or malice, is a sight very mortifying to human nature; but when the distemper arises from any indiscreet fervours of devotion, it deserves our compassion in a more particular manner.'—ADDISON. Our maladies lie in the injuries which the affections occasion; 'Phillips has been always praised without contradiction as a man modest, blameless, and pious, who bore narrowness of fortune without discontent, and tedious and painful maladies without impatience.'—JOHNSON. Any perturbation in the mind is a disorder: avarice is a disease: melancholy is a distemper as far as it throws the mind out of its bias; it is a malady as far as it occasions suffering.

SICK, SICKLY, DISEASED, MORBID.

Sick denotes a partial state; sickly a permanent state of the body, a proneness to be sick: he who is sick may be made well; but he who is sickly is seldom really well: all persons are liable to be sick, though few have the misfortune to be sickly: a person may be sick from the effect of cold, violent exercise, and the like; 'For aught I see, they are as sick that surfeit with too much, as they that starve with nothing.'—SHAKESPEARE. A person is sickly only from constitution; 'Both Homer and Virgil were of a very delicate and sickly constitution.'—WALSH.

Sickly expresses a permanent state of indisposition; but diseased expresses a violent state of derangement without specifying its duration; it may be for a time only, or for a permanency: the person, or his constitution, is sickly; the person, or his frame, or particular parts, as his lungs, his inside, his brain, and the like, may be diseased.

We are all diseased,
And with our surfeiting and wanton hours
Have brought ourselves into a burning fever.
SHAKESPEARE.

Sick, sickly, and diseased may all be used in a moral application; morbid is rarely used in any other except in a technical sense. Sick denotes a partial state, as before, namely, a state of disgust, and is always associated with the object of the sickness; we are sick of turbulent enjoyments, and seek for tranquility: sickly and morbid are applied to the habitual state of the feelings or character; a sickly sentimentality, a morbid sensibility; 'While the distempers of a relaxed fibre prognosticate all the morbid force of convulsion in the body of the state, the steadiness of the physician is overpowered by the very aspect of the disease.'—BURKE. Diseased is applied in general to individuals or communities, to persons or to things; a person's mind is in a diseased state when it is under the influence of corrupt passions or principles; society is in a diseased state when it is overgrown with wealth and luxury; 'For a mind diseased with vain longings after unattainable advantages, no medicine can be prescribed.'—JOHNSON.

SICKNESS, ILLNESS, INDISPOSITION.

Sickness denotes the state of being sick (v. Sick); illness that of being ill (v. Evil); indisposition that of being not well disposed. Sickness denotes the state generally or particularly: illness denotes it particularly we speak of sickness as opposed to good health; in sickness or in health; but of the illness of a particular person: when sickness is said of the individual, it designates a protracted state; a person may be said to have much sickness in his family; 'Sickness is a sort of early old age; it teaches us a diffidence in our earthly state.'—POPE. Illness denotes only a particular or partial sickness: a person is said to have had an illness at this or that time, in this or that place, for this or that period; 'This is the first letter that I have ventured upon, which will be written, I fear vacillantis literis; as Tully says Tyro's Letters were after his recovery from an illness.'—ATTERBURY. Indisposition is a slight illness, such a one as is capable of deranging a person either in his enjoyments or in his business; colds are the ordinary causes of indisposition; 'It is not, as you conceive, an indisposition of body, but the mind's disease.'—FORD.

INVALID, PATIENT.

Invalid, in Latin invalidus, signifies literally one not strong or in good health; patient, from the Latin patiens suffering, signifies one suffering under disease. Invalid is a general, and patient a particular term: a person may be an invalid without being a patient: he may be a patient without being an invalid. An invalid is so denominated from his wanting his ordinary share of health and strength; but the patient is one who is labouring under some bodily suffering. Old soldiers are called invalids who are no longer able to bear the fatigues of warfare: but they are not necessarily patients. He who is under the surgeon's hands for a broken limb is a patient, but not necessarily an invalid.

DEBILITY, INFIRMITY, IMBECILITY.

Debility, in Latin debilitas, from debilis, or de privative and habilis, signifies a deficiency, or not having; infirmitas, in Latin infirmitas, from infirmus, or in privative and firmus strong, signifies the absence of strength; imbecility, in Latin imbecilitas from imbecillus, or in privative, and becillus, bacillum, or baculus a staff, signifies not having a staff or support.

All these terms denote a species of weakness, but the two former, particularly the first, respects that which is physical, and the latter that which is either physical or mental. Debility is constitutional, or otherwise; imbecility is always constitutional; infirmitas is accidental, and results from sickness, or a decay of the frame. Debility may be either general or local; infirmitas is always local; imbecility always general. Debility prevents the active performance of the ordinary functions of nature; it is a deficiency in the muscular power of the body: infirmitas is a partial want of power, which interferes with, but does not necessarily destroy, the activity: imbecility lies in the whole frame, and renders it almost entirely powerless.

Young people are frequently troubled with debilities in their ankles or legs, of which they are never cured; 'As increasing years debilitate the body, so they weaken the force and diminish the warmth of the affections.'—BLAIR. Old age is most exposed to infirmities; but there is no age at which human beings are exempt from infirmity of some kind or another; 'This is weakness, not wisdom, I own, and on that account fitter to be trusted to the bosom of a friend, where I may safely lodge all my infirmities.'—ATTERBURY. The imbecility natural to youth, both in body and mind, would make them willing to rest on the strength of their elders, if they were not too often misled by a mischievous confidence in their own strength; 'It is seldom that we are otherwise than by affliction awakened to a sense of our imbecility.'—JOHNSON.

DECAY, DECLINE, CONSUMPTION.

Decay, French dechoir, from the Latin decado, signifies literally to fall off or away; decline, from the Latin declino, or de and clino, signifies to turn away or lean aside; the direction expressed by both these actions is very similar; it is a sideward movement, but decay expresses more than decline. What is decayed is fallen or gone; what declines leans towards a fall, or is going; when applied, therefore, to the same objects, a decline is properly the commencement of a decay. The health may experience a decline at any period of life from a variety of causes, but it naturally experiences a decay in old age; consumption (v. To consume) implies a rapid decay.

* By decay things lose their perfection, their greatness, and their consistency; by decline they lose their strength, their vigour, and their lustre; by consumption they lose their existence. Decay brings to ruin; decline leads to an end or expiration. 'There are some things to which decay is peculiar, and some things to which decline is peculiar, and other things to which both decay and decline belong. The corruption to which material substances are particularly exposed is termed decay: the close of life, when health and strength begin to fall away, is termed the decline; the decay of states in the moral world takes place by the same process as the decay of fabrics in the natural world; the decline of empires, from their state of elevation and splendour, is a natural figure drawn from the decline of the setting sun. Consumption is seldom applied to any thing but animal bodies;

The seas shall waste, the skies in smoke decay,
Rocks fall to dust, and mountains melt away;
But fix'd his word, his saving power remains,
Thy realm for ever lasts, thy own Messiah reigns.
POPE.

'After the death of Julius and Augustus Cæsar the Roman empire declined every day.'—SOUTH. 'By degrees the empire shrivelled and pined away; and from such a surfeit of immoderate prosperity passed at length into a final consumption.'—SOUTH.

WEAK, FEEBLE, INFIRM.

Weak, in Saxon wæc, Dutch wack, German schwach, is in all probability an intensive of weich soft, which comes from weichen to yield, and this from bewegen to move; feeble is probably contracted from failable; infirm, v. Debility.

The Saxon term weak is here, as it usually is, the familiar and universal term; feeble is suited to a more polished style; infirm is only a species of the weak; we may be weak in body or mind; but we are commonly feeble and infirm only in the body: we may be weak from disease, or weak by nature, it equally conveys the gross idea of a defect; but the terms feeble and infirm are qualified expressions for weakness: a child is feeble from its infancy; an old man is feeble from age; the latter may likewise be infirm in consequence of sickness. We pity the weak, but their weakness often gives us pain;

* Vide Trusler: "Decay, decline, disease."

You, gallant Vernon! saw
The miserable scene; you pitying saw
To infant weakness sunk the warrior's aim.

THOMSON

We assist the feeble when they attempt to walk;

Command th' assistance of a friend,
But feeble are the succours I can send.—DRYDEN.

We support the infirm when they are unable to stand
'At my age, and under my infirmities, I can have no relief but those with which religion furnishes me.'—ATTERBURY. The same distinction exists between weak and feeble in the moral use of the words: a weak attempt to excuse a person conveys a reproachful meaning; but the efforts which we make to defend an other may be praiseworthy, although feeble.

TO WEAKEN, ENFEEBLE, DEBILITATE, ENERVATE, INVALIDATE.

To weaken is to make weak (v. Weak), and is, as before, the generic term: to enfeeble is to make feeble (v. Weak); to debilitate is to cause debility (v. Debility); to enervate is to unnerve; and to invalidate is to make not valid or strong: all of which are but modes of weakening applicable to different objects. To weaken may be either a temporary or permanent act when applied to persons; enfeeble is permanent either as to the body or the mind: we may be weakened suddenly by severe pain; we are enfeebled in a gradual manner, either by the slow effects of disease or age. To weaken is either a particular or a complete act; to enfeeble, to debilitate, and enervate are properly partial acts: what enfeebles deprives of vital or essential power;

So much hath hell debas'd, and pain
Enfeebled me, to what I was in heav'n.—MILTON.

What debilitates may lessen power in one particular, though not in another; the severe exercise of any power, such as the memory or the attention, will tend to debilitate that faculty;

Sometimes the body in full strength we find,
While various ails debilitate the mind.—JENYNS

What enervates acts particularly on the nervous system; it relaxes the frame, and unfits the person for action either of body or mind; 'Elevated by success and enervated by luxury, the military, in the time of the emperors, soon became incapable of fatigue.'—GIBBON. To weaken is said of things as well as persons; to invalidate is said of things only: we weaken the force of an argument by an injudicious application; 'No article of faith can be true which weakens the practical part of religion.'—ADDISON. We invalidate the claim of another by proving its informality in law. 'Do they (the Jacobins) mean to invalidate that great body of our statute law, which passed under those whom they treat as usurpers?'—BURKE.

TO FLAG, DROOP, LANGUISH, PINE.

To flag is to hang down loose like a flag; droop, v. To fall; to languish is to become or continue languid (v. Faint); to pine, from the German peinen pain, is to be or continue in pain.

In the proper application, nothing flags but that which can be distended and made to flutter by the wind, as the leaves of plants when they are in want of water or in a weakly condition; hence figuratively the spirits are said to flag; 'It is variety which keeps alive desire, which would otherwise flag.'—SOUTH. Things are said to droop when their heads flag or drop; in the snowdrop droops, and flowers will generally droop from excess of drought or heat: the spirits in the same manner are said to droop, which expresses more than to flag; the human body also droops when the strength fails;

Shrunk with dry famine, and with toils declin'd,
The drooping body will desert the mind.—POPE.

Languish is a still stronger expression than droop, and is applicable principally to persons; some languish in sickness, some in prison, and some in a state of distress; 'How finely has the poet told us that the sick persons languished under lingering and incurable distempers.'—ADDISON. To pine is to be in a state of wearing pain which is mostly of a mental nature a hild may pine when absent from all his friends, and supposing itself deserted;

From beds of raging fire to starve in ice
Their soft ethereal warmth, there to pine,
Immoveably infix'd.—MILTON.

FAINT, LANGUID.

Faint, from the French faiver to fade, signifies that which is faded or withered, which has lost its spirit; languid, in Latin languidus, from languere to languish, signifies languished.

Faint is less than languid; faintness is in fact in the physical application the commencement of languor; we may be faint for a short time, and if continued and extended through the limbs it becomes languor; thus we say to speak with a faint tone, and have a languid frame; and in the figurative application to make a faint resistance, to move with a languid air; to form a faint idea, to make a languid effort;

Low the woods

Bow their hoar head: and here the languid sun,
Faint from the west, emits his evening ray.

THOMSON

PALE, PALLID, WAN.

Pale, in French pale, and pallid, in Latin pallidus, both come from pallere to turn pale, which probably comes from the Greek παλλύνω to make white, and that from παλιν flour; wan is connected with want and wane, signifying in general a deficiency or a losing colour.

Pallid rises upon pale, and wan upon pallid: the absence of colour in any degree, where colour is a requisite or usual quality, constitutes pale, but pallidness is an excess of pale, and wan is an unusual degree of pallidness: *pale*ness in the countenance may be temporary; but pallidness and wanness are permanent; fear, or any sudden emotion, may produce *pale*ness: but protracted sickness, hunger, and fatigue bring on pallidness; and when these calamities are combined and heightened by every aggravation, they may produce that which is peculiarly termed wanness.

Pale is an ordinary term for an ordinary quality, applicable to many very different objects, to persons, colours, lights, and luminaries. *Pale*ness may be either a natural or an acquired deficiency: a person is said to be pale, a colour pale, a light pale, the sun pale; the deficiency may be desirable or otherwise; the *pale*ness of the moon is agreeable, that of the complexion the contrary:

Now morn, her lamp pale glimmering on the sight,
Scatter'd before her sun reluctant night.

FALCONER.

Pallid is an ordinary term for an extraordinary quality: nothing is said to be pallid but the human face, and that not from the ordinary course of nature, but as the effect of disease; those who paint are most apt to look pallid;

Her spirits faint,

Her cheeks assume a pallid tint.—ADDISON.

Wan is an extraordinary term for an ordinary property, it is applicable only to ghostly objects, or such as are rendered monstrous by unusually powerful causes: the effects of death on the human visage are fully expressed by the term wan, when applied to an individual who is reduced, by severe abstinence or sickness, to a state bordering on the grave;

And with them comes a third with regal pomp,
But faded splendour wan.—MILTON.

FATIGUE, WEARINESS, LASSITUDE.

Fatigue, from the Latin fatigo, to act, is, fatim abundantly or powerfully, and ago to act, or agito to agitate, designates an effect from a powerful or stimulating cause; weariness, from weary, a frequentative of wear, marks an effect from a continued or repeated cause; lassitude, from the Latin lassus, changed from laxus relaxed, marks a state without specifying a cause

Fatigue is an exhaustion of the animal or mental powers; weariness is a wearing out of the strength, or breaking the spirits; lassitude is a general relaxation of the animal frame. The labourer experiences fatigue from the toils of the day; the man of business, who is harassed by the multiplicity and complexity of his concerns, suffers fatigue; and the student, who labours to fit himself for a public exhibition of his acquisitions is in like manner exposed to fatigue; 'One of the amusements of idleness is reading without the fatigus of close attention.'—JOHNSON. Weariness attends the traveller who takes a long or pathless journey; weariness is the lot of the petitioner, who attends in the anti-chamber of a great man; the critic is doomed to suffer weariness, who is obliged to drag through the shallow but voluminous writings of a dull author; and the enlightened hearer will suffer no less weariness in listening to the absurd effusions of an extemporaneous preacher; 'For want of a process of events, neither knowledge nor elegance preserves the reader from weariness.'—JOHNSON.

Lassitude is the consequence of a distempered system, sometimes brought on by an excess of fatigue, sometimes by sickness, and frequently by the action of the external air: 'The cattle in the fields show evident symptoms of lassitude and disgust in an unpleasant season.'—COWPER.

TO WEARY, TIRE, JADE, HARASS.

To weary is a frequentative of wear, that is, to wear out the strength; to tire, from the French tirer, and the Latin traho to draw, signifies to draw out the strength; to jade is the same as to goad; to harass, v. Distress.

Long exertion wearies; a little exertion will tire a child or a weak man; forced exertions jade; painful exertions, or exertions coupled with painful circumstances, harass: the horse is jaded which is forced on beyond his strength; the soldier is harassed who marches in perpetual fear of an attack from the enemy. We are weared with thinking when it gives us pain to think any longer; 'All pleasures that affect the body must needs weary.'—SOUTH. We are tired of our employment when it ceases to give us pleasure; 'Every morsel to a satisfied hunger is only a new labour to a tired digestion.'—SOUTH. We are jaded by incessant attention to business; 'I recall the time (and am glad it is over) when about this hour (six in the morning) I used to be going to bed surfeited with pleasure, or jaded with business.'—BOLINGBROKE. We are harassed by perpetual complaints which we cannot redress;

Bankrupt nobility, a factious, giddy, and Divided Senate, harass'd commonality,
Is all the strength of Venice.—OTWAY.

WEARISOME, TIRESOME, TEDIOUS.

Wearisome (v. To weary) is the general and indefinite term; tiresome, v. To weary; and tedious, causing tedium, a specific form of wearisomeness: common things may cause weariness; that which acts painfully is either tiresome or tedious; but in different degrees the repetition of the same sounds will grow tiresome; long waiting in anxious suspense is tedious: there is more of that which is physical in the tiresome, and mental in the tedious; 'All weariness presupposes weakness, and consequently every long, importune, wearisome petition, is truly and properly a force upon him that is pursued with it.'—SOUTH.

Far happier were the meanest peasant's lot,
Than to be plac'd on high, in anxious pride,
The purple drudge and slave of tiresome state.

Has through this doleful vale of mis'ry pass'd,
Who to his destin'd stage has carried on
The tedious load, and laid his burden down.

WEIGHT, HEAVINESS, GRAVITY.

Weight, from to weigh, is that which a thing weighs; heaviness, from heavy and heave, signifies the abstract quality of the heavy, or difficult to heave:

gravity, from the Latin gravis, likewise denotes the same abstract qualities.

Weight is indefinite; whatever may be weighed has a weight, whether large or small: heaviness and gravity are the property of bodies having a great weight. Weight is only opposed to that which has or is supposed to have no weight, that is, what is incorporeal or immaterial: for we may speak of the weight of the lightest conceivable bodies, as the weight of a feather: heaviness is opposed to lightness; the heaviness of lead is opposed to the lightness of a feather.

Weight lies absolutely in the thing; heaviness is relatively considered with respect to the person: we estimate the weight of things according to a certain measure: we estimate the heaviness of things by our feelings.

Gravity is that species of weight, which is scientifically considered as inherent in certain bodies; the term is therefore properly scientifick.

WEIGHT, BURDEN, LOAD.

Weight, v. Weight; burden, from bear, signifies the thing borne; load, in German laden, is supposed by Adelung to admit of a derivation from different sources; but he does not suppose that which appears to me the most natural, namely, from lay, which becomes in our preterit laid, particularly since in Low German and Dutch laden, to load, is contracted into laeyen, and the literal meaning of load is to lay on or in any thing.

The term weight is here considered in common with the other terms, in the sense of a positive weight, as respects the persons or things by which it is allied to the word burden: the weight is said either of persons or things; the burden more commonly respects persons; the load may be said of either: a person may sink under the weight that rests upon him; a platform may break down from the weight upon it; a person sinks under his burden or load; a cart breaks down from the load. The weight is abstractedly taken for what is without reference to the cause of its being there; burden and load have respect to the person or thing by which they are produced; accident produces the weight; a person takes a burden upon himself; or has it imposed upon him; the load is always laid on; it is not proper to carry any weight that exceeds our strength; those who bear the burden expect to reap the fruit of their labour; he who carries loads must be contented to take such as are given him.

In the moral application, these terms mark the pain which is produced by a pressure; but the weight and load rather describe the positive severity of the pressure: the burden respects the temper and inclinations of the sufferer; the load is in this case a very great weight: a minister of state has a weight on his mind at all times, from the heavy responsibility which attaches to his station; 'With what oppressive weight will sickness, disappointment, or old age fall upon the spirits of that man who is a stranger to God!'—BLAIR. One who labours under strong apprehensions or dread of an evil has a load on his mind; 'How a man can have a quiet and cheerful mind under a burden and load of guilt, I know not, unless he be very ignorant.'—RAY. Any sort of employment is a burden to one who wishes to be idle; and time unemployed is a burden to him who wishes to be always in action;

I understood not that a grateful mind

By owing owes not, but still pays at once;

Indebted and discharg'd: what burden then?

MILTON.

HEAVY, BURDENSOME, WEIGHTY, PONDEROUS.

Heavy, from heave, signifies the causing to heave, or requiring to be lifted up with force; burdensome, having a burden; weighty and ponderous, from the Latin pondus a weight, both signify having a weight.

Heaviness is the natural property of some bodies: burdensomeness is incidental to others. In the vulgar sense, things are termed heavy which are found difficult to lift, in distinction from those which are light or easy to be lifted; but those things are burdensome which are too troublesome to be carried or borne: many things therefore are actually heavy that are never burden- some; and others are occasionally burdensome that are never heavy: that which is heavy is so whether lifted or not, but that which is burdensome must be burdensome to some one; 'Though philosophy teaches, that no element is heavy in its own place, yet experience shows that out of its own place it proves exceeding burdensome'—SOUTH. Hard substances are mostly heavy; but to a weak person the softest substance may sometimes be burdensome if he is obliged to bear it. things are heavy according to the difficulty with which they are lifted; but they are weighty according as they weigh other things down. The heavy is therefore indefinite; but the weighty is definite, and something positively great: what is heavy to one may be light to another; but that which is weighty exceeds the ordinary weight of other things;

The sable troops along the narrow tracks

Scarce bear the weighty burden on their backs.

DRYDEN.

Ponderous expresses even more than weighty, for it includes also the idea of bulk; the ponderous therefore is that which is so weighty and large that it cannot easily be moved; 'The diligence of an idler is rapid and impetuous, as ponderous bodies forced into velocity move with violence proportionate to their weight.'—JOHNSON.

TO CLOG, LOAD, ENCUMBER.

Clog is probably changed from clot or clod, signifying to put a heavy lump in the way; load, from to load, in Saxon laden, Dutch, &c. laden, signifies to burden with a load, or lay any thing on so as to form a load; encumber, compounded of en or in and cumber, in German kummer, sorrow, signifies to burden with trouble.

Clog is figuratively employed for whatever impedes the motion or action of a thing, drawn from the familiar object which is used to impede the motion of animals: load is used for whatever occasions an excess of weight or materials. A wheel is clogged, or a machine is clogged; a fire may be loaded with coals, or a picture with colouring. The stomach and memory may be either clogged or loaded: in the former case by the introduction of improper food; and in the second case by the introduction of an improper quantity. A memory that is clogged becomes confused, and confounds one thing with another; that which is loaded loses the impression of one object by the introduction of another; 'Butler gives Hudibras that pedantic ostentation of knowledge, which has no relation to chivalry, and loads him with martial encumbrances that can add nothing to his civil dignity.'—JOHNSON.

Clog and encumber have the common signification of interrupting or troubling by means of something irrelevant. Whatever is clogged has scarcely the liberty of moving at all; whatever is encumbered moves and acts, but with difficulty. When the roots of plants are clogged with mould, or any improper substance, their growth is almost stopped: weeds and noxious plants are encumbrances in the ground where flowers should grow: the commands or prohibition of parents sometimes very fortunately clog those whose sanguine tempers would lead them into imprudence; 'Whatsoever was observed by the ancient philosophers, either irregular or defective in the workings of the mind, was all charged upon the body as its great clog.'—SOUTH. No one can expect to proceed with ease to himself in any transaction, who is encumbered with a variety of concerns at the same time; 'This minority is great and formidable. I do not know whether, if I aimed at the total overthrow of a kingdom, I should wish to be encumbered with a large body of partizans.'—BURKE.

TO POISE, BALANCE.

Poise, in French peser, probably comes from pes a foot, on which the body is as it were poised; balance in French balancer, comes from the Latin bilanx, or bis and lanx, a pair of scales.

The idea of bringing into an equilibrium is common to both terms; but poise is a particular, and balance a more general term: a thing is poised as respect itself; it is balanced as respects other things.

poises a plain stick in his hand when he wants it to lie even; he balances the stick if it has a particular weight at each end: a person may poise himself, but he balances others: when not on firm ground, it is necessary to poise oneself; when two persons are situated one at each end of a beam, they may balance one another. These terms preserve the same distinction in a figurative acceptation;

Some evil, terrible and unforeseen,
Must sure ensue, to poise the scale against
This vast profusion of exceeding pleasure.—Rowe.
This, O! this very moment let me die,
While hopes and fears in equal balance lie.
DRYDEN.

TO PERISH, DIE, DECAY.

Perish, in French perir, in Latin perire, compounded of per and eo, signifies to go thoroughly away; die, v. To die; and decay, v. To decay.

To perish expresses more than to die, and is applicable to many objects; for the latter is properly applied only to express the extinction of animal life, and figuratively to express the extinction of life or spirit in vegetables or other bodies; but the former is applied to express the dissolution of substances, so that they lose their existence as aggregate bodies. What perishes, therefore, does not always die, although whatever dies, by that very act perishes to a certain extent. Hence we say that wood perishes, although it does not die; people are said either to perish or die: but as the term perish expresses even more than dying, it is possible for the same thing to die and not perish; thus a plant may be said to die when it loses its vegetative power; but it is said to perish if its substance crumbles into dust.

To perish expresses the end; to decay, the process by which this end is brought about: a thing may be long in decaying, but when it perishes it ceases at once to act or to exist: things may, therefore, perish without decaying; they may likewise decay without perishing. Things may perish by means of water, fire, lightning, and the like, which are altogether new, and have experienced no kind of decay: on the other hand, wood, iron, and other substances may begin to decay, but may be saved from immediately perishing by the application of preventives.

In a moral or extended application of the terms they preserve a similar distinction: to die signifies simply to fall away; thus, thoughts may die in one's breast which never return, or power may die with the possessor; 'Whatever pleasure any man may take in spreading whispers, he will find greater satisfaction in letting the secret die within his own breast.'—SPECTATOR. With perish is always associated the manner and degree of the extinction, namely, that it is complete, and effected for the most part by violence;

Beauty and youth about to perish finds
Such noble pity in brave English minds.—WALLER.

Decay is figuratively employed in the sense of gradually sinking into a state of non-existence;

The soul's dark cottage, batter'd and decay'd,
Lies in new light through chinks that time has made.
WALLER.

TO DIE, EXPIRE.

Die, in Low German doen, Danish doe, from the Greek θάνω to kill, designates in general the extinction of being, which may be considered either as gradual or otherwise; 'She died every day she lived.'—Rowe. Expire, from the Latin e or ex and spiro to breathe out, designates the last action of life in certain objects, and is of course a momentary act; 'Pope died in the evening of the thirtieth day of May, 1744, so placidly, that the attendants did not discern the exact time of his expiration.'—JOHNSON.

* There are beings, such as trees and plants, which are said to live, although they have not breath; these die, but do not expire: there are other beings which absorb and emit air, but do not live; such as the flame of a lamp, which does not die, but it expires. By a natural metaphor, the time of being is put for the life of objects; and hence we speak of the date expiring, the term expiring, and the like; 'A parliament may expire by length of time.'—BLACKSTONE. As life is applied figuratively to moral objects, so may death to objects not having physical life; 'A dissolution is the civil death of parliament.'—BLACKSTONE. 'When Alexander the Great died, the Grecian monarchy expired with him.'—SOUTH.

DEATH, DEPARTURE, DECEASE, DEMISE.

Death signifies the act of dying; departure, the act of departing; decease, from the Latin decedo to fall off, the act of falling away; demise, from demitto to lay down, signifies literally resigning possession.

Death is a general or a particular term; it marks in the abstract sense the extinction of life, and is applicable to men or animals; to one or many. Departure, decease, and demise are particular expressions suited only to the condition of human beings. * Departure is a Christian term, which carries with it an idea of a passage from one life to another; decease is a technical term in law, which is introduced into common language to designate one's falling off from the number of the living; demise is substituted for decease in speaking of princes, who by their death also put on their earthly power; 'So tender is the law of supposing even a possibility of the king's death, that his natural dissolution is generally called his demise.'—BLACKSTONE.

Death of itself has always something terrific in it; but the Gospel has divested it of its terrors: the hour of departure, therefore, for a Christian is often the happiest period of his mortal existence; 'How quickly would the honours of illustrious men perish after death, if their souls performed nothing to preserve their fame.'—HUGHES (after Xenophon). Decease presents only the idea of leaving life to the survivors. Of death it has been said, that nothing is more certain than that it will come, and nothing more uncertain than when it will come. Knowing that we have here no resting place of abode, it is the part of wisdom to look forward to our departure; 'The loss of our friends impresses upon us hourly the necessity of our own departure.'

JOHNSON. Property is in perpetual occupancy; at the decease of one possessor, it passes into the hands of another; 'Though men see every day people go to their long home, they are not so apt to be alarmed at that, as at the decease of those who have lived longer in their sight.'—STEELE.

The death of an individual is sometimes attended with circumstances peculiarly distressing to those who are nearly related. The tears which are shed at the departure of those we love are not always indications of our weakness, but rather testimonies of their worth.

As an epithet, dead is used collectively; departed is used with a noun only; deceased generally without a noun, to denote one or more according to the connection.

There is a respect due to the dead, which cannot be violated without offence to the living;

The living and the dead, at his command,
Were coupled face to face, and hand to hand.
DRYDEN.

It is a pleasant reflection to conceive of departed spirits, as taking an interest in the concerns of those whom they have left: 'The sophisticated tyrants of Paris are loud in their declamations against the departed regal tyrants, who in former ages have vexed the world.'—BURKE. All the marks on the body of the deceased indicated that he had met with his death by some violence; 'It was enacted in the reign of Edward I., that the ordinary shall be bound to pay the debts of the intestate, in the same manner that executors were bound in case the deceased left a will.'—BLACKSTONE.

DEADLY, MORTAL, FATAL.

Deadly or deadlike signifies like death itself in its effects; mortal, in Latin mortalis, signifies belonging to death; fatal, in Latin fatalis, i. e. according to fate. Deadly is applied to what is productive of death;

* Vide Trusler: "Departure, death, decease"

On him amid the flying numbers found,
Euryпилus inflicts a deadly wound.—POPE.

Mortal to what terminates in or is liable to death; 'For my own part, I never could think that the soul, while in a mortal body, lives.'—HUGHES (after Xenophon). Fatal applies not only to death, but every thing which may be of great mischief;

O fatal change! become in one sad day
A senseless corpse! inanimated clay.—POPE.

A poison is deadly; a wound or a wounded part is mortal; a step in walking, or a step in one's conduct, may be fatal. Things only are deadly, creatures are mortal. Hatred is deadly; whatever has life is mortal. There may be remedies sometimes to counteract that which is deadly; but that which is mortal is past all cure; and that which is fatal cannot be retrieved.

NUMB, BENUMBED, TORPID.

Numb and benumbed come from the Hebrew num to sleep; in the former denoting the quality, and the latter the state: there are but few things numb by nature; but there may be many things which may be benumbed. Torpid, in Latin torpidus, from torpeo to languish, is most commonly employed to express the permanent state of being benumbed, as in the case of some animals, which lie in a torpid state all the winter; or in the moral sense to depict the benumbed state of the thinking faculty; in this manner we speak of the torpor of persons who are benumbed by any strong affection, or by any strong external action; 'The night, with its silence and darkness, shows the winter, in which all the powers of vegetation are benumbed.'—JOHNSON. 'There must be a grand spectacle to rouse the imagination, grown torpid with the lazy enjoyment of sixty years' security.'—BURKE.

EXIT, DEPARTURE.

Both these words are metaphorically employed for death, or a passage out of this life: the former is borrowed from the act of going off the stage; the latter from the act of setting off on a journey. The exit seems to convey the idea of volition; for we speak of making our exit: the departure designates simply the event; the hour of a man's departure is not made known to him. When we speak of the exit, we think only of the place left; when we speak of departure, we think not only of the object left, but of the place gone to. The unbeliever may talk of his exit; the Christian most commonly speaks of his departure; 'There are no ideas strike more forcibly upon our imaginations than those which are raised from reflections upon the exits of great and excellent men.'—STEELE. 'Happy was their good prince in his timely departure, which barred him from the knowledge of his son's miseries.'—SIDNEY.

TO STRENGTHEN, FORTIFY, INVIGORATE.

Strengthen, from strength, and fortify, from fortis and facio, signify to make strong; invigorate signifies to put in vigour (v. Energy).

Whatever adds to the strength, be it in ever so small a degree, strengthens; exercise strengthens either body or mind; 'There is a certain bias towards knowledge, in every mind, which may be strengthened and improved.'—BUDGE. Whatever gives strength for a particular emergence fortifies; religion fortifies the mind against adversity; 'This relation will not be wholly without its use, if those who languish under any part of its sufferings shall be enabled to fortify their patience by reflecting that they feel only those afflictions from which the abilities of Savage could not exempt him.'—JOHNSON. Whatever adds to the strength, so as to give a positive degree of strength, invigorates; morning exercise in fine weather invigorates;

For much the pack
(Rous'd from their dark alcoves) delight to stretch
And bask in his invigorating ray.—SOMERVILLE.

STRONG, FIRM, ROBUST, STURDY.

Strong is in all probability a variation of strict, which is in German streng, because strength is stro-gether derived from the close texture of bodies; robust, in Latin robustus, from robur, signifies literally having the strength of oak; sturdy, like the word stout, steady (v. Firm), comes in all probability from stehen to stand, signifying capable of standing.

Strong is here the generic term; the others are specific, or specify strength under different circumstances; robust is a positive and high degree of strength, arising from a peculiar bodily make; sturdy indicates not only strength of body but also of mind a man may be strong from the strength of his constitution, from the power which is inherent in his frame;

If thou hast strength, 't was Heaven that strength bestow'd.—POPE.

A robust man has strength both from the size and texture of his body, he has a bone and nerve which is endowed with great power. A little man may be strong, although not robust; a tall, stout man, in full health, may be termed robust.

A man may be strong in one part of his body and not in another; he may be stronger at one time, from particular circumstances, than he is at another: but a robust man is strong in his whole body; and as he is robust by nature, he will cease to be so only from disease;

The huntsman ever gay, robust, and bold,
Defies the noxious vapour.—SOMERVILLE.

Sturdiness lies both in the make of the body and the temper of the mind: a sturdy man is capable of making resistance, and ready to make it; he must be naturally strong, and not of slender make, but he need not be robust: a sturdy peasant presents us with the picture of a man who, both by nature and habit, is formed for withstanding the inroads of an enemy;

This must be done, and I would fain see
Mortal so sturdy as to gainsay.—HUDIBRAS.

Sometimes this epithet is applied to those objects which cause a violent resistance;

Beneath their sturdy strokes the billows roar.

DRYDEN

Every object is termed strong which is the reverse of weak; persons only are termed robust who have every bodily requisite to make them more than ordinarily strong; persons only are sturdy whose habits of life qualify them both for action and for endurance

SUBSTANTIAL, SOLID.

Substantial signifies having a substance: solid signifies having a firm substance. The substantial is opposed to that which is thin and has no consistency; the solid is opposed to the liquid, or that which is of loose consistency. All objects which admit of being handled are in their nature substantial; those which are of so hard a texture as to require to be cut are solid. Substantial food is that which has a consistency in itself, and is capable of giving fulness to the empty stomach: solid food is meat in distinction from drink.

In the moral application, an argument is said to be substantial which has weight in itself;

Trusting in its own native and substantial worth,
Scorns all meretricious ornaments.—MILTON.

A reason is solid which has a high degree of substantiality;

As the swollen columns of ascending smoke,
So solid swells thy grandeur, pigmy man.

YOUNG

ENERGY, FORCE, VIGOUR.

Energy, in French energie, Latin energia, Greek ἐνεργία from ἐνεργέω to operate inwardly, signifies the power of producing positive effects; force, v. To compel; vigour, from the Latin vigore to flourish, signifies unimpaired power, or that which belongs to a subject in a sound or flourishing state.

With energy is connected the idea of activity; with force that of capability; with vigour that of health. Energy lies only in the mind; force and vigour are the property of either body or mind. Knowledge and freedom combine to produce energy of character, 'Our powers owe much of their energy to our hopes, possunt guia posse videntur When success seems attainable, diligence is enforced.'—JOHNSON. Force is a gift of nature that may be increased by exercise;

On the passive main

Descends th' ethereal force, and with strong gust
Turns from its bottom the discolour'd deep.

THOMSON.

Vigour, both bodily and mental, is an ordinary accompaniment of youth, but is not always denied to old age; 'No man at the age and vigour of thirty is fond of sugar-plums and rattles.'—SOUTH.

HARD, FIRM, SOLID.

The close adherence of the component parts of a body constitutes hardness. The close adherence of different bodies to each other constitutes firmness (v. Fixed). That is hard which will not yield to a closer compression; 'I see you labouring through all your inconveniences of the rough roads, the hard saddle, the trotting horse, and what not.'—POPE. That is firm which will not yield so as to produce a separation;

The loosen'd ice

Rustles no more; but to the sedge bank
Fast grows, or guthers round the pointed stone,
A crystal pavement, by the breath of heaven
Cemented firm.—THOMSON.

Ice is hard, as far as it respects itself, when it resists every pressure; it is firm, with regard to the water which it covers, when it is so closely bound as to resist every weight without breaking.

Hard and solid respect the internal constitution of bodies, and the adherence of the component parts; but hard denotes a much closer degree of adherence than solid: the hard is opposed to the soft; the solid to the fluid; every hard body is by nature solid; although every solid body is not hard. Wood is always a solid body, but is sometimes hard and sometimes soft: water, when congealed, is a solid body, and admits of different degrees of hardness; 'A copious manner of expression gives strength and weight to our ideas, which frequently makes impression upon the mind, as iron does upon solid bodies, rather by repeated strokes than a single blow.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny).

In the improper application, hardness is allied to insensibility; firmness to fixedness; solidity to substantiality; a hard man is not to be acted upon by any tender motives; a firm man is not to be turned from his purpose; a solid man holds no purposes that are not well founded. A man is hardened in that which is bad, by being made insensible to that which is good; a man is confirmed in any thing good or bad, by being rendered less disposed to lay it aside; his mind is consolidated by acquiring fresh motives for action.

HARD, CALLOUS, HARDENED, OBDURATE.

Hard is here, as in the former case (v. Hard), the general term, and the rest particular: hard, in its most extensive and physical sense, denotes the property of resisting the action of external force, so as not to undergo any change in its form, or motion in its parts; callous is that species of the hard, in application to the skin, which arises from its dryness, and the absence of all nervous susceptibility. Hard and callous are likewise applied in the moral sense: but hard denotes the absence of tender feeling, or the property of resisting any impression which tender objects are apt to produce;

Such woes

Not e'en the hardest of our foes could hear,
Nor stern Ulysses tell without a tear.—DRYDEN.

Callous denotes the property of not yielding to the force of objects acting on the senses of the mind; 'Licentiousness has so long passed for sharpness of wit, and greatness of mind, that the conscience is grown callous.'—L'ESTRANGE. A hard heart cannot be moved by the sight of misery, let it be presented in ever so affecting a form: a callous mind is not to be touched by any persuasions however powerful.

Hard does not designate any circumstance of its existence or origin: we may be hard from a variety of causes; but callousness arises from the indulgence of vices, passions, and the pursuit of vicious practices

When we speak of a person as hard, it simply determines what he is: if we speak of him as callous, it refers also to what he was, and from what he is become so; 'By degrees the sense grows callous, and loses that exquisite relish of trifles.'—BERKELEY.

Callous, hardened, and obdurate are all employed to designate a morally depraved character: but callousness belongs properly to the heart and affections; hardened to both the heart and the understanding; obdurate more particularly to the will. Callousness is the first stage of hardness in moral depravity; it may exist in the infant mind, on its first tasting the poisonous pleasures of vice, without being acquainted with its remote consequences; 'If they let go their hope of everlasting life with willingness, and entertain final perdition with exultation, ought they not to be esteemed destitute of common sense, and abandoned to a callousness and numbness of soul?'—BENTLEY. A hardened state is the work of time; it arises from a continued course of vice, which becomes as it were habitual, and wholly unfits a person for admitting of any other impressions;

His harden'd heart, nor prayers, nor threatenings move;

Fate and the gods had stopp'd his ears to love.

DRYDEN

Obduracy is the last stage of moral hardness, which suppresses the whole mind to be obstinately bent on vice;

Round he throws his baleful eyes,

That witness'd huge affliction and dismay,

Mix'd with obdurate pride and steadfast hate

MILTON.

A child discovers himself to be callous, when the tears and entreaties of a parent cannot awaken in him a single sentiment of contrition; a youth discovers himself to be hardened when he begins to take a pride and a pleasure in a vicious career; a man shows himself to be obdurate when he betrays a settled and confirmed purpose to pursue his abandoned course, without regard to consequences.

HARDHEARTED, CRUEL, UNMERCIFUL, MERCILESS.

Hardhearted is here, as the word hard (v. Hard) the strongest of these terms: in regard to cruel, it be speaks a settled character; whereas that may be frequently a temporary disposition, or even extend no farther than the action. A hardhearted man must always be cruel; but it is possible to be cruel, and yet not hardhearted. A hardhearted parent is a monster who spurns from him the being that owes his existence to him, and depends upon him for support. A child is often cruel to animals from the mistaken conception that they are not liable to the same sufferings as himself.

The unmerciful and merciless are both modes or characteristics of the hardhearted. An unmerciful man is hardhearted, inasmuch as he is unwilling to extend his compassion or mercy to one who is in his power; a merciless man, which is more than an unmerciful man, is hardhearted, inasmuch as he is restrained by no compunctious feelings from inflicting pain on those who are in his power. Avarice makes a man hardhearted even to those who are bound to him by the closest ties. Avarice will make a man unmerciful to those who are in his debt. There are many merciless tyrants in domestic life, who show their disposition by their merciless treatment of their poor brutes; 'Single men, though they be many times more charitable, on the other side, are more cruel and hardhearted, because their tenderness is not so oft called upon.'—BACON.

Relentless love the cruel mother led

The blood of her unhappy babes to shed.—DRYDEN.

'I saw how unmerciful you were to your eyes in your last letter to me.'—TILLOTSON.

To crush a merciless and cruel victor.—DRYDEN

CRUEL, INHUMAN, BARBAROUS, BRUTAL, SAVAGE.

Cruel, from the Latin crudelis and crudus raw rough, or untutored; inhuman; compounded of the privative in and human, signifies not human; barbarous, from the Greek βάρβαρος rude or unsettled, all mark a degree of bad feeling which is uncontrolled by culture or refinement; brutal, signifying like a brute; and savage, from the Latin savus fierce, and the Hebrew צאן a wolf, marks a still stronger degree of this bad passion.

Cruel is the most familiar and the least powerful epithet of all these terms; it designates the ordinary propensity which is innate in man, and which if not overpowered by a better principle, will invariably show itself by the desire of inflicting positive pain on others, or abridging their comfort: inhuman and barbarous are higher degrees of cruelty; brutal and savage rise so much in degree above the rest, as almost to partake of another nature. A child gives early symptoms of his natural cruelty by his ill-treatment of animals; but we do not speak of his inhumanity, because this is a term confined to men, and more properly to their treatment of their own species, although extended in its sense to their treatment of the brutes: barbarity is but too common among children and persons of riper years. A person is cruel who neglects the creature he should protect and take care of;

Now be thy rage, thy fatal rage resign'd,
A cruel heart ill suits a manly mind.—POPE.

A person is inhuman if he withhold from him the common marks of tenderness or kindness which are to be expected from one human being to another;

Love lent the sword, the mother struck the blow,
Inhuman she, but more inhuman thou.—DRYDEN.

A person is barbarous if he find amusement in inflicting pain;

I have found out a gift for my fair,
I have found where the wood-pigeons breed,
But let me that plunder forbear,
She will say, 't was a barbarous deed.

SHENSTONE.

A person is brutal or savage according to the circumstances of aggravation which accompany the act of torturing; 'The play was acted at the other theatre, and the brutal petulance of Cibber was confuted, though perhaps not shamed, by general applause.'—JOHNSON.

Brothers by brothers' impious hands are slain!
Mistaken zeal, how savage is thy reign!

JENYNS.

Cruel is applied either to the disposition or the conduct; inhuman and barbarous mostly to the outward conduct; brutal and savage mostly to the disposition. Cruelties and even barbarities, too horrid to relate, are daily practised by men upon dogs and horses, the usefulest and most unoffending of brutes; either for the indulgence of a naturally brutal temper, or from the impulse of a savage fury: we need not wonder to find the same men inhuman towards their children or their servants. Domitian was notorious for the cruelty of his disposition: the Romans indulged themselves in the inhuman practice of making their slaves and convicts fight with wild beasts; but the barbarities which have been practised on slaves in the colonies of European states, exceed every thing in atrocity that is related of ancient times; proving that, in spite of all the refinement which the religion of our blessed Saviour has introduced into the world, the possession of uncontrolled power will inevitably brutalize the mind, and give a savage ferocity to the character.

FEROCIOUS, FIERCE, SAVAGE.

Ferocious and fierce are both derived from the Latin ferox, which comes from fera a wild beast: savage, v. Cruel; ferocity marks the untamed character of a cruel disposition: fierceness has a greater mixture of pride and anger in it, the word fierité in French being taken for haughtiness: savageness marks a more permanent, but not so violent, a sentiment of either cruelty or anger as the two former. Ferocity and fierceness are in common applied to the brutes, to designate their natural tempers: savage is mostly employed to designate the natural tempers of man, when uncontrolled by the force of reason and a sense of religion. Ferocity is the nature! characteristic of wild beasts: it is a delight in blood that needs no outward stimulus to call it into action; but it displays itself most strikingly in the moment when the animal is going to grasp, or when in the act of devouring, its prey: fierceness may be provoked in many creatures, but it does not discover itself unless roused by some circumstances of aggravation; many animals become fierce by being shut up in cages, and exposed to the view of spectators: savageness is as natural a temper in the uncivilized man, as ferocity or fierceness in the brute; it does not wait for an enemy to attack, but is restless in search of some one whom it may make an enemy, and have an opportunity of destroying. It is an easy transition for the savage to become the ferocious cannibal, glutting himself in the blood of his enemies, or the fierce antagonist to one who sets himself up in opposition to him.

In an extended application of these terms, they bear the same relation to each other: the countenance may be either ferocious, fierce, or savage, according to circumstances. A robber who spends his life in the act of unlawfully shedding blood acquires a ferocity of countenance; 'The ferocious character of Moloch appears both in the battle and the council with exact consistency.'—JOHNSON. A soldier who follows a predatory and desultory mode of warfare betrays the licentiousness of his calling, and his undisciplined temper, in the fierceness of his countenance;

The tempest falls,
The weary winds sink, breathless. But who knows
What fiercer tempest yet may shake this night?

THOMSON.

The wretch whose enjoyment consists in inflicting misery on his dependants or subjects, evinces the savageness of his temper by the savage joy with which he witnesses their groans and tortures;

Nay, the dire monsters that infest the flood,
By nature dreadful, and athirst for blood,
His will can calm, their savage tempers bind,
And turn to mild protectors of mankind.—YOUNG

HARD, HARDY, INSENSIBLE, UNFEELING.

Hard (v. Hard) may either be applied to that which makes resistance to external impressions, or that which presses with a force upon other objects: hardy, which is only a variation of hard, is applicable only in the first case: thus, a person's skin may be hard, which is not easily acted upon; but the person is said to be hardy who can withstand the elements;

Ocnus was next, who led his native train
Of hardy warriors through the watery plain.

DRYDEN.

On the other hand, hard, when employed as an active principle, is only applied to the moral character; hence, the difference between a hardy man who endures every thing, and a hard man who makes others endure. Insensible and unfeeling are but modes of the hard; that is, they designate the negative quality of hardness, or its incapacity to receive impression: hard, therefore, is always the strongest term of the three; and of the two, unfeeling is stronger than insensible. Hard and insensible are applied physically and morally; unfeeling is employed only as a moral characteristic. A horse's mouth is hard, inasmuch as it is insensible to the action of the bit; a man's heart is hard which is insensible to the miseries of others; a man is unfeeling who does not regard the feelings of others. The heart may be hard by nature, or rendered so by the influence of some passion; but the person is commonly unfeeling from circumstances. Shylock is depicted by Shakspeare as hard, from his strong antipathy to the Christians: people who enjoy an uninterrupted state of good health, are often unfeeling in cases of sickness.

As that which is hard mostly hurts or pains when it comes in contact with the soft, the term hard is peculiarly applicable to superiors, or such as have power to inflict pain: a creditor may be hard towards a debtor; 'To be inaccessible, contemptuous, and hard of heart, is to revolt against our own nature.'—BLAIR. As insensible signifies a want of sense, it may be sometimes necessary: a surgeon, when performing an operation, must be insensible to the present pain which he inflicts; but as a habit of the mind it is always bad;

It is both reproachful and criminal to have an insensible heart."—BLAIR. As unfeeling signifies a want of feeling, it is always taken for a want of good feeling where the removal of pain is required: the surgeon shows himself to be unfeeling who does not do every thing in his power to lessen the pain of the sufferer;

The father too a sordid man,
Who love nor pity knew,
Was all unfeeling as the rock
From whence his riches grew.—MALLET.

INDIFFERENCE, INSENSIBILITY, APATHY.

Indifference signifies no difference; that is, having no difference of feeling for one thing more than another; insensibility, from sense and able, signifies incapable of feeling; apathy, from the Greek privative α and $\pi\alpha\theta\acute{o}s$ feeling, implies without feeling.

Indifference is a partial state of the mind; apathy, and insensibility are general states of the mind; he who has indifference is not to be awakened to feeling by some objects, though he may by others; but he who has not sensibility is incapable of feeling; and he who has apathy is without any feeling. Indifference is mostly a temporary state; insensibility is either a temporary or a permanent state; apathy is always a permanent state: indifference is either acquired or accidental; insensibility is either produced or natural; apathy is natural. A person may be in a state of indifference about a thing the value of which he is not aware of, or acquire an indifference for that which he knows to be of comparatively little value: he may be in a state of insensibility from some lethargick torpor which has seized his mind; or he may have an habitual insensibility arising either from the contractedness of his powers, or the physical bluntness of his understanding, and deadness of his passions; his apathy is born with him, and forms a prominent feature in the constitution of his mind.

Indifference is often the consequence of insensibility; for he who is not sensible or alive to any feeling must naturally be without choice or preference: but indifference is not always insensibility, since we may be indifferent to one thing because we have an equal liking to another; 'I could never prevail with myself to exchange joy and sorrow for a state of constant tasteless indifference.'—HODGKIN. In like manner insensibility may spring from apathy, for he who has no feeling is naturally not to be awakened to feeling, that is, he is unfeeling or insensible by constitution; but since his insensibility may spring from other causes besides those that are natural, he may be insensible without having apathy; 'I look upon Iseus not only as the most eloquent but the most happy of men; as I shall esteem you the most insensible if you appear to slight his acquaintance.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny). Moreover, it is observable that between insensibility and apathy there is this farther distinction, that the former refers only to our capacity for being moved by the outward objects that surround us; whereas apathy denotes an entire internal deadness of all the feelings: but we may be insensible to the present external objects from the total absorption of all the powers and feelings in one distant object; 'To remain insensible of such provocations, is not constancy, but apathy.'—SOUTH.

INDIFFERENT, UNCONCERNED, REGARDLESS.

Indifferent (v. Indifference) marks the want of inclination: unconcerned, that is, having no concern (v. Care); and regardless, that is, without regard (v. Care); mark the want of serious consideration.

Indifferent respects only the will, unconcerned either the will or the understanding, regardless the understanding only; we are indifferent about matters of minor consideration: we are unconcerned or regardless about serious matters that have remote consequences; an author will seldom be indifferent about the success of his work; he ought not to be unconcerned about the influence which his writings may have on the publick, or regardless of the estimation in which his own character as a man may be held. To be indifferent is sometimes an act of wisdom or virtue; to be unconcerned or regardless is mostly an act of folly or a breach of duty.

When the object is purely of a personal nature, it is but treating it as it deserves if we are indifferent about it; hence a wise man is indifferent about the applause of the multitude; 'As an author I am perfectly indifferent to the judgement of all except the few who are really judicious.'—COWPER. As religion should be the object of our concern, if we are unconcerned about any thing connected with it, the fault is in ourselves: a good parent will never be unconcerned about the religious education of his children;

Not the most cruel of our conquering foes,
So unconcern'dly can relate our woes.—DENHAM.

Whatever tends to increase our knowledge or to add to the comfort of others, ought to excite our regard; if therefore we are regardless of these things, we betray a culpable want of feeling; a good child will never be regardless of the admonition of a parent;

Regardless of my words, he no reply
Returns.—DRYDEN.

SENSIBLE, SENSITIVE, SENTIENT.

All these epithets, which are derived from the same source (v. To feel), have obviously a great sameness of meaning, though not of application. 'Sensible and sensitive both denote the capacity of being moved to feeling: sentient implies the very act of feeling. Sensible expresses either a habit of the body and mind, or only a particular state referring to some particular object; a person may be sensible of things in general, or sensible of cold, or sensible of injuries, or sensible of the kindnesses which he has received from an individual;

And with affection wondrous sensible,
He wrung Bassanio's hand, and so they parted
SHAKESPEARE.

Sensitive signifies always an habitual or permanent quality; it is the characteristic of objects; a sensitive creature implies one whose sense is by distinction quickly to be acted upon: a sensitive plant is a peculiar species of plants, marked for the property of having sense or being sensible of the touch; 'Those creatures live more alone whose food, and therefore prey, is upon other sensitive creatures.'—TEMPLE.

Sensible and sensitive have always a reference to external objects; but sentient expresses simply the possession of feeling, or the power of feeling, and excludes the idea of the cause. Hence, the terms sensible and sensitive are applied only to persons or corporeal objects; but sentient is likewise applicable to spirits; sentient beings may include angels as well as men; 'This acting of the sentient phantasy is performed by the presence of sense, as the horse is under the sense of hunger, and that without any formal syllogism presseth him to eat.'—HALE.

SENSUALIST, VOLUPTUARY, EPICURE.

The sensualist lives for the indulgence of his senses, the voluptuary, from voluptas pleasure, is devoted to his pleasures, and as far as these pleasures are the pleasures of sense, the voluptuary is a sensualist: the epicure, from the philosopher Epicurus, who is charged with having been the votary of pleasure, is one who makes the pleasures of sense his god, and in this sense he is a sensualist and a voluptuary. In the application of these terms, however, the sensualist is one who is a slave to the grossest appetites; 'Let the sensualist satisfy himself as he is able; he will find that there is a certain living spark within which all the drink he can pour in will never be able to quench.'—SOUTH. The voluptuary is one who studies his pleasures so as to make them the most valuable to himself; 'To fill up the drawing of this personage, he conceived a voluptuary, who in his person should be bloated and blown up to the size of a Silenus; lazy, luxurious, in sensuality; in intemperance a bacchanalian.'—CUMBERLAND. The epicure is a species of voluptuary who practises more than ordinary refinement in the choice of his pleasures; 'What epicure can be always plying his palate?'—SOUTH.

SENTENTIOUS, SENTIMENTAL

Sententious signifies having or abounding in sentences or judgements: sentimental, having sentiment (v. Opinion). Books and authors are termed sententious; but travellers, society, intercourse, correspondence, and the like, are characterized as sentimental. Moralists like Dr. Johnson are termed sententious, whose words and conversation abound in moral sentences; 'His (Mr. Ferguson's) love of Montesquieu and Tacitus has led him into a manner of writing too short-winded and sententious.'—GRAY. Novelists and romance writers, like Mrs. Radcliffe, are properly sentimental; 'In books, whether moral or amusing, there are no passages more captivating than those delicate strokes of sentimental morality which refer our actions to the determination of feeling.'—MACKENZIE. Sententious books always serve for improvement; sentimental works, unless they are of a superiour order, are in general hurtful.

SENTIMENT, SENSATION, PERCEPTION.

Sentiment and sensation are obviously derived from the same source, namely, from the Greek αἴσθησις to make intelligent, and αἰσθάνω to understand; perception, from perceive (v. To see), expresses the act of perceiving, or the impressions produced by perceiving.

The impressions which objects make upon the person are designated by all these terms; but the sentiment has its seat in the heart, the sensation is confined to the senses, and the perception rests in the understanding. Sentiments are lively, sensations are grateful, perceptions are clear.

Gratitude is a sentiment the most pleasing to the human mind;

Alike to council, or the assembly came,
With equal souls and sentiments the same.—POPE.

The sensation produced by the action of electricity on the frame is generally unpleasant; 'Diversity of constitution, or other circumstances, vary the sensations, and to them Java pepper is cold.'—GLANVILLE. A nice perception of objects is one of the first requisites for perfection in any art; 'Matter hath no life nor perception, and is not conscious of its own existence.'

—BENTLEY *The sentiment extends to the manners and morals, and renders us alive to the happiness or misery of others as well as our own; 'I am framing every possible pretence to live hereafter according to my own taste and sentiments.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero). The sensation is purely physical; it makes us alive only to the effects of external objects on our physical organs; 'When we describe our sensations of another's sorrows in condolence, the customs of the world scarcely admit of rigid veracity.'—JOHNSON. Perceptions carry us into the district of science; they give us an interest in all the surrounding objects as intellectual observers;

When first the trembling eye receives the day,
External forms on young perception play.

LANGHORNE.

A man of spirit or courage receives marks of honour, or affronts, with very different sentiments from the poltroon: he who bounds his happiness by the present fleeting existence must be careful to remove every painful sensation: we judge of objects as complex or simple, according to the number of perceptions which they produce in us.

'TO FEEL, BE SENSIBLE, CONSCIOUS.

From the simple idea of a sense, the word feel has acquired the most extensive signification and application in our language, and may be employed indifferently for all the other terms, but not in all cases: to feel is said of the whole frame, inwardly and outwardly; it is the accompaniment of existence: to be sensible, from the Latin sentio, is said only of the senses. It is the property of all living creatures to feel pleasure and pain in a greater or a less degree: those creatures which have not the sense of hearing will not be sensible of sounds.

In the moral application, to feel is peculiarly the property or act of the heart; to be sensible is that of the understanding: an ingenuous mind feels pain when it is sensible of having committed an error: one may, however, feel as well as be sensible by means of the understanding: a person feels the value of another's services, he is sensible of his kindness.

One feels or is sensible of what passes outwardly one is conscious only of what passes inwardly, from con or cum and scio to know to oneself: we feel the force of another's remark; 'The devout man does not only believe, but feels there is a Deity.'—ADDISON. We are sensible of the evil which must spring from the practice of vice; 'There is, doubtless, a faculty in spirits by which they apprehend one another, as our senses do material objects; and there is no question but our souls, when they are disembodied, will, by this faculty, be always sensible of the Divine presence.'—ADDISON. We are conscious of having fallen short of our duty;

A creature of a more exalted kind
Was wanting yet, and then was man design'd;
Conscious of thought, of more capacious breast,
For empire form'd, and fit to rule the rest.—DRYDEN

FEELING, SENSATION, SENSE.

Feeling and sensation express either the particular act, or the general property of feeling; sense expresses the general property, or the particular mode of feeling. Feeling is, as before (v. To feel), the general, sensation and sense are the special terms: the feeling is either physical or moral; the sensation is mostly physical; the sense physical in the general, and moral in the particular application.

We speak either of the feeling or sensation of cold. the feeling or sense of virtue: it is not easy to describe the feelings which are excited by the cutting of cork, or the sharpening of a saw; 'I am sure the natural feeling, as I have just said, is a far more predominant ingredient in this war, than in that of any other that was ever waged by this kingdom.'—BURKE. The sensation which pervades the frame after bathing is exceedingly grateful to one who is accustomed to the water; 'Those ideas to which any agreeable sensation is annexed are easily excited, as leaving behind them the most strong and permanent impressions.'—SOMERVILLE. The pleasures of sense are not comparable with those of intellect;

In distances of things, their shapes, and size,
Our reason judges better than our eyes;
Declares not this the soul's pre-eminence,
Superiour to, and quite distinct from sense?

JENYNS.

The term feeling is most adapted to ordinary discourse; sensation is a term better suited to the grave or scientific style: a child may talk of an unpleasant feeling; a professional man talks of the sensation of giddiness, a gnawing sensation, or of sensations from the rocking of a vessel, the motion of a carriage, and the like: it is our duty to command and curb our feelings; it is folly to watch every passing sensation.

The feeling, in a moral sense, has its seat in the heart; it is transitory and variable; 'Their king, out of a princely feeling, was sparing and compassionate towards his subjects.'—BACON. Sense has its seat in the understanding; it is permanent and regular. We may have feelings of anger, ill-will, envy, and the like, which cannot be too quickly overpowered, and succeeded by those of love, charity, and benevolence; although there is no feeling, however good, which does not require to be kept under control by a proper sense of religion; 'This Basilus having the quick sense of a lover took as though his mistress had given him a secret reprehension.'—SIDNEY.

FEELING, SENSIBILITY, SUSCEPTIBILITY.

Feeling, in the present case, is taken for a positive characteristic, namely, the property of feeling (v. To feel) in a strong degree; in this sense feeling expresses either a particular act, or an habitual property of the mind; sensibility is always taken in the sense of a habit. Traits of feeling in young people are happy omens in the estimation of the preceptor; 'Gentleness is native feeling improved by principle.'—BLAIR. An exquisite sensibility is not a desirable gift; it creates an infinite disproportion of pains; 'Modesty is a kind of quick and delicate feeling in the soul; it is such an exquisite sensibility, as warns a woman to shun the first appearance of any thing hurtful.—ADDISON. This term, like that of feeling, may sometimes be taken in a general sense, but still it expresses the idea more strongly; 'By long habit in carrying a burden we lose in great part our sensibility of its weight.'—JOHNSON. Feeling and sensibility are here taken as moral properties, which are awakened as much by the operations of the mind within itself as by external objects: susceptibility, from the Latin suscipio to take or receive, designates that property of the body or the mind which consists in being ready to take an affection from external objects; hence we speak of a person's susceptibility to take cold, or his susceptibility to be affected with grief, joy, or any other passion: if an excess of sensibility be an evil, an excess of susceptibility is a still greater evil; it makes us a slave to every circumstance, however trivial, which comes under our notice; 'It pleases me to think that it was from a principle of gratitude in me, that my mind was susceptible of such generous transport (in my dreams) when I thought myself repaying the kindness of my friend.'—BYRON.

HUMAN, HUMANE.

Though both derived from homo a man, they are thus far distinguished, that human is said of the genus, and humane of the species. The human race or human beings are opposed to the irrational part of the creation; a humane race or a humane individual is opposed to one that is cruel and fond of inflicting pain. He who is not human is divested of the first and distinguishing characteristics of his kind; 'Christianity has rescued human nature from that ignominious yoke, under which in former times the one-half of mankind groaned.'—BLAIR. He who is not humane, is divested of the most important and elevated characteristic that belongs to his nature;

Life, fill'd with grief's distressful train,
For ever asks the tear humane.—LANGHORNE.

TO NOURISH, NURTURE, CHERISH.

To nourish and nurture are but variations from the same Latin verb nutrio; cherish, from the French cher, and the Latin carus dear, to treat as something dear to one.

The thing nourishes, the person nurtures and cherishes: to nourish is to afford bodily strength, to supply the physical necessities of the body; to nurture is to extend one's care to the supply of all its physical necessities, to preserve life, occasion growth, and increase vigour: the breast of the mother nourishes;

Air, and ye elements, the eldest birth
Of nature's womb, that in quaternion run
Perpetual circle, multiform; and mix
And nourish all things.—MILTON.

The fostering care and attention of the mother nurtures; 'They suppose mother earth to be a great animal, and to have nurtured up her young offspring with conscious tenderness.'—BENTLEY To nurture is a physical act; to cherish is a mental as well as a physical act: a mother nurtures her infant while it is entirely dependent upon her; she cherishes her child in her bosom, and protects it from every misfortune, or affords consolation in the midst of all its troubles, when it is no longer an infant;

Of thy superfluous brood, she 'll cherish kind
The alien offspring.—SOMERVILLE.

TO FOSTER, CHERISH, HARBOUR, INDULGE.

To foster is probably connected with father, in the natural sense, to bring up with a parent's care; to cherish, from the Latin carus dear, is to feed with affection; to harbour, from a harbour or haven, is to provide with a shelter and protection; to indulge, from the Latin dulcis sweet, is to render sweet and agreeable. These terms are all employed here in the moral acceptance, to express the idea of giving nourishment to an object.

To foster in the mind is to keep with care and positive endeavours: as when one fosters prejudices by encouraging every thing which favours them; 'Th greater part of those who live but to infuse malignity and multiply enemies, have no hopes to foster, no designs to promote, nor any expectations of attaining power by insolence.'—JOHNSON. To cherish in the mind is to hold dear or set a value upon; as when one cherishes good sentiments, by dwelling upon them with inward satisfaction; 'As social inclinations are absolutely necessary to the well being of the world, it is the duty and interest of every individual to cherish and improve them to the benefit of mankind.'—BERKELEY To harbour is to allow room in the mind, and is generally taken in the worst sense, for giving admission to that which ought to be excluded; as when one harbours resentment by permitting it to have a resting place in the heart;

This is scorn,
Which the fair soul of gentle Athenais
Would ne'er have harbour'd.—LEE.

To indulge in the mind, is to give the whole mind to any thing, to make it the chief source of pleasure; as when one indulges an affection, by making the will and the outward conduct bend to its gratifications; 'The king (Charles I.) would indulge no refinements of casuistry, however plausible, in such delicate subjects, and was resolved, that what depredations soever fortune should commit upon him, she never should deprive him of his honour.'—HUME.

He who fosters pride in his breast lays up for himself a store of mortification in his intercourse with the world; it is the duty of a man to cherish sentiments of tenderness and kindness towards the woman whom he has made the object of his choice; nothing evinces the innate depravity of the human heart more forcibly than the spirit of malice, which some men harbour for years together; any affection of the mind, if indulged beyond the bounds of discretion, will become a hurtful passion, that may endanger the peace of society as much as that of the individual.

TO CARESS, FONDLE.

Both these terms mark a species of endearment; caress, like cherish, comes from the French chérir, and cher, Latin carus dear, signifying the expression of a tender sentiment; fondle, from fond, is a frequentative verb, signifying to become fond of, or express one's fondness for.

We caress by words or actions; we fondle by actions only: caresses are not always unsuitable; but fondling, which is the extreme of caressing, is not less unfit for the one who receives than for the one who gives: animals caress each other, as the natural mode of indicating their affection; fondling, which is for the most part the expression of perverted feeling, is peculiar to human beings, who alone abuse the faculties with which they are endowed.

TO CLASP, HUG, EMBRACE.

To clasp, from the noun clasp, signifies to lay hold of like a clasp; hug, in Saxon hogan, comes from the German hagen, which signifies to enclose with a hedge, and figuratively to cherish or take special care of; embrace, in French embrasser, is compounded of en or in and bras the arm, signifying to take or lock in the arms.

All these terms are employed to express the act of enclosing another in one's arms: clasp marks this action when it is performed with the warmth of true affection; hug is a ludicrous sort of clasping, which is the consequence of ignorance and extravagant feeling; embrace is simply a mode of ordinary salutation: a parent will clasp his long-lost child in his arms on their remeeting;

Thy suppliant,
I beg, and clasp thy knees.—MILTON.

A peasant in the excess of his raptures would throw his body, as well as his arms, over the object of his joy, and stifle with hugging him whom he meant to love;

Thyself a boy, assume a boy's dissembled face,
That when amid the fervour of the feast
The Tyrian hugs and fonds thee on her breast,
Thou mayest infuse thy venom in her veins.

DRYDEN.

In the continental parts of Europe embracing between males, as well as females, is universal on meeting after a long absence, or on taking leave for a length of time; embraces are sometimes given in England between near relatives, but in no other case; 'The king at length having kindly reproached Helim for depriving him so long of such a brother, embraced Bal-sora with the greatest tenderness.'—ADDISON.

Clasp may also be employed in the same sense for other objects besides persons;

Some more aspiring catch the neighbouring shrub,
With clasping tendrils, and invest her branch.

COWPER.

Embrace may be employed figuratively in the sense of including (v. Comprehend).

INDULGENT, FOND.

Indulgent signifies disposed to indulge; fond, from to find, signifies trying to find, longing for.

Indulgence lies more in forbearing from the exercise of authority; fondness in the outward behaviour and endearments: they may both arise from an excess of kindness or love; but the former is of a less objectionable character than the latter. Indulgence may be sometimes wrong; but fondness is seldom right: an indulgent parent is seldom a prudent parent; but a fond parent does not rise above a fool: all who have the care of young people should occasionally relax from the strictness of the disciplinarian, and show an indulgence where a suitable opportunity offers; a fond mother takes away from the value of indulgences by an invariable compliance with the humours of her children: however, when applied generally or abstractedly, they are both taken in a good sense;

God then thro' all creation gives, we find,
Sufficient marks of an indulgent mind —JENYNS.

While, for a while his fond paternal care,
Feasts us with every joy our state can bear. —JENYNS.

AMOROUS, LOVING, FOND.

Amorous, from amor love, signifies full of love; loving, the act of loving, that is, of continually loving; fond has the same signification as given under the head of Indulgent, fond.

These epithets are all used to mark the excess or distortion of a tender sentiment. Amorous is taken in a criminal sense, loving and fond in a contemptuous sense: an indiscriminate and dishonourable attachment to the fair sex characterizes the amorous man; 'I shall range all old amorous dotards under the denomination of grinners.'—STEELE. An overweening and childish attachment to any object marks the loving and fond person.

Loving is less dishonourable than fond: men may be loving;

So loving to my mother
That he would not let ev'n the winds of heaven
Visit her face too roughly. —SHAKESPEARE.

Children, females, and brutes may be fond; 'I'm a foolish fond wife.'—ADDISON. Those who have not a well regulated affection for each other will be loving by fits and starts; children and animals who have no control over their appetites will be apt to be fond of those who indulge them. An amorous temper should be suppressed; a loving temper should be regulated; a fond temper should be checked. When loving and fond are applied generally, they may sometimes be taken in a good or indifferent sense;

This place may seem for shepherds' leisure made,
So lovingly these elms unite their shade. —PHILLIPS.

'My impatience for your return, my anxiety for your welfare, and my fondness for my dear Ulysses, were the only distempers that preyed upon my life.'—ADDISON.

AMIALE, LOVELY, BELOVED.

Amiable, in Latin amabilis, from amo and habilis, signifies fit to be loved; lovely, compounded of love and ly or like, signifies like that which we love: beloved, having or receiving love.

The first two express the fitness of an object to awaken the sentiment of love; the latter expresses the state of being in actual possession of that love. The amiable designates that sentiment in its most spiritual form, as it is awakened by purely spiritual objects; the lovely applies to this sentiment as it is awakened by sensible objects.

One is amiable according to the qualities of the heart: one is lovely according to the external figure and manners; one is beloved according to the circumstances that bring him or her into connexion with others. Hence it is that things as well as persons may be lovely or beloved; but persons only, or that which is personal, is amiable;

Sweet Auburn, loveliest village of the plain.

GOLDSMITH.

Sorrow would be a rarity most belov'd,
If all could so become it. —SHAKESPEARE.

An amiable disposition, without a lovely person, will render a person beloved; 'Tully has a very beautiful gradation of thoughts to show how amiable virtue is. "We love a virtuous man," says he, "who lives in the remotest parts of the earth, although we are altogether out of the reach of his virtue, and can receive from it no manner of benefit."—ADDISON. It is distressing to see any one who is lovely in person unamiable in character

AMICABLE, FRIENDLY.

Amicable, from amicus a friend, signifies able or fit for a friend; friendly, like a friend. The word amicus comes from amo to love, and friend in the northern languages from fregan to love. Amicable and friendly therefore both denote the tender sentiment of goodwill which all men ought to bear one to another; but amicable rather implies a negative sentiment, a freedom from discordance; and friendly a positive feeling of regard, the absence of indifference.

We make an amicable accommodation, and a friendly visit. It is a happy thing when people who have been at variance can amicably adjust all their disputes. Nothing adds more to the charms of society than a friendly correspondence.

Amicable is always said of persons who have been in connexion with each other; friendly may be applied to those who are perfect strangers. Neighbours must always endeavour to live amicably with each other; 'What first presents itself to be recommended is a disposition averse to offence, and desirous of cultivating harmony, and amicable intercourse in society.'—BLAIR. Travellers should always endeavour to keep up a friendly intercourse with the inhabitants, wherever they come;

Who slake his thirst; who spread the friendly board
To give the famish'd Bellisarius food? —PHILLIPS.

The abstract terms of the preceding qualities admit of no variation but in the signification of friendship, which marks an individual feeling only; to live amicably, or in amity with all men, is a point of Christian duty, but we cannot live in friendship with all men; since friendship must be confined to a few;

Beasts of each kind their fellows spare;
Bear lives in amity with bear. —JOHNSON.

'Every man might, in the multitudes that swarm about him, find some kindred mind with which he could unite in confidence and friendship.'—JOHNSON.

AFFECTION, LOVE.

Affection denotes the state of being kindly affected towards a person; love, in Low German leeve, High German liebe, from the English lieve, Low German leef, High German lieb dear or pleasing, the Latin libet it is pleasing, and by metathesis from the Greek φίλος dear, signifies the state of holding a person dear.

These words express two sentiments of the heart which do honour to human nature; they are the bonds by which mankind are knit to each other. Both imply good-will: but affection is a tender sentiment that dwells with pleasure on the object; love is a tender sentiment accompanied with longing for the object: we cannot have love without affection, but we may have affection without love.

Love is the natural sentiment between near relations: affection subsists between those who are less intimately connected, being the consequence either of relationship, friendship, or long intercourse; it is the sweetener of human society, which carries with it a thousand charms, in all the varied modes of kindness which it gives birth to; it is not so active as love, but it diffuses itself wider, and embraces a larger number of objects.

Love is powerful in its effects, awakening vivid sentiments of pleasure or pain; it is a passion exclusive, restless, and capricious. Affection is a chastened feeling under the control of the understanding; it promises no more pleasure than it gives, and has but few alloys. Marriage may begin with love; but it ought to terminate in affection;

But thou, whose years are more to mine allied,
No fate my vow'd affection shall divide
From thee, heroic youth!—DRYDEN.

*The poets, the moralists, the painters, in all their descriptions, allegories, and pictures, have represented love as a soft torment, a bitter sweet, a pleasing pain, or an agreeable distress.—ADDISON.

AFFECTIONATE, KIND, FOND.

Affectionate denotes the quality of having affection (v. Affection); kind, from the word kind kindred or family, denotes the quality or feeling engendered by the family tie; fond, from find, denotes a vehement attachment to a thing.

Affectionate and fond characterize feelings, or the expression of those feelings; kind is an epithet applied to outward actions, as well as inward feelings; a disposition is affectionate or fond; a behaviour is kind.

Affection is a settled state of the mind; kindness, a temporary state of feeling, mostly discoverable by some outward sign: both are commendable and honourable, as to the nature of the feelings themselves, the objects of the feelings, and the manner in which they display themselves; the understanding always approves the kindness which affection dictates, or that which springs from a tender heart. Fondness is a less respectable feeling; it is sometimes the excess of affection, or an extravagant mode of expressing it, or an attachment to an inferior object.

A person is affectionate, who has the object of his regard strongly in his mind, who participates in his pleasures and pains, and is pleased with his society. A person is kind, who expresses a tender sentiment, or does any service in a pleasant manner; 'Our salutations were very hearty on both sides, consisting of many kind shakes of the hand, and affectionate looks which we cast upon one another.'—ADDISON. A person is fond, who caresses an object, or makes it a source of pleasure to himself; 'Riches expose a man to pride and luxury, a foolish elation of heart, and too great fondness for the present world.'—ADDISON.

Relatives should be affectionate to each other: we should be kind to all who stand in need of our kindness: children are fond of whatever affords them pleasure, or of whoever gives them indulgences.

ATTACHMENT, AFFECTION, INCLINATION.

Attachment respects persons and things; affection (v. Affection) regards persons only; inclination has respect to things mostly, but it may be applied to objects generally.

Attachment, as it regards persons, is not so powerful or solid as affection. Children are attached to those who will minister to their gratifications; they have an attachment for their nearest and dearest relatives.

Attachment is sometimes a tender sentiment between the persons of different sexes; affection is an affair of the heart without distinction of sex. The passing attachments of young people are seldom entitled to serious notice; although sometimes they may ripen by long intercourse into a laudable and steady affection; 'Though devoted to the study of philosophy, and a great master in the early science of the times, Solon mixed with cheerfulness in society, and did not hold back from those tender ties and attachments which connect a man to the world.'—CUMBERLAND. Nothing is so delightful as to see affection among brothers and sisters; 'When I was sent to school, the gayety of my look, and the liveliness of my loquacity, soon gained me admission to hearts not yet fortified against affection by artifice or interest.'—JOHNSON. Attachment is more powerful than inclination; the latter is a rising sentiment, the forerunner of attachment, which is positive and fixed; 'I am glad that he whom I must have loved from duty, whatever he had been, is such a one as I can love from inclination.'—STEELE.

As respects things generally, attachment and inclination are similarly distinguished. We strive to obtain that to which we are attached; but an inclination seldom leads to any effort for possession. Little minds are always betraying their attachment to trifles. It is the character of indifference not to show an inclination to any thing. Attachments are formed; inclinations arise of themselves.

Interest, similarity of character, or habit give rise to attachment; 'The Jews are remarkable for an attachment to their own country.'—ADDISON. A natural warmth of temper gives birth to various inclinations; 'A mere inclination to a thing is not properly a willing of that thing; and yet, in matters of duty, men frequently reckon it for such.'—SOUTH.

Suppress the first inclination to gaming, lest it grows into an attachment.

BENEVOLENCE, BENIGNITY, HUMANITY, KINDNESS, TENDERNESS.

Benevolence, from bene and volō to will, signifies wishing well; benignity, in Latin benignitas, from bene and gigno, signifies the quality or disposition for producing good; humanity, in French humanité, Latin humanitas from humanus and homo, signifies the quality of belonging to a man, or having what is common to man; kindness is the abstract quality of kind (v. Affectionate); tenderness, the abstract quality of tender, from the Latin tener, Greek repō.

Benevolence and benignity lie in the will; humanity lies in the heart; kindness and tenderness in the affections: benevolence indicates a general good-will to all mankind; benignity a particular good-will, flowing out of certain relations; humanity is a general tone of feeling; kindness and tenderness are particular modes of feeling.

Benevolence consists in the wish or intention to do good; it is confined to no station or object: the benevolent man may be rich or poor, and his benevolence will be exerted wherever there is an opportunity of doing good: benignity is always associated with power, and accompanied with condescension.

Benevolence in its fullest sense is the sum of moral excellence, and comprehends every other virtue; when taken in this acceptance, benignity, humanity, kindness, and tenderness are but modes of benevolence.

Benevolence and benignity tend to the communicating of happiness; humanity is concerned in the removal of evil. Benevolence is common to the Creator and his creatures; it differs only in degree; the former has the knowledge and power as well as the will to do good; man often has the will to do good without having the power to carry it into effect; 'I have heard say, that Pope Clement XI. never passes through the people, who always kneel in crowds and ask his benediction, but the tears are seen to flow from his eyes. This must proceed from an imagination that he is the father of all these people, and that he is touched with so extensive a benevolence, that it breaks out into a passion of tears.'—STEELE. Benignity is ascribed to the stars, to heaven, or to princes; ignorant and superstitious people are apt to ascribe their good fortune to the benign influence of the stars rather than to the gracious dispensations of Providence; 'A constant benignity in commerce with the rest of the world, which ought to run through all a man's actions, has effects more useful to those whom you oblige, and is less ostentatious in yourself.'—STEELE. Humanity belongs to man only; it is his peculiar characteristic, and ought at all times to be his boast; when he throws off this his distinguishing badge, he loses every thing valuable in him; it is a virtue that is indispensable in his present suffering condition: humanity is as universal in its application as benevolence; wherever there is distress, humanity flies to its relief; 'The greatest wits I have conversed with are men eminent for their humanity.'—ADDISON. Kindness and tenderness are partial modes of affection, confined to those who know or are related to each other: we are kind to friends and acquaintances, tender towards those who are near and dear: kindness is a mode of affection most fitted for social beings; it is what every one can show, and every one is pleased to receive; 'Benevolence, would the followers of Epicurus say, is all founded in weakness; and whatever be pretended, the kindness that passeth between men and men is by every man directed to himself. This it must be confessed is of a piece with that hopeful philosophy which, having patched man up out of the four elements, attributes his being to chance.'—GROVE. Tenderness is a state of feeling that is occasionally acceptable: the young and the weak demand tenderness from those who stand in the closest connexion with them, but this feeling may be carried to an excess so as to injure the object on which it is fixed; 'Dependence is a perpetual call upon humanity, and a greater incitement to tenderness and pity than any other motive whatsoever.'—ADDISON.

There are no circumstances or situation in life which preclude the exercise of benevolence: next to the pleasure of making others happy, the benevolent man rejoices in seeing them so; the benign influence of a benevolent monarch extends to the remotest corner of his dominions; benignity is a becoming attribute for a prince, when it does not lead him to sanction vice by its impunity; it is highly to be applauded in him as far as it renders him forgiving of minor offences, gracious to all who are deserving of his favours, and ready to afford a gratification, to all whom it is in his power to serve: the multiplied misfortunes to which all men are exposed afford ample scope for the exercise of humanity, which, in consequence of the unequal distribution of wealth, power, and talent, is peculiar to no situation of life; even the profession of arms does not exclude humanity from the breasts of its followers: and when we observe men's habits of thinking in various situations, we may remark that the soldier, with arms by his side, is commonly more humane than the partisan with arms in his hands. Kindness is always an amiable feeling, and in a grateful mind always begets kindness; but it is sometimes ill bestowed upon selfish people who requite it by making fresh exactions; tenderness is frequently little better than an amiable weakness, when directed to a wrong end, and fixed on an improper object; the false tenderness of parents has often been the ruin of children.

LOVE, FRIENDSHIP.

Love (v. Affection) is a term of very extensive import; it may be either taken in the most general sense for every strong and passionate attachment, or only for such as subsist between the sexes; in either of which cases it has features by which it has been easily distinguished from friendship.

Love subsists between members of the same family; it springs out of their natural relationship, and is kept alive by their close intercourse and constant interchange of kindnesses: friendship excludes the idea of any tender and natural relationship; nor is it, like love, to be found in children, but is confined to maturer years; it is formed by time, by circumstances, by congruity of character, and sympathy of sentiment. Love always operates with ardour; friendship is remarkable for firmness and constancy. Love is peculiar to no station: it is to be found equally among the high and the low, the learned and the unlearned: friendship is of nobler growth; it finds admittance only into minds of a loftier make; it cannot be felt by men of an ordinary stamp.

Both love and friendship are gratified by seeking the good of the object; but love is more selfish in its nature than friendship; in indulging another it seeks its own, and when this is not to be obtained, it will change into the contrary passion of hatred; friendship, on the other hand, is altogether disinterested, it makes sacrifices of every description, and knows no limits to its sacrifice. As love is a passion, it has all the errors attendant upon passion; but friendship, which is an affection tempered by reason, is exempt from every such exceptionable quality. Love is blind to the faults of the object of its devotion; it adores, it idolizes, it is fond, it is foolish: friendship sees faults, and strives to correct them; it aims to render the object more worthy of esteem and regard. Love is capricious, humourous, and changeable; it will not bear contradiction, disappointment, nor any cross or untoward circumstance: friendship is stable; it withstands the rudest blasts, and is unchanged by the severest shocks of adversity; neither the smiles nor frowns of fortune can change its form, its serene and placid countenance is unruined by the rude blasts of adversity; it rejoices and sympathizes in prosperity; it cheers, consoles, and assists in adversity. Love is exclusive in its nature: it insists upon a devotion to a single object; it is jealous of any intrusion from others: friendship is liberal and communicative; it is bounded by nothing but rules of prudence; it is not confined as to the number but as to the nature of the objects.

When love is not produced by any social relation, it has its groundwork in sexuality, and subsists only between persons of different sexes; in this case it has all the former faults with which it is chargeable to a still greater degree, and others peculiar to itself; it is even more selfish, more capricious, more changeable, and more exclusive, than when subsisting between persons of the same kindred. Love is in this case as unreasonable in its choice of an object, as it is extravagant in its regards of the object; it is formed without examination; it is the effect of a sudden glance, the work of a moment, in which the heart is taken by surprise, and the understanding is discarded: friendship, on the other hand, is the entire work of the understanding; it does not admit of the senses or the heart to have any undue influence in the choice. A fine eye, a fair hand, a graceful step, are the authors of love; talent, virtue, fine sentiment, a good heart, and a sound head, are the promoters of friendship: love wants no excitement from personal merit; friendship cannot be produced without merit. Time, which is the consolidator of friendship, is the destroyer of love; an object improvidently chosen is as carelessly thrown aside; and that which was not chosen for its merits, is seldom rejected for its demerits, the fault lying rather in the humour of love, which can abate of its ardour as the novelty of the thing ceases, and transfer itself to other objects: friendship, on the other hand, is slow and cautious in choosing, and still more gradual in the confirmation, as it rests on virtue and excellence; it grows only with the growth of one's acquaintance, and ripens with the maturity of esteem. Love, while it lasts, subsists even by those very means which may seem rather calculated to extinguish it; namely, caprice, disdain, cruelty, absence, jealousy, and the like;

So every passion, but fond love,
Unto its own redress does move.—WALLER.

Friendship is supported by nothing artificial; it depends upon reciprocity of esteem, which nothing but solid qualities can ensure or render durable;

For natural affection soon doth cease,
And quenched is with Cupid's greater flame,
But faithful friendship doth them both suppress,
And them with mastering discipline doth tame.

SPENSER.

In the last place, love when misdirected is dangerous and mischievous; in ordinary cases it awakens flattering hopes and delusive dreams, which end in disappointment and mortification; and in some cases it is the origin of the most frightful evils; there is nothing more atrocious than what has owed its origin to slighted love: but friendship, even if mistaken, will awaken no other feeling than that of pity; when a friend proves faithless or wicked, he is lamented as one who has fallen from the high estate to which we thought him entitled.

LOVER, SUITOR, WOOER.

Lover signifies literally one who loves, and is applicable to any object; there are lovers of money, and lovers of wine, lovers of things individually, and things collectively, that is, lovers of particular women in the good sense, or lovers of women in the bad sense, but lover, taken absolutely, signifies one who feels or professes his love for a female: 'It is very natural for a young friend, and a young lover, to think the persons they love have nothing to do but to please them.'—POPE. The suitor is one who sues and strives after a thing; the term is equally undefined as to the object, but may be employed for such as sue for favours from their superiors, or sue for the affections and person of a female; 'What pleasure can it be to be thronged with petitioners, and those perhaps suitors for the same thing?'—SOUTH. 'The wooer is only a species of lover, who wooos or solicits the kind regards of a female; 'I am glad this parcel of wooers are so reasonable, for there is not one of them but I dote on his very absence.'—SHAKESPEARE. When applied to the same object, namely, the female sex, the lover is employed or persons of all ranks, who are equally alive to the tender passion of love: suitors is a title adapted to that class of life where all the genuine affections of human nature are adulterated by a false refinement, or entirely lost in other passions of a guilty nature. Wooer is a tender and passionate title, which is adapted to that class of beings that live only in poetry and romance. There is most sincerity in the lover, he simply proffers his love; there is most ceremony in the suitors, he prefers his suit; there is most ardour in the wooer, he makes his vows.

GALLANT, BEAU, SPARK.

These words convey nothing respectful of the person to whom they are applied; but the first, as is evident from its derivation, has something in it to recommend it to attention above the others: as true valour is ever associated with a regard for the fair sex, a gallant man will always be a gallant when he can render the female any service; sometimes, however, his gallantries may be such as to do them harm rather than good;

The god of wit, and light, and arts,
With all acquir'd and natural parts,
Was an unfortunate gallant.—SWIFT.

Insignificance and effeminacy characterize the beau or fine gentleman; he is the woman's man—the humble servant to supply the place of a laquay;

His pride began to interpose,
Preferr'd before a crowd of beaux.—SWIFT.

The spark has but a spark of that fire which shows itself in impertinent puerilities; it is applicable to youth who are just broke loose from school or college, and eager to display their manhood;

Oft it has been my lot to mark
A proud, conceited, talking spark.—MERRICK.

MALEVOLENT, MALICIOUS, MALIGNANT.

These words have all their derivation from malus bad: that is, malevolent, wishing ill; malicious (v. Malice), having an evil disposition; and malignant, having an evil tendency.

Malevolence has a deep root in the heart, and is a settled part of the character; we denominate the person malevolent, to designate the ruling temper of his mind: maliciousness may be applied as an epithet to particular parts of a man's character or conduct; one may have a malicious joy or pleasure in seeing the distresses of another: malignity is not employed to characterize the person, but the thing; the malignity of a design is estimated by the degree of mischief which was intended to be done. Whenever malevolence has taken possession of the heart, all the sources of goodwill are dried up; a stream of evil runs through the whole frame, and contaminates every moral feeling; the being who is under such an unhappy influence neither thinks nor does any thing but what is evil; 'I have often known very lasting malevolence excited by unlucky censures.'—JOHNSON. A malicious disposition is that branch of malevolence which is the next to it in the blackness of its character; it differs, however, in this, that malice will, in general, lie dormant, until it is provoked;

Greatness, the earnest of malicious Fate
For future wo, was never meant a good.

SOUTHERN.

But malevolence is as active and unceasing in its operations for mischief, as its opposite, benevolence, is in wishing and doing good.

Malicious and malignant are both applied to things; but the former is applied to those which are of a personal nature, the latter to objects purely inanimate: a story or tale is termed malicious, which emanates from a malicious disposition; a star is termed malignant, which is supposed to have a bad or malignant influence;

Still horror reign'd, a dreary twilight round,
Of struggling night and day malignant mix'd

THOMSON.

MALICE, RANCOUR, SPITE, GRUDGE, PIQUE.

Malice, in Latin malitia, from malus bad, signifies the very essence of badness lying in the heart; rancour (v. Hatred) is only continued hatred: the former requires no external cause to provoke it, it is inherent in the mind; the latter must be caused by some personal offence. Malice is properly the love of evil for evil's sake, and is, therefore, confined to no number or quality of objects, and limited by no circumstance; rancour, as it depends upon external objects for its existence, so it is confined to such objects only as are liable to cause displeasure or anger: malice will impel a man to do mischief to those who have not injured him, and are perhaps strangers to him;

If any chance has hither brought the name
Of Palamedes, not unknown to fame,
Who suffer'd from the malice of the times.

DRYDEN

Rancour can subsist only between those who have had sufficient connexion to be at variance; 'Party spirit fills a nation with spleen and rancour.'—ADDISON.

Spite, from the Italian dispetto and the French despit, denotes a petty kind of malice, or disposition to offend another in trifling matters; it may be in the temper of the person, or it may have its source in some external provocation: children often show their spite to each other;

Can heav'nly minds such high resentment show,
Or exercise their spite in human wo!—DRYDEN.

Grudge, connected with grumble and groul, and pique, from pique, denoting the prick of a pointed instrument, are employed for that particular state of rancorous or spiteful feeling which is occasioned by personal offences: the grudge is that which has long existed;

The god of wit, to show his grudge,
Clapp'd asses' ears upon the judge.—SWIFT.

The pique is that which is of recent date; 'You may be sure the ladies are not wanting, on their side, in cherishing and improving these important piques, which divide the town almost into as many parties as there are families.'—LADY M. W. MONTAGUE. A person is said to owe another a grudge for having done him a disservice; or he is said to have a pique towards another, who has shown him an affront.

IMPLACABLE, UNRELENTING, RELENTLESS, INEXORABLE.

Implacable, unappeasable, signifies not to be allayed nor softened; unrelenting or relentless, from the Latin lenio to soften, or to make pliant, signifies not rendered soft; inexorable, from oro to pray, signifies not to be turned by prayers.

Inflexibility is the idea expressed in common by these terms, but they differ in the causes and circumstance with which it is attended. Animositates are implacable when no misery which we occasion can diminish their force, and no concessions on the part of the offender can lessen the spirit of revenge; 'Implacable as the enmity of the Mexicans was, they were so unacquainted with the science of war that they knew not how to take the proper measures for the destruction of the Spaniards.'—ROBERTSON. The mind or character of a man is unrelenting, when it is not to be turned from its purpose by a view of the pain which it inflicts;

These are the realms of unrelenting fate.—DRYDEN.

A man is inexorable who turns a deaf ear to every solicitation or entreaty that is made to induce him to lessen the rigour of his sentence;

You are more inhuman, more inexorable,
Oh, ten times more, than tigers of Hyrcania!

SHAKESPEARE.

A man's angry passions render him implacable; it is not the magnitude of the offence, but the temper of the offended that is here in question; by implacability he is rendered insensible to the misery he occasions, and to every satisfaction which the offender may offer him: fixeness of purpose renders a man unrelenting or relentless; an unrelenting temper is not less callous to the misery produced, than an implacable temper; but it is not grounded always on resentment for personal injuries, but sometimes on a certain principle of right and a sense of necessity: the inexorable man adheres to his rule, as the unrelenting man does to his purpose; the former is insensible to any workings of his heart which might shake his purpose, the latter turns a deaf ear to all the solicitations of others which would go to alter his decrees: savages are mostly implacable in their animosities; Titus Manlius Torquatus displayed an instance of unrelenting severity towards his son, Minos, Æacus, and Rhadamanthus were the inexorable judges of hell.

Implacable and unrelenting are said only of animate beings in whom is wanting an ordinary portion of the tender affections: inexorable may be improperly applied to inanimate objects; justice and death are both represented as inexorable;

Acca, 't is past, he swims before my sight,
Inexorable death, and claims his right.—DRYDEN.

HARSH, ROUGH, SEVERE, RIGOROUS.

These terms mark different modes of treating those that are in one's power, all of which are the reverse of the kind.

Harsh and rough borrow their moral signification from the physical properties of the bodies to which they belong. The harsh and the rough both act painfully upon the taste, but the former with much more violence than the latter. An excess of the sour mingled with other unpleasant properties constitutes harshness: an excess of astringency constitutes roughness. Cheese is said to be harsh when it is dry and biting; roughness is the peculiar quality of the damascene.

From this physical distinction between these terms we discover the ground of their moral application. Harshness in a person's conduct acts upon the feelings, and does violence to the affections: roughness acts only externally on the senses: we may be rough in the tone of the voice, in the mode of address, or in the manner of handling or touching an object: but we are harsh in the sentiment we convey, and according to the persons to whom it is conveyed: a stranger may be rough when he has it in his power to be so: a friend, or one in the tenderest relation, only can be harsh. An officer of justice deals roughly with the prisoner in his charge, to whom he denies every indulgence in a rough and forbidding tone;

Know, gentle youth, in Lybian lands there are
A people rude in peace, and rough in war.

DRYDEN.

A parent deals harshly with a child who refuses every endearment, and only speaks to command or forbid; 'I would rather he was a man of a rough temper, who would treat me harshly, than of an effeminate nature.'

—ADDISON. Harsh and rough are unamiable and always censurable qualities: they spring from the harshness and roughness of the humour; 'No complaint is more feelingly made than that of the harsh and rugged manners of persons with whom we have an intercourse.'—BLAIR. Severe and rigorous are not always to be condemned; they spring from principle, and are often resorted to by necessity. Harshness is always mingled with anger and personal feeling; severity or rigour characterizes the thing more than the temper of the person.

A harsh master renders every burden which he imposes doubly severe, by the grating manner in which he communicates his will: a severe master simply imposes the burden in a manner to enforce obedience. The one seems to indulge himself in inflicting pain: the other seems to act from a motive that is independent of the pain inflicted. A harsh man is therefore always severe, but with injustice: a severe man, however, is not always harsh. Rigour is a high degree of severity. One is severe in the punishment of offences: one is rigorous in exacting compliance and obedience. Severity is always more or less necessary in the army, or in a school, for the preservation of good order: rigour is essential in dealing with the stubborn will and unruly passions of men. A general must be severe while lying in quarters, to prevent drunkenness and theft: but he must be rigorous when invading a foreign country, to prevent the ill-treatment of the inhabitants; It is pride which fills the world with so much harshness and severity. We are rigorous to offences as if we had never offended.'—BLAIR.

A measure is severe that threatens heavy consequences to those who do not comply: a line of conduct is rigorous that binds men down with great exactitude to a particular mode of proceeding. A judge is severe who is ready to punish and unwilling to pardon.

AUSTERE, RIGID, SEVERE, RIGOROUS, STERN.

Austere, in Latin austerus sour or rough, from the Greek αῠστος to dry, signifies rough or harsh, from drought; rigid and rigorous, from the Latin rigeo and the Greek ῥυτίω, signifies stiffness or unbendingness; severe, in Latin severus, comes from sævus cruel; stern, in Saxon sterne, German streng strong, has the sense of strictness.

Austere applies to ourselves as well as to others; rigid applies to ourselves only; severe, rigorous, stern, apply to others only. We are austere in our manner of living; rigid in our mode of thinking; austere, severe, rigorous, and stern in our mode of dealing with others. Effeminacy is opposed to austerity, pliability to rigidity.

The austere man mortifies himself; the rigid man binds himself to a rule: the austerities formerly practised among the Roman Catholics were in many instances the consequence of rigid piety: the manners of a man are austere when he refuses to take part in any social enjoyments; his probity is rigid, that is, inaccessible to the allurements of gain, or the urgency of necessity: an austere life consists not only in the privation of every pleasure, but in the infliction of every pain: 'Austerity is the proper antidote to indulgence, the diseases of the mind as well as body are cured by contraries.'—JOHNSON. Rigid justice is unbiassed, no less by the fear of loss than by the desire of gain: the present age affords no examples of austerity, but too many of its opposite extreme, effeminacy; and the rigidity of former times, in modes of thinking, has been succeeded by a culpable laxity; 'In things which are not immediately subject to religious or moral consideration, it is dangerous to be too long or too rigidly in the right.'—JOHNSON.

Austere, when taken with relation to others, is said of the behaviour; severe of the conduct: a parent is austere in his looks, his manners, and his words to his child; he is severe in the restraints he imposes, and the punishments he inflicts: an austere master speaks but to command, and commands so as to be obeyed; a severe master punishes every fault, and punishes in an undue measure: an austere temper is never softened; the countenance of such a one never relaxes into a smile, nor is he pleased to witness smiles: a severe temper is ready to catch at the imperfections of others, and to wound the offender: a judge should be a rigid administrator of justice between man and man, and severe in the punishment of offences as occasion requires; but never austere towards those who appear before him; austere of manner would ill become him who sits as a protector of either the innocent or the injured.

Rigour is a species of great severity, namely, in the infliction of punishment; towards enormous offenders, or on particular occasions where an example is requisite, rigour may be adopted, but otherwise it mark a cruel temper. A man is austere in his manners, severe in his remarks, and rigorous in his discipline; 'If you are hard or contracted in your judgements, severe in your censures, and oppressive in your dealings, then conclude with certainty that what you had termed piety was but an empty name.'—BLAIR. 'It is not by rigorous discipline and unrelaxing austerity that the aged can maintain an ascendancy over youthful minds.'—BLAIR.

Austerity, rigidity, and severity may be habitual; rigour and sternness are occasional. Sternness is a species of severity more in manner than in direct action; a commander may issue his commands sternly. or a despot may issue his stern decrees;

A man severe he was, and stern to view,
I knew him well, and every truant knew

Yet he was kind, or if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was in fault.

GOLDSMITH.

It is stern criticism to say, that Mr. Pope's is not a translation of Homer.'—CUMBERLAND.

ACRIMONY, TARTNESS, ASPERITY, HARSHNESS.

These epithets are figuratively employed to denote sharpness of feeling corresponding to the quality in natural bodies.

Acrimony, in Latin acrimonia, from acer sharp, is the characteristic of garlick, mustard, and pepper, that is, a biting sharpness; tartness, from tart, is not improbably derived from tartar, the quality of which it in some degree resembles, expressing a high degree of acid peculiar to vinegar; asperity, in Latin asperitas, from asper, comes from the Greek ἀσπερος fallow, without culture and without fruit as applied to land that is too hard and rough to be tilled; harshness, from harsh, in German and Teutonic herbe, herbisch, Swedish kerb, Latin acerbus, denotes the sharp, rough taste of unripe fruit.

A quick sense produces acrimony: it is too frequent among disputants, who impute each other's feelings. An acute sensibility, coupled with quickness of intellect, produces tartness: it is too frequent among females. Acrimony is a transient feeling that discovers itself by the words; 'The genius even when he endeavours only to entertain or instruct, yet suffers persecution from innumerable critics, whose acrimony is excited merely by the pain of seeing others pleased.'—JOHNSON. Tartness is an habitual irritability that mingles itself with the tone and looks; 'When his humours grew tart, as being now in the lees of favour, they broke forth into certain sudden excesses.'—WOTTON. An acrimonious reply frequently gives rise to much ill-will; a tart reply is often treated with indifference, as indicative of the natural temper, rather than of any unfriendly feeling.

Asperity and harshness respect one's conduct to inferiours; the latter expresses a strong degree of the former. Asperity is opposed to mildness and forbearance; harshness to kindness. A reproof is conveyed with asperity, when the words and looks convey strong displeasure; 'The charity of the one, like kindly exhalations, will descend in showers of blessings; but the rigour and asperity of the other, in a severe doom upon ourselves.'—GOVERNMENT OF THE TONGUE. A treatment is harsh when it wounds the feelings, and does violence to the affections:

Thy tender hefted nature shall not give Thee o'er to harshness: her eyes are fierce, but thine

Do comfort and not burn.—SHAKESPEARE.

Mistresses sometimes chide their servants with asperity; parents sometimes deal harshly with their children.

Harshness and asperity are also applied to other objects: the former to sounds or words, the latter figuratively to the atmosphere; 'Cowley seems to have possessed the power of writing easily beyond any other of our poets, yet his pursuit of remote thoughts led him often into harshness of expression.'—JOHNSON. 'The nakedness and asperity of the wintry world always fills the beholder with pensive and profound astonishment.'—JOHNSON.

TO SATISFY, PLEASE, GRATIFY.

To satisfy (v. Contentment) is rather to produce pleasure indirectly; to please (v. Agreeable) is to produce it directly: the former is negative, the latter positive, pleasure: as every desire is accompanied with more or less pain, satisfaction which is the removal of desire is itself to a certain extent pleasure; but what satisfies is not always calculated to please; nor is that which pleases, that which will always satisfy: plain food satisfies a hungry person but does not please him when he is not hungry; social enjoyments please, but they are very far from satisfying those who do not restrict their indulgences; 'He who has run over the whole circle of earthly pleasures will be forced to complain that either they were not pleasures or that pleasure was not satisfaction.'—SOUTH. To gratify is to please in a high degree, to produce a vivid pleasure; we may be pleased with trifles, but we are commonly gratified with such things as act strongly either on the senses or the affections: an epicure is gratified with those delicacies which suit his taste; an amateur in music will be gratified with hearing a piece of Handel's composition finely performed; 'Did we consider that the mind of a man is the man himself, we should think it the most unnatural sort of self-murder to sacrifice the sentiment of the soul to gratify the appetites of the body.'—STEELE.

TO SATISFY, SATIATE, GLUT, CLOY.

To satisfy is to take enough; satiare is a frequentative formed from satis enough, signifying to have more than enough; glut, in Latin gultio, from gula the throat, signifies to take down the throat; cloy is a variation of clog.

Satisfaction brings pleasure; it is what nature demands; and nature therefore makes a suitable return: satiety is attended with disgust; it is what appetite demands; but appetite is the corruption of nature and produces nothing but evil: glutting is an act of intemperance; it is what the inordinate appetite demands; it greatly exceeds the former in degree both of the cause and the consequence; cloying is the consequence of glutting. Every healthy person satisfies himself with a regular portion of food; children if unrestrained seek to satiare their appetites, and cloy themselves by their excesses; brutes, or men debased into brutes, glut themselves with that which is agreeable to their appetites.

The first three terms are employed in a moral application; the last may also be used figuratively; we satisfy desires in general, or any particular desire; 'The only thing that can give the mind any solid satisfaction is a certain complacency and repose in the good providence of God.'—HERRING. We satiare the appetite for pleasure or power;

'T was not enough,
By subtle fraud to snatch a single life;
Puny impiety! whole kingdoms fell,
To sate the lust of power.—PORTEUS.

One gluts the eyes or the ears by any thing that is horrid or extravagant; 'If the understanding be detained by occupations less pleasing, it returns again to study with greater alacrity than when it is glutted with ideal pleasures.'—JOHNSON. We may be cloyed by an uninterrupted round of pleasures; 'Religious pleasure is such a pleasure as can never cloy or overwork the mind.'—SOUTH.

ENJOYMENT, FRUITION, GRATIFICATION.

Enjoyment, from enjoy to have the joy or pleasure, signifies either the act of enjoying, or the pleasure itself derived from that act; fruition, from frui to enjoy, is employed only for the act of enjoying.

We speak either of the enjoyment of any pleasure, or of the enjoyment as a pleasure: we speak of those pleasures which are received from the fruition, in distinction from those which are only in expectation. The enjoyment is either corporeal or spiritual, as the enjoyment of music, or the enjoyment of study; 'The enjoyment of fame brings but very little pleasure, though the loss or want of it be very sensible and afflicting.'—ADDISON. Fruition mostly relates to sensible, or at least to external objects; hope intervenes between the desire and the fruition; 'Fame is a good so wholly foreign to our natures that we have no faculty in the soul adapted to it, nor any organ in the body to relish it; an object of desire placed out of the possibility of fruition.'—ADDISON.

Gratification, from the verb to gratify make grateful or pleasant, signifies either the act of giving pleasure, or the pleasure received. Enjoyment springs from every object which is capable of yielding pleasure; by distinction however from moral and rational objects; 'His hopes and expectations are bigger than his enjoyments.'—TILLOTSON. But the gratification, which is a species of enjoyment, is obtained through the medium of the senses; 'The man of pleasure little knows the perfect joy he loses for the disappointing gratifications which he pursues.'—ANDREW MARSH.

enjoyment is not so vivid as the gratification: the gratification is not so permanent as the enjoyment. Domestic life has its peculiar enjoyments; brilliant spectacles afford gratification. Our capacity for enjoyments depends upon our intellectual endowments; our gratification depends upon the tone of our feelings, and the nature of our desires.

CONTENTMENT, SATISFACTION.

Contentment, in French contentment, from content, in Latin contentus, participle of contineo to contain or hold, signifies the keeping one's self to a thing; satisfaction, in Latin satisfacio, compounded of satis and facio, signifies the making or having enough.

Contentment lies in ourselves: satisfaction is derived from external objects; one is contented when one wishes for no more: one is satisfied when one has obtained what one wishes; the contented man has always enough; the satisfied man receives enough.

The contented man will not be dissatisfied; but he who looks for satisfaction will never be contented. Contentment is the absence of pain; satisfaction is positive pleasure. Contentment is accompanied with the enjoyment of what one has; satisfaction is often quickly followed with the alloy of wanting more. A contented man can never be miserable; a satisfied man can scarcely be long happy. Contentment is a permanent and habitual state of mind; it is the restriction of all our thoughts, views, and desires within the compass of present possession and enjoyment;

True happiness is to no place confin'd,

But still is found in a contented mind.—ANONYMOUS.

Satisfaction is a partial and turbulent state of the feelings, which awakens rather than deadens desire; 'Women who have been married some time, not having it in their heads to draw after them a numerous train of followers, find their satisfaction in the possession of one man's heart.'—SPECTATOR. Contentment is suited to our present condition; it accommodates itself to the vicissitudes of human life: satisfaction belongs to no created being; one satisfied desire engenders another that demands satisfaction. Contentment is within the reach of the poor man, to whom it is a continual feast; but satisfaction has never been procured by wealth, however enormous, or ambition, however boundless and successful. We should therefore look for the contented man, where there are the fewest means of being satisfied. Our duty bids us be contented; our desires ask to be satisfied; but our duty is associated with our happiness; our desires are the sources of our misery.

PLAY, GAME, SPORT.

Play, from the French plaire to please, signifies in general what one does to please one's self; game, in Saxon gaming, very probably comes from the Greek γαμω to marry, which is the season for games; the word γαμω, itself, comes from γαω to be buoyant or boasting, whence comes our word gay; sport, in German spass or posse, comes from the Greek παίζω to jest.

Play and game both include exercise, corporeal or mental, or both; but play is an unsystematic, game a systematic, exercise; children play when they merely run after each other, but this is no game; on the other hand, when they exercise with the ball according to any rule, this is a game; every game therefore is a play, but every play is not a game: trundling a hoop is a play, but not a game: cricket is both a play and a game. One person may have his play by himself, but there must be more than one to have a game. Play is adapted to infants; games to those who are more advanced. Play is the necessary unbending of the mind to give a free exercise to the body: game is the direction of the mind to the lighter objects of intellectual pursuit. An intemperate love of play, though prejudicial to the improvement of young people, is not always the worst indication which they can give; it is often coupled with qualities of a better kind; 'Play is not unlawful merely as a contest.'—HAWKESWORTH. When games are pursued with too much ardour, particularly for the purposes of gain, they are altogether prejudicial to the understanding, and ruinous to the morals.

What arms to use, or nets to frame,
Wild beasts to combat or to tame,
With all the mysteries of that game—WALLER

Sport is a bodily exercise connected with the prosecution of some object; it is so far, therefore, distinct from either play or game: for play may be purely corporeal; game, principally intellectual; but sport is a mixture of both. The game comprehends the exercise of an art, and the perfection which is attained in that art is the end or source of pleasure; the sport is merely the prosecution of an object which may be, and mostly is, attainable by one's physical powers without any exercise of art: the game, therefore, is intellectual both in the end and the means; the sport only in the end. Draughts, backgammon, cards, and the like, are games; but hunting, shooting, racing, bowling, quoits, &c. are termed more properly sports; there are, however, many things which may be denominated either game or sport according as it has more or less of art in it. Wrestling, boxing, chariot-racing, and the like, were carried to such perfection by the ancients that they are always distinguished by the name of games; of which we have historical accounts under the different titles of the Olympick, the Pythian, the Nemean, and the Isthmian games. Similar exercises, when practised by the rusticks in England, have been commonly denominated rural sports. Upon this ground game is used abstractedly for the part of the game in which the whole art lies: 'There is no man of sense and honesty but must see and own, whether he understands the game or not, that it is an evident folly for any people, instead of prosecuting the old honest methods of industry and frugality, to sit down to a public gaming table, and play off their money to one another.'—BERKELEY. Sport is used for the end of the sport or the pleasure produced by the attainment of that end: thus we say that the game is won or lost; to be clever or inept at a game; to have much sport, to enjoy the sport, or to spoil the sport;

Now for our mountain sport up to yon hill:

Your legs are young.—SHAKESPEARE.

Game is sometimes used figuratively for any scheme or course of conduct pursued;

War! that mad game the world so loves to play.

SWIFT.

Sport is sometimes used for the subject of sport to another;

Commit not thy prophetick mind

To fitting leaves, the sport of every wind,

Lest they disperse in air.—DRYDEN.

Why on that brow dwell sorrow and dismay,

Where loves were wont to sport, and smiles to play?

SWIFT.

The epithets playful, gamesome, and sportive bear a very similar distinction. Playful is taken in a general sense for a disposition to play, and applies peculiarly to children; 'He is scandalized at youth for being lively, and at childhood for being playful.'—ADDISON. Gamesome denotes a disposition to indulge in jest, but is seldom employed in a good sense;

Belial in like gamesome mood.—MILTON.

Sportive, which denotes a disposition to sporting or carrying on a sport, is a term of stronger import than playful;

I am not in a sportive humour now:

Tell me, and dally not, where is the money?

SHAKESPEARE.

FREAK, WHIM.

Freak most probably comes from the German frech bold and petulant. Whim, from the Teutonic wimmen to whine or whimper: but they have at present somewhat deviated from their original meaning; for a freak has more of childishness and humour than boldness in it, a whim more of eccentricity than of childishness. Fancy and fortune are both said to have their freaks, as they both deviate most widely in their movements from all rule; but whims are at most but singular deviations of the mind from its ordinary and even course. Females are most liable to be seized with freaks, which are in their nature sudden and not to be calculated upon: men are apt to indulge themselves in whims which are in their nature strange and often laughable. We should call it a freak for a female to put on the habit of a male, and so accoutred to sally forth into the streets;

But the long pomp, the midnight masquerade,
With all the freaks of wanton wealth array'd,
In these, ere trifles half their wish obtain,
The toiling pleasure-sickens into pain.—GOLDSMITH.

We term it a whim in a man who takes a resolution never to shave himself any more;

"T is all bequeath'd to publick uses,
To publick uses! There's a whim!
What had the publick done for him?—SWIFT

FANCIFUL, FANTASTICAL, WHIMSICAL, CAPRICIOUS.

Fanciful signifies full of fancy (v. Conceit); fantastical signifies belonging to the phantasy, which is the immediate derivative from the Greek; whimsical signifies either like a whim, or having a whim; capricious signifies having caprice.

Fanciful and fantastical are both employed for persons and things; whimsical and capricious are mostly employed for persons, or what is personal. Fanciful, in regard to persons, is said of that which is irregular in the taste or judgement; fantastical is said of that which violates all propriety, as well as regularity; the former may consist of a simple deviation from rule; the latter is something extravagant. A person may, therefore, sometimes be advantageously fanciful, although he can never be fantastical but to his discredit. Lively minds will be fanciful in the choice of their dress, furniture, or equipage; 'There is something very sublime, though very fanciful, in Plato's description of the Supreme Being, that "truth is his body, and light his shadow."—ADDISON. The affectation of singularity frequently renders people fantastical in their manners as well as their dress;

Methinks heroic poesy, till now,
Like some fantastick fairy land did show.

COWLEY.

Fanciful is said mostly in regard to errors of opinion or taste; it springs from an aberration of the mind: whimsical is a species of the fanciful in regard to one's likes or dislikes: capricious respects errors of temper, or irregularities of feeling. The fanciful does not necessarily imply instability; but the capricious excludes the idea of fixedness. One is fanciful by attaching a reality to that which only passes in one's own mind; one is whimsical in the inventions of the fancy; one is capricious by acting and judging without rule or reason in that which admits of both. A person discovers himself to be fanciful who makes difficulties and objections which have no foundation in the external object, but in his own mind; 'The English are naturally fanciful.'—ADDISON. A person discovers himself to be capricious when he likes and dislikes the same thing in quick succession; 'Many of the pretended friendships of youth are founded on capricious liking.'—BLAIR. A person discovers himself to be whimsical who falls upon unaccountable moods, and imagines unaccountable things;

"T is this exalted power, whose business lies
In nonsense and impossibilities:
This made a whimsical philosopher
Before the spacious world a tub prefer.

ROCHESTER.

Sick persons are apt to be fanciful in their food; females, whose minds are not well disciplined, are apt to be capricious; the English have the character of being a whimsical nation. In application to things, the terms fanciful and fantastical preserve a similar distinction; what is fanciful may be the real and just combination of a well regulated fancy, or the unreal combination of a distempered fancy; the fantastical is not only the unreal, but the distorted combination of a disordered fancy. In sculpture or painting drapery may be fancifully disposed: the airiness and showiness which would not be becoming even in the dress of a young female, would be fantastical in that of an old woman

FASTIDIOUS, SQUEAMISH.

Fastidious, in Latin fastidiosus, from fastus pride signifies proudly, nice, not easily pleased: squeamish, changed from qualmish or weak-stomached, signifies, in the moral sense, foolishly sick, easily disgusted.

A female is fastidious when she criticises the dress or manners of her rival: 'The perception as well as the senses may be improved to our own disquiet; and we may by diligent cultivation of the powers of dislike raise in time an artificial fastidiousness.'—JOHNSON She is squeamish in the choice of her own dress, company, words, &c. Whoever examines his own imperfections will cease to be fastidious;

Were the fates more kind,

Our narrow luxuries would soon grow stale;
Were these exhaustless, nature would grow sick,
And, cloy'd with pleasure, squeamishly complain
That all is vanity, and life a dream.—ARMSTRONG.

Whoever restrains humour and caprice will cease to be squeamish.

PARTICULAR, SINGULAR, ODD, ECCENTRIC TRICK, STRANGE.

Particular, in French particulier, Latin particularis, from particula a particle, signifies belonging to a particle or a very small part; singular, in French singulier, Latin singularis, from singulus every one, which very probably comes from the Hebrew יחיד peculium, or private property; odd is probably changed from add, signifying something arbitrarily added; eccentric, from ex and centre, signifies out of the centre or direct line; strange, in French étrange, Latin extra, and Greek ἐξ out of, signifies out of some other part, or not belonging to that part.

All these terms are employed either as characteristics of persons or things. What is particular belongs to some small particle or point to which it is confined: what is singular is single, or the only one of its kind; what is odd is without an equal or any thing with which it is fit to pair; what is eccentric is not to be brought within any rule or estimate, it deviates to the right and the left; what is strange is different from that which one is accustomed to see, it does not admit of comparison or assimilation. A person is particular as it respects himself; he is singular as it respects others; he is particular in his habits or modes of action; he is singular in that which is about him; we may be particular or singular in our dress; in the former case we study the minute points of our dress to please ourselves; in the latter case we adopt a mode of dress that distinguishes us from all others.

One is odd, eccentric, and strange more as it respects established modes, forms, and rules, than individual circumstances: a person is odd when his actions or his words bear no resemblance to that of others, he is eccentric if he irregularly departs from the customary modes of proceeding; he is strange when that which he does makes him new or unknown to those who are about him. Particularity and singularity are not always taken in a bad sense; oddness, eccentricity, and strangeness are never taken in a good one. A person ought to be particular in the choice of his society, his amusements, his books, and the like; he ought to be singular in virtue, when vice is unfortunately prevalent; but particularity becomes ridiculous when it respects trifles; and singularity becomes culpable when it is not warranted by the most impious necessity. As oddness, eccentricity, and strangeness consist in the violation of good order, of the decencies of human life, or the more important points of moral duty, they can never be justifiable, and often unpardonable. An odd man, whom no one can associate with, and who likes to associate with no one, is an outcast by nature, and a burden to the society which is troubled with his presence. An eccentric character, who distinguishes himself by nothing but the breach of every established rule, is a being who deserves nothing but ridicule, or the more serious treatment of censure or rebuke. A strange person, who makes himself a stranger among those to whom he is bound by the closest ties, is a being as unfortunate as he is worthless. Particularity, in the bad sense, arises either from a naturally frivolous character, or the want of more serious objects to engage the mind; 'There is such a particularity for ever affected by great beauties, that they are encumbered with their charms in all they say or do.'—HUGHES. Singularity, which is much oftener taken in the bad than in the good sense, arises from a preposterous pride which thirsts after distinction even in folly; 'Singularity is only vicious, as it makes men act contrary to reason.'—ADDISON. Oddness is mostly the effect of a distorted humour, attributable to an unhappy frame of mind;

So proud, I am no slave,
So impudent, I own myself no knave,
So odd, my country's ruin makes me grave.—POPE.

Eccentricity, which is the excess of singularity, arises commonly from the undisciplined state of strong powers; 'That acute, though eccentric observer, Rousseau, had perceived that to strike and interest the publick, the marvellous must be produced.'—BURKE. Strangeness, which is a degree of oddness, has its source in the perverted state of the heart; 'A strange, proud return you may think I make you, madam, when I tell you, it is not from every body I would be thus obliged.'—SUCKLING. 'Artists, who propose only the imitation of such a particular person, without election of ideas, have been often reproached for that omission.'—DRYDEN.

So singular a madness
Must have a cause as strange as the effect.

DENHAM.

When applied to characterize inanimate objects they are mostly used in an indifferent sense, but sometimes in a bad sense: the particular serves to define or specify, it is opposed to the general or indefinite; a particular day or hour, a particular case, a particular person, are expressions which confine one's attention to one precise object in distinction from the rest; singular, like the word particular, marks but one object, and that which is clearly pointed out in distinction from the rest; but this term differs from the former, inasmuch as the particular is said only of that which one has arbitrarily made particular, but the singular is so from its own properties: thus a place is particular when we fix upon it, and mark it out in any manner so that it may be known from others; a place is singular if it have anything in itself which distinguishes it from others. Odd, in an indifferent sense, is opposed to even, and applied to objects in general; an odd number, an odd person, an odd book, and the like: but it is also employed in a bad sense, to mark objects which are totally dissimilar to others, as an odd idea, an odd conceit, an odd whim, an odd way, an odd place; 'History is the great looking-glass, through which we may behold with ancestral eyes, not only the various actions of past ages, and the odd accidents that attend time, but also discern the different humours of men.'—HOWELL. Eccentric is applied in its proper sense to mathematical lines or circles, which have not the same centre, and is never employed in regard to things in an improper sense: strange, in its proper sense, marks that which is unknown or unusual, as a strange face, a strange figure, a strange place; but in the moral application it is like the word odd, and conveys the unfavourable idea of that which is uncommon and not worth knowing; a strange noise designates not only that which has not been heard before, but that which it is not desirable to hear; a strange place may signify not only that which we have been unaccustomed to see, but that which has also much in it that is objectionable; 'Is it not strange that a rational man should worship an ox?'—SOUTH.

STRANGER, FOREIGNER, ALIEN.

Stranger, in French étranger, Latin extraneus or extra, in Greek ἕξ, signifies out of, that is, out of another country; foreigner, from foris abroad, and alien, from alienus another's, have obviously the same original meaning. They have, however, deviated in their acceptations. Stranger is a general term, and applies to one not known or not an inhabitant, whether of the same or another country; foreigner is applied only to strangers of another country; and alien is a technical term applied to foreigners as subjects or residents, in distinction from natural-born subjects. Ulysses after his return from the Trojan war, was a stranger in his own house. The French are foreigners in England, and the English in France. Neither can enjoy, as aliens, the same privileges in a foreign country as they do in their own. The laws of hospitality require us to treat strangers with more ceremony than we do members of the same family, or very intimate friends. The lower orders of the English are apt to treat foreigners with an undeserved contempt. Every alien is obliged in time of war to have a license for residing in England.

The term stranger is sometimes employed to denote one not acquainted with an object, or not having experienced its effects, as to be a stranger to sorrow, or to be a stranger to any work or subject; I was no stranger to the original; I had also studied Virgil's design, and his disposition of it. Foreigner is used only in the above-mentioned sense; but the epithet foreign sometimes signifies not belonging to an object;

All the distinctions of this little life
Are quite cutaneous, quite foreign to the man.

YOUNG.

Alien is sometimes employed by the poets in the sense of foreigner;

Like you an alien in a land unknown,
I learn to pity woes so like my own.—DRYDEN.

From stranger and alien come the verbs estrangle and alienate, which are extended in their meaning and application; the former signifying to make the understanding or mind of a person strange to an object, and the latter to make the heart or affections of one person strange to another. Thus we may say that the mind becomes alienated to one object, when it has fixed its affections on another; 'The manner of men's writing must not alienate our hearts from the truth.'—HOOKER. Or a person estranges himself from his family; 'Worldly and corrupt men estrangle themselves from all that is divine.'—BLAIR.

FINICAL, SPRUCE, FOPPISH.

These epithets are applied to such as attempt at finery by improper means. The finical is insignificantly fine; the spruce is laboriously and artfully fine; the foppish is fantastically and affectively fine. The finical is said mostly of manners and speech; the spruce is said of the dress; the foppish of dress and manners.

A finical gentleman clips his words and screws his body into as small a compass as possible to give himself the air of a delicate person; a spruce gentleman strives not to have a fold wrong in his frill or cravat, nor a hair of his head to lie amiss; a foppish gentleman seeks, by extravagance in the cut of his clothes, and by the tawdriness in their ornaments, to render himself distinguished for finery. A little mind, full of conceit of itself, will lead a man to be finical; 'I cannot hear a finical fop romancing how the king took him aside at such a time; what the queen said to him at another.'—L'ESTRANGE. A vacant mind that is anxious to be pleasing will not object to the employment of rendering the person spruce;

methinks I see thee spruce and fine,
With coat embroider'd richly shine.—SWIFT.

A giddy, vain mind, eager after applause, impels a man to every kind of foppery;

The learned, full of inward pride,
The fops of outward show deride.—GAY.

Finical may also be applied in the same sense as an epithet for things; 'At the top of the building (Blenheim house) are several cupolas and little turrets that have but an ill effect, and make the building look at once finical and heavy.'—POPE.

HUMOUR, CAPRICE.

Humour (v. Humour) is general; caprice (v. Fantastical) is particular: humour may be good or bad, caprice is always taken in a bad sense. Humour is always independent of fixed principle; it is the feeling or impulse of the moment: caprice is always opposed to fixed principle, or rational motives of acting; it is the feeling of the individual setting at naught all rule, and defying all reason. The feeling only is perverted when the humour predominates;

Yout it ask me, why I rather choose to have
A weight of carrion flesh than to receive
Three thousand ducats; I'll not answer that,
But say, it is my humour.—SHAKESPEARE.

The judgement and will are perverted by caprice: a child shows its humour in fretfulness and impatience; a liar, betrays his caprice in his intercourse with others, in the management of his concerns, in the choice of his amusements; 'Men will submit to any rule by which they may be exempted from the tyranny of caprice and chance.'—JOHNSON.

Indulgence renders children and subordinate persons humorsome: 'I am glad that though you are incredulous you are not humorsome too.'—GOODMAN. Prosperity or unlimited power is apt to render a man capricious; 'A subject ought to suppose that there are reasons, although he be not apprized of them, otherwise he must tax his prince of capriciousness, inconstancy, or ill design.'—SWIFT. A humorsome person commonly objects to be pleased, or is easily displeased; a capricious person likes and dislikes, approves and disapproves the same thing in quick succession. Humour, when applied to things, has the sense of wit; whence the distinction between humorsome and humorous: the former implying the existence of humour or perverted feeling in the person; the latter implying the existence of humour or wit in the person or thing;

Thy humorous vein, thy pleasing folly
Lies all neglected, all forgot,
And pensive, wayward, melancholy,
Thou dread'st and hop'st thou know'st not what.

PRIOR.

Caprice is improperly applied to things to designate their total irregularity and planlessness of proceeding; as, in speaking of fashion, we notice its caprice, when that which has been laid aside is again taken into use: diseases are termed capricious which act in direct opposition to all established rule; 'Does it imply that our language is in its nature irregular and capricious?' LOWTH.

HUMOUR, TEMPER, MOOD.

Humour literally signifies moisture or fluid, in which sense it is used for the fluids of the human body; and as far as these humours or their particular state is connected with, or has its influence on, the animal spirits and the moral feelings, so far is humour applicable to moral agents; temper (v. Disposition) is less specific in its signification; it may with equal propriety, under the changed form of temperament, be applicable to the general state of the body or the mind; mood, which is but a change from mode or manner, has an original signification not less indefinite than the former; it is applied only to the mind.

As the humours of the body are the most variable parts of the animal frame, humour in regard to the mind denotes but a partial and transitory state when compared with the temper, which is a general and habitual state. The humour is so fluctuating that it varies in the same mind perpetually; but the temper is so far confined that it always shows itself to be the same whenever it shows itself at all: the humour makes a man different from himself; the temper makes him different from others. Hence we speak of the humour of the moment; of the temper of the youth or of old age: so likewise we say, to accommodate one's self to the humour of a person; to manage his temper: to put one into a certain humour; to correct or sour the temper. Humour is not less partial in its nature than in its duration; it fixes itself often on only one object, or respects only one particular direction of the feelings: temper extends to all the actions and opinions as well as feelings of a man; it gives a colouring to all he says, does, thinks, and feels: 'There are three or four single men who suit my temper to a hair.'—COWPER. We may be in a humour for writing, or reading; for what is gay or what is serious; for what is noisy or what is quiet: but our temper is discoverable in our daily conduct; we may be in a good or ill humour in company, but in domestic life and in our closest relations we show whether we are good or ill tempered. A man shows his humour in different or trifling actions; he shows his temper in the most important actions: it may be a man's humour to sit while others stand, or to go unshaven while others shave; but he shows his temper as a Christian or otherwise in forgiving injuries or harbouring resentments; in living peaceably, or indulging himself in contentions;

It is the curse of kings to be attended

By slaves, that take their humours for a warrant
To break into the bloodhouse of life.

SHAKESPEARE.

'This, I shall call it evangelical, temper is far from being natural to any corrupt son of Adam.'—HAMMOND.

The same distinction is kept up between the terms when applied to bodies of men. A nation may have its humour and its temper as much as an individual: the former discovers itself in the manners and fashion; the latter in its public spirit towards its government or other nations. It has been the most unlucky humour of the present day to banish ceremony, and consequently decency, from all companies; 'True modesty is ashamed to do any thing that is opposite to the humour of the company.'—ADDISON. The temper of the times is somewhat more sober now than it was during the heat of the revolutionary mania; 'All irregular tempers in trade and business are but like irregular tempers in eating and drinking.'—LAW.

Humour and mood agree in denoting a particular and temporary state of feeling; but they differ in the cause, the former being attributable rather to the physical state of the body; and the latter to the moral frame of the mind; the former therefore is independent of all external circumstances, or at all events, of any that are reducible to system; the latter is guided entirely by events. Humour is therefore generally taken in a bad sense, unless actually qualified by some epithet to the contrary;

Their humours are not to be won

But when they are imposed upon.—HUDIBRAS

Mood is always taken in an indifferent sense; 'Strange as it may seem, the most ludicrous lines I ever wrote have been written in the saddest mood.'—COWPER. There is no calculating on the humour of a man; it depends upon his mood whether he performs ill or well: it is necessary to suppress humour in a child; we discover by the melancholy mood of a man that something distressing has happened to him.

DISPOSITION, TEMPER.

Disposition, from dîsposè (v. To dispose), signifies here the state of being disposed; temper, like temperament, from the Latin temperamentum and tempero to temper or manage, signifies the thing modelled or formed.

These terms are both applied to the mind and its bias; but disposition respects the whole frame and texture of the mind: temper respects only the bias or tone of the feelings.

Disposition is permanent and settled; 'My friend has his eye more upon the virtue and disposition of his children than their advancement or wealth.'—STEELE. Temper is transitory and fluctuating; 'The man who lives under an habitual sense of the Divine presence keeps up a perpetual cheerfulness of temper.'—ADDISON. The disposition comprehends the springs and motives of action; the temper influences the actions for the time being: it is possible and not unfrequent to have a good disposition with a bad temper, and vice versa.

A good disposition makes a man a useful member of society, but not always a good companion; 'Aken side was a young man warm with every notion that by nature or accident had been connected with the sound of liberty, and by an eccentricity which such dispositions do not easily avoid, a lover of contradiction, and no friend to any thing established.'—JOHNSON. A good temper renders a man acceptable to all and peaceable with all, but essentially useful to none; 'In coffee-houses a man of my temper is in his element, for if he cannot talk he can be still more agreeable to his company as well as pleased in himself in being a hearer.'—STEELE. A good disposition will go far towards correcting the errors of temper; but where there is a bad disposition there are no hopes of amendment.

DISPOSITION, INCLINATION.

Disposition in the preceding section is taken for the general frame of the mind; in the present case for the particular frame; inclination, v. Attachment.

Disposition is more positive than inclination. We may always expect a man to do that which he is disposed to do: but we cannot always calculate upon his executing that to which he is merely inclined.

We indulge a disposition; we yield to an inclination. The disposition comprehends the whole state of the mind at the time; 'It is the duty of every man who would be true to himself, to obtain if possible a disposition to be pleased.'—STEELE. An inclination is particular, referring always to a particular object; 'There never was a time, believe me, when I wanted an inclination to cultivate your esteem, and promote your interest.'—MELMOTH'S (Letters of Cicero). After the performance of a serious duty, no one is expected to be in a disposition for laughter or merriment: it is becoming to suppress our inclination to laughter in the presence of those who wish to be serious; we should be careful not to enter into controversy with one who shows a disposition to be unfriendly. When a young person discovers any inclination to study, there are hopes of his improvement.

TEMPERAMENT, TEMPERATURE.

Temperament and temperature are both used to express that state which arises from the tempering of opposite or varying qualities: the temperament is said of animal bodies, and the temperature of the atmosphere. Men of a sanguine temperament ought to be cautious in their diet; 'Without a proper temperament for the particular art which he studies, his utmost pains will be to no purpose.'—BUDGELL. All bodies are strongly affected by the temperature of the air; 'O happy England, where there is such a rare temperature of heat and cold.'—HOWELL.

FRAME, TEMPER, TEMPERAMENT, CONSTITUTION.

Frame in its natural sense is that which forms the exterior edging of any thing, and consequently determines its form; it is applied to man physically or mentally, as denoting that constituent portion of him which seems to hold the rest together; which by an extension of the metaphor is likewise put for the whole contents, the whole body, or the whole mind; temper and temperament, in Latin temperamentum, from tempero to govern or dispose, signify the particular modes of being disposed or organized; constitution, from constitute or appoint, signifies the particular mode of being constituted or formed.

Frame, when applied to the body, is taken in its most universal sense; as when we speak of the frame being violently agitated, or the human frame being wonderfully constructed: when applied to the mind it will admit either of a general or restricted signification;

The soul
Contemplates what she is, and whence she came,
And almost comprehends her own amazing frame.

JENYNS.

Temper, which is applicable only to the mind, is taken for the general or particular state of the individual;

'T is he
Sets superstition high on virtue's throne,
Then thinks his Maker's temper like his own.

JENYNS.

The frame comprehends either the whole body of mental powers, or the particular disposition of those powers in individuals; the temper comprehends the general or particular state of feeling as well as thinking in the individual. The mental frame which receives any violent concussion is liable to derangement;

Your steady soul preserves her frame,
In good and evil times the same.—SWIFT.

It is necessary for those who govern to be well acquainted with the temper of those whom they govern; 'The brain may devise laws for the blood, but a hot temper leaps o'er a cold decree.'—SHAKESPEARE. By reflection on the various attributes of the Divine Being, a man may easily bring his mind into a frame of devotion; 'There is a great tendency to cheerfulness in religion; and such a frame of mind is not only the most lovely, but the most commendable in a virtuous person.'—ADDISON. By the indulgence of a fretful, repining temper, a man destroys his own peace of mind, and offends his Maker; 'The sole strength of the sound from the shouting of multitudes so amazes and confounds the imagination, that the best established *temper*s can scarcely forbear being borne down.'

—BURKE.

Temperament and constitution mark the general state of the individual; the former comprehends a mixture of the physical and mental; the latter has a purely physical application. A man with a warm temperament owes his warmth of character to the rapid impetus of the blood; a man with a delicate constitution is exposed to great fluctuations in his health; 'I have always more need of a laugh than a cry, being somewhat disposed to melancholy by my temperament.'—COWPER. 'How little our constitution is able to bear a remove into parts of this air, not much higher than that we commonly breathe in!'—LOCKE.

The whole frame of a new-born infant is peculiarly tender. Men of fierce *temper*s are to be found in all nations; men of sanguine *temper*s are more frequent in warm climates; the constitutions of females are more tender than those of the male, and their frames are altogether more susceptible.

TO QUALIFY, TEMPER, HUMOUR.

Qualify, compounded of the Latin qualis and facto, signifies to make a thing what it ought to be; to temper, from tempero, is to regulate the temperament; to humour is to suit to the humour.

Things are qualified according to circumstances: what is too harsh must be qualified by something that is soft and lenitive; things are tempered by nature so that things perfectly discordant should not be combined; things are humoured by contrivance: what is subject to many changes requires to be humoured; a polite person will qualify his refusal of a request by some expression of kindness; 'It is the excellency of friendship to rectify or at least to qualify the malignity of these surmises.'—SOUTH. Providence has tempered the seasons so as to mix something that is pleasant in them all; 'God in his mercy has so framed and tempered his word, that we have for the most part a reserve of mercy wrapped up in a curse.'—SOUTH. Nature itself is sometimes to be humoured when art is employed: but the *temper*s of men require still more to be humoured; 'Our British gardeners, instead of humouring nature, love to deviate from it as much as possible.'—ADDISON.

GOOD-NATURE, GOOD-HUMOUR.

Good-nature and good-humour both imply the disposition to please and be pleased; but the former is habitual and permanent, the latter is temporary and partial: the former lies in the nature and frame of the mind; the latter in the state of the humours or spirits. A good-natured man recommends himself at all times by his good-nature; a good-humoured man recommends himself particularly as a companion: good-nature displays itself by a readiness in doing kind offices; 'Affability, mildness, tenderness, and a word which I would fain bring back to its original signification of virtue, I mean good-nature, are of daily use.'—ADDISON. Good-humour is confined mostly to the ease and cheerfulness of one's outward deportment in social converse; 'There was but one who kept up his good-humour to the Land's End.'—ADDISON. Good-nature is apt to be guilty of weak compliances: good-humour is apt to be succeeded by fits of peevishness and depression. Good-nature is applicable only to the character of the individual; good-humour may be said of a whole company: it is a mark of good-nature in a man not to disturb the good-humour of the company he is in, by resenting the affront that is offered him by another.

Good-nature qualifies every thing we say or do, so as to render even reproof bearable; 'I concluded, however unaccountable the assertion might appear at first sight, that good-nature was an essential quality in a satirist.'—ADDISON. Good-humour takes off from the personality of every remark; 'When Virgil said "He that did not hate Bavius might love Mævius," he was in perfect good-humour.'—ADDISON.

JEALOUSY, ENVY, SUSPICION.

Jealousy, in French jalousie, Latin zelotypia, Greek ζηλοντα, compounded of ζῆλος and τύπος to strike or fill, signifies properly filled with a burning desire; envy, in French envie, Latin invidia, from invidere, compounded of in privative and video to see, signifies not looking at, or looking at in a contrary direction.

We are jealous of what is our own, we are envious of what is another's. Jealousy fears to lose what it has; envy is pained at seeing another have. Princes are jealous of their authority; subjects are jealous of their rights: courtiers are envious of those in favour; women are envious of superior beauty.

The jealous man has an object of desire, something to get and something to retain: he does not look beyond the object that interferes with his enjoyment; a jealous husband may therefore be appeased by the declaration of his wife's animosity against the object of his jealousy. The envious man sickens at the sight of enjoyment; he is easy only in the misery of others: all endeavours, therefore, to satisfy an envious man are fruitless. Jealousy is a noble or an ignoble passion, according to the object; in the former case it is emulation sharpened by fear, in the latter case it is greediness stimulated by fear; 'Every man is more jealous of his natural than his moral qualities.'—HAWKESWORTH.

'It is doing wrong creates such doubts as these,
Renders us jealous, and destroys our peace.

WALLER.

Envy is always a base passion, having the worst passions in its train; 'The envious man is in pain upon all occasions which should give him pleasure.'—ADDISON.

Jealous is applicable to bodies of men as well as individuals; envious to individuals only. Nations are jealous of any interference on the part of any other power in their commerce, government, or territory; 'While the people are so jealous of the clergy's ambition, I do not see any other method left them to reform the world, than by using all honest arts to make themselves acceptable to the laity.'—SWIFT. Individuals are envious of the rank, wealth, and honours of each other; 'A woman does not envy a man for fighting courage, nor a man a woman for her beauty.'—COLLIER.

Jealousy and suspicion both imply a fear of another's will, intentions, or power, to dispossess one of some object of desire: but in jealousy there is none of the distrust which belongs to suspicion. The jealous man does not dispute the integrity or sincerity of his opponent; the suspicious man thinks ill of both. Jealousy exists properly between equals, or those who may without direct injustice make pretensions to the same thing; rival lovers are jealous of each other: suspicion fixes on the person who by fraud or circumvention is supposed to aim at getting what he has no right to; men suspect those who have once cheated them. Jealousy is most alive when the person's intentions are known; suspicion can only exist while the views of the party are concealed. According to this distinction Lord Clarendon has erroneously substituted the word jealousy for that of suspicion when he says, 'The obstinacy in Essex, in refusing to treat with the king, proceeded only from his jealousy, that when the king had got him into his hands, he would take revenge upon him.'—There can be no jealousy between a subject and a king, or between parties entering into a treaty; but there may be suspicion of the good faith of either side towards the other;

Though wisdom wake, suspicion sleeps
At wisdom's gate; and to simplicity
Resigns her charge; while goodness thinks no ill
Where no ill seems.

INVIDIOUS, ENVIOUS.

Invidious, in Latin invidiosus, from invidia and invidere not to look at, signifies looking at with an evil eye; envious is literally only a variation of invidious. Invidious in its common acceptation signifies causing ill will; envious signifies having ill will.

A task is invidious that puts one in the way of giving offence; a look is envious that is full of envy. Invidious qualifies the thing; envious qualifies the empy of the mind. It is invidious for one author to be judge against another who has written on the same subject;

For I must speak what wisdom would conceal,
And truths invidious to the great reveal.—POPE.

A man is envious when the prospect of another's happiness gives him pain; 'They that desire to excel in too many matters out of levity and vainglory, are ever envious.'—BACON.

LIVELY, SPRIGHTLY, VIVACIOUS, SPORTIVE, MERRY, JOCUND.

Lively signifies having life, or the animal spirits which accompany the vital spark; sprightly, contracted from sprightfully or spiritfully, signifies full of spirits; vivacious, in Latin vivax, from vivo to live, has the same original meaning as lively; sportive, fond of or ready for sport; merry, v. Jocund; jocund, in Latin jocundus, from jucundus and juvo to delight or please, signifies delighted or pleased.

The activity of the heart when it beats high with a sentiment of gaiety is strongly depicted by all these terms: the lively is the most general and literal in its signification; life, as a moving or active principle, is supposed to be inherent in spiritual as well as material bodies; the feeling, as well as the body which has within a power of moving arbitrarily of itself, is said to have life, and in whatever object this is wanting, this object is said to be dead: in like manner, according to the degree or circumstances under which this moving principle displays itself, the object is denominated lively, sprightly, vivacious, and the like. Liveliness is the property of childhood, youth, or even maturer age; sprightliness is the peculiar property of youth; vivacity is a quality compatible with the sobriety of years: an infant shows itself to be lively or otherwise in a few months after its birth; a female, particularly in her early years, affords often a pleasing picture of sprightliness; a vivacious companion recommends himself wherever he goes. Sportiveness is an accompaniment of liveliness or sprightliness: a sprightly child will show its sprightliness by its sportive humour: mirth and jocundity are the forms of liveliness which display themselves in social life; the former is a familiar quality, more frequently to be discovered in vulgar than in polished society; jocundity is a form of liveliness which poets have ascribed to nymphs and goddesses, and other ærial creatures of the imagination.

The terms preserve the same sense when applied to the characteristics or actions of persons as when applied to the persons themselves: imagination, wit, conception, representation, and the like, are lively; 'One study is inconsistent with a lively imagination, another with a solid judgement.'—JOHNSON. A person's air, manner, look, tune, dance, are sprightly;

His sportive lambs,

This way and that convolv'd, in friskful glee
Their frolics play. And now the sprightly race
Invites them forth.—THOMSON.

A conversation, a turn of mind, a society, is vivacious; 'By every victory over appetite or passion, the mind gains new strength to refuse those solicitations by which the young and vivacious are hourly assailed.'—JOHNSON. The muse, the pen, the imagination, is sportive; the meeting, the laugh, the song, the conceit, is merry;

Warn'd by the streaming light and merry lark,
Forth rush the jolly clans.—SOMERVILLE.

The train, the dance, is jocund;

Thus jocund fleets with them the winter night.
THOMSON.

CHEERFUL, MERRY, SPRIGHTLY, GAY.

Cheerful signifies full of cheer, or of that which cheers (v. To animate); merry, in Saxon merig, is probably connected with the word mare, and the Latin meretrix a strumpet; sprightly is contracted from spiritedly; gay is connected with joy and jocund, in Latin jocundus, from juvo to delight; cheerful marks an untroubled flow of spirits; with mirth there is more of tumult and noise; with sprightliness there is more buoyancy; gaiety comprehends mirth and indulgence. A cheerful person smiles: the merry person laughs.

the sprightly person dances; the gay person takes his pleasure.

The cheerful countenance remains cheerful; it marks the contentment of the heart, and its freedom from pain: the merry face will often look sad; a trifle will turn mirth into sorrow: the sprightliness of youth is often succeeded by the listlessness of bodily infirmity, or the gloom of despondency: gayety is as transitory as the pleasures upon which it subsists; it is often followed by sullenness and discontent.

Cheerfulness is an habitual state of the mind; mirth is an occasional elevation of the spirits; sprightliness lies in the temperature and flow of the blood; gayety depends altogether on external circumstances. Religion is the best promoter of cheerfulness: it makes its possessor pleased with himself and all around him; 'I have always preferred cheerfulness to mirth': the latter I consider as an act, the former as a habit of the mind. Mirth is short and transient; cheerfulness fixed and permanent.—ADDISON. Company and wine are but too often the only promoters of mirth; 'Mankind may be divided into the merry and the serious, who both of them make a very good figure in the species so long as they keep their respective humours from degenerating into the neighbouring extreme.'—ADDISON. Youth and health will naturally be attended with sprightliness;

But Venus, anxious for her son's affairs,
New counsels tries, and new designs prepares:
That Cupid should assume the shape and face
Of sweet Ascanius, and the sprightly grace.

DRYDEN.

A succession of pleasures, an exemption from care, and the banishment of thought, will keep gayety alive.

Sprightly and merry are seldom employed but in the proper sense as respects persons: but cheerful and gay are extended to different objects; as a cheerful prospect, a cheerful room, gay attire, a gay scene, gay colours, &c.;

To kinder skies, where gentler manners reign,
I turn: and France displays her bright domain.
Gay, sprightly land of mirth and social ease,
Pleas'd with thyself, whom all the world can please.

GOLDSMITH.

LIGHTNESS, LEVITY, FLIGHTINESS, VOLATILITY, GIDDINESS.

Lightness, from light, signifies the abstract quality; levity, in Latin levitas, from levis light, signifies the same; volatility, in Latin volatilitas, from volo to fly, signifies flitting, or ready to fly swiftly on; flightiness, from fly, signifies the readiness to fly; giddiness, from giddy, in Saxon gādg, is probably connected with the verb gehen to go, signifying a state of going unsteadily.

Lightness is taken either in the natural or metaphorical sense; the rest only in the moral sense: lightness is said of the outward carriage, or the inward temper; levity is said only of the outward carriage; a light minded man treats every thing lightly, be it ever so serious; the lightness of his mind is evident by the lightness of his motions. Lightness is common to both sexes; levity is peculiarly striking in females; and in respect to them, they are both exceptionable qualities in the highest degree: when a woman has lightness of mind, she verges very near towards direct vice; when there is levity in her conduct she exposes herself to the imputation of criminality; 'Innocence gives a lightness to the spirits, ill imitated and ill supplied by that forced levity of the vicious.'—BLAIR. Volatility, flightiness, and giddiness are degrees of lightness, which rise in signification on one another; volatility being more than lightness, and the others more than volatility: lightness and volatility are defects as they relate to age; those only who ought to be serious or grave are said to be light or volatile. When we treat that as light which is weighty, when we suffer nothing to sink into the mind, or make any impression, this is a defective lightness of character; when the spirits are of a buoyant nature, and the thoughts fly from one object to another, without resting on any for a moment, this lightness becomes volatility; 'If we see people dancing, even in wooden shoes, and a fiddle always at their heel's, we are soon convinced of the volatile spirits of those merry slaves.'—SOMERVILLE. A light minded person sets care at a distance; a volatile person catches pleasure from every passing object. Flightiness and giddiness are the defects of youth; they bespeak that entire want of command over one's feelings and animal spirits which is inseparable from a state of childhood: a flighty child, however, only fails from a want of attention; but a giddy child, like one whose head is in the natural sense giddy, is unable to collect itself so as to have any consciousness of what passes: a flighty person commits improprieties; 'Remembering many flightinesses in her writing, I know not how to behave myself to her.'—RICHARDSON. A giddy person commits extravagances;

The giddy vulgar, as their fancies guide,
With noise, say nothing, and in parts divide.

DRYDEN.

FROLICK, GAMBOL, PRANK.

Frolic, in German, &c. fröhlich cheerful, comes from froh merry, and freude joy; gambol signifies literally leaping into the air, from the Italian gamba, in French jamb the leg; prank is changed from prance, which literally signifies to throw up the hind feet after the manner of a horse, and is most probably connected with the German prangen to make a parade or fuss, and the Hebrew פָּרַץ to set free, because the freedom indicated by the word prank is more or less discoverable in the sense of all these terms. The frolic is a merry, joyous entertainment; the gambol is a dancing, light entertainment; the prank is a freakish, wild entertainment. Laughing, singing, noise, and feasting constitute the frolic of the careless mind; it belongs to a company: conceit, levity, and trick, in movement, gesture, and contrivance, constitute the gambol; it belongs to the individual: adventure, eccentricity, and humour constitute the prank; it belongs to one or many. One has a frolic; one plays a gambol, or a prank. Frolic is the mirth rather of vulgar minds; servants have their frolicks in the kitchen while their masters have pleasures abroad; 'I have heard of some very merry fellows, among whom the frolic was started and passed by a great majority, that every man should immediately draw a tooth.'—STEELE. Gambols are the diversions of youth; the Christmas season has given rise to a variety of gambols for the entertainment of both sexes. The term gambol may also be applied to the tricks of animals;

The monsters of the flood
Gambol around him in the wat'ry way,
And heavy whales in awkward measures play

POPE.

And in the same sense the term may be applied figuratively;

What are those crested locks
That make such wanton gambols with the wind?

SHAKESPEARE.

Pranks are the diversions of the undisciplined; the rude schoolboy broke loose from school spends his time in molesting a neighbourhood with his mischievous pranks; 'Some time afterward (1756), some young men of the college, whose chambers were near his (Gray's), diverted themselves by frequent and troublesome noises, and, as is said, by pranks yet more offensive and contemptuous.'—JOHNSON. Frolic is the diversion of human beings only; gambol and prank are likewise applicable to brutes; a kitten gambols; a horse, a monkey, and a squirrel will play pranks.

TO AMUSE, DIVERT, ENTERTAIN.

To amuse is to occupy the mind lightly, from the Latin musa a song, signifying to allure the attention by any thing as light and airy as a song; divert, in French divertir, Latin diverto, is compounded of di and verto to turn aside, signifying to turn the mind aside from an object; entertain, in French entretenir, compounded of entre, inter, and tenir, or the Latin teneo to keep, signifies to keep the mind fixed on a thing.

We amuse or entertain by engaging the attention on some present occupation; we divert by drawing the attention from a present object; all this proceeds by the means of that pleasure which the object produces, which in the first case is less vivid than in the second, and in the second case is less durable than in the third. Whatever amuses serves to kill time, to lull the faculties, and banish reflection; it may be solitary, sedentary, and lifeless, but also sociable or intellectual, according to the temper of the person; 'I yesterday passed a whole afternoon in the churchyard, the cloisters, and the church, amusing myself with the tombstones and inscriptions that I met with in those several regions of the dead.'—ADDISON. Whatever diverts causes mirth, and provokes laughter; it will be active, lively, and sometimes tumultuous; 'His diversion on this occasion was to see the cross-bows, mistaken signs, and wrong connivances that passed amid so many broken and refracted rays of sight.'—ADDISON. Whatever entertains acts on the senses, and awakens the understanding; it must be rational, and is mostly social; 'Will Honeycomb was very entertaining, the other night at the play, to a gentleman who sat on his right-hand, while I was at his left. The gentleman believed Will was talking to himself.'—ADDISON. The bare act of walking and changing place may amuse; the tricks of animals divert; conversation entertains. We sit down to a card-table to be amused; we go to a comedy or pantomime to be diverted; we go to a tragedy to be entertained. Children are amused with looking at pictures; ignorant people are diverted with shows; intelligent people are entertained with reading.

The dullest and most vacant, as well as the most intelligent, minds may be amused; the most volatile are diverted; the most reflective are entertained: the emperor Domitian amused himself with killing flies; the emperor Nero diverted himself with appearing before his subjects in the characters of gladiator and charioteer; Socrates entertained himself by discoursing on the day of his execution with his friends on the immortality of the soul.

TO AMUSE, BEGUILE.

Amuse signifies the same as in the preceding article; beguile is compounded of be and guile signifying to overreach with guile. As amuse denotes the occupation of the mind, so beguile expresses an effect or consequence of amusement.

When amuse and beguile express any species of deception, the former indicates what is effected by persons, and the latter that which is effected by things. To amuse is to practise a fraud upon the understanding; to beguile is to practise a fraud upon the memory and consciousness. We are amused by a false story; our misfortunes are beguiled by the charms of fine music or fine scenery. To suffer one's self to be amused is an act of weakness; to be beguiled is a relief and a privilege. Credulous people are easily amused by any idle tale, and thus prevented from penetrating the designs of the artful; 'In later ages pious frauds were made use of to amuse mankind.'—ADDISON. Weary travellers beguile the tedium of the journey by lively conversation;

With seeming innocence the crowd beguil'd,
But made the desperate passes when he smil'd.
DRYDEN.

AMUSEMENT, ENTERTAINMENT, DIVERSION, SPORT, RECREATION, PASTIME.

Amusement signifies here that which serves to amuse (v. To amuse, divert); entertainment, that which serves to entertain (v. To amuse); diversion, that which serves to divert (v. To amuse, divert); sport, that which serves to give sport; recreation, that which serves to recreate, from recreatus, participle of recreo or re and creo to create or make alive again; pastime, that which serves to pass time.

The first four of these terms are either applied to objects which specifically serve the purposes of pleasure, or to such as may accidentally serve this purpose; the last two terms are employed only in the latter sense.

The distinction between the first three terms are very similar in this as in the preceding case. Amusement is a general term, which comprehends little more than the common idea of pleasure, whether small or great;

As Atlas groan'd
The world beneath, we groan beneath an hour:
We cry for mercy to the next amusement.
The next amusement mortgages our fields.

YOUNG.

Entertainment is a species of amusement which is always more or less of an intellectual nature; 'The stage might be made a perpetual source of the most noble and useful entertainments, were it under proper regulations.'—ADDISON. Diversions and sports are a species of amusements more adapted to the young and the active, particularly the latter: the theatre or the concert is an entertainment; fairs and publick exhibitions are diversions; 'When I was some years younger than I am at present, I used to employ myself in a more laborious diversion, which I learned from a Latin treatise of exercises that is written with great erudition; it is there called the σχολασια, or the fighting with a man's own shadow.'—ADDISON. Games of racing or cricket, hunting, shooting, and the like, are sports; 'With great respect to country sports, I may say this gentleman could pass his time agreeably, if there were not a fox or a hare in his county.'—STEELE.

Recreation and pastime are terms of relative import, the former is of use for those who labour; the latter for those who are idle. A recreation must partake more or less of the nature of an amusement, but it is an occupation which owes its pleasure to the relaxation of the mind from severe exertion: in this manner gardening may be a recreation to one who studies; 'Pleasure and recreation of one kind or other are absolutely necessary to relieve our minds and bodies from too constant attention and labour: where therefore publick diversions are tolerated, it behooves persons of distinction, with their power and example, to preside over them.'—STEELE. Company is a recreation to a man of business: the pastime is the amusement of the leisure hour; it may be alternately a diversion, a sport, or a simple amusement, as circumstances require; 'Your microscope brings to sight shoals of living creatures in a spoonful of vinegar; but we, who can distinguish them in their different magnitudes, see among them several huge Leviathans that terrify the little fry of animals about them, and take their pastime as in an ocean.'—ADDISON.

MIRTH, MERRIMENT, JOVIALITY, JOLLITY, HILARITY.

These terms all express that species of gayety or joy which belongs to company, or to men in their social intercourse.

Mirth refers to the feeling displayed in the outward conduct; merriment, and the other terms, refer rather to the external expressions of the feeling, or the causes of the feeling, than to the feeling itself: mirth shows itself in laughter, in dancing, singing, and noise; merriment consists of such things as are apt to excite mirth: the more we are disposed to laugh, the greater is our mirth; the more there is to create laughter, the greater is the merriment: the tricks of Punch and his wife, or the jokes of a clown, cause much mirth among the gaping crowd of rustics; the amusements with the swine, or the roundabout, afford much merriment to the visitants of a fair. Mirth is confined to no age or station; but merriment belongs more particularly to young people, or those of the lower station; mirth may be provoked wherever any number of persons is assembled; 'The highest gratification we receive here from company is mirth, which at the best is but a fluttering, unquiet motion.'—POPE. Merriment cannot go forward any where so properly as at fairs, or common and publick places; 'He who best knows our natures by such afflictions recalls our wandering thoughts from idle merriment.'—GRAY. Joviality or jollity, and hilarity, are species of merriment which belong to the convivial board, or to less refined indulgences; joviality or jollity is the unrefined, unlicensed indulgence in the pleasures of the table, or any social entertainments;

Now swarms the village o'er the jovial mead.
THOMSON

With branches we the fanes adorn, and waste
In jollity the day ordain'd to be the last.

DRYDEN.

Hilarity is the same thing qualified by the cultivation and good sense of the company: we may expect to find much joviality and jollity at a publick dinner of mechanicks, watermen, or labourers: we may expect to find hilarity at a publick dinner of noblemen: eating, drinking, and noise constitute the joviality; the conversation, the songs, the toasts, and the publick spirit of the company contribute to hilarity; 'He that contributes to the hilarity of the vacant hour will be welcomed with ardour.'—JOHNSON.

FESTIVITY, MIRTH.

'There is commonly mirth with festivity, but there may be frequently mirth without festivity. The festivity lies in the outward circumstances: mirth in the temper of the mind. Festivity is rather the producer of mirth than the mirth itself. Festivity includes the social enjoyments of eating, drinking, dancin^g, cards, and other pleasures; 'Pisistratus, fearing that the festivity of his guests would be interrupted by the misconduct of Thrasippus, rose from his seat, and entreated him to stay.'—CUMBERLAND. Mirth includes in it the buoyancy of spirits which is engendered by a participation in such pleasures;

Low lies that house where nut-brown draughts in-spir'd,
Where graybeard mirth and smiling toil retir'd.
GOLDSMITH.

GRAVE, SERIOUS, SOLEMN.

Grave, in Latin gravis heavy, denotes the weight which keeps the mind or person down, and prevents buoyancy; it is opposed to the light; serious, in Latin serus late or slow, marks the quality of slowness or considerateness, either in the mind, or that which occupies the mind: it is opposed to the jocose.

Grave expresses more than serious; it does not merely bespeak the absence of mirth, but that heaviness of mind which is displayed in all the movements of the body; seriousness, on the other hand, bespeaks no depression, but simply steadiness of action, and a restraint from all that is jocular. A man may be grave in his walk, in his tone, in his gesture, in his looks, and all his exterior; he is serious only in his general air, his countenance, and demeanour. Gravity is produced by some external circumstance; seriousness springs from the operation of the mind itself, or from circumstances. Misfortunes or age will produce gravity; seriousness is the fruit of reflection. Gravity is, in the proper sense, confined to the person, as a characteristic of his temper;

If then some grave and pious man appear,
They hush their noise, and lend a listening ear.
DRYDEN.

Serious, on the other hand, is a characteristic either of persons or things; 'In our retirements every thing disposes us to be serious.'—ADDISON. Hence we should speak of a grave assembly, not a serious assembly, of old men; grave senators, not serious senators; of a grave speaker, not a serious speaker: but a serious, not a grave sermon; a serious, not a grave writer; a serious, not a grave sentiment; a serious, not properly a grave objection: grave is, however, sometimes extended to things in the sense of weighty, as when we speak of grave matters of deliberation. Gravity is peculiarly ascribed to a judge, from the double cause, that much depends upon his deportment, in which there ought to be gravity, and that the weighty concerns which press on his mind are most apt to produce gravity: on the other hand, both gravity and seriousness may be applied to the preacher; the former only as it respects the manner of delivery; the latter as it respects especially the matter of his discourse: the person may be grave or serious; the discourse only is serious.

Solemn expresses more than either grave or serious, from the Latin solenis yearly; as applied to the stated religious festivals of the Romans, it has acquired the collateral meaning of religious gravity: like serious, it is employed not so much to characterize the person as the thing: a judge pronounces the solemn sentence of condemnation in a solemn manner; a preacher delivers many solemn warnings to his hearers. Gravity may be the effect of corporeal habit, and seriousness of mental habit; but solemnity is something occasional and extraordinary; 'The necessary business of a man' calling, with some, will not afford much time for set and solemn prayer.'—WHOLE DUTY OF MAN. Some children discover a remarkable gravity as soon as they begin to observe; a regular attention to religious worship will induce a habit of seriousness; the admonitions of a parent on his death-bed will have peculiar solemnity; 'The staidness and gravity of the Spaniards shows itself in the solemnity of their language.'—ADDISON. 'In most of our long words which are derived from the Latin, we contract the length of the syllables, that gives them a grave and solemn air in their own language.'—ADDISON.

EAGER, EARNEST, SERIOUS.

Eager signifies the same as in the preceding article; earnest most probably comes from the thing earnest, in Saxon thornest a pledge, or token of a person's real intentions, whence the word has been employed to qualify the state of any one's mind, as settled or fixed; serious, in Latin serius or sine risu, signifies without laughter.

Eager is used to qualify the desires or passions; earnest to qualify the wishes or sentiments: the former has either a physical or moral application, the latter altogether a moral application: a child is eager to get a plaything; a hungry person is eager to get food; a covetous man is eager to seize whatever comes within his grasp: a person is earnest in solicitation; earnest in exhortation; earnest in devotion.

Eagerness is mostly faulty; it cannot be too early restrained; we can seldom have any substantial reason to be eager;

With joy the ambitious youth his mother heard,
And, eager for the journey, soon prepar'd.

DRYDEN.

Whence this term is applied with particular propriety to brutes;

The panting steeds impatient fury breathe,
But snort and tremble at the gulf beneath;
Eager they view'd the prospect dark and deep,
Vast was the leap, and headlong hung the steep.

POPE.

Earnestness is always taken in a good sense; it denotes the inward conviction of the mind, and the warmth of the heart when awakened by important objects;

Then even superiour to ambition, we
With earnest eye anticipate those scenes
Of happiness and wonder.—TROMSON.

A person is said to be earnest, or in earnest; a person or thing is said to be serious: the former characterizes the temper of the mind, the latter characterizes the object itself. In regard to persons, in which alone they are to be compared, earnest expresses more than serious; the former is opposed to lukewarmness, the latter to unconcernedness: we are earnest as to our wishes, or / prayers, or our persuasions; 'He which prayeth in due sort, is thereby made the more attentive to hear; and be which heareth, the more earnest to pray for the time which we bestow, as well in the one as the other.'—HUCKER. We are serious as to our intentions, or the temper of mind with which we set about things; 'It is hardly possible to sit down to the serious perusal of Virgil's works, but a man shall rise more disposed to virtue and goodness.'—WALSH. The earnestness with which we address another depends upon the force of our conviction; the seriousness with which we address them depends upon our sincerity, and the nature of the subject: the preacher earnestly exhorts his hearers to lay aside their sins; he seriously admonishes those who are guilty of irregularities.

SOBER, GRAVE.

Sober (v. Abstinent) expresses the absence of all exhilaration of spirits; grave (v. Grave) expresses a weight in the intellectual operations which makes them proceed slowly. Sobriety is therefore a more natural and ordinary state for the human mind than gravity: it behooves every man to be sober in all situations; but those who fill the most important stations of life must be grave. Even in our pleasures we may observe sobriety, which keeps us from every unseemly ebullition of mirth; but on particular occasions where the importance of the subject ought to weigh of the mind it becomes us to be grave. At a feast we have need of sobriety; at a funeral we have need of gravity: sobriety extends to many more objects than gravity; we must be sober in our thoughts and opinions, as well as in our outward conduct and behaviour; 'These confusions disposed men of any sobor understanding to wish for peace.'—CLARENDON. We can be grave, properly speaking, only in our looks and our outward deportment;

So spake the Cherub, and his grave rebuke,
Severe in youthful beauty, added grace
Invincible.—MILTON.

Sober is often poetically and figuratively applied;
Now came still ev'ning on, and twilight gray
Had in her sobor liv'ry all things clad.—MILTON.

GLAD, PLEASED, JOYFUL, CHEERFUL.

Glad is obviously a variation of glee and glow; pleased, from please, marks the state of being pleased; joyful bespeaks its own meaning, either as full of joy or productive of great joy; cheerful, v. Cheerful.

Glad denotes either a partial state, or a permanent and habitual sentiment: in the former sense it is most nearly allied to pleased; in the latter sense to joyful and merry.

Glad and pleased are both applied to the ordinary occurrence of the day; but the former denotes rather a lively and momentary sentiment, the latter a gentle but rather more lasting feeling; we are glad to see a friend who has been long absent; we are glad to have good intelligence from our friends and relatives; we are glad to get rid of a troublesome companion;

O Sol, in whom my thoughts find all repose,
My glory, my perfection! glad I see
Thy face, and morn return'd.—MILTON.

We are pleased to have the approbation of those we esteem: we are pleased to hear our friends well spoken of; we are pleased with the company of an intelligent and communicative person; 'The soul has many different faculties, or, in other words, many different ways of acting, and can be intensely pleased or made happy by all these different faculties or ways of acting.'—ADDISON.

Glad, joyful, and cheerful, all express more or less lively sentiments; but glad is less vivid than joyful, and more so than cheerful. Gladness seems to rise as much from physical as mental causes; wine is said to make the heart glad: joy has its source in the mind, as it is influenced by external circumstances; instances of good fortune, either for ourselves, our friends, or our country, excite joy: cheerfulness is an even tenour of the mind, which it may preserve of itself independently of all external circumstances: religious contemplation produces habitual cheerfulness.

A comfortable meal to an indigent person gladdens his heart: a nation rejoices at the return of peace after a long protracted war: a traveller is cheered in a solitary desert by the sight of a human being, or the sound of a voice; or a sufferer is cheered by his trust in Divine Providence.

Glad is seldom employed as an epithet to qualify things, except in the scriptural or solemn style, as, glad tidings of great joy;

Man superiour walks
Amid the glad creation, musing praise.—THOMSON.

Joyful is seldom used to qualify persons than things; hence we speak of joyful news, a joyful occurrence, joyful faces, joyful sounds, and the like;

Thus joyful Troy maintain'd the watch of night,
While fear, pale comrade of inglorious flight,
And heaven-bred horrour, on the Grecian part,
Sat on each face, and sadden'd every heart.—POPE.

Cheerful is employed either to designate the state of the mind or the property of the thing: we either speak of a cheerful disposition, a cheerful person, a cheerful society, or a cheerful face, a cheerful sound, a cheerful aspect, and the like;

No sun e'er gilds the gloomy horrors there,
No cheerful gales refresh the lazy air.—POPE.

When used to qualify a person's actions, they all bespeak the temper of the mind: gladly denotes a high degree of willingness as opposed to aversion; one who is suffering under excruciating pains gladly submits to any thing which promises relief;

For his particular I'll receive him gladly,
But not one follower.—SHAKESPEARE.

Joyfully denotes unqualified pleasure, unmixed with any alloy or restrictive consideration; a convert to Christianity joyfully goes through all the initiatory ceremonies which entitle him to all its privileges, spiritual and temporal;

Never did men more joyfully obey,
Or sooner understood the sign to file;
With such alacrity they bore away,
As if to praise them all the states stood by.

DRYDEN

Cheerfully denotes the absence of unwillingness, it is opposed to reluctantly; the zealous Christian cheerfully submits to every hardship to which he is exposed in the course of his religious profession; 'Doctrine is that which must prepare men for discipline; and men never go on so cheerfully, as when they see where they go.'—SOUTH.

JOY, GLADNESS, MIRTH.

The happy condition of the soul is designated by all these terms (v. Pleasure); but joy and gladness lie more internally; mirth, or the feeling of being merry, (v. Glad) is the more immediate result of external circumstances. What creates joy and gladness is of a permanent nature; that which creates mirth is temporary: joy is the most vivid sensation in the soul; gladness is the same in quality, but inferior in degree; joy is awakened in the mind by the most important events in life; gladness springs up in the mind on ordinary occasions: the return of the prodigal son awakened joy in the heart of his father; a man feels gladness at being relieved from some distress or trouble: public events of a gratifying nature produce universal joy;

His thoughts triumphant, heav'n alone employs,
And hope anticipates his future joys.—JENYNS.

Relief from either sickness or want brings gladness to an oppressed heart; 'None of the poets have observed so well as Milton those secret overflowings of gladness, which diffuse themselves through the mind of the beholder upon surveying the gay scenes of nature.'—ADDISON. He who is absorbed in his private distresses is ill prepared to partake of the mirth with which he is surrounded at the festive board.

Joy is depicted on the countenance, or expresses itself by various demonstrations: gladness is a more tranquil feeling, which is enjoyed in secret, and seeks no outward expression: mirth displays itself in laughter, singing, and noise. 'Most of the appearing mirth in the world, is not mirth, but art. The wounded spirit is not seen, but walks under a disguise.'—SOUTH.

PLEASURE, JOY, DELIGHT, CHARM

Pleasure, from the Latin placere to please or give content, is the generic term, involving in itself the common idea of the other terms; joy, v. Glad; delight, in Latin delicia, comes from delicio to allure, signifying the thing that allures the mind.

Pleasure is a term of most extensive use; it embraces one grand class of our feelings or sensations, and is opposed to nothing but pain, which embraces the opposite class or division: joy and delight are but modes or modifications of pleasure, differing as to the degree, and as to the objects or sources. Pleasure, in its peculiar acceptation, is smaller in degree than either joy or delight, but in its universal acceptation it defines no degree: the term is indifferently employed for the highest as well as the lowest degree; whereas joy and delight can only be employed to express a positively high degree. Pleasure is produced by any or every object; every thing by which we are surrounded acts upon us more or less to produce it; we may have pleasure either from without or from within: pleasure from the gratification of our senses, from the exercise of our affections, or the exercise of our understandings; pleasures from our own selves, or pleasures from others: but joy is derived from the exercise of the affections; and delight either from the affections or the understanding. In this manner we distinguish the pleasures of the table, social pleasures, or intellectual pleasures, the joy of meeting an old friend; or the delight of pursuing a favourite object.

Pleasures are either transitory or otherwise; they may arise from momentary circumstances, or be attached to some permanent condition: all earthly pleasure is in its nature fleeting; and heavenly pleasure, on the contrary, lasting; 'That every day has its pains and sorrows is universally experienced; but if we look impartially about us, we shall find that every day has likewise its pleasures and its joys.'—JOHNSON. Joy is in its nature commonly of short duration, it springs from particular events; it is pleasure at high tide, but it may come and go as suddenly as the events which caused it: one's joy may be awakened and damped in quick succession; earthly joys are peculiarly of this nature, and heavenly joys are not altogether divested of this characteristic; they are supposed to spring out of particular occurrences, when the spiritual and holy affections are peculiarly called into action;

While he who virtue's radiant course has run,
Descends like a serenely setting sun;
His thoughts triumphant heav'n alone employs,
And hope anticipates his future joys.—JENYNS.

Delight is not so fleeting as joy, but it may be less so than simple pleasure; delight arises from a state of outward circumstances which is naturally more durable than that of joy; but it is a state seldom attainable, and not so much at one's command as pleasure: this last is very seldom denied in some form or another to every human being, but those only are susceptible of delight who have acquired a certain degree of mental refinement; we must have a strong capacity for enjoyment before we can find delight in the pursuits of literature, or the cultivation of the arts. Pleasures are often calm and moderate; they do not depend upon a man's rank or condition; they are within the reach of all, more or less, and more or less at one's command: joys are buoyant; they dilate the heart for a time, but they must and will subside; they depend likewise on casualties which are under no one's control: delights are ardent and excessive; they are within the reach of a few only, but depend less on external circumstances than on the temper of the receiver.

Pleasure may be had either by reflection on the past, or by anticipation of the future; joy and delight can be produced only by the present object: we have a pleasure in thinking on what we have once enjoyed, or what we may again enjoy; we experience joy on the receipt of particularly good news; one may experience delight from a musical entertainment. Pleasure and delight may be either individual or social; joy is rather of a social nature: we feel a pleasure in solitude when locked up only in our own contemplations; we experience delight in the prosecution of some great end; we feel joy in the presence of those whom we love, when we see them likewise happy. Pleasures are particularly divided into selfish or benevolent; joys and delights flow commonly from that which immediately interests ourselves, but very frequently spring from the higher source of interest in the happiness of others: the pleasure of serving a friend, or of relieving a distressed object, has always been esteemed by moralists as the purest of pleasures; we are told that in heaven there is more joy over one sinner that repenteth, than over the ninety and nine that need no repentance; the delight which a parent feels at seeing the improvement of his child is one of those enviable sorts of pleasures which all may desire to experience, but which many must be contented to forego.

Pleasure, joy, and delight are likewise employed for the things which give pleasure, joy, or delight.

Charm (v. Attraction) is used only in the sense of what charms, or gives a high degree of pleasure; but not a degree equal to that of joy or delight, though greater than of ordinary pleasure; pleasure intoxicates; the joys of heaven are objects of a Christian's pursuit; the delights of matrimony are lasting to those who are susceptible of true affection; 'Before the day of departure (from the country), a week is always appropriated for the payment and reception of ceremonial visits, at which nothing can be mentioned but the delights of London.'—JOHNSON. The charms of rural scenery never fail of their effect whenever they offer themselves to the eye;

When thus creation's charms around combine,
Amid the store should thankless pride repine?

GOLDSMITH

HAPPINESS, FELICITY, BLISS, BLESSEDNESS, BEATITUDE.

Happiness signifies the state of being happy; felicity, in Latin felicitas, from felix happy, most probably comes from the Greek ἡδύτης youth, which is the age of purest enjoyment; bliss, blessedness, signify the state or property of being blessed; beatitude, from the Latin beatus, signifies the property of being happy in a superior degree.

Happiness comprehends that aggregate of pleasurable sensations which we derive from external objects; it is the ordinary term which is employed alike in the colloquial or the philosophical style: felicity is a higher expression, that comprehends inward enjoyment, or an aggregate of inward pleasure, without regard to the source whence they are derived: bliss is a still higher term, expressing more than either happiness or felicity, both as to the degree and nature of the enjoyment. Happiness is the thing adapted to our present condition, and to the nature of our being, as a compound of body and soul; it is impure in its nature, and variable in degree; it is sought for by various means and with great eagerness; but it often lies much more within our reach than we are apt to imagine: it is not to be found in the possession of great wealth, of great power, of great dominions, of great splendour, or the unbounded indulgence of any one appetite or desire; but it is to be found in moderate possessions, with a heart tempered by religion and virtue, for the enjoyment of that which God has bestowed upon us: it is, therefore, not so unequally distributed as some have been led to conclude.

Happiness admits of degrees, since every individual is placed in different circumstances, either of body or mind, which fit him to be more or less happy;

Ah! whither now are fled

Those dreams of greatness? those unsolid hopes

Of happiness?—THOMSON.

Felicity is not regarded in the same light; it is that which is positive and independent of all circumstances: domestic felicity, and conjugal felicity, are regarded as moral enjoyments, abstracted from every thing which can serve as an alloy; 'No greater felicity can genius attain than that of having purified intellectual pleasure, separated mirth from indecency, and wit from licentiousness.'—JOHNSON. Bliss is that which is purely spiritual; it has its source in the imagination, and rises above the ordinary level of human enjoyments: of earthly bliss little is known but in poetry; of heavenly bliss we form but an imperfect conception from the utmost stretch of our powers;

The fond soul,

Wrapp'd in gay visions of unreal bliss,

Still paints th' illusive form.—THOMSON.

'In the description of heaven and hell we are surely interested, as we are all to reside hereafter either in the regions of horror or of bliss.'—JOHNSON. Blessedness is a term of spiritual import which refers to the happy condition of those who enjoy the Divine favour, and are permitted to have a foretaste of heavenly bliss, by the exaltation of their minds above earthly happiness; 'So solid a comfort to men, under all the troubles and afflictions of this world, is that firm assurance which the Christian religion gives us of a future happiness, as to bring even the greatest miseries which in this life we are liable to, in some sense, under the notion of blessedness.'—TILLOTSON. Beatitude denotes that quality or degree of happiness only which is most exalted; namely, heavenly happiness; 'As in the next world, so in this, the only solid blessings are owing to the goodness of the mind, not the extent of the capacity; friendship here is an emanation from the same source as beatitude there.'—POPE.

HAPPY, FORTUNATE.

Happy and fortunate are both applied to the external circumstances of a man; but the former conveys the idea of that which is abstractedly good, the latter implies rather what is agreeable to one's wishes. A man is happy in his marriage, in his children, in his connexions, and the like: he is fortunate in his trading concerns. Happy excludes the idea of chance; fortunate excludes the idea of personal effort: a man is happy in the possession of what he gets; he is fortunate in getting it.

In the improper sense they bear a similar analogy. A happy thought, a happy expression, a happy turn, a happy event, and the like, denote a degree of positive excellence;

O happy, if he knew his happy state,
The swain, who, free from business and debate,
Receives his easy food from nature's hand,
And just returns of cultivated land.—DRYDEN.

A fortunate idea, a fortunate circumstance, a fortunate event, are all relatively considered, with regard to the wishes and views of the individual; 'Visit the gayest and most fortunate on earth only with sleepless nights, disorder any single organ of the senses, and you shall (will) presently see his gayety vanish.'—BLAIR.

TO FELICITATE, CONGRATULATE.

Felicitate, from the Latin felix happy, signifies to make happy, and is applicable only to ourselves; congratulate, from gratus, pleasant or agreeable, is to make agreeable, and is applicable either to ourselves or others: we felicitate ourselves on having escaped the danger; we congratulate others on their good fortune; 'The astronomers, indeed, expect her (night) with impatience, and felicitate themselves upon her arrival.'—JOHNSON. 'The fierce young hero who had overcome the Curiatii, instead of being congratulated by his sister for his victory, was upbraided by her for having slain her lover.'—ADDISON.

FORTUNATE, LUCKY, FORTUITOUS, PROSPEROUS, SUCCESSFUL.

Fortunate signifies having fortune (v. Chance, fortune); lucky, having luck, which is in German gluck, and in all probability comes from gelingen or lingen to succeed; fortuitous, after the manner of fortune; prosperous, having prosperity; successful, i.e. full of success, enabled to succeed.

The fortunate and lucky are both applied to that which happens without the control of man; but lucky, which is a collateral term, describes the capricious goddess Fortune in her most freakish humours, and fortunate represents her in her most sober mood: in other words, the fortunate is more according to the ordinary course of things; the lucky is something sudden, unaccountable, and singular: a circumstance is said to be fortunate which turns up suitably to our purpose; it is said to be lucky when it comes upon us unexpectedly at the moment that it is wanted;

'This lucky moment the sly traitor chose,
Then starting from his ambush up he rose.

DRYDEN.

Hence we speak of a man as fortunate in his business, and the ordinary concerns of life; 'Several of the Roman emperors, as is still to be seen upon their medals, among their other titles, gave themselves that of Felix or fortunate.'—ADDISON. A man is lucky in the lottery or in games of chance: a fortunate year will make up for the losses of the past year;

O fortunate old man, whose farm remains
For you sufficient, and requites your pains.

DRYDEN.

A lucky hit may repair the ruined spendthrift's fortune, only to tempt him to still greater extravagances;

Riches are oft by guilt or baseness earn'd,
Or dealt by chance to shield a lucky knave.

ARMSTRONG.

Fortunate and lucky are applied to particular circumstances of fortune and luck; but fortuitous is employed only in matters of chance generally; 'A wonder it must be, that there should be any man found so stupid as to persuade himself that this most beautiful world could be produced by the fortuitous concurrence of atoms.'—RAY.

Prosperous and successful seem to exclude the idea of what is fortuitous, although prosperity and success are both greatly aided by good fortune. Fortunate and lucky are applied as much to the removal of evil as to the attainment of good; prosperous and successful are concerned only in what is good, or esteemed as such: we may be fortunate in making our escape; we are prosperous in the acquirement of wealth. Fortunate is employed for single circumstances; prosperous only for a train of circumstances; a man may be fortunate in meeting with the approbation of a superior; he is prosperous in his business; 'Prosperous people (for happy there are none) are hurried away with a fond sense of their present condition, and thoughtless of the mutability of fortune.'—STEELE. Prosperity is extended to whatever is the object of our wishes in this world; success is that degree of prosperity which immediately attends our endeavours: wealth, honours, children, and all outward circumstances, constitute prosperity; whence the epithet prosperous may be applied to the winds as far as they favour our designs;

Ye gods, presiding over lands and seas,
And you who raging winds and waves appease,
Breathe on our swelling sails a prosperous wind.

DRYDEN.

The attainment of any object constitutes the success; 'The Count d'Olivares was disgraced at the court of Madrid, because it was alleged against him that he had never success in his undertakings.'—ADDISON. The fortunate and lucky man can lay no claim to merit, because they preclude the idea of exertion; prosperous and successful may claim a share of merit proportioned to the exertion.

TO FLOURISH, THRIVE, PROSPER.

Flourish, in French fleurir, florissant, Latin florescere or floreo, from flos a flower, signifies to have the vigour and health of a flower in bloom; thrive signifies properly to drive on; prosper, in Latin prosper, prosperus, compounded of pro and spero and spes hope, signifies to be agreeable to the hopes.

To flourish expresses the state of being that which is desirable; to thrive, the process of becoming so.

In the proper sense, flourish and thrive are applied to the vegetation: the former to that which is full grown; the latter to that which is in the act of growing: the oldest trees are said to flourish, which put forth their leaves and fruits in full vigour; young trees thrive when they increase rapidly towards their full growth.

Flourish and thrive are taken likewise in the moral sense; prosper is employed only in this sense: flourish is said either of individuals or communities of men; thrive and prosper only of individuals. To flourish is to be in full possession of one's powers, physical, intellectual, and incidental; an author flourishes at a certain period; an institution flourishes; literature or trade flourishes; a nation flourishes. To thrive is to carry on one's concerns to the advantage of one's circumstances; it is a term of familiar use for those who gain by positive labour: the industrious tradesman thrives. To prosper is to be already in advantageous circumstances: men prosper who accumulate wealth agreeably to their wishes, and beyond their expectations.

Flourish and thrive are always taken in the good sense: nothing flourishes but what ought to flourish; the word bespeaks the possession of that which ought to be possessed: when a poet flourishes he is the ornament of his country, the pride of human nature, the boast of literature: when a city flourishes it attains all the ends of civil association; its advantageous not only to its own members, but to the world at large; 'There have been times in which no power has been brought so low as France. Few have ever flourished in greater glory.'—BURKE. No one thrives without merit: what is gained by the thriving man is gained by those qualities which entitle him to all he has; 'Every thriving grazier can think himself but ill dealt with, if within his own country he is not courted.'—SOUTH. To prosper admits of a different view: one may prosper by that which is bad, or prosper in that which is bad, or become bad by prospering; the attainment of one's ends, be they what they may, constitutes the prosperity; a man may prosper by means of fraud and injustice; he may prosper in the attainment of inordinate wealth or power; and he may become proud, unfeeling, and selfish, by his prosperity: so great an enemy has prosperity been considered to the virtue of man, that every good man has trembled to be in that condition: 'Betimes inure yourself to examine, how your estate prosperes.'—WENTWORTH.

WELL-BEING, WELFARE, PROSPERITY, HAPPINESS.

Well-being may be said of one or many, but more generally of a body; the well-being of society depends upon a due subordination of the different ranks of which it is composed; 'Have free-thinkers been authors of any inventions that conduce to the well-being of mankind?'—BERKELEY. Welfare, or faring well, from the German fahren to go, respects the good condition of an individual; a parent is naturally anxious for the welfare of his child;

For his own sake no duty he can ask,
The common welfare is our only task.—JENYNS.

Well-being and welfare consist of such things as more immediately affect our existence; prosperity, which comprehends both well-being and welfare, includes likewise all that can add to the enjoyments of man. The prosperity of a state, or of an individual, therefore, consists in the increase of wealth, power, honours, and the like; 'Religion affords to good men peculiar security in the enjoyment of their prosperity.'—BLAIR. As outward circumstances more or less affect the happiness of man, happiness is, therefore, often substituted for prosperity; but it must never be forgotten that happiness properly lies only in the mind, and that consequently prosperity may exist without happiness; but happiness, at least as far as respects a body of men, cannot exist without some portion of prosperity.

TO ACQUIRE, OBTAIN, GAIN, WIN, EARN.

Acquire, in French acquérir, Latin acquirō, is compounded of ac or ad and quæro to seek, signifying to seek or get to one's self; obtain, in French obtenir, Latin obtinere, is compounded of ob and tenere to hold, signifying to lay hold or secure within one's reach; gain and win are derived from the same source; namely, the French gagner, German gewinnen, Saxon winnen, from the Latin vinco, Greek καίνομαι or νίκο to conquer, signifying to get the mastery over, to get into one's possession; earn comes from the Saxon tharnan, German ernden, Frieslandish arnan to reap, which is connected with the Greek ἀρνῶμαι to take or get.

The idea of getting is common to these terms, but the circumstances of the action vary. We acquire by our own efforts; we obtain by the efforts of others, as well as of ourselves; we gain or win by striving; we earn by labour. Talents and industry are requisite for acquiring; what we acquire comes gradually to us in consequence of the regular exercise of our abilities; in this manner, knowledge, honour, and reputation are acquired; 'It is Sallust's remark upon Cato, that the less he coveted glory, the more he acquired it.'—ADDISON. Things are obtained by all means, honest or dishonest; whatever comes into our possession agreeable to our wishes is obtained: favours and requests are always obtained; 'Were not this desire of fame very strong, the difficulty of obtaining it, and the danger of losing it when obtained, would be sufficient to deter a man from so vain a pursuit.'—ADDISON. Fortune assists in both gaining and winning, but particularly in the latter case: a subsistence, a superiority, a victory or battle, an advantage, or a pleasure, is gained; 'He whose mind is engaged by the acquisition or improvement of a fortune, not only escapes the insipidity of indifference and the tediousness of inactivity, but gains enjoyments wholly unknown to those who live lazily on the toils of others.'—JOHNSON. A game or a prize in the lottery is literally won;

An honest man may freely take his own;
The goat was mine, by singing fairly won.

DRYDEN.

But we may win many things, in the gaining of which fortune is more concerned than one's own exertions; 'Where the danger ends, the hero ceases: when he has won an empire, or gained his mistress, the rest of his story is not worth relating.'—STEELE. A good constitution and full employment are all that is necessary for earning a livelihood; 'They who have earned their fortune by a laborious and industrious life are naturally tenacious of what they have painfully acquired.'—BLAIR. Fortunes are acquired after a course of years; they are obtained by inheritance, or gained in trade; they are sometimes won at the gaming table, but seldom earned.

What is acquired is solid, and produces lasting benefit; what is obtained may often be injurious to one's health, one's interest, or one's morals; what is gained or won is often only a partial advantage, and transitory in its nature; it is gained or won only to be lost; what is earned serves only to supply the necessity of the moment; it is hardly got and quickly spent. Scholars acquire learning, obtain rewards, gain applause, and win prizes, which are often hardly earned by the loss of health.

TO ACQUIRE, TO ATTAIN

To acquire (v. to attain) is a progressive and permanent action; to attain, from the Latin attineo, compounded of ac or ad and teneo to hold, signifying to rest at a thing, is a perfect and finished action; we always go on acquiring; but we stop when we have attained. What is acquired is something got into the possession; what is attained is the point arrived at. We acquire a language; we attain to a certain degree of perfection.

By abilities and perseverance we may acquire a considerable fluency in speaking several languages; but we can scarcely expect to attain to the perfection of a native in any foreign language. Ordinary powers, coupled with diligence, will enable a person to acquire whatever is useful; 'A genius is never to be acquired by art, but is the gift of nature.'—GAY. We cannot attain to superiority without extraordinary talents and determined perseverance; 'Inquiries after happiness, and rules for attaining it, are not so necessary and useful to mankind as the arts of consolation, and supporting one's self under affliction.'—SHEPARD. Acquirements are always serviceable; attainments always creditable.

ACQUIREMENT, ACQUISITION,

Are two abstract nouns from the same verb, denoting the thing acquired.

Acquirement implies the thing acquired for and by ourselves; acquisition that which is acquired for another, or to the advantage of another.

People can expect to make but slender acquirements without a considerable share of industry; 'Men of the greatest application and acquirements can look back upon many vacant spaces and neglected parts of time.'—HUGHES. Men of slender acquirements will be no acquisition to the community to which they have attached themselves; 'To me, who have taken pains to look at beauty, abstracted from the consideration of its being an object of desire; at power only as it sits upon another, without any hopes of partaking any share of it; at wisdom and capacity without any pretension to rival or envy its acquisitions; the world is not only a mere scene, but a pleasant one.'—STEELE.

Acquirement respects rather the exertions employed; acquisition, the benefit or gain accruing. To learn a language is an acquirement; to gain a class or a degree, an acquisition. The acquirements of literature far exceed in value the acquisitions of fortune.

TO GET, GAIN, OBTAIN, PROCURE.

To get signifies simply to cause to have or possess it is generic, and the rest specific; to gain (v. to acquire) is to get the thing one wishes, or that is for one's advantage: to obtain is to get the thing aimed at or striven after: to procure, from pro and curo to care for, is to get the thing wanted or sought for.

Get is not only the most general in its sense, but in its application: it may be substituted in almost every case for the other terms, for we may say to get or gain a prize, to get or obtain a reward, to get or procure a book; and it is also employed in numberless familiar cases, where the other terms would be less suitable, for what this word gains in familiarity it loses in dignity : hence we may with propriety talk of a servant's getting some water, or a person getting a book off a shelf or getting meat from the butcher, with numberless similar cases in which the other terms could not be employed without losing their dignity. Moreover, get is promiscuously used for whatever comes to the hand, whether good or bad, desirable or not desirable, sought for or not : 'The miser is more industrious than the saint : the pains of getting, the fears of losing, and the inability of enjoying his wealth, have been the mark of satire in all ages.'—SPECTATOR. Gain, obtain, and procure always include either the wishes, or the instrumentality of the agent, or both together. Thus a person is said to get a cold, or a fever, a good or an ill name, without specifying any of the circumstances of the action : but he is said to gain that approbation which is gratifying to his feelings ; to obtain a recompense which is the object of his exertions ; to procure a situation which is the end of his endeavours.

The word gain is peculiarly applicable to whatever comes to us fortuitously ; what we gain constitutes our good fortune ; we gain a victory, or we gain a cause ; the result in both cases may be independent of our exertions ; 'Neither Virgil nor Horace would have gained so great reputation in the world, had they not been the friends and admirers of each other.'—ADDISON. To obtain and procure exclude the idea of chance, and suppose exertions directed to a specific end : but the former may include the exertions of others ; the latter is particularly employed for one's own personal exertions. A person obtains a situation through the recommendation of a friend ; he procures a situation by applying for it. Obtain is likewise employed only in that which requires particular efforts, that which is not immediately within our reach ;

All things are blended, changeable, and vain !
No hope, no wish, we perfectly obtain.—JENYNS.

Procure is applicable to that which is to be got with ease, by the simple exertion of a walk, or of asking for ; 'Ambition pushes the soul to such actions as are apt to procure honour and reputation to the actor.'—ADDISON.

GAIN, PROFIT, EMOLUMENT, LUCRE.

Gain signifies in general what is gained (v. To acquire) ; profit, in French profit, Latin profectus, participle of proficere, i. e. pro and facio, signifies that which makes for one's good ; emolument, from emolui, signifies to work out or get by working ; lucre is in Latin lucrum gain, which probably comes from luo to pay, signifying that which comes to a man's purse.

Gain is here a general term, the other terms are specific : the gain is that which comes to a man : it is the fruit of his exertions, or agreeable to his wish : the profit is that which accrues from the thing. Thus when applied to riches that which increases a man's estate are his gains ; 'The gains of ordinary trades and vocations are honest and furthered by two things, chiefly by diligence and by a good name.'—BACON. That which flows out of his trade are his profits ; that is, they are his gains upon dealing ; 'Why may not a whole estate, thrown into a kind of garden, turn as much to the profit as the pleasure of the owner ?'—ADDISON. Emolument is a species of gain from labour, or a collateral gain ; of this description are a man's emoluments from an office ; 'Except the salary of the Laureate, to which King James added the office of Historiographer, perhaps with some additional emoluments, Dryden's whole revenue seems to have been casual.'—JOHNSON. A man estimates his gains by what he receives in the year ; he estimates his profits by what he receives on every article ; he estimates his emoluments according to the nature of the service which he has to perform : the merchant talks of his gains ; the retail dealer of his profits ; the place-man of his emoluments.

Gain and profit are also taken in an abstract sense ; lucre is never used otherwise ; but the latter always conveys a bad meaning ; it is, strictly speaking, unhallowed gain ; an immoderate thirst for gain is the vice of men who are always calculating profit and loss ; a thirst for lucre deadens every generous feeling of the mind ;

O sacred hunger of pernicious gold !
What bands of faith can impious lucre hold ?

DRYDEN.

Gain and profit may be extended to other objects, and sometimes opposed to each other ; for as that which we gain is what we wish only, it is often the reverse of profitable ; hence the force of that important question in Scripture, What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul ?

GOOD, GOODNESS.

Good, which under different forms runs through all the northern languages, and has a great affinity to the Greek ἀγαθός, is supposed by Adelung to be derived from the Latin gaudeo, Greek γαῖω, and Hebrew הרה, signifying to be joyful, joy or happiness being derived from that which is good.

Good and goodness are abstract terms, drawn from the same word ; the former to denote the thing that is good, the latter the inherent good property of a thing. All good comes from God, whose goodness towards his creatures is unbounded.

The good we do is determined by the tendency of the action ; but our goodness in doing it is determined by the motives of our actions. Good is of a two-fold nature, physical and moral, and is opposed to evil ; Goodness is applicable either to the disposition of moral agents or the qualities of inanimate objects ; it is opposed to badness. By the order of Providence the most horrible convulsions are made to bring about good ;

Each form'd for all, promotes through private care
The publick good, and justly takes its share.

JENYNS.

The goodness or badness of any fruit depends upon its fitness to be enjoyed ; 'The reigning error of his life was, that Savage mistook the love for the practice of virtue, and was indeed not so much a good man as the friend of goodness.'—JOHNSON.

GOOD, BENEFIT, ADVANTAGE.

Good is an abstract universal term, which in its un- limited sense comprehends every thing that can be conceived of, as suited in all its parts to the end proposed. In this sense benefit and advantage, as well as utility, service, profit, &c. are all modifications of good ; but the term good has likewise a limited application, which brings it to a just point of comparison with the other terms here chosen ; the common idea which allies these words to each other is that of good as it respects a particular object. Good is here employed indefinitely ; benefit and advantage are specified by some collateral circumstances. Good is done without regard to the person who does it, or him to whom it is done ; but benefit has always respect to the relative condition of the giver and receiver, who must be both specified. Hence we say of a charitable man, that he does much good, or that he bestows benefits upon this or that individual. In like manner, when speaking of particular communities or society at large, we may say that it is for the good of society or for the good of mankind that every one submits to the sacrifice of some portion of his natural liberty ; but it is intended for the benefit of the poorer orders that the charitably disposed employ so much time and money in giving them instruction.

Good is limited to no mode or manner, no condition of the person or the thing ; it is applied indiscriminately ;

Our present good the easy task is made,
To earn superiour bliss when this shall fade.

JENYNS.

Benefit is more particularly applicable to the external circumstances of a person, as to his health, his improvement, his pecuniary condition, and the like : it is likewise confined in its application to persons only ; we may counsel another for his good, although we do not counsel him for his benefit ; but we labour for the benefit of another when we set apart for him the fruits of our labour : exercise is always attended with some good to all persons ; it is of particular benefit to those who are of a lethargick habit : an indiscreet zeal does more harm than good to the cause of religion ; a patient cannot expect to derive benefit from a medicine when he counteracts its effects ; 'Unless men were endowed by nature with some sense of duty or mora-obligation, they could reap no benefit from revelation.'—BLAIR.

Good is mostly employed for some positive and direct good; advantage for an adventitious and indirect good: the good is that which would be good to all; the advantage is that which is partially good, or good only in particular cases: it is good for a man to exert his talents; it is an advantage to him if in addition to his own efforts he has the support of friends: it may however frequently happen that he who has the most advantages derives the least good: talents, person, voice, powerful interest, a pleasing address, are all advantages; but they may produce evil instead of good if they are not directed to the right purpose; 'The true art of memory is the art of attention. No man will read with much advantage who is not able at pleasure to evacuate his mind.'—JOHNSON.

ADVANTAGE, PROFIT.

Advantage, in French avantage, probably comes from the Latin adventum, participle of advenio, compounded of ad and venio to come to, signifying to come to any one according to his desire, or agreeable to his purpose; profit, in French profite, Latin profectus, participle of proficio, signifies that which inakes for one's good.

The idea common to these terms is of some good received by a person. Advantage is general; it respects every thing which can contribute to the wishes, wants, and comforts of life: profit in its proper sense is specific; it regards only pecuniary advantage. Situations have their advantages; trade has its profits.

Whatever we estimate as an advantage is so to the individual; but profits are something real; the former is a relative term, it depends on the sentiments of the person: what is an advantage to one may be a disadvantage to another;

For he in all his am'rous battles

N' advantage finds like goods and chattels.

BUTLER.

The latter is an absolute term: profit is alike to all under all circumstances; 'He does the office of a counsellor, a judge, an executor, and a friend, to all his acquaintance, without the profits which attend such offices.'—STEELE.

ADVANTAGE, BENEFIT, UTILITY, SERVICE, AVAIL, USE.

Advantage has the same signification as in the preceding article; benefit, in French bienfait, Latin benefactum, compounded of bene well, and factum done, signifies done or made to one's wishes; utility, in French utilité, Latin utilitas and utilis useful, from utor to use, signifies the quality of being able to be used, which is also the meaning of use; service, in French service, Latin servitium, from servio to serve, signifies the quality of serving one's purpose; avail compounded of a or ad and valere to be strong, signifies to be strong for a purpose.

Advantage respects external or extrinsic circumstances of profit, honour, and convenience; benefit respects the consequences of actions and events; utility and service respect the good which can be drawn from the use of any object. Utility implies the intrinsic good quality which renders a thing fit for use; service the actual state of a thing which may fit it for immediate use: a thing has its utility and is made of service.

A large house has its advantages; suitable exercise is attended with benefit: sun-dials have their utility in ascertaining the hour precisely by the sun; and may be made serviceable at times in lieu of watches. Things are sold to advantage, or advantages are derived from buying and selling: 'It is the great advantage of a trading nation, that there are very few in it so dull and heavy, who may not be placed in stations of life which may give them an opportunity of making their fortunes.'—ADDISON. Persons ride or walk for the benefit of their health; 'For the benefit of the gentle reader, I will show what to turn over unread, and what to peruse.'—STEELE. Things are purchased for their utility; 'If the gibbet does not produce virtue, it is yet of such incontestable utility, that I believe those gentlemen would be very unwilling that it should be removed, who are notwithstanding so zealous to steel every breast against damnation.'—HAWKESWORTH. Things are retained when they are found serviceable; 'His wisdom and knowledge are serviceable to all who think fit to make use of them.'—STEELE.

A good education has always its advantages, although every one cannot derive the same benefit from the cultivation of his talents, as all have not the happy art of employing their acquirements to the right objects: riches are of no utility unless rightly employed; and edge-tools are of no service which are not properly sharpened. It is of great advantage to young people to form good connexions on their entrance into life: it is no less beneficial to their morals to be under the guidance of the aged and experienced, from whom they may draw many useful directions for their future conduct, and many serviceable hints by way of admonition.

Utility, use, service, and avail, all express the idea of fitness to be employed to advantage. Utility is applied mostly in a general sense for that which may be used, and use for that which actually is used; thus things may be said to be of general utility, or of particular use; 'Those things which have long gone together are confederate; whereas new things piece not so well; but, though they help by their utility, yet they trouble by their inconviniency.'—BACON. 'When will my friendship be of use to you?'—PHILLIPS. Use comprehends in it whatever is derived from the use of a thing; service may imply that which serves for a particular purpose; avail implies that kind of service which may possibly be procured from any object, but which also may not be procured; it is therefore used in problematical cases, or in a negative sense. Prudence forbids us to destroy any thing that can be turned to a use; 'A man with great talents, but void of discretion, is like Polyphemus in the fable, strong and blind, endued with an irresistible force, which for want of sight is of no use to him.'—ADDISON. Economy enjoins that we should not throw aside a thing so long as it is fit for service; 'The Greeks in the heroic age seem to have been unacquainted with the use of iron, the most serviceable of all the metals.'—ROBERTSON. When entreaties are found to be of no avail, females sometimes try the force of tears; 'What does it avail, though Seneca had taught as good morality as Christ himself from the mount?'—CUMBERLAND.

The intercession of a friend may be available to avert the resentment of one who is offended: useful lessons of experience may be drawn from all the events of life: whatever is of the best quality will be found most serviceable.

TO EMPLOY, USE.

Employ, from the Latin implico, signifies to implicate, or apply for any special purpose; use, from the Latin usus and utor, signifies to enjoy or derive benefit from.

Employ expresses less than use; it is in fact a species of partial using: we always employ when we use; but we do not always use when we employ. We employ whatever we take into our service, or make subservient to our convenience for a time; we use whatever we entirely devote to our purpose. Whatever is employed by one person may, in its turn, be employed by another, or at different times be employed by the same person; but what is used is frequently consumed or rendered unfit for a similar use. What we employ may frequently belong to another; but what one uses is supposed to be his exclusive property. On this ground we may speak of employing persons as well as things; but we speak of using things only, and not persons, except in the most degrading sense. Persons, time, strength, and power are employed;

Thou godlike Hector! all thy force employ;

Assemble all th' united band of Troy.—POPE

Houses, furniture, and all materials, of which either necessities or conveniences are composed, are used;

Straight the broad belt, with gay em'roid'ry grac'd,
He loos'd, the corset from his breast unbraç'd,
Then suck'd the blood, and sov'reign balm infus'd,
Which Chiron gave, and Æsculapius us'd.—POPE.

It is a part of wisdom to employ well the short portion of time which is allotted to us in this subinary state, and to use the things of this world so as not to abuse them No one is exculpated from the guilt of an immoral action, by suffering himself to be employed as an instrument to serve the purposes of another: we ought to use our utmost endeavours to abstain from all connexion with such as wish to implicate us in their guilty practices.

INSTRUMENT, TOOL.

Instrument, in Latin instrumentum, from instruo, signifies the thing by which an effect is produced; tool comes probably from toil, signifying the thing with which one toils. These terms are both employed to express the means of producing an end; they differ principally in this, that the former is used in a good or an indifferent sense, the latter only in a bad sense, for persons. Individuals in high stations are often the instruments in bringing about great changes in nations; 'Devotion has often been found a powerful instrument in humanizing the manners of men.'—BLAIR. Spies and informers are the worthless tools of government;

Poor York! the harmless tool of others' hate,
He sues for pardon, and repents too late.—SWIFT.

TO ABUSE, MISUSE.

Abuse, in Latin abusus, participle of abutor, com- pounded of ab from and utor to use, signifies to use away or wear away with using; in distinction from misuse, which signifies to use amiss. Every thing is abused which receives any sort of injury; it is misused, if not used at all, or turned to a wrong use.

Young people are too prone to abuse books for want of setting a proper value on their contents; 'I know no evil so great as the abuse of the understanding, and yet there is no one vice more common.'—STEELE. People misuse books when they read for amusement only instead of improvement;

You misuse the reverence of your place,
As a false favourite doth his prince's name,
In deeds dishon'rab'le.—SHAKESPEARE.

Money is abused when it is clipped, or its value any way lessened; it is misused when it is spent in excess and debauchery.

TREATMENT, USAGE.

Treatment implies the act of treating, and usage that of using: treatment may be partial or temporary; but usage is properly employed for that which is permanent or continued: a passer-by may meet with ill treatment; but children or domesticks are liable to meet with ill usage. All persons may meet with treatment from others with whom they casually come in connexion: 'By promises of more indulgent treatment, if they would unite with him (Cortez) against their oppressors, he prevailed on the people to supply the Spanish camp with provisions.'—ROBERTSON. Usage is applied more properly to those who are more or less in the power of others: children may receive good or ill usage from those who have the charge of them, servants from their masters, or wives from their husbands; 'If we look further into the world, we shall find this usage (of our Saviour from his own) not so very strange; for kindred is not friendship.'—SOUTH.

TO PROVIDE, PROCURE, FURNISH, SUPPLY.

Provide, in Latin providere, signifies literally to see before, but figuratively to get in readiness for some future purpose; procure, v. To get; furnish, in French fournir, may possibly be connected with the Latin ferro to bring; supply, in French supplier, Latin suppleo, from sub and pleo, signifies to fill up a deficiency, or make up what is wanting.

Provide and procure are both actions that have a special reference to the future; furnish and supply are employed for that which is of immediate concern: one provides a dinner in the contemplation that some persons are coming to partake of it; one procures help in the contemplation that it may be wanted; one furnishes a room, as we find it necessary for the present purpose; one supplies a family with any article of domestic use. Calculation is necessary in providing; one does not wish to provide too much or too little; 'A rude hand may build walls, form roofs, and lay floors, and provide all that warmth and security require.'—JOHN-

SON. Labour and management are requisite in procur- ing; when the thing is not always at hand, or not easily come at, one must exercise one's strength or ingenuity to procure it; 'Such dress as may enable the body to endure the different seasons, the most unenlightened nations have been able to procure.'—JOHNSON. Judge- ment is requisite in furnishing; what one furnishes ought to be selected with due regard to the circum- stances of the individual who furnishes, or for whom it is furnished; 'Auria having driven the Turks from Corone, both by sea and land, furnished the city with corn, wine, victual, and powder.'—KNOLLES. Care and attention are wanted in supplying; we must be careful to know what a person really wants, in order to supply him to his satisfaction;

Although I neither lend nor borrow,
Yet, to supply the ripe wants of my friend,
I'll break a custom.—SHAKESPEARE.

One provides against all contingencies; one procures all necessities; one furnishes all comforts; one supplies all deficiencies. Provide and procure are the acts of persons only; furnish and supply are the acts of uncon- scious agents. A person's garden and orchard may be said to furnish him with delicacies; the earth supplies us with food. So in the improper application; the daily occurrences of a great city furnish materials for a newspaper; a newspaper, to an Englishman, supplies almost every other want; 'Your ideas are new, and borrowed from a mountainous country, the only one that can furnish truly picturesque scenery.'—GRAY.

And clouds, dissolv'd, the thirsty ground supply.
DRYDEN

PROVIDENCE, PRUDENCE.

Providence and prudence are both derived from the verb to provide; but the former expresses the particular act of providing; the latter the habit of providing. The former is applied both to animals and men; the latter is employed only as a characteristic of men. We may admire the providence of the ant in laying up a store for the winter;

In Albion's isle, when glorious Edgar reign'd,
He, wisely provident, from her white cliffs
Launch'd half her forests.—SOMERVILLE.

The prudence of a parent is displayed in his concern for the future settlement of his child; 'Prudence operates on life, in the same manner as rules on com- position; it produces vigilance rather than elevation.'—JOHNSON. It is provident in a person to adopt measures of escape for himself, in certain situations of peculiar danger; it is prudent to be always prepared for all con- tingencies.

PRUDENT, PRUDENTIAL.

Prudent (v. Judgement) characterizes the person or the thing; prudential characterizes only the thing Prudent signifies having prudence; prudential, ac- cording to the rules of prudence, or as respects prudence. The prudent is opposed to the imprudent and inconsiderate; the prudential is opposed to the volun- tary; the counsel is prudent which accords with the principles of prudence;

Ulysses first in publick care she found,
For prudent counsel like the gods renown'd.
POPE

The reason or motive is prudential, as flowing out of circumstances of prudence or necessity; 'Those who possess elevated understandings, are naturally apt to consider all prudential maxims as below their regard.

—JOHNSON. Every one is called upon at certain times to adopt prudent measures; those who are obliged to consult their means in the management of their ex- penses, must act upon prudential motives

FORESIGHT, FORETHOUGHT, FORECAST, PREMEDIATION.

Foresight, from seeing before, and forethought, from thinking beforehand, denote the simple act of the mind in seeing a thing before it happens: forecast, from casting the thoughts onward, signifies coming at the knowledge of a thing beforehand by means of calcula- tion: premeditation from pre before, and meditate signifies obtaining the same knowledge by force of meditating, or reflecting deeply on a thing beforehand. Foresight and forethought are general and indefinite terms; we employ them either on ordinary or extraordinary occasions; but forethought is of the two the most familiar term; forecast and premeditation mostly in the latter case: all business requires foresight; state concerns require forecast: foresight and forecast respect what is to happen; they are the operations of the mind in calculating futurity: premeditation respects what is to be said or done; it is a preparation of the thoughts and designs for action: by foresight and forecast we guard against evils and provide for contingencies; by premeditation we guard against errors of conduct. A man betrays his want of foresight who does not provide against losses in trade;

The wary crane foresees it first, and sails
Above the storm, and leaves the lowly vales.

DRYDEN.

A person shows his want of forecast who does not provide against old age;

Let him forecast his work with timely care,
Which else is huddled, when the skies are fair.

DRYDEN.

A man shows his want of premeditation who acts or speaks on the impulse of the moment; the man therefore who does a wicked act without premeditation lessens his guilt; 'The tongue may fail and falter in her sudden extemporal expressions, but the pen having a greater advantage of premeditation is not so subject to error.'—HOWELL.

JUDGEMENT, DISCRETION, PRUDENCE.

These terms are all employed to express the various modes of practical wisdom, which serve to regulate the conduct of men in ordinary life. The judgement is that faculty which enables a person to distinguish right and wrong in general; discretion and prudence serve the same purpose in particular cases. The judgement is conclusive; it decides by positive inference; it enables a person to discover the truth: discretion is intuitive (v. Discernment); it discerns or perceives what is in all probability right. The judgement acts by a fixed rule; it admits of no question or variation: the discretion acts according to circumstances, and is its own rule. The judgement determines in the choice of what is good: the discretion sometimes only guards against error or direct mistakes; it chooses what is nearest to the truth. The judgement requires knowledge and actual experience; the discretion requires reflection and consideration: a general exercises his judgement in the disposition of his army, and in the mode of attack; while he is following the rules of military art he exercises his discretion in the choice of officers for different posts, in the treatment of his men, in his negotiations with the enemy, and various other measures which depend upon contingencies; 'If a man have that penetration of judgement as he can discern what things are to be laid open, and what to be secreted, to him a habit of dissimulation is a hindrance and a poorness.'—BACON.

Let your own

Discretion be your tutor. Suit the action
To the words.—SHAKESPEARE.

Discretion looks to the present; prudence, which is the same as providence or forethought calculates on the future: discretion takes a wide survey of the case that offers; it looks to the moral fitness of the thing, as well as the consequences which may follow from it; it determines according to the real propriety of the thing, as well as the ultimate advantages which it may produce; prudence looks only to the good or evil which may result from the thing; it is, therefore, but a mode or accompaniment of discretion; we must have prudence when we have discretion; but we may have prudence where there is no occasion for discretion. Those who have the conduct or direction of others require discretion; those who have the management of their own concerns require prudence. For want of discretion the master of a school, or the general of an army, may lose his authority; for want of prudence the merchant may involve himself in ruin; or the man of fortune may be brought to beggary; 'The ignorance in which we are left concerning good and evil, is not such as to supersede prudence in conduct.'—BLAIR.

As epithets, judicious is applied to things oftener than to persons; discreet is applied to persons rather than to things; prudent is applied to both: a remark or a military movement is judicious; it displays the judgement of the individual from whom they emanate;

So bold, yet so judiciously you dare,

That your least praise is to be regular.—DRYDEN

A matron is discreet, who, by dint of years, experience, and long reflection, is enabled to determine on what is befitting the case;

To elder years to be discreet and grave,

Then to old age maturity she gave.—DENMAN.

A person is prudent who does not inconsiderately expose himself to danger; a measure is prudent that guards against the chances of evil;

The monarch rose, preventing all reply,

Prudent lest, from his resolution rais'd,

Others among the chiefs might offer.—MILTON.

Counsels will be injudicious which are given by those who are ignorant of the subject: it is dangerous to intrust a secret to one who is indiscreet: the impetuosity of youth naturally impels them to be imprudent; an imprudent marriage is seldom followed by prudent conduct in the parties that have involved themselves in it.

WISDOM, PRUDENCE.

Wisdom (v. Wit) consists in speculative knowledge; prudence (v. Prudent) in that which is practical: the former knows what is past; the latter by foresight knows what is to come; many wise men are remarkable for their want of prudence; and those who are remarkable for prudence have frequently no other knowledge of which they can boast; 'Two things speak much the wisdom of a nation: good laws, and a prudent management of them.'—STILLINGFLEET.

FOLLY, FOOLERY.

Folly is the abstract of foolish, and characterizes the thing; foolery the abstract of fool, and characterizes the person: we may commit an act of folly without being chargeable with weakness or folly; but none are guilty of fooleries who are not themselves fools, either habitually or temporarily: young people are perpetually committing foolies if not under proper control; 'This peculiar ill property has folly, that it enlarges men's desires while it lessens their capacities.'—SOUTH. Fashionable people only lay aside one foolery to take up another; 'If you are so much transported with the sight of beautiful persons, to what ecstasy would it raise you to behold the original beauty, not filled up with flesh and blood, or varnished with a fading mixture of colours, and the rest of mortal trifles and fooleries.'—WALSH.

FOOL, IDIOT, BUFFOON.

Fool is doubtless connected with our word foul, in German faul, which is either nasty or lazy, and the Greek φαῖλος which signifies worthless or good for nothing; idiot comes from the Greek ιδιώτης, signifying either a private person or one that is rude and unskilled in the ways of the world; buffoon, in French bouffon, is in all probability connected with our word beef, buffalo, and bull, signifying a senseless fellow.

The fool is either naturally or artificially a fool;

Thought's the slave of life, and life's time's fool.

SHAKESPEARE.

The idiot is a natural fool; Idiots are still in request in most of the courts of Germany, where there is not a prince of any great magnificence who has not two or three dressed, distinguished, undisputed fools in his retinue.'—ADDISON. The buffoon is an artificial fool; 'Homer has described a Vulcan that is a buffoon among his gods, and a Thersites among his mortals.'—ADDISON. Whoever violates common sense in his actions is a fool; whoever is unable to act according to common sense is an idiot; whoever intentionally violates common sense is a buffoon.

SIMPLE, SILLY, FOOLISH.

Simple, v. Simple; silly is but a variation of simple; foolish signifies like a fool (v. Fool).

The simple, when applied to the understanding, implies such a contracted power as is incapable of combination; silly and foolish rise in sense upon the former, signifying either the perversion or the total deficiency of understanding; the behaviour of a person may be silly, who from any excess of feeling loses his sense of propriety; the conduct of a person will be foolish who has not judgement to direct himself. Country people may be simple owing to their want of knowledge;

And had the simple natives

Observ'd his sage advice,

Their wealth and fame some years ago

Had reach'd above the skies.—SWIFT.

Children will be silly in company if they have too much liberty given to them;

Two gods a silly woman have undone.—DRYDEN.

There are some persons who never acquire wisdom enough to prevent them from committing foolish errors; 'Virgil justly thought it a foolish figure for a grave man to be overtaken by death, while he was weighing the cadence of words and measuring verses.'

—WALSH.

STUPID, DULL.

Stupid, in Latin stupidus, from stueo to be amazed or bewildered, expresses an amazement which is equivalent to a deprivation of understanding; dull, through the medium of the German toll, and Swedish stolig, comes from the Latin stultus simple or foolish, and denotes a simple deficiency. Stupidity in its proper sense is natural to a man, although a particular circumstance may have a similar effect upon the understanding; he who is questioned in the presence of others may appear very stupid in that which is otherwise very familiar to him; 'A stupid but is only fit for the conversation of ordinary people.'—ADDISON. Dull is an incidental quality, arising principally from the state of the animal spirits. A writer may sometimes be dull who is otherwise vivacious and pointed; a person may be dull in a large circle while he is very lively in private intercourse; 'It is the great advantage of a trading nation that there are very few in it so dull and heavy who may not be placed in stations of life which may give them an opportunity of making their fortunes.'—ADDISON.

YOUTHFUL, JUVENILE, PUERILE.

Youthful signifies full of youth, or in the complete state of youth; juvenile, from the Latin juvenis, signifies the same; but puerile, from puer a boy, signifies literally boyish. Hence the first two terms are taken in an indifferent sense; but the latter in a bad sense, or at least always in the sense of what is suitable to a boy only: thus we speak of youthful vigour, youthful employments, juvenile performances, juvenile years, and the like: but puerile objections, puerile conduct, and the like. Sometimes juvenile is taken in the bad sense when speaking of youth in contrast with men, as juvenile tricks; but puerile is a much stronger term of reproach, and marks the absence of manhood in those who ought to be men. We expect nothing from a youth but what is juvenile; we are surprised and dissatisfied to see what is puerile in a man;

Chorebus then, with youthful hopes beguill'd,

Sworn with success, and of a daring mind,

This new invention fatally design'd.—DRYDEN.

'Raw juvenile writers imagine that, by pouring forth figures often, they render their compositions warm and animated.'—BLAIR. 'After the common course of puerile studies, he was put an apprentice to a brewer.'—JOHNSON.

CHILDISH, INFANTINE.

Childish is in the manner of a child; infantine is in the manner of an infant.

What children do is frequently simple or foolish; 'that infants do is commonly pretty and engaging;

therefore childish is taken in the bad, and infantine in the good or indifferent sense. Childish manners are very offensive in those who have ceased according to their years to be children; 'It may frequently be remarked of the studious and speculative, that they are proud of trifles, and that their amusements seem frivolous and childish.'—JOHNSON. 'The infantine actions of some children evince a simplicity of character, 'The sole comfort of his declining years, almost in infantine imbecility.'—BURKE.

PENETRATION, ACUTENESS, SAGACITY

As characteristics of mind, these terms have much more in them in which they differ than in what they agree: penetration is a necessary property of mind; it exists to a greater or less degree in every rational being that has the due exercise of its rational powers: acuteness is an accidental property that belongs to the mind only, under certain circumstances. As penetration (v. Discernment) denotes the process of entering into substances physically or morally, so acuteness which is the same as sharpness, denotes the fitness of the thing that performs this process; and as the mind is in both cases the thing that is spoken of, the terms penetration and acuteness are in this particular closely allied. It is clear, however, that the mind may have penetration without having acuteness, although one cannot have acuteness without penetration. If by penetration we are commonly enabled to get at the truth which lies concealed, by acuteness we succeed in piercing the veil that hides it from our view; the former is, therefore, an ordinary, and the latter an extraordinary gift; 'Fairfax, having neither talents himself for cabal, nor penetration to discover the cabals of others, had given his entire confidence to Cromwell.'—HUME. 'Chillingworth was an acute disputant against the papists.'—HUME.

Sagacity, in Latin sagacitas and sagio to perceive quickly, comes in all probability from the Persian sag a dog, whence the term has been peculiarly applied to dogs, and from thence extended to all brutes which discover an intuitive wisdom, and also to children, or uneducated persons, in whom there is more penetration than may be expected from the narrow compass of their knowledge; hence, properly speaking, sagacity is natural or uncultivated acuteness; 'Activity to seize, not sagacity to discern, is the requisite which youth value.'—BLAIR.

SAGE, SAGACIOUS, SAPIENT.

Sage and sagacious are variations from the Latin sagax and sagio (v. Penetration); sapient is in Latin sapiens, from sapio, which comes probably from the Greek σοφός wise.

The first of these terms has a good sense, in application to men, to denote the faculty of discerning immediately, which is the fruit of experience, and very similar to that sagacity in brutes which instinctively perceives the truth of a thing without the deductions of reason;

So strange they will appear, but so it happen'd,

That these most sage academicians sate

In solemn consultation—on a cabbage.

CUMBERLAND.

Sagacious all to trace the smallest game,

And bold to seize the greatest.—YOUNG.

Sapient, which has very different meanings, in the original, is now employed only with regard to animals which are trained up to particular arts; its use is therefore mostly burlesque.

ACUTE, KEEN, SHREWD.

Acute, in French acute, Latin acutus, from acus a needle, signifies the quality of sharpness and pointedness peculiar to a needle; keen, in Saxon cene, probably comes from snidan to cut; signifying the quality of being able to cut; shrewd, probably from the Teutonic beschreyen to enchant, signifies inspired or endowed with a strong portion of intuitive intellect.

In the natural sense, a fitness to pierce is predominant in the word acute; and that of cutting, or a fitness for cutting, in the word keen. The same difference is observable in their figurative acception.

An acute understanding is quick at discovering truth in the midst of falsehood; it fixes itself on a single point with wonderful celerity; 'His acuteness was most eminently signalized at the masquerade, where he discovered his acquaintance through their disguises with such wonderful facility.'—JOHNSON. A keen understanding out or removes away the artificial veil under which the truth lies hidden from the view; 'The village songs and festivities of Bacchus gave a scope to the wildest extravagancies of mummery and grimace, mixed with coarse but keen railery.'—CUMBERLAND. A shrewd understanding is rather quick at discovering new truths, than at distinguishing truth from falsehood;

You statesmen are so shrewd in forming schemes!

JEFFREY.

Acuteness is requisite in speculative and abstruse discussions; keenness in penetrating characters and springs of action; shrewdness in eliciting remarks and new ideas. The acute man detects errors, and the keen man falsehoods. The shrewd man exposes follies. Arguments may be acute, reproaches keen, and replies or retorts shrewd. A polemic, or a lawyer, must be acute, a satirist keen, and a wit shrewd.

SHARP, ACUTE, KEEN.

The general property expressed by these epithets is that of sharpness or an ability to cut. The term sharp, from the German scharf and scheren to cut, is generic and indefinite: the two others are modes of sharpness differing in the circumstance or the degree: the acute (v. Acute) is not only more than sharp in the common sense, but signifies also sharp pointed: a knife may be sharp; but a needle is properly acute. Things are sharp that have either a long or a pointed edge; but the keen is applicable only to the long edge; and that in the highest degree of sharpness: a common knife may be sharp; but a razor or a lancet are properly said to be keen. These terms preserve the same distinction in their figurative use. Every pain is sharp which may resemble that which is produced by cutting; 'Be sure you avoid as much as you can to inquire after those that have been sharp in their judgements towards me.'—EARL OF STRAFFORD. A pain is acute when it resembles that produced by piercing deep;

Wisdom's eye

Acute for what? To spy more miseries.—YOUNG.

Words are keen when they cut deep and wide;

To this great end keen instinct stings him on.

YOUNG.

TO PENETRATE, PIERCE, PERFORATE, BORE.

Penetrate, v. Discernment; pierce, in French percer, comes probably from the Hebrew פָּרַץ to break or rend; perforate, from the Latin foris a door, signifies to make a door through; bore, in Saxon borian, is probably changed from fore or foris a door, signifying to make a door or passage.

To penetrate is simply to make an entrance into any substance; to pierce is to go still deeper; to perforate and to bore are to go through, or at all events to make a considerable hollow. To penetrate is a natural and gradual process; in this manner rust penetrates iron, water penetrates wood: to pierce is a violent, and commonly artificial, process; thus an arrow or a bullet pierces through wood. The instrument by which the act of penetration is performed is in no case defined; but that of piercing commonly proceeds by some pointed instrument: we may penetrate the earth by means of a spade, a plough, a knife, or various other instruments; but one pierces the flesh by means of a needle, or one pierces the ground or a wall by means of a mattock.

To perforate and bore are modes of piercing that vary in the circumstances of the action, and the objects acted upon: to pierce, in its peculiar use, is a sudden action by which a hollow is produced in any substance; but to perforate and bore are commonly the effect of mechanical art. The body of an animal is pierced by a dart; but cannon is made by perforating or borin the iron: channels are formed under ground by perforating the earth; holes are made in the ear by perforation; 'Mountains were perforated, and bold arches thrown over the broadest and most rapid streams (by the Romans).'—GIBSON. Holes are made in leather, or in wood, by boring;

But Capys, and the graver sort, thought fit,
'The Greeks' suspected present to commit
To seas or flames, at least to search or bore
The sides, and what that space contains' explore.

DENHAM.

These last two words do not differ in sense, but in application; the latter being a term of vulgar use.

To penetrate and pierce are likewise employed in an improper sense; to perforate and bore are employed only in the proper sense. The first two bear the same relation to each other as in the former: penetrate is, however, only employed as the act of persons; pierce is used in regard to things. There is a power in the mind to penetrate the looks and actions, so as justly to interpret their meaning;

For if when dead we are but dust or clay,
Why think of what posterity shall say?
Their praise or censure cannot us concern,
Nor ever penetrate the silent urn.—JENYNS.

The eye of the Almighty is said to pierce the thickest veil of darkness;

Subtle as lightning, bright, and quick, and fierce,
Gold through doors and walls did pierce

COWLEY.

Affairs are sometimes involved in such mystery, that the most enlightened mind is unable to penetrate either the end or the beginning; the shrieks of distress are sometimes so loud as to seem to pierce the ear.

ORIFICE, PERFORATION.

Orifice, in Latin orificium or orificium, from os and factum, signifies a made mouth, that is, an opening made, as it were; perforation, in Latin perforatio, from perforo, signifies a piercing through.

These terms are both scientifically employed by medical men, to designate certain cavities in the human body; but the former respects that which is natural, the latter that which is artificial: all the vessels of the human body have their orifices, which are so constructed as to open or close of themselves. Surgeons are frequently obliged to make perforations into the bones. Sometimes the term perforation may describe what comes from a natural process, but it denotes a cavity made through a solid substance; but the orifice is particularly applicable to such openings as most resemble the mouth in form and use. In this manner the words may be extended in their application to other bodies besides animal substances, and in other sciences besides anatomy: hence we speak of the orifice of a tube, the orifice of any flower, and the like; or the perforation of a tree, by means of a cannon ball or an iron instrument.

OPENING, APERTURE, CAVITY.

Opening signifies in general any place left open, without defining any circumstances; the aperture is generally a specific kind of opening which is considered scientifically: there are openings in a wood when the trees are partly cut away; openings in streets by the removal of houses; or openings in a fence that has been broken down;

The scented dew
Betrays her early labyrinth, and deep
In scattered sullen openings far behind,
With every breeze she hears the coming storm

THOMSON.

Anatomists speak of apertures in the skull or in the heart, and the naturalist describes the apertures in the nests of bees, ants, beavers, and the like; 'In less than a minute he had thrust his little person through the aperture, and again and again perches upon his neighbour's cage.'—COWPER. The opening or aperture is the commencement of an enclosure; the cavity is the whole enclosure; hence the first two are frequently as a part to the whole: many animals make a cavity in the earth for their nest with only a small aperture for their egress and ingress; 'In the centre of every floor, from top to bottom is the chief room, of no great extent, round which there are narrow cavities or recesses'—JOHNSON.

GULF, ABYSS.

Gulf, in Greek κόλπος from κοίλος hollow, is applied literally in the sense of a deep concave receptacle for water, as the gulf of Venice; abyss, in Greek ἄβυσσος, compounded of a privative and βυσός, a bottom, signifies literally a bottomless pit.

One is overwhelmed in a gulf; it carries with it the idea of liquidity and profundity, into which one inevitably sinks never to rise: one is lost in an abyss; it carries with it the idea of immense profundity, into which he who is cast never reaches a bottom, nor is able to return to the top: an insatiable voracity is the characteristic idea in the signification of this term.

A gulf is a capacious bosom, which holds within itself and buries all objects that suffer themselves to sink into it, without allowing them the possibility of escape; hell is represented as a fiery gulf, into which evil spirits are plunged, and remain perpetually overwhelmed: a guilty mind may be said, figuratively, to be plunged into a gulf of woe or despair, when filled with the horrid sense of its enormities;

Sin and death amain

Following his track, such was the will of heav'n,
Pav'd after him a broad and beaten way
Over the dark abyss, whose boiling gulf
Tamely endur'd a bridge of wondrous length,
From hell continued.—MILTON.

An abyss presents nothing but an interminable space, which has neither beginning nor end; he does wisely who does not venture in, or who retreats before he has plunged too deep to retrace his footsteps: as the ocean, in the natural sense, is a great abyss, so are metaphysical an immense abyss, into which the human mind precipitates itself only to be bewildered;

His broad wing'd vessel drink the whelming tide,
Hid in the bosom of the black abyss.—THOMSON.

LABYRINTH, MAZE.

Intricacy is common to both the objects expressed by these terms; but the term labyrinth has it to a much greater extent than maze; the labyrinth, from the Greek λαβύρινθος, was a work of antiquity which surpassed the maze in the same proportion as the ancients surpassed the moderns in all other works of art: it was constructed on so prodigious a scale, and with so many windings, that when a person was once entered, he could not find his way out without the assistance of a clue or thread. Maze, probably from the Saxon mase a gulf, is a modern term for a similar structure on a smaller scale, which is frequently made by way of ornament in large gardens. From the proper meaning of the two words we may easily see the ground of their metaphorical application: political and polemical discussions are compared to a labyrinth; because the mind that is once entangled in them is unable to extricate itself by any efforts of its own;

From the slow mistress of this school, Experience,
And her assistant, pausing, pale Distrust,
Purchase a dear-bought clue to lead his youth
Through serpentine obliquities of human life,
And the dark labyrinth of human hearts.—YOUNG.

On the other hand, that perplexity and confusion into which the mind is thrown by unexpected or inexplicable events, is termed a maze; because, for the time, it is bereft of its power to pursue its ordinary functions of recollection and combination;

To measur'd notes, while they advance,
He in wild maze shall lead the dance.

CUMBERLAND.

WONDER, ADMIRATION, SURPRISE, ASTONISHMENT, AMAZEMENT.

Wonder, in German wunder, is in all probability a variation of wander, because wonder throws the mind off its bias; admiration, from the Latin miror, and the Hebrew מִרְאָה vision, or looking at, signifies looking at attentively: surprise, compounded of sur and prize, or the Latin prehendo, signifies to take on a sudden;

astonish, from the Latin attonitus, and tonitru thunder, signifies to strike, as it were, with the overpowering noise of thunder; amaze signifies to be in a maze, so as not to be able to collect one's self.

That particular feeling which any thing unusual produces on our minds is expressed by all these terms, but under various modifications. Wonder is the most indefinite in its signification or application, but it is still the least vivid sentiment of all; it amounts to little more than a pausing of the mind, a suspension of the thinking faculty, an incapacity to fix on a discernible point in an object that rouses our curiosity: it is that state which all must experience at times, but none so much as those who are ignorant; they wonder at every thing because they know nothing; 'The reader of the "Seasons" wonders that he never saw before what Thomson shows him.'—JOHNSON. Admiration is wonder mixed with esteem or veneration; the admirer suspends his thoughts, not from the vacancy but the fullness of his mind: he is riveted to an object which for a time absorbs his faculties; nothing but what is great and good excites admiration, and none but cultivated minds are susceptible of it; an ignorant person cannot admire, because he cannot appreciate the value of any thing;

With eyes insatiate, and tumultuous joy,
Beholds the presents, and admires the boy.

DRYDEN.

Surprise and astonishment both arise from that which happens unexpectedly; they are a species of wonder differing in degree, and produced only by the events of life: the surprise, as its derivation implies, takes us unawares; we are surprised if that does not happen which we calculate upon, as the absence of a friend whom we looked for; or we are surprised if that happens which we did not calculate upon; thus we are surprised to see a friend returned whom we supposed was on his journey: astonishment may be awakened by similar events which are more unexpected and more unaccountable; thus we are astonished to find a friend at our house whom we had every reason to suppose was many hundred miles off; or we are astonished to hear that a person has got safely through a road which we conceived to be absolutely impassable; 'So little do we accustom ourselves to consider the effects of time, that things necessary and certain often surprise us like unexpected contingencies.'—JOHNSON. 'I have often been astonished, considering that the mutual intercourse between the two countries (France and England) has lately been very great, to find how little you seem to know of us.'—BURKE.

Surprise may for a moment startle; astonishment may stupify and cause an entire suspension of the faculties; but amazement has also a mixture of perturbation. We may be surprised and astonished at things in which we have no particular interest: we are mostly amazed at that which immediately concerns us. We may be surprised agreeably or otherwise; we may be astonished at that which is agreeable, although astonishment is not itself a pleasure; but we are amazed at that which happens contrary to our inclination. We are agreeably surprised to see our friends: we are astonished how we ever got through the difficulty: we are amazed at the sudden and unexpected events which have come upon us to our ruin. A man of experience will not have much to wonder at, for his observations will supply him with corresponding examples of whatever passes: a wise man will have but momentary surprises; as he has estimated the uncertainty of human life, few things of importance will happen contrary to his expectations: a generous mind will be astonished at gross instances of perfidy in others: there is no mind that may not sometimes be thrown into amazement at the awful dispensations of Providence;

Amazement seizes all; the general cry
Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die.—DRYDEN.

WONDER, MIRACLE, MARVEL, PRODIGY, MONSTER.

Wonder is that which causes wonder (v. Wonder); miracle, in Latin miraculum, from mirror to wonder, has the same signification, signifying that which strikes the sense; marvel is a variation of miracle; prodigy in Latin prodigium, from prodigo, or procul and ago to launch forth, signifies the thing launching forth; monster, in Latin monstrum, comes from monstro to point out, and monéo to advise or give notice; because among the Romans any unaccountable appearance was considered as an indication of some future event.

Wonders are natural; miracles are supernatural. The whole creation is full of wonders; the Bible contains an account of the miracles which happened in those days. Sometimes the term miracle or miraculous may be employed hyperbolically for what is exceedingly wonderful;

Murder, though it have no tongue, will speak

With most miraculous organ.—SHAKESPEARE.

Wonders are real; marvels are often fictitious; prodigies are extravagant and imaginary. Natural history is full of wonders;

His wisdom such as once it did appear

Three kingdoms wonder, and three kingdoms fear.

DENHAM.

Travels abound in marvels or in marvellous stories, which are the inventions either of the artful or the ignorant and credulous: ancient history contains numberless accounts of prodigies. Wonders are agreeable to the laws of nature; they are wonderful only as respects ourselves: monsters are violations of the laws of nature. The production of a tree from a grain of seed is a wonder; but the production of a calf with two heads is a monster;

Ill omens may the guilty tremble at,

Make every accident a prodigy,

And monsters frame where nature never err'd.—LEE.

DISADVANTAGE, INJURY, HURT, DETRIMENT, PREJUDICE.

Disadvantage implies the absence of an advantage (v. Advantage); injury, in Latin injuria, from jus, properly signifies what is contrary to right or justice, but extends in its sense to every loss or deficiency which is occasioned; hurt signifies in the northern languages beaten or wounded; detriment, in Latin detrimentum, from detrītum and detrere to wear away, signifies the effect of being worn out; prejudice, in the improper sense of the word (v. Bias), implies the ill which is supposed to result from prejudice.

The disadvantage is rather the absence of a good; the injury is a positive evil: the want of education may frequently be a disadvantage to a person by retarding his advancement; 'Even the greatest actions of a celebrated person labour under this disadvantage, that however surprising and extraordinary they may be, they are no more than what are expected from him.'—ADDISON. The ill word of another may be an injury by depriving us of friends; 'The places were acquired by just title of victory, and therefore in keeping of them no injury was offered.'—HAYWARD. The disadvantage, therefore, is applied to such things as are of an adventitious nature: the injury to that which is of essential importance. The hurt, detriment, and prejudice are all species of injuries. Injury, in general, implies whatever ill befalls an object by the external action of other objects, whether taken in relation to physical or moral evil to persons or to things; hurt is that species of injury which is produced by more direct violence; too close application to study is injurious to the health; reading by an improper light is hurtful to the eyes: so in a moral sense, the light reading which a circulating library supplies is often injurious to the morals of young people; 'Our repentance is not real, because we have not done what we can to undo our faults, or at least to hinder the injurious consequences of them from proceeding.'—TILLOTSON. All violent affections are hurtful to the mind; 'The number of those who by abstracted thoughts become useless is inconsiderable, in respect of them who are hurtful to mankind by an active and restless disposition.'—BARTLETT. The detriment and prejudice are species of injury which affect only the outward circumstances of a person; the former implying what may lessen the value of an object, the latter what may lower it in the esteem of others. Whatever affects the stability of a merchant's credit is highly detrimental to his interests; 'In many instances we clearly perceive that more or less knowledge dispensed to man would have proved detrimental to his state'—BLAIR.

Whatever is prejudicial to the character of a man should not be made the subject of indiscriminate conversation: 'That the heathen have spoken things to the same sense of this saying of our Saviour is so far from being any prejudice to this saying, that it is a great commendation of it.'—TILLOTSON.

It is prudent to conceal that which will be to our disadvantage unless we are called upon to make the acknowledgment. There is nothing material that is not exposed to the injuries of time, if not to those of actual violence. Excesses of every kind carry their own punishment with them, for they are always hurtful to the body. The price of a book is often detrimental to its sale. The intemperate zeal, or the inconsistent conduct of religious professors is highly prejudicial to the spread of religion.

TO LOSE, MISS.

Lose, in all probability, is but a variation of loose, because what gets loose or away from a person is lost to him; to miss, probably from the particle mis, implying a defect, signifies to lose by mistake.

What is lost is not at hand; what is missing is not to be seen; it does not depend upon ourselves to recover what is lost; it is supposed to be irrevocably gone; what we miss at one time we may by diligence and care recover at another time. A person loses his health and strength by a decay of nature, and must submit patiently to the loss which cannot be repaired; 'Some ants are so unfortunate as to fall down with their load when they almost come home; when this happens they seldom lose their corn, but carry it up again.'—ADDISON. If a person misses the opportunity of improvement in his youth, he will never have another opportunity that is equally good;

For a time caught up to God, as once

Moses was in the mount, and missing long

MILTON

LOSS, DAMAGE, DETRIMENT.

Loss signifies the act of losing or the thing lost, damage, in French dommage, Latin damnum, from dēmo to take away, signifies the thing taken away. detriment, v. Disadvantageous.

Loss is here the generic term; damage and detriment are species or modes of loss. The person sustains the loss, the thing suffers the damage or detriment. Whatever is gone from us which we wish to retain is a loss; hence we may sustain a loss in our property, in our reputation, in our influence, in our intellect, and every other object of possession; 'What trader would purchase such airy satisfaction (as the charms of conversation) by the loss of solid gain.'—JOHNSON. Whatever renders an object less serviceable or valuable, by any external violence, is a damage; as a vessel suffers a damage in a storm; 'The ants were still troubled with the rain, and the next day they took a world of pains to repair the damage.'—ADDISON. Whatever is calculated to cross a man's purpose is a detriment; the bare want of a good name may be a detriment to a young tradesman; the want of prudence is always a great detriment to the prosperity of a family; 'The expenditure should be with the least possible detriment to the morals of those who expend'—BURKE.

INJURY, DAMAGE, HURT, HARM, MISCHIEF.

The idea of making a thing otherwise than it ought is common to these terms. Injury (v. Disadvantage) is the most general term, simply implying what happens contrary to right; the rest are but modes of injury; damage, from the Latin damnum loss, is the injury which takes away from the value of a thing; hurt (v. Disadvantage) is the injury which destroys the soundness or wholeness of a thing; harm (v. Evil) is the injury which is attended with trouble and inconvenience; mischief is the injury which interrupts the order and consistency of things. The injury is applicable to all bodies physical and moral: damage is applicable only to physical bodies. Trade may suffer an injury; a building may suffer an injury; but a building, a vessel, a merchandise, suffers damage. When applied both to physical bodies, the injury comprehends every thing which makes an object otherwise than it ought to be: that is to say, all collateral circumstances which are connected with the end and purpose of things; but damage implies that actual injury which affects the structure and materials of the object: the situation of some buildings is an injury to them; the falling of a chimney, or the breaking of a roof, is a damage: the injury may not be easily removed; the damage may be easily repaired.

Injury and hurt are both applied to persons; but the injury may either affect their bodies, their circumstances, or their minds; the hurt in its proper sense affects only their bodies. We may receive an injury or a hurt by a fall; but the former is employed when the health or spirits of a person suffer, the latter when any fracture or wound is produced. A person sometimes sustains an injury from a fall, either by losing the use of a limb, or by the deprivation of his senses; 'Great injuries mice and rats do in a field.'—MORTIMER. A sprain, a cut, and a bruise are little hurts which are easily cured;

No plough shall hurt the glebe, no pruning hook the vine.—DRYDEN.

The hurt is sometimes figuratively employed as it respects the circumstances of a man, where the idea of inflicting a wound or a pain is implied; as in hurting a man's good name, hurting his reputation, hurting his morals, and other such cases, in which the specific term hurt may be substituted for the general term injury;

In arms and science 't is the same,
Our rival's hurt creates our fame.—PRIOR.

The injury, harm, and mischief are all employed for the circumstances of either things or men; but the injury comprehends cause and effect; the harm and mischief respect the evil as it is. If we say that the injury is done, we always think of either the agent by which it is done, or the object to which it is done, or both; 'Many times we do injury to a cause by dwelling upon trifling arguments.'—WATTS. When we speak of the harm and mischief, we only think of the nature and measure of the one or the other. It is an injury to society to let public offenders go free; young people do not always consider the harm which there may be in some of their most imprudent actions; 'After their young are hatched, they brood them under their wings, lest the cold, and sometimes the heat, should harm them.'—RAY. The mischief of disseminating free principles among the young and the ignorant has now been found to exceed all the good which might result from the superior cultivation of the human mind, and the more extended diffusion of knowledge;

But furious Dido, with dark thoughts involv'd,
Shook at the mighty mischief she resolv'd.—DRYDEN.

TO IMPAIR, INJURE.

Impair comes from the Latin im and pejoro or pejor worse, signifying to make worse; injure, from in and jus against right, signifies to make otherwise than it ought to be.

Impair seems to be in regard to injure as the species to the genus; what is impaired is injured, but what is injured is not necessarily impaired. To impair is a progressive mode of injuring: an injury may take place either by degrees, or by an instantaneous act; straining of the eyes impairs the sight, but a blow injures rather than impairs the eye. A man's health may be impaired or injured by his vices, but his limbs are injured rather than impaired by a fall. A person's circumstances are impaired by a succession of misfortunes; they are injured by a sudden turn of fortune. The same distinction is preserved in their figurative application; 'It is painful to consider that this sublime enjoyment of friendship may be impaired by innumerable causes.'—JOHNSON.

Who lives to nature rarely can be poor.
O what a patrimony this! a being
Of such inherent strength and majesty,
Not worlds possess'd can raise it; worlds destroy'd
Can't injure.—YOUNG.

IMMINENT, IMPENDING, THREATENING.

Imminent, in Latin imminens, from in and maneo to remain, signifies resting or coming upon; impending, from the Latin pendeo to hang, signifies hanging; threatening is used in the sense of the verb to threaten.

All these terms are used in regard to some evil that is exceedingly near: imminent conveys no idea of duration; impending excludes the idea of what is momentary. A person may be in imminent danger of losing his life in one instant, and the danger may be over the next instant: but an impending danger is that, which has been long in existence, and gradually approaching; 'There was an opinion, if we may believe the Spanish historians, almost universal among the Americans, that some dreadful calamity was impending over their heads.'—ROBERTSON. We can seldom escape imminent danger by any efforts of one's own; but we may be successfully warned to escape from an impending danger. Imminent and impending are said of dangers that are not discoverable; but a threatening evil gives intimations of its own approach; we perceive the threatening tempest in the blackness of the sky; we hear the threatening sounds of the enemy's clashing swords; 'The threatening voice and fierce gestures with which these words were uttered, struck Montezuma. He saw his own danger was imminent, the necessity unavoidable.'—ROBERTSON.

THREAT, MENACE.

Threat is of Saxon origin; menace is of Latin extraction. They do not differ in signification; but, as is frequently the case, the Saxon is the familiar term, and the Latin word is employed only in the higher style. We may be threatened with either small or great evils; but we are menaced only with great evils. One individual threatens to strike another: a general menaces the enemy with an attack. We are threatened by things as well as persons: we are menaced by persons only; a person is threatened with a look; he is menaced with a prosecution by his adversary;

By turns put on the suppliant and the lord;
Threaten'd this moment, and the next implor'd.
PRIOR

Of the sharp axe
Regardless, that o'er her devoted head
Hangs menacing.—SOMERVILLE.

EVIL OR ILL, MISFORTUNE, HARM, MISCHIEF.

Evil in its full sense comprehends every quality which is not good, and consequently the other terms express only modifications of evil.

The word is however more limited in its application than its meaning, and admits therefore of a just comparison with the other words here mentioned. They are all taken in the sense of evils produced by some external cause, or evils inherent in the object and arising out of it. The evil, or, in its contracted form, the ill, befalls a person; the misfortune comes upon him; the harm is taken, or he receives the harm; the mischief is done him. Evil in its limited application is taken for evils of the greatest magnitude; it is that which is evil without any mitigation or qualification of circumstances. The misfortune is a minor evil; it depends upon the opinion and circumstances of the individual; what is a misfortune in one respect may be the contrary in another respect. An untimely death, the fracture or loss of a limb, are denominated evils; the loss of a vessel, the overturning of a carriage, and the like, are misfortunes, inasmuch as they tend to the diminution of property; but as all the casualties of life may produce various consequences, it may sometimes happen that that which seems to have come upon us by our ill fortune turns out ultimately of the greatest benefit; in this respect, therefore, the misfortune is but a partial evil: of evil it is likewise observable, that it has no respect to the sufferer as a moral agent, but misfortune is used in regard to such things as are controllable or otherwise by human foresight;

Misfortune stands with her bow ever bent
Over the world; and he who wounds another,
Directs the goddess by that part where he wounds
There to strike deep her arrows in himself.
YOUNG.

The evil which befalls a man is opposed only to the good which he in general experiences; but the misfortune is opposed to the good fortune or the prudence of the individual. Sickness is an evil, let it be endured or caused by whatever circumstances it may; it is a misfortune for an individual to come in the way of having this evil brought on himself: his own relative condition in the scale of being is here referred to.

The harm and mischiefe are species of minor evils; the former of which is much less specifick than the latter, both in the nature and cause of the evil. A person takes harm from circumstances that are not known; the mischiefe is done to him from some positive and immediate circumstance. He who takes cold takes harm; the cause of which, however, may not be known or suspected: a fall from a horse is attended with mischiefe, if it occasion a fracture or any evil to the body. Evil and misfortune respect persons only as the objects; harm and mischiefe are said of inanimate things as the object. A tender plant takes harm from being exposed to the cold air: mischiefe is done to it when its branches are violently broken off or its roots are laid bare.

Misfortune is the incidental property of persons who are its involuntary subjects; but evil, harm, and mischiefe are the inherent and active properties of things that flow out of them as effects from their causes: evil is said either to lie in a thing or attend it as a companion or follower; 'A misfortune is not to be measured from the nature of the evil, but from the temper of the sufferer.'—ADDISON. Harm properly lies in the thing;

To me the labours of the field resign;
Me Paris injured: all the war be mine,
Fall he that must beneath his rival's arms,
And leave the rest secure of future *harm*s.

POPE.

Mischiefe properly attends the thing as a consequence;

To mourn a mischiefe that is past and gone,
Is the next way to draw new mischiefe on.

SHAKESPEARE.

In political revolutions there is evil in the thing and evil from the thing; evil when it begins, evil when it ends, and evil long after it has ceased;

Yet think not thus, when freedom's ills I state,
I mean to flatter kings or court the great.

GOLDSMITH.

It is a dangerous question for any young person to put to himself—what harm is there in this or that indulgence? He who is disposed to put this question to himself will not hesitate to answer it according to his own wishes. The mischiefs which arise from the unskillfulness of those who undertake to be their own coachmen are of so serious a nature, that in course of time they will probably deter men from performing such unsuitable offices.

HURTFUL, PERNICIOUS, NOXIOUS, NOISOME.

Hurtful signifies full of hurt, or causing much hurt; pernicious, v. Destructive; noxious and noisome, from the Latin noxius and noceo to hurt, signifies the same originally as hurtful.

Between hurtful and pernicious there is the same distinction as between hurting and destroying: that which is hurtful may hurt in various ways;

The hurtful hazel in thy vineyard shun.

DRYDEN.

'That which is pernicious necessarily tends to destruction: confinement is hurtful to the health: bad company is pernicious to the morals; or the doctrines of freethinkers are pernicious to the well-being of society;

Of strength, pernicious to myself, I boast,
The powers I have were given me to my cost.

LEWIS.

Noxious and noisome are species of the hurtful: things may be hurtful both to body and mind; noxious and noisome only to the body: that which is noxious inflicts a direct injury;

The serpent, subtlest beast of all the field,
Of huge extent sometimes, with brazen eyes,

And hairy mane, terrifick, though to thee
Not noxious, but obedient at thy call.

MILTON.

That which is noisome inflicts the injury indirectly: noxious insects are such as wound; noisome vapours are such as tend to create disorders;

The only prison that enslaves the soul
Is the dark habitation, where she dwells
As in a noisome dungeon.—BELLINGHAM.

Ireland is said to be free from every noxious weed or animal; where filth is brought together, there will always be noisome smells.

CALAMITY, DISASTER, MISFORTUNE MISCHANCE, MISHAP.

Calamity, in French calamité, Latin calamitas, from calamus a stalk; because hail or whatever injured the stalks of corn was termed a calamity; disaster, in French désastre, is compounded of the privative des or dis and astre, in Latin astrum a star, signifying what came from the adverse influence of the stars; misfortune, mischance, and mishap naturally express what comes amiss.

The idea of a painful event is common to all these terms, but they differ in the degree of importance.

A calamity is a great disaster or misfortune; a misfortune a great mischance or mishap: whatever is attended with destruction is a calamity; whatever occasions mischief to the person, defeats or interrupts plans, is a disaster; whatever is accompanied with a loss of property, or the deprivation of health, is a misfortune; whatever diminishes the beauty or utility of objects is a mischance or mishap: the devastation of a country by hurricanes or earthquakes, or the desolation of its inhabitants by famine or plague, are great calamities; the overturning of a carriage, and the fracture of a limb, are disasters; losses in trade are misfortunes; the spoiling of a book is, to a greater or less extent, a mischance or mishap.

A calamity seldom arises from the direct agency of man; the elements, or the natural course of things are mostly concerned in producing this source of misery to men; the rest may be ascribed to chance as distinguished from design; 'They observed that several blessings had degenerated into calamities, and that several calamities had improved into blessings according as they fell into the possession of wise or foolish men.'—ADDISON. Disasters mostly arise from some specific known cause, either the carelessness of persons, or the unfitness of things for their use; as they generally serve to derange some preconceived scheme or undertaking, they seem as if they were produced by some secret influence;

There in his noisy mansion, skill'd to rule,
The village master taught his little school:
A man severe he was, and stern to view,
I knew him well, and every truant knew.
Well had the boding tremblers learn'd to trace
The day's disasters in his morning face.

GOLDSMITH.

Misfortune is frequently assignable to no specific cause, it is the bad fortune of an individual; a link in the chain of his destiny; an evil independent of himself, as distinguished from a fault; 'She daily exercises her benevolence by pitying every misfortune that happens to every family within her circle of notice.'—JOHNSON. Mischance and mishap are misfortunes of comparatively so trivial a nature, that it would not be worth while to inquire into their cause, or to dwell upon their consequences;

Permit thy daughter, gracious Jove, to tell,
How this mischance the Cyprian queen befall.

POPE.

For pity's sake tells undeserv'd mishaps,
And their applause to gain, recounts his claps.

CHURCHILL.

A calamity is dreadful; a disaster melancholy; a misfortune grievous or heavy; a mischance or mishap slight or trivial.

A calamity is either publick or private, but more frequently the former: a disaster is rather particular than private; it affects things rather than persons; journeys expeditions, and military movements are commonly attended with disasters: misfortunes are altogether personal; they immediately affect the interests of the individual: mischances and mishaps are altogether domestic. We speak of a calamitous period, a disastrous expedition, an unfortunate person, little mischances or mishaps.

ADVERSITY, DISTRESS.

Adversity, v. Adverse; distress, from the Latin dis-tringo, compounded of dis twice, and stringo to bind, signifies that which binds very tight, or brings into a great strait.

Adversity respects external circumstances; distress regards either external circumstances or inward feelings. Adversity is opposed to prosperity; distress to ease.

Adversity is a general condition, distress a particular state. Distress is properly the highest degree of adversity. When a man's affairs go altogether adverse to his wishes and hopes, when accidents deprive him of his possessions or blast his prospects, he is said to be in adversity; 'The other extreme which these considerations should arm the heart of a man against, is utter despondency of mind in a time of pressing adversity.'—SOUTH. When a man is reduced to a state of want, deprived of friends and all prospect of relief, his situation is that of real distress; 'Most men, who are at length delivered from any great distress, indeed, find that they are so by ways they never thought of.'—SOUTH.

Adversity is trying, distress is overwhelming. Every man is liable to adversity, although few are reduced to distress but by their own fault.

DISTRESS, ANXIETY, ANGUISH, AGONY.

Distress, v. Adversity; anxiety, in French anxiété, and anguish, in French angoisse, both come from the Latin ango, anxi to strangle; agony, in French agonie, Latin agonia, Greek ἀγώνια, from ἀγωνίζω to contend or strive, signifies a severe struggle with pain and suffering.

Distress is the pain felt when in a strait from which we see no means of extricating ourselves; anxiety is that pain which one feels on the prospect of an evil. The distress always depends upon some outward cause; the anxiety often lies in the imagination. The distress is produced by the present, but not always immediate, evil;

How many, rack'd with honest passions, droop
In deep retir'd distress! How many stand
Around the death-bed of their dearest friends,
And point the parting anguish.—THOMSON.

The anxiety respects that which is future; 'If you have any affection for me, let not your anxiety, on my account, injure your health.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero). Anguish arises from the reflection on the evil that is past; 'In the anguish of his heart, Adam expostulates with his Creator for having given him an unasked existence.'—ADDISON. Agony springs from witnessing that which is immediate or before the eye;

These are the charming agonies of love,
Whose misery delights. But through the heart
Should jealousy its venom once diffuse,
'T is then delightful misery no more,
But agony unmix'd.—THOMSON.

Distress is not peculiar to any age, where there is a consciousness of good and evil, pain and pleasure; it will inevitably arise from some circumstance or another. Anxiety, anguish, and agony belong to riper years: infancy and childhood are deemed the happy periods of human existence; because they are exempt from the anxieties attendant on every one who has a station to fill, and duties to discharge. Anguish and agony are species of distress, of the severer kind, which spring altogether from the maturity of reflection, and the full consciousness of evil. A child is in distress when it loses its mother, and the mother is also in distress when she misses her child. The station of a parent is, indeed, that which is most productive, not only of distress, but anxiety, anguish, and agony: the mother has her peculiar anxieties for the child, while rearing it in its infant state; the father has his anxiety for its welfare on its entrance into the world: they both suffer the deepest anguish when the child disappoints their dearest hopes, by running a career of vice, and finishing its wicked course by an untimely, and sometimes ignominious, end: not unfrequently they are doomed to suffer the agony of seeing a child encircled in flames from which he cannot be snatched, or sinking into a watery grave from which he cannot be rescued.

TO DISTRESS, HARASS, PERPLEX.

Distress, v. Distress; harass, in French harasser probably from the Greek ἀράσσω to beat; perplex, in Latin perplexus, participle of perplector, compounded of per and plector, signifies to wind round and entangle.

A person is distressed either in his outward circumstances or his feelings; he is harassed mentally or corporeally; he is perplexed in his understanding, more than in his feelings: a deprivation distresses; provocations and hostile measures harass; stratagems and ambiguous measures perplex: a besieged town is distressed by the cutting off its resources of water and provisions;

O friend! Ulysses' shouts invade my ear;
Distress'd he seems, and no assistance near.

POPE

The besieged in a town are harassed by perpetual attacks; 'Persons who have been long harassed with business and care, sometimes imagine that when life declines, they cannot make their retirement from the world too complete.'—BLAIR. The besiegers of a town are sometimes perplexed in all their manœuvres and plans, by the counter-manœuvres and contrivances of their opponents; or a person is perplexed by the contradictory points of view in which an affair appears to him; a tale of wo distresses: continual alarms and incessant labour harass: unexpected obstacles and inextricable difficulties perplex;

Would being end with our expiring breath,
How soon misfortunes would be puff'd away!
A trifling shock can shiver us to the dust,
But th' existence of the immortal soul,
Futurity's dark road perplexes still.—GENTLEMAN.

We are distressed and perplexed by circumstances; we are harassed altogether by persons, or the intentional efforts of others: we may relieve another in distress, or may remove a perplexity; but the harassing ceases only with the cause which gave rise to it.

PAIN, PANG, AGONY, ANGUISH.

Pain is to be traced, through the French and northern languages, to the Latin and Greek ποινή punishment, πόνος labour, and πένουσι to be poor or in trouble. Pang is but a variation of pain, contracted from the Teutonic peinigen to torment; agony comes from the Greek ἀγωνίζω to struggle or contend, signifying the labour or pain of a struggle; anguish comes from the Latin ango, contracted from ante and ago, to act against, or in direct opposition to, and signifies the pain arising from severe pressure.

Pain, which expresses the feeling that is most repugnant to the nature of all sensible beings, is here the generic, and the rest specific terms: pain and agony are applied indiscriminately to what is physical and mental; pang and anguish mostly respect that which is mental: pain signifies either an individual feeling or a permanent state; pang is only a particular feeling; agony is sometimes employed for the individual feeling, but more commonly for the state; anguish is always employed for the state. Pain is indefinite with regard to the degree; it may rise to the highest, or sink to the lowest possible degree; the rest are positively high degrees of pain: the pang is a sharp pain; the agony is a severe and permanent pain; the anguish is an overwhelming pain.

The causes of pain are as various as the modes of pain, or as the circumstances of sensible beings; it attends disease, want, and sin, in an infinite variety of forms; 'We should pass on from crime to crime, heedless and remorseless, if misery did not stand in our way, and our own pains admonish us of our folly.'—JOHNSON. The pangs of conscience frequently trouble the man who is not yet hardened in guilt: the pangs of disappointed love are among the severest to be borne;

What pangs the tender breast of Dido tore!

DRYDEN.

Agony and anguish are produced by violent causes, and disease in its most terrible shape: wounds and torments naturally produce corporeal agony; a guilty conscience that is awakened to a sense of guilt will suffer mental agony;

Thou shalt behold him stretch'd in all the agonies
Of a tormenting and a shameful death.—OTWAY.

Anguish arises altogether from moral causes; the miseries and distresses of others, particularly of those who are nearly related, are most calculated to excite anguish; a mother suffers anguish when she sees her child labouring under severe pain, or in danger of losing its life, without having the power to relieve it;

Are these the parting pangs which nature feels,
When anguish rends the heart-strings?—ROWE.

TORMENT, TORTURE.

Torment (v. To tease) and torture both come from torqueo to twist, and express the agony which arises from a violent twisting or griping of any part; but the latter, which is more immediately derived from the verb, expresses much greater violence and consequent pain than the former. Torture is an excess of torment. We may be tormented by a variety of indirect means; but we are tortured only by the direct means of the rack, or similar instruments. Torment may be permanent: torture is only for a time, or on certain occasions. It is related in history that a person was once tormented to death, by a violent and incessant beating of drums in his prison: the Indians practise every species of torture upon their prisoners. A guilty conscience may torment a man all his life;

Yet in his empire o'er thy abject breast,
His flames and torments only are express'd.—PRIOR.

The horrors of an awakened conscience are a torture to one who is on his death-bed;

To a wild sonnet or a wanton air,
Offence and torture to a sober ear.—PRIOR.

TO AFFLICT, DISTRESS, TROUBLE.

Afflict, in Latin afflictus, participle of affligo, compounded of af or ad and fligo, in Greek θλίβω to press hard, signifies to bear upon any one; distress, v. Adversity; trouble signifies to cause a tumult, from the Latin turba, Greek τρίβη or θόρυβος a tumult.

When these terms relate to outward circumstances, the first expresses more than the second, and the second more than the third.

People are afflicted with grievous maladies;

A melancholy tear afflicts my eye,
And my heart labours with a sudden sigh.—PRIOR.

The mariner is distressed for want of water in the midst of the wide ocean, or an embarrassed tradesman is distressed for money to maintain his credit;

I often did beguile her of her tears,
When I did speak of some distressful stroke,
That my youth suffered.—SHAKESPEARE.

The mechanic is troubled for want of proper tools, or the head of a family for want of good domesticks;

The boy so troubles me,
'Tis past enduring.—SHAKESPEARE.

When they respect the inward feelings, afflict conveys the idea of deep sorrow: distress that of sorrow mixed with anxiety; trouble that of pain in a smaller degree. The death of a parent afflicts; 'We last night received a piece of ill news at our club which very sensibly afflicted every one of us. I question not but my readers themselves will be troubled at the hearing of it. To keep them no longer in suspense, Sir Roger de Coverly is dead.'—ADDISON. The misfortunes of our family and friends distress; 'While the mind contemplates distress, it is acted upon and never acts, and by indulging in this contemplation it becomes more and more unfit for action.'—CRAIG. Crosses in trade and domestick inconveniences trouble.

In the season of affliction prayer affords the best consolation and surest supports. The assistance and sympathy of friends serve to relieve distress. We may often help ourselves out of our troubles, and remove the evil by patience and perseverance.

Afflictions may be turned to benefits if they lead a man to turn inwardly into himself, and examine the state of his heart and conscience in the sight of his Maker. The distresses of human life often serve only to enhance the value of our pleasures when we regain them. Among the troubles with which we are daily assailed, many of them are too trifling for us to be troubled by them.

AFFLICTION, GRIEF, SORROW

Affliction, v. To afflict; grief, from grieve, in German grämen, Swedish gramga, &c.; sorrow, in German sorge, &c. signifies care, as well as sorrow.

All these words mark a state of suffering which differs either in the degree or the cause, or in both.

Affliction is much stronger than grief, it lies deeper in the soul, and arises from a more powerful cause; the loss of what is most dear, the continued sickness of our friends, or a reverse of fortune, will all cause affliction; 'Some virtues are only seen in affliction, and some in prosperity.'—ADDISON. The misfortunes of others, the failure of our favourite schemes, the troubles of our country, will occasion us grief; 'The melancholy silence that follows hereupon, and continues until he has recovered himself enough to reveal his mind to his friend, raises in the spectators a grief that is inexpressible.'—ADDISON.

Sorrow is less than grief; it arises from the untoward circumstances which perpetually arise in life. A disappointment, the loss of a game, our own mistake, or the negligences of others, cause sorrow. If more serious objects awaken sorrow, the feeling is less poignant than that of grief; 'The most agreeable objects recall the sorrow for her with whom he used to enjoy them.'—ADDISON.

Affliction lies too deep to be vehement; it discovers itself by no striking marks in the exterior: it is lasting and does not cease when the external cause ceases to act; grief may be violent, and discover itself by loud and indecorous signs; it is transitory, and ceases even before the cause which gave birth to it; sorrow discovers itself by a simple expression; it is still more transient than grief, not existing beyond the moment in which it is produced.

A person of a tender mind is afflicted at the remembrance of his sins; he is grieved at the consciousness of his fallibility and proneness to error; he is sorry for the faults which he has committed.

Affliction is allayed; grief subsides; sorrow is soothed.

TO GRIEVE, MOURN, LAMENT.

Grieve, v. Affliction; mourn, like moan and murmur, is probably but an imitation of the sound which is produced by pain.

To grieve is the general term; mourn the particular term. To grieve, in its limited sense, is an inward act; to mourn is an outward act: the grief lies altogether in the mind; the mourning displays itself by some outward mark. A man grieves for his sins; he mourns for the loss of his friends. One grieves for that which immediately concerns one's self;

Achates, the companion of his breast,
Goes grieving by his side, with equal cares oppress'd
DRYDEN

One mourns for that which concerns others;

My brother's friends and daughters left behind,
False to them all, to Paris only kind;
For this I mourn till grief or dire disease
Shall waste the form whose crime it was to please.

POPE.

One grieves over the loss of property; one mourns the fate of a deceased relative.

Grieve is the act of an individual; mourn may be the common act of many; a nation mourns, though it does not grieve, for a public calamity. To grieve is applicable to domestick troubles; mourn may refer to publick or private ills. Every good Frenchman has had occasion to grieve for the loss of that which is immediately dear to himself, and to mourn over the misfortunes which have overwhelmed his country.

Grieve and mourn are permanent sentiments; lament (v. To bewail) is a transitory feeling: the former produced by substantial causes, which come home to the feelings; the latter respects things of a more partial, oftentimes of a more remote and indifferent, nature. A real widow mourns all the remainder of her days for the loss of her husband; we lament a thing to-day which we may forget to-morrow. Mourn and lament are both expressed by some outward sign: but the former is composed and free from all noise; the latter displays itself either in cries or simple words;

So close in poplar shades, her children gone,
The mother nightingale laments alone.—DRYDEN.

In the moment of trouble, when the distress of the mind is at its height, it may break out into loud lamentation; but commonly grieving and mourning commence when lamentation ceases.

As epithets, grievous, mournful, and lamentable have a similar distinction. What presses hard on persons, their property, connexions, and circumstances, is grievous; what touches the tender feelings, and tears asunder the ties of kindred and friendship, is mournful; whatever excites a painful sensation in our minds is lamentable. Famine is a grievous calamity for a nation; the violent separation of friends by death is a mournful event at all times, but particularly so for those who are in the prime of life and the fullness of expectation; the ignorance which some persons discover even in the present cultivated state of society is truly lamentable. Grievous misfortunes come but seldom, although they sometimes fall thickly on an individual; a mournful tale excites our pity from the persuasion of its veracity; but lamentable stories are often fabricated for sinister purposes.

GRIEVANCE, HARDSHIP.

Grievance, from the Latin gravis, heavy or burdensome, implies that which lies heavy at heart; hardship, from the adjective hard, denotes that which presses or bears violently on the person.

Grievance is in general taken for that which is done by another to grieve or distress: hardship is a particular kind of grievance, that presses upon individuals. There are national grievances, though not national hardships.

An infraction of one's rights, an act of violence or oppression, are grievances to those who are exposed to them, whether as individuals or bodies of men: an unequal distribution of labour, a partial indulgence of one to the detriment of another, constitute the hardship. A weight of taxes levied by an unthinking government, will be esteemed a grievance; the partiality and caprice of tax-gatherers or subordinates in office in making it fall with unequal weight upon particular persons will be regarded as a peculiar hardship. Men seek a redress of their grievances from some higher power than that by which they are afflicted: they endure their hardships until an opportunity offers of getting them removed; 'It is better private men should have some injustice done them, than a public grievance should not be redressed. This is usually pleaded in defence of all those hardships which fall on particular persons, in particular occasions which could not be foreseen when the law was made.'—SPECTATOR.

TO COMPLAIN, LAMENT, REGRET.

Complain, in French plaindre or plandre, Latin plango to beat the breast as a sign of grief, in Greek πλῖγναι to beat; lament, v. To bewail; regret, compounded of re privative and gratus grateful, signifies to have a feeling the reverse of pleasant.

Complaint marks most of dissatisfaction; lamentation most of regret; regret most of pain. Complaint is expressed verbally; lamentation either by words or signs; regret may be felt without being expressed. Complaint is made of personal grievances; lamentation and regret may be made on account of others as well as ourselves. We complain of our ill health, of our inconveniences, or of troublesome circumstances; we lament our inability to serve another; we regret the absence of one whom we love. Selfish people have the most to complain of, as they demand the most of others, and are most liable to be disappointed; anxious people are the most liable to lament, as they feel every thing strongly; the best regulated mind may have occasion to regret some circumstances which give pain to the tender affections of the heart.

The folly of complaint has ever been the theme of moralists in all ages; it has always been regarded as the author and magnifier of evils; it dwells on little things until they become great; 'We all of us complain of the shortness of time, saith Seneca, and yet have much more than we know what to do with.'—ADDISON. Lamentations are not wiser though more excusable, especially if we lament over the misfortunes of others; 'Surely to dread the future is more reasonable than to lament the past.'—JOHNSON. Regret is frequently tender, and always moderate; hence it is allowable to mortals who are encompassed with troubles to indulge in regret; 'Regret is useful and virtuous when it tends to the amendment of life.'—JOHNSON. We may complain without any cause, and lament beyond what the cause requires; but regret will always be founded on some real cause, and not exceed the cause in degree. It would be idle for a man to complain of his want of education, or lament over the errors and misfortunes of his youth; but he can never look back upon mispent time without sincere regret.

TO COMPLAIN, MURMUR, REPINE.

Complain, v. To complain; murmur, in German murmeln, conveys both in sound and in sense the idea of dissatisfaction; repine is compounded of re and pine, from the English pain, Latin pæna punishment, and the Greek τίνα hunger, signifying to convert into pain.

The idea of expressing displeasure or dissatisfaction is common to these terms. Complaint is not so loud as murmuring, but more so than repining.

We complain or murmur by some audible method; we may repine secretly. Complaints are always addressed to some one; murmurs and repinings are often addressed only to one's self. Complaints are made of whatever creates uneasiness, without regard to the source from which they flow; murmurings are a species of complaints made only of that which is done by others for our inconvenience; when used in relation to persons, complaint is the act of a superior; murmuring that of an inferior; repining is always used in relation to the general disposition of things. When the conduct of another offends, it calls for complaint; when a superior aggrieves by the imposition of what is burdensome, it occasions murmuring on the part of the aggrieved; when disappointments arrive, or ambition is thwarted, men repine at their destiny.

Complaints and murmurs may be made upon every trivial occasion; repinings only on matters of moment. Complaints, especially such as respect one's self, are at best but the offspring of an uneasy mind; they betray great weakness, and ought to be suppressed; murmurs are culpable; they violate the respect and obedience due to superiors; those who murmur have seldom substantial grounds for murmuring; repinings are sinful, they arraign the wisdom and the goodness of an infinitely wise and good Being. It will be difficult, by the aid of philosophy, to endure much pain without complaining; religion only can arm the soul against all the ills of life;

I'll not complain;

Children and cowards rail at their misfortunes.

TRAPP.

The rebellious Israelites were frequently guilty of murmurings, not only against Moses, but even against their Almighty Deliverer, notwithstanding the repeated manifestations of his goodness and power;

Yet, O my soul! thy rising murmurs stay,
Nor dare th' ALLWISE DISPOSER to arraign;
Or against his supreme decree,
With impious grief complain.—LYTTLETON.

A want of confidence in God is the only cause of repinings; he who sees the hand of God in all things cannot repine;

Would all the deities of Greece combine,
In vain the gloomy thunderer might repine;
Sole should he sit, with scarce a god to friend,
And see his Trojans to the shades descend.—POPE.

TO BEWAIL, BEMOAN, LAMENT, DEPLORE.

Bewail is compounded of be and wail, which is probably connected with the word wo, signifying to express sorrow; bemoan, compounded of be and moan, signifies to indicate grief with moans; lament, in French lamentier, Latin lamentor or lamentum, comes probably from the Greek κλαῖμα and κλαίω to cry out with grief; deplora, in Latin deploro, i. e. de and ploro or plango, signifies to give signs of distress with the face or mouth.

All these terms mark an expression of pain by some external sign. Bewail is not so strong as bemoan, but stronger than lament; bewail and bemoan are expressions of unrestrained grief or anguish: a wretched mother bewails the loss of her child; a person in deep distress bemoans his hard fate: lamentation may arise from simple sorrow or even imaginary grievances; a sensualist laments the disappointment of some expected gratification.

Bewail and bemoan are always indecorous, if not sinful, expressions of grief, which are inconsistent with the profession of a Christian; they are common among the uncultivated, who have not a proper principle to restrain the intemperance of their feelings. There is nothing temporal which is so dear to any one that he ought to bewail its loss: nor any condition of things so distressing or desperate as to make a man bemoan his lot. Lamentations are sometimes allowable; the miseries of others, or our own infirmities and sins, may justly be lamented.

Deplore is a much stronger expression than lament; the former calls forth tears from bitterness of the heart;

The wounds they washed, their pious tears they shed,
And laid along their oars deplor'd the dead.—POPE.

The latter excites a cry from the warmth of feeling;

But let not chieft the nightingale lament
Her ruin'd care, too delicately fram'd
To brook the harsh confinement of the cage.

THOMSON.

The deplorable indicates despair; the lamentable marks only pain or distress.

Among the poor we have deplorable instances of poverty, ignorance, vice, and wretchedness combined. Among the higher classes we have often lamentable instances of people involving themselves in trouble by their own imprudence. A field of battle or a city overthrown by an earthquake is a spectacle truly deplorable. It is lamentable to see beggars putting on all the disguises of wretchedness in order to obtain what they might earn by honest industry. The condition of a dying man suffering under the agonies of an awakened conscience is deplorable; the situation of the relative or friend who witnesses the agony, without being able to afford consolation to the sufferer, is truly lamentable.

TO GROAN, MOAN.

Groan and moan are both an onomatopoeia, from the sounds which they express. Groan is a deep sound produced by hard breathing: moan is a plaintive, long-drawn sound produced by the organs of utterance. The groan proceeds involuntarily as an expression of severe pain, either of body or mind: the moan proceeds often from the desire of awakening attention or exciting compassion. Dying groans are uttered in the agonies of death: the moans of a wounded sufferer are sometimes the only resource he has left to make his destitute case known;

The plain ox, whose toil,
Patient and ever ready, clothes the land
With all the pomp of harvest, shall he bleed,
And struggling groan beneath the cruel hands
E'en of the clown he feeds?—THOMSON.

The fair Alexis lov'd, but lov'd in vain,
And underneath the beechen shade, alone,
Thus to the woods and mountains made his moan

DRYDEN.

MOURNFUL, SAD.

Mournful signifies full of what causes mourning; sad (v. Dull) signifies either a painful sentiment, or what causes this painful sentiment. The difference in the sentiment is what constitutes the difference between these epithets: the mournful awakens tender and sympathetic feelings: the sad oppresses the spirits and makes one heavy at heart; a mournful tale contains an account of others' distresses;

Upon his tomb
Shall be engrav'd the sack of Orleans;
The treacherous manner of his mournful death.
SHAKESPEARE.

A sad story contains an account of one's own distress;

How sad a sight is human happiness
To those whose thoughts can pierce beyond an hour!
YOUNG

A mournful event befalls our friends and relatives; a sad misfortune befalls ourselves. Selfish people find nothing mournful, but many things sad: tender-hearted people are always affected by what is mournful, and are less troubled about what is sad.

DULL, GLOOMY, SAD, DISMAL.

Dull may probably come from the Latin dolor, signifying generally that which takes off from the brightness, vivacity, or perfection of any thing; gloomy, from the German glumm, muddy, signifies the same as tarnished; sad is probably connected with shade, to imply obscurity, which is most suitable to sorrow; dismal, compounded of dis and mal or malus, signifies very evil.

When applied to natural objects they denote the want of necessary light: in this sense metals are more or less dull according as they are stained with dirt: the weather is either dull or gloomy in different degrees; that is, dull when the sun is obscured by clouds, and gloomy when the atmosphere is darkened by fogs or thick clouds. A room is dull, gloomy, or dismal, according to circumstances: it is dull if the usual quantity of light and sound be wanting; it is gloomy if the darkness and stillness be very considerable; it is dismal if it be deprived of every convenience that fits it for a habitation; in this sense a dungeon is a dismal abode; 'While man is a retainer to the elements and a sojourner in the body, it (the soul) must be content to submit its own quickness and spirituality to the dulness of its vehicle.'—SOUTH.

Achilles' wrath, to Greece the direful spring
Of woes unnumber'd, heav'nly goddess, sing!
That wrath which hurl'd to Pluto's gloomy reign
The souls of mighty chiefs untimely slain.—POPE.

For nine long nights, through all the dusky air
The pyres thick flaming shot a dismal glare.—POPE.

Sad is not applied so much to sensible as moral objects, in which sense the distressing events of human life, as the loss of a parent or a child, is justly denominated sad; 'Henry II. of France, by a splinter unhappily thrust into his eye at a solemn justing, was sent out of the world by a sad but very accidental death.'—SOUTH.

In regard to the frame of mind which is designated by these terms, it will be easily perceived from the above explanation. As slight circumstances produce dulness, any change, however small, in the usual flow of spirits may be termed dull;

A man
So dull, so dead in look, so wo-begone.
SHAKESPEARE.

Gloom weighs heavy on the mind, and gives a turn to the reflections and the imagination: desponding thoughts of futurity will spread a gloom over every other object; 'Neglect spreads gloominess upon their humour and makes them grow sullen and unconvertible.'—COLLIER. The word dismal is seldom used except as an epithet to external objects. Sadness indicates a wounded state of the heart; feelings of unmixed pain:

Six brave companions from each ship we lost;
With sails outspread we fly the unequal strife,
Sad for their loss, but joyful of our life.—POPE.

GLOOM, HEAVINESS.

Gloom has its source internally, and is often independent of outward circumstances; heaviness is a weight upon the spirits, produced by a foreign cause: the former belongs to the constitution; the latter is occasional. People of a melancholy habit have a particular gloom hanging over their minds which pervades all their thoughts; those who suffer under severe disappointments for the present, and have gloomy prospects for the future, may be expected to be heavy at heart; we may sometimes dispel the gloom of the mind by the force of reflection, particularly by the force of religious contemplation: heaviness of spirits is itself a temporary thing, and may be succeeded by vivacity or lightness of mind when the pressure of the moment has subsided; 'If we consider the frequent reliefs we receive from laughter, and how often it breaks the gloom which is apt to depress the mind, one would take care not to grow too wise for so great a pleasure of life.'—ADDISON. 'Worldly prosperity flattens as life descends. He who lately overflowed with cheerful spirits and high hopes, begins to look back with heaviness on the days of former years.'—BLAIR.

GLOOMY, SULLEN, MOROSE, SPLENETICK.

All these terms denote a temper of mind the reverse of easy or happy: gloomy lies either in the general constitution or the particular frame of the mind; sullen lies in the temper: a man of a gloomy disposition is an involuntary agent; it is his misfortune, and renders him in some measure pitiable: the sullen man yields to his evil humours; sullenness is his fault, and renders him offensive. The gloomy man distresses himself most; his pains are all his own: the sullen man has a great share of discontent in his composition; he charges his sufferings upon others, and makes them suffer in common with himself. A man may be rendered gloomy for a time by the influence of particular circumstances; but sullenness creates pains for itself when all external circumstances of a painful nature are wanting;

Th' unwilling heralds act their lord's commands,
Pensive they walk along the barren sands;
Arriv'd, the hero in his tent they find,
With gloomy aspect, on his arm reclin'd.—POPE.

At this they ceased; the stern debate expir'd:
The chiefs in sullen majesty retir'd.—POPE.

Sullenness and moroseness are both the inherent properties of the temper; but the former discovers itself in those who have to submit, and the latter in those who have to command: sullenness therefore betrays itself mostly in early life; moroseness is the peculiar characteristic of age; 'The morose philosopher is so much affected by these and some other authorities, that he becomes a convert to his friend, and desires he would take him with him when he went to his next ball.'—BUDGELL. The sullen person has many fancied hardships to endure from the control of others; the morose person causes others to endure many real hardships, by keeping them under too severe a control. Sullenness shows itself mostly by an unseemly reserve; moroseness shows itself by the hardness of the speech, and the roughness of the voice. Sullenness is altogether a sluggish principle, that leads more or less to inaction; moroseness is a harsh feeling, that is not contented with exacting obedience unless it inflicts pain.

Moroseness is a defect of the temper; but spleen, from splen, is a defect in the heart: the one betrays itself in behaviour, the other more in conduct. 'A morose man is an unpleasant companion; a splenetic man is a bad member of society: the former is ill-natured to those about him, the latter is ill-humoured with all the world. Moroseness vents itself in temporary expressions: spleen indulges itself in perpetual bitterness of expression: 'While in that splenetic mood, we amused ourselves in a sour critical speculation of which we ourselves were the objects, a few months effected a total change in our variable minds.'—BURKE.

PITEOUS, DOLEFUL, WOFUL, RUEFUL.

Piteous signifies moving pity (v. Pity); doleful, or full of dole, in Latin dolor pain, signifies indicative of much pain; woful, or full of wo, signifies likewise indicative of wo, which from the German weh implies pain; rueful, or full of rue, from the German reuen to repent, signifies indicative of much sorrow

The close alliance in sense of these words one to another is obvious from the above explanation; piteous is applicable to one's external expression of bodily or mental pain; a child makes piteous lamentations when it suffers for hunger, or has lost its way;

With pond'rous clubs

As weak against the mountain heaps they push
Their beating breast in vain and piteous bray,
He lays them quivering on th' ensanguin'd plain

THOMSON.

Doleful applies to those sounds which convey the idea of pain; there is something doleful in the tolling of a funeral bell, or in the sound of a muffled drum;

Entreat, pray, beg, and raise a doleful cry.—DRYDEN.

Woful applies to the circumstances and situations of men; a scene is woful in which we witness a large family of young children suffering under the complicated horrors of sickness and want; 'A brutish temptation made Samson, from a judge of Israel, a woful judgement upon it.'—SOUTH. Rueful applies to the outward indications of inward sorrow depicted in the looks or countenance. The term is commonly applied to the sorrows which spring from a gloomy or distorted imagination, and has therefore acquired a somewhat ludicrous acceptance; hence we find in Don Quixote, the knight of the rueful countenance introduced. The term is however used in poetry in a serious sense;

Coccyus nam'd, of lamentation loud,
Heard on the rueful stream.—MILTON.

MEAN, PITIFUL, SORDID.

The moral application of these terms to the characters of men, in their transactions with each other, is what constitutes their common signification. What ever a man does in common with those below him is mean; it evinces a temper that is prone to sink rather than to rise in the scale of society: whatever makes him an object of pity, and consequently of contempt for his sunken character, makes him pitiful: what ever makes him grovel and crawl in the dust, licking up the dross and filth of the earth, is sordid, from the Latin sordeo to be filthy and pasty. Meanness is in many cases only relatively bad as it respects the disposal of our property: for instance, what is meanness in one, might be generosity or prudence in another: the due estimate of circumstances is allowable in all, but it is meanness for any one to attempt to save, at the expense of others, that which he can conveniently afford either to give or pay: hence an undue spirit of seeking gain or advantage for one's self to the detriment of others, is denominated a mean temper: of this temper the world affords such abundant examples, that it may almost seem unnecessary to specify any particulars, or else I would say it is mean in those who keep servants, to want to deprive them of any fair sources of emolument: it is mean for ladies in their carriages, and attended by their livery servants, to take up the time of a tradesman by bartering with him about sixpences or shillings in the price of his articles. It is mean for a gentleman to do that for himself which, according to his circumstances, he might get another to do for him;

Can you imagine I so mean could prove,

To save my life by changing of my love?

DRYDEN.

Pitifulness goes farther than meanness: it is not merely that which degrades, but unmans the person; it is that which is bad as well as low: when the fear of evil or the love of gain prompts a man to sacrifice his character and forfeit his veracity he becomes truly pitiful: Blifield in Tom Jones is the character whom all pronounce to be pitiful; 'The Jews tell us of a two-fold Messiah, a vile and most pitiful fetch, invented only to evade what they cannot answer'—PRIDEAUX. Sordidness is peculiarly applicable to one's love of gain: although of a more corrupt, yet it is not of so degrading a nature as the two former: the sordid man does not deal in trifles like the mean man; and has nothing so low and vicious in him as the pitiful man. A continual habit of getting money will engender a sordid love of it in the human mind: but nothing short of a radically contemptible character leads a man to be pitiful. A mean man is thought lightly of: a pitiful man is held in profound contempt: a sordid man is hated. Meanness descends to that which is insignificant and worthless;

Nature, I thought, perform'd too mean a part,
Forming her movements to the rules of art.
SWIFT.

Pitifulness sinks into that which is despicable; Those men who give themselves airs of bravery on reflecting upon the last scenes of others, may behave the most pitifully in their own.—RICHARDSON. Sordidness contaminates the mind with what is foul; 'It is strange, since the priest's office heretofore was always splendid, that it is now looked upon as a piece of religion, and to make it low and sordid.'—SOUTH.

This my assertion proves, he may be old,
And yet not sordid, who refuses gold.
DENHAM.

SORRY, GRIEVED, HURT.

Sorry and grieved are epithets somewhat differing from their primitives sorrow and grief (v. Affliction), inasmuch as they are applied to ordinary subjects. We speak of being sorry for any thing, however trivial, which concerns ourselves;

The ass, approaching next, confess'd
That in his heart he lov'd a jest;
One fault he hath, is sorry for 't,
His ears are half a foot too short.—SWIFT.

We are commonly grieved for that which concerns others;

The mimic ape began to chatter,
How evil tongues his name bespatter;
He saw, and he was grieved to see 't,
His zeal was sometimes indiscreet.—SWIFT.

I am sorry that I was not at home when a person called upon me; I am grieved that it is not in my power to serve a friend who stands in need. Both these terms respect only that which we do ourselves: hurt (v. To displease and To injure) respects that which is done to us, denoting a painful feeling from hurt or wounded feelings; we are hurt at being treated with disrespect; 'No man is hurt, at least few are so, by hearing his neighbour esteemed a worthy man.'—BLAIR.

UNHAPPY, MISERABLE, WRETCHED.

Unhappy is literally not to be happy; this is the negative condition of many who might be happy if they pleased. Miserable, from misereor to pity, signifies to deserve pity, which is to be positively and extremely unhappy: this is the lot only of a comparatively few. Wretched, from our word wreck, the Saxon wrecca an exile, and the like, signifies cast away or abandoned; that is, particularly miserable, which is the lot of still fewer. As happiness lies properly in the mind, unhappy is taken in the proper sense, with regard to the state of the feelings, but is figuratively extended to the outward circumstances which occasion the painful feelings; we lead an unhappy life, or are in an unhappy condition: as that which excites the compassion of others must be external, and the state of abandonment must of itself be an outward state, miserable and wretched are properly applied to the outward circumstances which cause the pain, and improperly to the pain which is occasioned. We can measure the force of these words, that is to say, the degree of unhappiness which they express, only by the circumstance which causes the unhappiness. Unhappy is an indefinite term; as we may be unhappy from slight circumstances, or from those which are important; a child may be said to be unhappy at the loss of a plaything; a man is unhappy who leads a vicious life; miserable and wretched are more limited in their application; a child cannot be either miserable or wretched; and he who is so, has some serious cause either in his own mind or in his circumstances to make him so: a man is miserable who is tormented by his conscience; a mother will be wretched who sees her child violently torn from her.

The same distinction holds good when taken to designate the outward circumstances themselves; he is an unhappy man whom nobody likes, and who likes nobody; every criminal suffering the punishment of his offences is an unhappy man;

Such is the fate unhappy women find,
And such the curse entail'd upon our kind.
ROWE.

The condition of the poor is particularly miserable in countries which are not blessed with the abundance that England enjoys;

These miseries are more than may be borne.
SHAKESPEARE.

Philoctetes, abandoned by the Greeks in the island of Lemnos, a prey to the most poignant grief and the horrors of indigence and solitude, was a wretched man;

'T is murmur, discontent, distrust,
That makes you wretched.—GAY.

Unhappy is only applicable to that which respects the happiness of man; but miserable and wretched may be said of that which is mean and worthless in its nature; a writer may be either miserable or wretched according to the lowness of the measure at which he is rated; so likewise any performance may be miserable or wretched, a house may be miserable or wretched, and the like.

TO EMBARRASS, PERPLEX, ENTANGLE

Embarrass (v. Difficult) respects a person's manners or circumstances; perplex (v. To distress) his views and conduct; entangle (v. To disengage) is said of particular circumstances. Embarrassments depend altogether on ourselves; the want of prudence and presence of mind are the common causes: perplexities depend on extraneous circumstances as well as ourselves; extensive dealings with others are mostly attended with perplexities; entanglements arise mostly from the evil designs of others.

That embarrasses which interrupts the even course or progress of one's actions; 'Cervantes had so much kindness for Don Quixote, that however he embarrasses him with absurd distresses, he gives him so much sense and virtue as may preserve our esteem.'—JOHNSON. That perplexes which interferes with one's opinions; 'It is scarcely possible, in the regularity and composure of the present time, to image the tumult of absurdity and clamour of contradiction which perplexed doctrine, disordered practice, and disturbed both public and private quiet in the time of the rebellion.'—JOHNSON. That entangles which binds a person in his decisions; 'I presume you do not entangle yourself in the particular controversies between the Romanists and us.'—CLARENDON. Pecuniary difficulties embarrass, or contending feelings produce embarrassment: contrary counsels or interests perplex: law-suits entangle. Steadiness of mind prevents embarrassment in the outward behaviour. Firmness of character is requisite in the midst of perplexities: caution must be employed to guard against entanglements.

TO TROUBLE, DISTURB, MOLEST.

Whatever uneasiness or painful sentiment is produced in the mind by outward circumstances is effected either by trouble (v. Affliction), by disturbance (v. Commotion), or by molestation (v. To inconvenience). Trouble is the most general in its application; we may be troubled by the want of a thing, or troubled by that which is unsuitable; we are disturbed and molested only by that which actively troubles. Pecuniary wants are the greatest troubles in life; the perverseness of servants, the indisposition or ill behaviour of children, are domestic troubles; 'Ulysses was exceedingly troubled at the sight of his mother (in the Elysian fields).—ADDISON. The noise of children is a disturbance, and the prospect of want disturbs the mind. Trouble may be permanent; disturbances and molestation are temporary, and both refer to the peace which is destroyed: a disturbance ruffles or throws out of a tranquil state; a molestation burdens or bears hard either on the body or the mind: noise is always a disturbance to one who wishes to think or to remain in quiet;

No buzzing sounds disturb their golden sleep.

DRYDEN.

Talking, or any noise, is a molestation to one who is in an irritable frame of body or mind;

Both are doom'd to death;

And the dead wake not to molest the living.

ROWE.

TROUBLESOME, IRKSOME, VEXATIOUS.

These epithets are applied to the objects which create trouble or vexation.

Irk is compounded of irk and some, from the German argen vexation, which probably comes from the Greek argos; troublesome (v. To afflict) is here, as before, the generic term; irksome and vexatious are species of the troublesome: what is troublesome creates either bodily or mental pain; what is irksome creates a mixture of bodily and mental pain; and what is vexatious creates purely mental pain. What requires great exertion, or a too long continued exertion or exertions, coupled with difficulties, is troublesome; in this sense the laying in stores for the winter is a troublesome work for the ants, and compiling a dictionary is a troublesome labour to some writers; 'The incursions of troublesome thoughts are often violent and importunate.'—JOHNSON. What requires any exertion which we are unwilling to make, or interrupts the quiet which we particularly long for, is irksome; in this sense giving and receiving of visits is irksome to some persons; travelling is irksome to others;

For not to irksome toil, but to delight he made us.

MILTON.

What comes across our particular wishes, or disappoints us in a particular manner, is vexatious; in this sense the loss of a prize which we had hoped to gain may be vexatious;

The pensive goddess has already taught

How vain is hope, and how vexatious thought.

PRIOR.

DIFFICULTIES, EMBARRASMENTS, TROUBLES.

These terms are all applicable to a person's concerns in life; but difficulties relate to the difficulty (v. Difficulty) of conducting a business; embarrassments relate to the confusion attending a state of debt; and trouble to the pain which is the natural consequence of not fulfilling engagements or answering demands. Of the three, difficulties expresses the least, and troubles the most. A young man on his entrance into the world will unavoidably experience difficulties, if not provided with ample means in the outset; 'Young Cunningham was recalled to Dublin, where he continued for four or five years, and of course experienced all the difficulties that attend distressed situations.'—JOHNSON. Let a man's means be ever so ample, if he have not prudence and talents fitted for business, he will hardly keep himself free from embarrassments; 'Few men would have had resolution to write books with such embarrassments (as Milton laboured under).'—JOHNSON. There are no troubles so great as those which are produced by pecuniary difficulties, which are the greatest troubles that can arise to disturb the peace of a man's mind; 'Virgil's sickness, studies, and the troubles he met with, turned his hair gray before the usual time'—WALSH.

DEJECTION, DEPRESSION, MELANCHOLY.

Dejection, from deficio to cast down, and depression, from deprimo to press or sink down, have both regard to the state of the animal spirits; melancholy, from the Greek μελαγχολία black bile, regards the state of the humours in general, or of the particular humour called the bile.

Dejection and depression are occasional, and depend on outward circumstances; melancholy is permanent, and lies in the constitution. Depression is but a degree of dejection: slight circumstances may occasion a depression; distressing events occasion a dejection: the death of a near and dear relative may be expected to produce dejection in persons of the greatest equanimity;

So bursting frequent from Atreides' breast,

Sighs following sighs his inward fears confess d;

Now o'er the fields dejected he surveys,

From thousand Trojan fires the mountain blaze.

POPE.

Lively tempers are most liable to depressions; 'I will only desire you to allow me that Hector was in an absolute certainty of death, and depressed over and above with the conscience of being in an ill cause.'—POPE. Melancholy is a disease which nothing but clear views of religion can possibly correct; 'I have read somewhere in the history of ancient Greece, that the women of the country were seized with an unaccountable melancholy, which disposed several of them to make away with themselves.'—ADDISON.

DESPAIR, DESPERATION, DESPONDENCY.

Despair and desperation, from the French desespoir, compounded of the privative de and the Latin spes hope, signifies the absence or the annihilation of all hope; despondency, from despond, in Latin despondeo, compounded of the privative de and spondeo to promise, signifies literally to deprive in a solemn manner, or cut off from every gleam of hope.

Despair is a state of mind produced by the view of external circumstances; desperation and despondency may be the fruit of the imagination; the former therefore always rests on some ground, the latter are sometimes ideal: despair lies mostly in reflection; desperation and despondency in the feelings; the former marks a state of vehement and impatient feeling, the latter that of fallen and mournful feeling. Despair is often the forerunner of desperation and despondency, but it is not necessarily accompanied with effects so powerful: the strongest mind may have occasion to despair when circumstances warrant the sentiment; men of an impetuous character are apt to run into a state of desperation; a weak mind full of morbid sensibility is most liable to fall into despondency.

Despair interrupts or checks exertion

Despair and grief distract my lab'ring mind;

Gods! what a crime my impious heart design'd.

POPE

Desperation impels to greater exertions; 'It may be generally remarked of those who squander what they know their fortune is not sufficient to allow, that in their most jovial moments there always breaks out some proof of discontent and impatience; they either scatter with a wild desperation, or pay their money with a peevish anxiety.'—JOHNSON. Despondency unfits for exertion; 'Thomson submitting his productions to some who thought themselves qualified to criticise, he heard of nothing but faults; but finding other judges more favourable, he did not suffer himself to sink into despondence.'—JOHNSON. When a physician despairs of making a cure, he lays aside the application of remedies; when a soldier sees nothing but death or disgrace before him, he is driven to desperation, and redoubles his efforts; when a tradesman sees before him nothing but failure for the present, and want for the future, he may sink into despondency. Despair is justifiable as far as it is a rational calculation into futurity from the present appearances: desperation may arise from extraordinary circumstances or the action of strong passions; in the former case it is unavoidable, and may serve to rescue from great distress; in the latter case it is mostly attended with fatal consequences: despondency is a disease of the mind, which nothing but a firm trust in the goodness of Providence can obviate.

DESPERATE, HOPELESS.

Desperate (v. Despair) is applicable to persons or things; hopeless to things only: a person makes a desperate effort; he undertakes a hopeless task.

Desperate, when applied to things, expresses more than hopeless; the latter marks the absence of hope as to the attainment of good, the former marks the absence of hope as to the removal of an evil: a person who is in a desperate condition is overwhelmed with actual trouble for the present, and the prospect of its continuance for the future; he whose case is hopeless is without the prospect of effecting the end he has in view: gamblers are frequently brought into desperate situations when bereft of every thing that might possibly serve to lighten the burdens of their misfortunes;

Before the ships a desperate stand they made,
And fir'd the troops, and call'd the gods to aid.

POPE.

It is a hopeless undertaking to endeavour to reclaim men who have plunged themselves deep into the labyrinth of vice;

Th' Eneacs wish in vain their wanted chief,
Hopeless of flight, more hopeless of relief.

DRYDEN.

HOPE, EXPECTATION, TRUST, CONFIDENCE.

Anticipation of futurity is the common idea expressed by all these words. Hope, in German hoffen, probably from the Greek ὑποσπείν to look at with pleasure, is welcome; expectation (v. To await) is either welcome or unwelcome: we hope only for that which is good; we expect the bad as well as the good. In bad weather we hope it will soon be better; but in a bad season we expect a bad harvest, and in a good season a good harvest. Hope is simply a presentiment; it may vary in degree, more according to the temper of the mind than the nature of the circumstances, some hope where there is no ground for hope, and others despair where they might hope: expectation is a conviction that excludes doubt;* we expect in proportion as that conviction is positive: we hope that which may be or can possibly be; we expect that which must be or which ought to be. The young man hopes to live many years; the old man expects to die in a few years. Hope is a precious gift to man; it is denied to no one under any circumstances; it is a solace in affliction, and a support under adversity; it throws a ray of light over the darkest scene; expectation is an evil rather than a good; whether we expect the thing that is agreeable or otherwise, it is seldom attended with any thing but pain. Hope is justified by the nature of our condition; since every thing is changing, we have also reason to hope that a present evil, however great, may be succeeded by something less severe;

Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace
And rest can never dwell; hope never comes,
That comes to all.—MILTON.

Expectation is often an act of presumption, in which the mind outsteps its own powers, and estimates the future as if it were present; since every thing future is uncertain, but death, there is but that one legitimate subject of expectation;

All these within the dungeon's depth remain,
Despairing pardon, and expecting pain.—DRYDEN.

Hope may be deferred, but never dies; it is a pleasure as lasting as it is great: expectation is swallowed up in certainty; it seldom leaves any thing but disappointment.

Trust (v. Believe) and confidence (v. To confide) agree with hope in regard to the objects anticipated; they agree with expectation in regard to the certainty of the anticipation: expectation, trust, and confidence, when applied to some future good, differ principally in the grounds on which this certainty or positive conviction rests. Expectation springs either from the character of the individual or the nature of the event which is the subject of anticipation: in the former it is a decision; in the latter a rational conclusion: trust springs altogether from a view of the circumstances connected with the event, and is an inference or conclusion of the mind drawn from the whole;

Our country's gods, in whom our trust we place.
DRYDEN.

Confidence arises more from the temper of the mind, than from the nature of the object; it is rather an instantaneous decision than a rational conclusion;

His pride
Humbled by such rebuke, so far beneath
His confidence to equal God in pow'r.—MILTON.

* See Eberhardt: "Hoffnung, Erwartung, Vertrauen, Zuversicht.

Expectation and confidence therefore are often erroneous, and mostly unwarrantable; the latter still more frequently than the former: trust, like hope, is always warrantable, even though it may sometimes be deceived.

If we expect our friends to assist us in time of need, it may be a reasonable expectation founded upon their tried regard for us and promises of assistance; or it may be an extravagant expectation founded upon our self-love and selfishness: if we trust that an eminent physician will cure us, it is founded upon our knowledge of his skill, and of the nature of our case; if we indulge a confident expectation that our performances will meet with universal approbation, it is founded upon our vanity and ignorance of ourselves. The most modest man is permitted to hope that his endeavours to please will not fail of success; and to trust so far in his own powers as to be encouraged to proceed: a prudent man will never think himself authorized to expect success, and still less to be confident of it, when a thousand contingencies may intervene to defeat the proposed end.

TO CONFIDE, TRUST.

Both these verbs express a reliance on the fidelity of another, but confide, in Latin confido, compounded of con and fido, signifying to place a trust in a person, is to trust (v. Believe) as the species to the genus; we always trust when we confide, but not vice versa. We confide to a person that which is of the greatest importance to ourselves; we trust to him whenever we rest on his word for any thing. We need rely only on a person's integrity when we trust to him, but we rely also on his abilities and mental qualifications when we place confidence; it is an extraordinary trust, founded on a powerful conviction in a person's favour.

Confidence frequently supposes something secret as well as personal; trust respects only the personal interest. A king confides in his ministers and generals for the due execution of his plans, and the administration of the laws; one friend confides in another when he discloses to him all his private concerns: a merchant trusts to his clerks when he employs them in his business; individuals trust each other with portions of their property;

Men live and prosper but in mutual trust,
A confidence of one another's truth.—SOUTHERN

Hence, credit

And publick trust 'twixt man and man are broken.

ROWE.

A breach of trust evinces a want of that common principle which keeps human society together; but a breach of confidence betrays a more than ordinary share of baseness and depravity.

CONFIDENT, DOGMATICAL, POSITIVE.

Confident, from confide (v. To confide), marks the temper of confiding in one's self; dogmatical, from dogma a maxim or assertion, signifies the temper of dealing in unqualified assertions; positive, in Latin positivus, from positus, signifies fixed to a point.

The first two of these words denote an habitual or permanent state of mind; the latter either a partial or an habitual temper. There is much of confidence in dogmatism and positivity, but it expresses more than either. Confidence implies a general reliance on one's abilities in whatever we undertake; dogmatism implies a reliance on the truth of our opinions; positivity a reliance on the truth of our assertions. A confident man is always ready to act, as he is sure of succeeding; a dogmatical man is always ready to speak, as he is sure of being heard; a positive man is determined to maintain what he has asserted, as he is convinced that he has made no mistake.

Confidence is opposed to diffidence; dogmatism to skepticism; positivity to hesitation. A confident man mostly fails for want of using the necessary means to ensure success; 'People forget how little it is that they know and how much less it is that they can do, when they grow confident upon any present state of things.—SOUTH. A dogmatical man is mostly in error, because he substitutes his own partial opinions for such as are established; 'If you are neither dogmatical, nor show either by your words or your actions that you are full of yourself, all will the more heartily rejoice at your victory.'—BUDGELL. A positive man is mostly deceived, because he trusts more to his own senses and memory than he ought; 'Positive as you now are in your opinions, and confident in your assertions, be assured that the time approaches when both men and things will appear to you in a different light.'—BLAIR. Self-knowledge is the most effectual cure for self-confidence; an acquaintance with men and things tends to lessen dogmatism. The experience of having been deceived one's self, and the observation that others are perpetually liable to be deceived, ought to check the folly of being positive as to any event or circumstance that is past.

ASSURANCE, CONFIDENCE.

Assurance implies either the act of making another sure (v. To affirm), or of being sure one's self; confidence implies simply the act of the mind in confiding, which is equivalent to a feeling.

Assurance, as an action, is to confidence as the means to the end. We give a person an assurance in order to inspire him with confidence.

Assurance and confidence, as a sentiment in ourselves, may respect either that which is external of us, or that which belongs to ourselves; in the first case they are both taken in an indifferent sense: but the feeling of assurance is much stronger than that of confidence, and applies to objects that interest the feelings; 'I appeal to posterity, says Æschylus; to posterity I consecrated my works, in the assurance that they will meet that reward from time which the partiality of my contemporaries refuses to bestow.'—CUMBERLAND. Confidence, on the other hand, applies only to such objects as exercise the understanding; 'All the arguments upon which a man, who is telling the private affairs of another, may ground his confidence of security, he must, upon reflection, know to be uncertain, because he finds them without effect upon himself.'—JOHNSON. Thus we have an assurance of a life to come; an assurance of a blessed immortality: we have a confidence in a person's integrity. As respects ourselves exclusively, assurance is employed to designate either an occasional feeling, or a habit of the mind; confidence is for the most part an occasional feeling: assurance, therefore, in this sense, may be used indifferently, but in general it has a bad acceptance; but confidence has an indifferer or a good sense.

Assurance is a self-possession of the mind, arising from the conviction that all in ourselves is right; 'I never sit silent in company when secret history is talking, but I am reproached for want of assurance.'—JOHNSON. Confidence is self-possession only in particular cases, grounded on the reliance we have in our abilities or our character; 'The hope of fame is necessarily connected with such considerations as must abate the ardour of confidence, and repress the vigour of pursuit.'—JOHNSON. The man of assurance never loses himself under any circumstances, however trying; he is calm and easy when another is abashed and confounded: the man who has confidence will generally have it in cases that warrant him to trust to himself. A liar utters his falsehoods with an air of assurance, in order the more effectually to gain belief; conscious innocence enables a person to speak with confidence when interrogated.

Assurance shows itself in the behaviour, confidence in the conduct. Young people are apt to assert every thing with a tone of assurance; 'Modesty, the daughter of Knowledge, and Assurance, the offspring of Ignorance, met accidentally upon the road; and as both had a long way to go, and had experienced from former hardships that they were alike unqualified to pursue their journey alone, they agreed, for their mutual advantage, to travel together.'—MOORE. No man should undertake any thing without a certain degree of confidence in himself; 'I must observe that there is a vicious modesty which justly deserves to be ridiculed, and which those very persons often discover, who value themselves most upon a well-bred confidence. This happens when a man is ashamed to act up to his reason, and would not, upon any consideration, be surprised in the practice of those duties for the performance of which he was sent into the world'—ADDISON.

ASSURANCE, IMPUDENCE.

Assurance (v. Assurance), and impudence, which literally implies shamelessness, are so closely allied to each other, that assurance is distinguished from impudence more in the manner than the spirit; for impudence has a grossness attached to it which does not belong to assurance.

Vulgar people are impudent because they have assurance to break through all the forms of society; but those who are more cultivated will have their assurance controlled by its decencies and refinements; 'A man of assurance, though at first it only denoted a person of a free and open carriage, is now very usually applied to a profligate wretch, who can break through all the rules of decency and morality without a blush. I shall endeavour, therefore, in this essay, to restore these words to their true meaning, to prevent the idea of modesty from being confounded with that of sheepishness, and to hinder impudence from passing for assurance.'—BUDGELL.

TO AWAIT, WAIT FOR, LOOK FOR, EXPECT.

Await and wait, in German warten, comes from wahren to see or look after; expect, in Latin expecto or exspecto, compounded of ex and specto, signifies to look out after.

All these terms have a reference to futurity, and our actions with regard to it.

Await, wait for, and look for mark a calculation of consequences and a preparation for them; and expect simply a calculation; we often expect without awaiting, waiting, or looking for, but never the reverse.

Await is said of serious things; wait and look for are terms in familiar use; expect is employed either seriously or otherwise.

A person expects to die, or awaits the hour of his dissolution; he expects a letter, waits for its coming, and looks for it when the post is arrived.

Await indicates the disposition of the mind; wait for the regulation of the outward conduct as well as that of the mind; look for is a species of waiting drawn from the physical action of the eye, and may be figuratively applied to the mind's eye, in which latter sense it is the same as expect.

It is our duty, as well as our interest, to await the severest trials without a murmur;

This said, he sat, and expectation held
His looks suspense, awaiting who appeared
To second, or oppose, or undertake
The perilous attempt.—MILTON.

Not less resolv'd, Antenor's valiant heir
Confronts Achilles, and awaits the war.—POPE.

Prudence requires us to wait patiently for a suitable opportunity, rather than be premature in our attempts to obtain any objects; 'Wait till thy being shall be unfolded.'—BLAIR. When children are too much indulged and caressed, they are apt to look for a repetition of caresses at inconvenient seasons; 'If you look for a friend, in whose temper there is not to be found the least inequality, you look for a pleasing phantom.'—BLAIR. It is in vain to look for or expect happiness from the conjugal state, which is not founded on a cordial and mutual regard; 'We are not to expect, from our intercourse with others, all that satisfaction which we fondly wish.'—BLAIR.

TO CONSIGN, COMMIT, INTRUST.

Consign, in French consigner, Latin consigno, compounded of con and signo, signifies to seal for a special purpose, also to deposit; commit, in French commettre, Latin committo, compounded of com and mitto to put together, signifies to put into a person's hands; intrust, compounded of in and trust, signifies to put in trust.

The idea of transferring from one's self to the care of another is common to these terms. What is consigned is either given absolutely away from one's self or only conditionally for one's own purpose:

And oft I wish, amid the scene, to find
Some spot to real happiness consign'd.—GOLDSMITH.

What is committed or intrusted is given conditionally. A person consigns his property over to another by a deed in law; a merchant consigns his goods to another, to dispose of them for his advantage; he commits the management of his business to his clerks, and intrusts them with the care of his property.

Consign expresses a more positive measure than commit, but intrusting is more or less positive or important, according to the nature of the thing intrusted. When a child is consigned to the care of another, it is an unconditional surrender of one's trust into the hands of another;

Atrides, parting for the Trojan war,
Consign'd the youthful consort to his care.—POPE.

Any person may be committed to the care of another with various limitations; 'In a very short time Lady Maclefield removed her son from her sight, by committing him to the care of a poor woman.'—JOHNSON (Life of Savage). When a person is intrusted to the care of another, it is both a partial and temporary matter, referring mostly to his personal safety, and that only for a limited time. A parent does most wisely to consign the whole management of his child's education to one individual, in whom he can confide; if he commit it to part only to any one's care, the deficiency in the charge is likely to remain unsupplied; in infancy children must be more or less intrusted to the care of servants, but prudent parents will diminish the frequency of these occasions as much as possible.

In this sense the word intrust may be applied to other minor objects. In an extended application of the terms, papers are said to be consigned to an editor of a work for his selection and arrangement. 'The inspection of any publick work is committed to proper officers. A person is intrusted with a secret, but he may also be intrusted with the lives of others, and every thing else which they hold; on the same ground power is intrusted by the Almighty to kings, or, according to republican phraseology, it is intrusted by the commonwealth to the magistrate; 'Supposing both equal in their natural integrity, I ought in common prudence to fear foul play from an indigent person rather than from one whose circumstances seem to have placed him above the base temptation of money. This reason makes the commonwealth regard her richest subjects as the fittest to be intrusted with her highest employments.'—ADDISON.

Consign and commit are used in the figurative sense. A thing is consigned to destruction, or committed to the flames. Death consigns many to an untimely grave: a writer commits his thoughts to the press; 'At the day of general account, good men are then to be consigned over to another state, a state of everlasting love and charity.'—ATTERBURY.

Is my muse controll'd
By servile awe? Born free, and not be hold!
At least I'll dig a hole within the ground,
And to the trusty earth commit the sound.—DRYDEN.

DEPENDENCE, RELIANCE.

Dependence, from the Latin dependo, de and pendo to hang from, signifies literally to rest one's weight by hanging from that which is held; rely, compounded of re and ly or lie, signifies likewise to rest one's weight by lying or hanging back from the object held.

Dependence is the general term; reliance is a species of dependence: we depend either on persons or things; we rely on persons only: dependence serves for that which is immediate or remote; reliance serves for the future only. We depend upon a person for that which we are obliged to receive or led to expect from him: we rely upon a person for that which he has given us reason to expect from him.

Dependence is an outward condition, or the state of external circumstances; reliance is a state of the feelings with regard to others. We depend upon God for all that we have or shall have; 'A man who uses his best endeavours to live according to the dictates of virtue and right reason has two perpetual sources of cheerfulness, in the consideration of his own nature, and of that Being on whom he has a dependence.'—ADDISON. We rely upon the word of man for that which he has promised to perform; 'They afforded a sufficient conviction of this truth, and a firm reliance on the promises contained in it.'—ROGERS. We may depend upon a person's coming from a variety of causes; but we rely upon it only in reference to his avowed intention. This latter term may also denote the act of things in the same sense;

The tender twig shoots upward to the skies,
And on the faith of the new sun relies.—DRYDEN

FAITHFUL, TRUSTY.

Faithful signifies full of faith or fidelity (v. Faith, fidelity); trusty signifies fit or worthy to be trusted (v. Believe).

Faithful respects the principle altogether; it is suited to all relations and stations, publick and private: trusty includes not only the principle, but the mental qualifications in general; it applies to those in whom particular trust is to be placed. It is the part of a Christian to be faithful to all his engagements; it is a particular excellence in a servant to be trusty;

The steeds they left their trusty servants hold.

POPE.

Faithful is applied in the improper sense to an unconscious agent; trusty may be applied with equal propriety to things as to persons. We may speak of a faithful saying, or a faithful picture; a trusty sword or a trusty weapon;

What we hear

With weaker passion will affect the heart,
Than when the faithful eye beholds the part.

FRANCES

He took the quiver from the trusty bow
Achates used to bear.—DRYDEN.

FAITH, FIDELITY.

Though derived from the same source (v. Believe), they differ widely in meaning: faith here denotes a mode of action, namely, an acting true to the faith which others repose in us; fidelity, a disposition of the mind to adhere to that faith which others repose in us. We keep our faith, we show our fidelity.

Faith is a publick concern, it depends on promises; fidelity is a private or personal concern, it depends upon relationships and connexions. A breach of faith is a crime that brings a stain on a nation; for faith ought to be kept even with an enemy. A breach of fidelity attaches disgrace to the individual; for fidelity is due from a subject to a prince, or from a servant to his master, or from married people one to another. No treaty can be made with him who will keep no faith; no confidence can be placed in him who discovers no fidelity. The Danes kept no faith with the English;

The pit resounds with shrieks, a war succeeds,
For breach of publick faith and unexampled deeds.

DRYDEN.

Fashionable husbands and wives in the present day seem to think there is no fidelity due to each other; 'When one hears of negroes who upon the death of their masters hang themselves upon the next tree, who can forbear admiring their fidelity, though it expresses itself in so dreadful a manner?'—ADDISON.

DISTRUSTFUL, SUSPICIOUS, DIFFIDENT.

Distrustful signifies full of distrust, or not putting trust in (v. Believe); suspicious signifies having suspicion, from the Latin suspicio, or sub and specio to look at askance, or with a wary mind; diffident, from the Latin diffido or disfido, signifies having no faith.

Distrustful is said either of ourselves or others; suspicious is said only of others; diffident only of ourselves: to be distrustful of a person, is to impute no good to him; to be suspicious of a person, is to impute positive evil to him: he who is distrustful of another's honour or prudence, will abstain from giving him his confidence; he who is suspicious of another's honesty, will be cautious to have no dealings with him. Distrustful is a particular state of feeling; suspicious an habitual state of feeling: a person is distrustful of another, owing to particular circumstances; he may be suspicious from his natural temper

As applied to himself, a person is distrustful of his own powers to execute an office assigned, or he is generally of a difident disposition: it is faulty to distrust that in which we ought to trust; there is nothing more criminal than a distrust in Providence, and nothing better than a distrust in our own powers to withstand temptation; 'Before strangers, Pitt had something of the scholar's timidity and distrust.'—JOHNSON. Suspicion is justified more or less according to circumstances; but a too great proneness to suspicion is liable to lead us into many acts of injustice towards others; 'Nature itself, after it has done an injury, will for ever be suspicious, and no man can love the person he suspects.'—SOUTH. Difidence is becoming in youth, so long as it does not check their laudable exertions; 'As an actor, Mr. Cunningham obtained little reputation, for his difidence was too great to be overcome.'—JOHNSON.

TO DISTURB, INTERRUPT.

Disturb, v. Commotion; interrupt, from the Latin inter and rumpo, signifies to break in between so as to stop the progress.

We may be disturbed either inwardly or outwardly; we are interrupted only outwardly; our minds may be disturbed by disquieting reflections, or we may be disturbed in our rest or in our business by unseemly noises; but we can be interrupted only in our business or pursuits; the disturbance therefore depends upon the character of the person; what disturbs one man will not disturb another: an interruption is however something positive; what interrupts one person will interrupt another: the smallest noises may disturb one who is in bad health; illness or the visits of friends will interrupt a person in any of his business.

The same distinction exists between these words when applied to things as to persons: whatever is put out of its order or proper condition is disturbed; thus water which is put into motion from a state of rest is disturbed;

If aught disturb the tenour of his breast,
'Tis but the wish to strike before the rest.—POPE.

Whatever is stopped in the evenness or regularity of its course is interrupted; thus water which is turned out of its ordinary channel is interrupted; 'The foresight of the hour of death would continually interrupt the course of human affairs.'—BLAIR.

COMMOTION, DISTURBANCE.

Commotion, compounded of com or cum and motion, expresses naturally a motion of several together; disturbance signifies the state of disturbing or being disturbed (v. To trouble).

There is mostly a commotion where there is a disturbance; but there is frequently no disturbance where there is a commotion; commotion respects the physical movement; disturbance the mental agitation. Commotion is said only of large bodies of men, and is occasioned only by something extraordinary; disturbance may be said of a few, or even of a single individual: whatever occasions a bustle, awakens general inquiry, and sets people or things in motion, excites a commotion;

Ocean, unequally press'd, with broken tide
And blind commotion heaves.—THOMSON.

Whatever interrupts the peace and quiet of one or many produces a disturbance; 'A species of men to whom a state of order would become a sentence of obscurity, are nourished into a dangerous magnitude by the heat of intestine disturbances.'—BURKE. Any wonderful phenomenon, or unusually interesting intelligence, may throw the public into a commotion; 'Nothing can be more absurd than that perpetual contest for wealth which keeps the world in commotion.'—JOHNSON. Drunkenness is a common cause of disturbances in the streets or in families: civil commotions are above all others the most to be dreaded; they are attended with disturbances general and partial.

TO INCONVENIENCE, ANNOY, MOLEST.

To inconvenience is to make not convenient; to annoy, from the Latin noceo to hurt, is to do some hurt to; to molest, from the Latin moles a mass or weight, signifies to press with a weight.

We inconvenience in small matters, or by omitting such things as might be convenient; we annoy or molest by doing that which is positively painful; we are inconvenienced by a person's absence; we are annoyed by his presence if he renders himself offensive: we are inconvenienced by what is temporary; we are annoyed by that which is either temporary or durable; we are molested by that which is weighty and oppressive: we are inconvenienced simply in regard to our circumstances; we are annoyed mostly in regard to our corporeal feelings; we are molested mostly in regard to our minds: the removal of a seat or a book may inconvenience one who is engaged in business; 'I have often been tempted to inquire what happiness is to be gained, or what inconvenience to be avoided, by this stated recession from the town in the summer season.'—JOHNSON. The buzzing of a fly, or the stinging of a gnat may annoy;

Against the Capitol I met a lion,
Who glar'd upon me and went surly by,
Without annoying me.—SHAKESPEARE.

The impertinent freedom, or the rude insults of ill disposed persons may molest;

See all with skill acquire their daily food,
Produce their tender progeny and feed,
With care parental, while that care they need,
In these lov'd offices completely blest,
No hopes beyond them, nor vain fears molest.

JENYNS.

COMMODOUS, CONVENIENT, SUITABLE

Commodious, from the Latin commodus, or com and modus, according to the measure and degree required, convenient, from the Latin conveniens, participle of con and venio to come together, signifies that which comes together with something else as it ought.

Both these terms convey the idea of what is calculated for the pleasure of a person. Commodious regards the physical condition, and convenience the circumstances or mental feelings;

Within an ancient forest's ample verge,
There stands a lonely but a healthful dwelling,
Built for convenience and the use of life.—ROWE.

That is commodious which suits one's bodily ease; that is convenient which suits one's purpose. A house or a chair is commodious; 'Such a place cannot be commodious to live in; for being so near the moon, it had been too near the sun.'—RALEIGH. A time, an opportunity, a season, or the arrival of any person, is convenient. A noise inconmodious; the staying or going of a person may inconvenience. A person wishes to sit commodiously, and to be conveniently situated for witnessing any spectacle.

Convenient regards the circumstances of the individual; suitable (v. Conformable) respects the established opinions of mankind, and is closely connected with moral propriety: nothing is convenient which does not favour one's purpose; nothing is suitable which does not suit the person, place, and thing: whoever has any thing to ask of another must take a convenient opportunity in order to ensure success; 'If any man think it convenient to seem good, let him be so indeed, and then his goodness will appear to every body's satisfaction.'—TILLOTSON. The address of a suitor on such an occasion would be very unsuitable, if he affected to claim as a right what he ought to solicit as a favour; 'Pleasure in general is the consequent apprehension of a suitable object, suitably applied to a rightly disposed faculty.'—SOUTH.

NECESSARY, EXPEDIENT, ESSENTIAL, REQUISITE.

Necessary, (v. Necessity), from the Latin necesso and ne cedo, signifies not to be departed from; expedient signifies belonging to, or forming a part of, expedition; essential, containing that essence or property which cannot be omitted; requisite, i. e. literally required (v. To demand).

Necessary is a general and indefinite term; things may be necessary in the course of nature; it is necessary for all men once to die; they may be necessary according to the circumstances of the case, or our views of necessity; in this manner we conceive it necessary to call upon a person.

Expedient, essential, and requisite are modes of relative necessity; the expedience of a thing is a matter of discretion and calculation, and, therefore, not so self-evidently necessary as many things which we so denominate; 'One tells me he thinks it absolutely necessary for women to have true notions of right and equity.'—ADDISON. It may be expedient for a person to consult another, or it may not, according as circumstances may present themselves; 'It is highly expedient that men should, by some settled scheme of duties, be rescued from the tyranny of caprice.'—JOHNSON. The requisite and the essential are more obviously necessary than the expedient; but the former is less so than the latter: what is requisite may be requisite only in part or entirely; it may be requisite to complete a thing when begun, but not to begin it; the essential, on the contrary, is that which constitutes the essence, and without which a thing cannot exist. It is requisite for one who will have a good library to select only the best authors; exercise is essential for the preservation of good health. In all matters of dispute it is expedient to be guided by some impartial judge; it is requisite for every member of the community to contribute his share to the publick expenditure as far as he is able; 'It is not enough to say that faith and piety, joined with active virtue, constitute the requisite preparation for heaven; they in truth begin the enjoyment of heaven.'—BLAIR. It is essential to a teacher, particularly a spiritual teacher, to know more than those he teaches; 'The English do not consider their church establishment as convenient, but as essential to their state.'—BURKE.

EXPEDIENT, FIT.

Expedient, from the Latin expedire to get in readiness for a given occasion, supposes a certain degree of necessity from circumstances; fit (v. Fit), i. e. made for the purpose, signifies simply an agreement with, or suitability to, the circumstances; what is expedient must be fit, because it is called for; what is fit need be expedient, for it may not be required. The expediency of a thing depends altogether upon the outward circumstances; the fitness is determined by a moral rule; it is imprudent not to do that which is expedient; it is disgraceful to do that which is unfit; it is expedient for him who wishes to prepare for death, occasionally to take an account of his life; 'To far the greater number it is highly expedient that they should by some settled scheme of duties be rescued from the tyranny of caprice.'—JOHNSON. It is not fit for him who is about to die to dwell with anxiety on the things of this life;

Salt earth and bitter are not fit to sow,
Nor will be tam'd and mended by the plough.

DRYDEN.

OCCASION, OPPORTUNITY.

Occasion, in Latin ocasio, from oc or ob and cado to fall, signifies that which falls in the way so as to produce some change; opportunity, in Latin opportunitas, from opportunus fit, signifies the thing that happens fit for the purpose.

These terms are applied to the events of life; but the occasion is that which determines our conduct, and leaves us no choice; it amounts to a degree of necessity: the opportunity is that which invites to action; it tempts us to embrace the moment for taking the step. We do things, therefore, as the occasion requires, or as the opportunity offers. There are many occasions on which a man is called upon to uphold his opinions. There are but few opportunities for men in general to distinguish themselves. The occasion obtrudes upon us; the opportunity is what we seek or desire. On particular occasions it is necessary for a commander to be severe; 'Waller preserved and won his life from those who were most resolved to take it, and in an occasion in which he ought to have been ambitious to have lost it (to lose it).'—CLARENDON. A man of a humane disposition will profit by every opportunity to show his lenity to offenders; 'Every man is obliged by the Supreme Maker of the universe to improve all the opportunities of good which are afforded him.'—JOHNSON.

OCCASION, NECESSITY.

Occasion (v. Occasion) includes, necessity (v. Necessity) excludes, the idea of choice or alternative. We are regulated by the occasion, and can exercise our own discretion; we yield or submit to the necessity, without even the exercise of the will. On the death of a relative we have occasion to go into mourning, if we will not offer an affront to the family, but there is no express necessity;

A merrier man
Within the limit of becoming mirth,
I never spent an hour's talk withal;
His eye begets occasion for his wit.

SHAKESPEARE.

In case of an attack on our persons, there is a necessity of self-defence for the preservation of life; 'Where necessity ends curiosity begins.'—JOHNSON.

OCCASIONAL, CASUAL.

These are both opposed to what is fixed or stated; but occasional carries with it more the idea of frequency, and casual that of unfixedness, or the absence of all design.

A minister is termed an occasional preacher, who preaches only on certain occasions; his preaching at a particular place, or a certain day may be casual. Our acts of charity may be occasional; but they ought not to be casual; 'The beneficence of the Roman emperors and consuls was merely occasional.'—JOHNSON.

What wonder if we near Looks intervene, and smiles, or object new,
Casual discourse draws on.—MILTON.

TO ADD, JOIN, UNITE, COALESCE.

Add, in Latin addo, compounded of ad and do, signifies to put to an object; join, in French joindre, Latin jungo, comes from jugum a yoke, and the Greek ζεύω to yoke, signifying to bring into close contact; unite, in Latin unitus, participle of unio, from unus one, implies to make into one: coalesce, in Latin coalesco, compounded of co or con, and alesco for creasco, signifies to grow or form one's self together.

We add by affixing a part of one thing to another so as to make one whole; we join by attaching one whole to another, so that they may adhere in part; we unite by putting one thing to another, so that all their parts may adhere to each other; things coalesce by coming into an entire cohesion of all their parts.

Adding is either a corporeal or spiritual action; joining is mostly said of corporeal objects; uniting and coalescing of spiritual objects. We add a wing to a house by a mechanical process, or we add quantities together by calculation,

Now, best of kings, since you propose to send
Such bounteous presents to your Trojan friend,
Add yet a greater to our joint request,
One which he values more than all the rest;
Give him the fair Lavinia for his bride.—DRYDEN.

We join two houses together, or two armies, by placing them on the same spot; 'The several great bodies which compose the solar system are kept from joining together at the common centre of gravity by the rectilinear motions the Author of nature has impressed on each of them.'—BERKELEY. People are united who are bound to each other by similarity of opinion, sentiment, condition, or circumstances; 'Two Englishmen meeting at Rome or Constantinople soon run into familiarity. And in China or Japan, Europeans would think their being so a sufficient reason for their uniting in particular converse.'—BERKELEY. Parties coalesce when they agree to lay aside their leading distinctions of opinion so as to co-operate; 'The Danes had been established during a longer period in England than in France; and though the similarity of their original language to that of the Saxons invited them to a more early coalition with the natives, they had found as yet so little example of civilized manners among the English, that they retained all their ancient ferocity.'—HUME.

Nothing can be added without some agent to perform the act of adding; but things may be joined by casually coming in contact; and things will unite of themselves which have an aptitude to accordance, coalition is that species of union which arises mostly from external agency. The addition of quantities produces vast sums; the junction of streams forms great rivers; the union of families or states constitutes their principal strength; by the coalition of sounds, diphthongs are formed. Bodies are enlarged by the addition of other bodies; people are sometimes joined in matrimony who are not united in affection; no two things can coalesce, between which there is an essential difference, or the slightest discordance.

Addition is opposed to subtraction; junction and union, to division; coalition, to distinction.

TO CONNECT, COMBINE, UNITE.

The idea of being put together is common to these terms, but with different degrees of proximity. To connect, from the Latin connecto, compounded of con and necto, signifying to knit together, is more remote than to combine (v. Association), and this than to unite (v. To add).

What is connected and combined remains distinct, but what is united loses all individuality.

Things the most dissimilar may be connected or combined; things of the same kind only can be united.

Things or persons are connected more or less remotely by some common property or circumstance that serves as a tie; 'A right opinion is that which connects distant truths by the shortest train of intermediate propositions.'—JOHNSON. Things or persons are combined by a species of juncture; 'Fancy can combine the ideas which memory has treasured.'—HAWKSWORTH. Things or persons are united by a coalition; 'A friend is he with whom our interest is united.'—HAWKSWORTH. Houses are connected by means of a common passage: the armies of two nations are combined; two armies of the same nation are united.

Trade, marriage, and general intercourse create a connexion between individuals; co-operation and similarity of tendency are grounds for combination; entire accord leads to a union. It is dangerous to be connected with the wicked in any way; our reputation, if not our morals, must be the sufferers thereby. The most obnoxious members of society are those in whom wealth, talents, influence, and a lawless ambition are combined. United is an epithet that should apply equally to nations and families; the same obedience to laws should regulate every man who lives under the same government; the same heart should animate every breast; the same spirit should dictate every action of every member in the community, who has a common interest in the preservation of the whole.

CONNECTED, RELATED.

Connected, v. To connect; related, from relate, in Latin relatus, participle of refero to bring back, signifies brought back to the same point.

These terms are employed in the moral sense, to express an affinity between subjects or matters of thought.

Connexion marks affinity in an indefinite manner; 'It is odd to consider the connexion between despotism and barbarity, and how the making one person more than man, makes the rest less.'—ADDISON. Relation denotes affinity in a specific manner: 'All mankind are so related, that care is to be taken, in things to which all are liable, you do not mention what concerns one in terms which shall disgust another.'—STEELE. A connexion may be either close or remote; a relation direct or indirect. What is connected has some common principle on which it depends: what is related has some likeness with the object to which it is related: it is a part of some whole.

TO AFFIX, SUBJOIN, ATTACH, ANNEX.

Affix, in Latin affixus, participle of affigo, compounded of af or ad and figo to fix, signifies to fix to a thing; subjoin is compounded of sub and join, signifying to join to the lower or farther extremity of a body; attach, v. To adhere; annex, in Latin annexus, participle of annecto, compounded of an or ad and necto to knit, signifies to knit or tie to a thing.

To affix is to put any thing as an essential to any whole; to subjoin is to put any thing as a subordinate part to a whole: in the former case the part to which it is put is not specified; in the latter the syllable sub specifies the extremity as the part: to attach is to make one thing adhere to another as an accompaniment; to annex is to bring things into a general connexion with each other.

A title is affixed to a book; a few lines are subjoined to a letter by way of postscript; we attach blame to a person; a certain territory is annexed to a kingdom.

Letters are affixed to words in order to modify their sense, or names are affixed to ideas; 'He that has settled in his mind determined ideas, with names affixed to them, will be able to discern their differences one from another.'—LOCKE. It is necessary to subjoin remarks to what requires illustration; 'In justice to the opinion which I would wish to impress of the amiable character of Pisistratus, I subjoin to this paper some explanation of the word tyrant.'—CUMBERLAND. We are apt from prejudice or particular circumstances to attach disgrace to certain professions, which are not only useful but important; 'As our nature is at present constituted, attached by so many strong connexions to the world of sense, and enjoying a communication so feeble and distant with the world of spirits, we need fear no danger from cultivating intercourse with the latter as much as possible.'—BLAIR. Papers are annexed by way of appendix to some important transaction.

It is improper to affix opprobrious epithets to any community of persons on account of their calling in life. Men are not always scrupulous about the means of attaching others to their interest, when their ambitious views are to be forwarded. Every station in life, above that of extreme indigence, has certain privileges annexed to it, but none greater than those which are enjoyed by the middling classes; 'The evils inseparably annexed to the present condition are numerous and afflictive.'—JOHNSON.

TO STICK, CLEAVE, ADHERE.

Stick, in Saxon stican, Low German steken, is connected with the Latin stigo, Greek stíγω to prick; cleave, in Saxon cleofen, Low German klieven, Danish klæve, is connected with our words glue and lime, in Latin gluten, Greek κόλλα lime; adhere, v. To attach.

To stick expresses more than to cleave, and cleave than adhere: things are made to stick either by incision into the substance, or through the intervention of some glutinous matter; they are made to cleave and adhere by the intervention of some foreign body; what sticks, therefore, becomes so fast joined as to render the bodies inseparable; what cleaves and adheres is less tightly bound, and more easily separable.

Two pieces of clay will stick together by the incorporation of the substance in the two parts; paper is made to stick to paper by means of glue: the tongue in a certain state will cleave to the roof of the mouth; paste, or even occasional moisture, will make soft substances adhere to each other, or to hard bodies. Animals stick to bodies by means of their claws; persons in the moral sense cleave to each other by never parting company: and they adhere to each other by uniting their interests.

Stick is employed for the most part on familiar subjects, but is sometimes applied to moral objects

Adieu, then, O my soul's far better part,

Thy image sticks so close

That the blood follows from my rending heart.

DRYDEN.

Cleave and adhere are peculiarly proper in the moral acceptance;

Gold and his gains no more employ his mind,
But, driving o'er the billows with the wind,
Cleaves to one faithful plank, and leaves the rest behind.—ROWE.

That there's a God from nature's voice is clear;
And yet, what errors to this truth adhere?

JENYNS

FOLLOWER, ADHERENT, PARTISAN.

A follower is one who follows a person generally; an adherent is one who adheres to his cause; a partisan is the follower of a party: the follower follows either the person, the interests, or the principles of any one; thus, the retinue of a nobleman, or the friends of a statesman, or the friends of any man's opinions may be styled his followers;

The mournful followers, with assistant care,
The groaning hero to his chariot bear.—POPE.

The adherent is that kind of follower who espouses the interests of another, as the adherents of Charles I.; 'With Addison, the wits, his adherents and followers, were certain to concur.'—JOHNSON. A follower follows near or at a distance; but the adherent is always near at hand; the partisan hangs on or keeps at a certain distance: the follower follows from various motives; the adherent adheres from a personal motive; the partisan, from a partial motive; 'They (the Jacobins) then proceed in argument, as if all those who disapprove of their new abuses must of course be partisans of the old.'—BURKE. Charles I. had as many adherents as he had followers; the rebels had as many partisans as they had adherents.

TO ADDUCE, ALLEGE, ASSIGN, ADVANCE.

Adduce, in Latin adduco, compounded of ad and duco to lead, signifies to bring forwards, or for a thing; allege, in French alleguer, in Latin allego, compounded of al or ad and lego, in Greek λέγω to speak, signifies to speak for a thing; assign, in French assigner, Latin assigno, compounded of as or ad and signo to sign or mark out, signifies to set apart for a purpose; advance comes from the Latin advénio, compounded of ad and venio to come, or cause to come, signifying to bring forward a thing.

An argument is adduced; a fact or a charge is alleged; a reason is assigned; a position or an opinion is advanced. What is adduced tends to corroborate or invalidate; 'I have said that Celsus adduces neither oral nor written authority against Christ's miracles.'—CUMBERLAND. What is alleged tends to criminate or exculpate; 'The criminal alleged in his defence, that what he had done was to raise mirth, and to avoid ceremony.'—ADDISON. What is assigned tends to justify; 'If we consider what providential reasons may be assigned for these three particulars, we shall find that the numbers of the Jews, their dispersion and adherence to their religion, have furnished every age, and every nation of the world, with the strongest arguments for the Christian faith.'—ADDISON. What is advanced tends to explain and illustrate; 'I have heard of one that, having advanced some erroneous doctrines of philosophy, refused to see the experiments by which they were confuted.'—JOHNSON. Whoever discusses disputed points must have arguments to adduce in favour of his principles: censures should not be passed where nothing improper can be alleged: a conduct is absurd for which no reason can be assigned: those who advance what they cannot maintain expose their ignorance as much as their folly.

The reasoner adduces facts in proof of what he has advanced. The accuser alleges circumstances in support of his charge. The philosophical investigator assigns causes for particular phenomena.

We may controvert what is adduced or advanced; we may deny what is alleged, and question what is assigned.

TO ADHERE, ATTACH.

Adhere, from the French adherer, Latin adhæreo, is compounded of ad and hæreo to stick close to; attach, in French attacher, is compounded of at or ad and tach or touch, both which come from the Latin tango to touch, signifying to come so near as to touch.

A thing is adherent by the union which nature produces; it is attached by arbitrary ties which keep it close to another thing. Glutinous bodies are apt to adhere to every thing they touch: a smaller building is sometimes attached to a larger by a passage, or some other mode of communication.

What adheres to a thing is closely joined to its outward surface; but what is attached may be fastened to it by the intervention of a third body. There is a universal adhesion in all the particles of matter one to another: the sails of a vessel are attached to a mast by means of ropes; 'The play which this pathetic prologue was attached to, was a comedy, in which Læberius took the character of a slave.'—CUMBERLAND.

In a figurative sense, the analogy is kept up in the use of these two words. Adherence is a mode of conduct; attachment a state of feeling. We adhere to opinions which we are determined not to renounce; 'The firm adherence of the Jews to their religion is no less remarkable than their numbers and dispersion.'—ADDISON. We are attached to opinions for which our feelings are strongly prepossessed. It is the character of obstinacy to adhere to a line of conduct after it is proved to be injurious: some persons are not to be attached by the ordinary ties of relationship or friendship; 'The conqueror seems to have been fully apprized of the strength which the new government might derive from a clergy more closely attached to himself.'—TROWHITT.

ADHESION, ADHERENCE.

These terms are both derived from the verb adhere, one expressing the proper or figurative sense, and the other the moral sense or acceptance.

There is a power of adhesion in all glutinous bodies; 'We suffer equal pain from the pertinacious adhesion of unwelcome images, as from the evanescence of those which are pleasing and useful.'—JOHNSON. There is a disposition for adherence in steady minds; 'Shakspeare's adherence to general nature has exposed him to the censure of critics, who form their judgments upon narrower principles.'—JOHNSON.

ADJACENT, ADJOINING, CONTIGUOUS

Adjacent, in Latin adjacens, participle of adjaceo, is compounded of ad and jaceo to lie near; adjoining, as the words imply, signifies being joined together; contiguous, in French contigu, Latin contiguus, comes from contingo or con and tango, signifying to touch close.

What is adjacent may be separated altogether by the intervention of some third object; 'They have been beating up for volunteers at York, and the towns adjacent; but nobody will list.'—GRANVILLE. What is adjoining must touch in some part; 'As he happens to have no estate adjoining equal to his own, his oppressions are often borne without resistance.'—JOHNSON. What is contiguous must be fitted to touch entirely on one side; 'We arrived at the utmost boundaries of a wood which lay contiguous to a plain.'—STEELE. Lands are adjacent to a house or a town; fields are adjoining to each other; houses contiguous to each other.

EPI THET, ADJECTIVE.

Epithet is the technical term of the rhetorician; adjective that of the grammarian. The same word is an epithet as it qualifies the sense; it is an adjective as it is a part of speech: thus in the phrase 'Alexander the Great,' great is an epithet, inasmuch as it designates Alexander in distinction from all other persons: it is an adjective as it expresses a quality in distinction from the noun Alexander, which denotes a thing. The epithet ἐπίθετον is the word added by way of ornament to the diction; the adjective, from adjectivum, is the word added to the noun as its appendage, and made subservient to it in all its inflections. When we are estimating the merits of any one's style or composition, we should speak of the epithets he uses; when we are talking of words, their dependencies, and relations, we should speak of adjectives: an epithet is either gentle or harsh, an adjective is either a noun or a pronoun adjective.

All adjectives are epithets, but all epithets are not adjectives; thus in Virgil's Pater Æneas, the pater is an epithet, but not an adjective.

TO ABSTRACT, SEPARATE, DISTINGUISH

Abstract, v. Absent; separate, in Latin separatus participle of separo, is compounded of se and paro to dispose apart, signifying to put things asunder, &c. at a distance from each other; distinguish, in French distinguer, Latin distinguo, is compounded of the separative preposition dis and tango to touch or colour, &c.

nifying to give different marks by which they may be known from each other.

Abstract is used in the moral sense only; separate mostly in a physical sense; distinguish either in a moral or physical sense: we abstract what we wish to regard particularly and individually; we separate what we wish not to be united; we distinguish what we wish not to confound. The mind performs the office of abstraction for itself; separating and distinguishing, are exerted on external objects.* Arrangement, place, time, and circumstances serve to separate; the ideas formed of things, the outward marks attached to them, the qualities attributed to them, serve to distinguish.

By the operation of abstraction the mind creates for itself a multitude of new ideas: in the act of separation bodies are removed from each other by distance of place: in the act of distinguishing objects are discovered to be similar or dissimilar. Qualities are abstracted from the subjects in which they are inherent: countries are separated by mountains or seas: their inhabitants are distinguished by their dress, language, or manners. The mind is never less abstracted from one's friends than when separated from them by immense oceans: it requires a keen eye to distinguish objects that bear a great resemblance to each other. Volatile persons easily abstract their minds from the most solemn scenes to fix them on trifling objects that pass before them; 'We ought to abstract our minds from the observation of an excellence in those we converse with, till we have received some good information of the disposition of their minds.'—STEELE. An unsocial temper leads some men to separate themselves from all their companions; 'It is an eminent instance of Newton's superiority to the rest of mankind that he was able to separate knowledge from those weaknesses by which knowledge is generally disgraced.'—JOHNSON. An absurd ambition leads others to distinguish themselves by their eccentricities; 'Fontenelle, in his panegyric on Sir Isaac Newton, closes a long enumeration of that philosopher's virtues and attainments with an observation that he was not distinguished from other men by any singularity either natural or affected.'—JOHNSON.

TO DEDUCT, SUBTRACT.

Deduct, from the Latin deductus participle of deduco, and subtract, from subtrahere participle of subtrahere, have both the sense of taking from, but the former is used in a general, and the latter in a technical sense. He who makes an estimate is obliged to deduct; he who makes a calculation is obliged to subtract.

The tradesman deducts what has been paid from what remains due; 'The popish clergy took to themselves the whole residue of the intestate's estate, after the two-thirds of the wife and children were deducted.'—BLACKSTONE. The accountant subtracts small sums from the gross amount; 'A codicil is a supplement to a will, being for its explanation or alteration, or to make some addition to or else some subtraction from the former dispositions of the testator.'—BLACKSTONE.

TO SEPARATE, SEVER, DISJOIN, DETACH.

Whatever is united or joined in any way may be separated (v. To subtract), be the junction natural or artificial; 'Can a body be inflammable from which it would puzzle a chymist to separate an inflammable ingredient?'—BOYLE. To sever, which is but a variation of the verb to separate, is a mode of separating natural bodies, or bodies naturally joined: 'To mention only that species of shell-fish that grow to the surface of several rocks, and immediately die upon their being severed from the place where they grow.'—ADDISON. We may separate in part or entirely; we sever entirely: we separate with or without violence; we sever with violence only: we may separate papers which have been pasted together, or fruits which have grown together; but the head is severed from the body, or a branch from the trunk. There is the same distinction between these terms in their moral application; 'They (the French republicans) never have abandoned, and never will abandon, their old steady maxim of separating the people from their government.—BURKE.

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Distinguer, separer."

Better I were distract;
So should my thoughts be sever'd from my griefs.
SHAKSPEARE.

To separate may be said of things which are only remotely connected; disjoin, which signifies to destroy a junction, is said of things which are so intimately connected that they might be joined; 'In times and regions, so disjoined from each other that there can scarcely be imagined any communication of sentiments, has prevailed a general and uniform expectation of propitiating God by corporeal austerities.'—JOHNSON. We separate as convenience requires; we may separate in a right or a wrong manner: we mostly disjoin things which ought to remain joined: we separate syllables in order to distinguish them, but they are sometimes disjoined in writing by an accidental erasure. To detach, which signifies to destroy a contract, has an intermediate sense between separate and disjoin, applying to bodies which are neither so loosely connected as the former, nor so closely as the latter: we separate things that directly meet in no point; we disjoin those which meet in every point; we detach those things which meet in one point only; 'The several parts of it are detached one from the other, and yet join again, one cannot tell how.'—POPE. Sometimes the word detach has a moral application, as to detach persons, that is, the minds of persons, from their party; so likewise detached, in distinction from a connected piece of composition; 'As for the detached rhapsodies which Lycurgus in more early times brought with him out of Asia, they must have been exceedingly imperfect.'—CUMBERLAND.

TO DISJOINT, DISMEMBER.

Disjoint signifies to separate at the joint; dismember signifies to separate the members.

The terms here spoken of derive their distinct meaning and application from the signification of the words joint and member. A limb of the body may be disjointed if it be so put out of the joint that it cannot act; but the body itself is dismembered when the different limbs or parts are separated from each other. So in the metaphorical sense our ideas are said to be disjointed when they are so thrown out of their order that they do not fall in with one another; and kingdoms are said to be dismembered where any part or parts are separated from the rest;

Along the woods, along the moorish fens,
Sighs the sad genius of the coming storm,
And up among the loose disjointed cliffs.

THOMSON.

Where shall I find his corpse! What earth sustains
His trunk dismembered and his cold remains?

DRYDEN

And yet, deluded man,
A scene of crude disjointed visions past,
And broken slumbers, rises still resolv'd
With new flush'd hopes to run the giddy round.

THOMSON

'The kingdom of East Saxony was dismembered from that of Kent.'—HUME.

TO ADDICT, DEVOTE, APPLY.

Addict, in Latin addictus, participle of addico, compounded of ad and dico, signifies to speak or declare in favour of a thing, to exert one's self in its favour, devote, in Latin devotus, participle of devoeo, signifies to vow or make resolutions for a thing; apply, in French appliquer, Latin applico, is compounded of ap or ad and plico, signifying to knit or join one's self to a thing.

To addict is to indulge one's self in any particular practice; to devote is to direct one's powers and means to any particular pursuit; to apply is to employ one's time or attention about any object. Men are addicted to vices: they devote their talents to the acquirement of any art or science: they apply their minds to the investigation of a subject.

Children begin early to addict themselves to lying when they have any thing to conceal. People who are devoted to their appetites are burdensome to themselves, and to all with whom they are connected. Whoever applies his mind to the contemplation of nature, and the works of creation, will feel himself impressed with sublime and reverential ideas of the Creator.

We are addicted to a thing from an irresistible passion or propensity; 'As the pleasures of luxury are very expensive, they put those who are addicted to them upon raising fresh supplies of money by all the methods of rapaciousness and corruption.'—ADDISON. We are devoted to a thing from a strong but settled attachment to it; 'Persons who have devoted themselves to God are venerable to all who fear him.'—BERKELEY. We apply to a thing from a sense of its utility; 'Tully has observed that a lamb no sooner falls from its mother, but immediately, and of its own accord, it applies itself to the teat.'—ADDISON. We addict ourselves to study by yielding to our passion for it: we devote ourselves to the service of our king and country by employing all our powers to their benefit: we apply to business by giving it all the time and attention that it requires.

Addict is seldom used in a good than in a bad sense; devote is mostly employed in a good sense; apply in an indifferent sense.

TO ADDRESS, APPLY.

Address is compounded of ad and dress, in Spanish derecar, Latin directi, preterit of dirigo to direct, signifying to direct one's self to an object; apply, v. To addict.

An address is immediately directed from one party to another, either personally or by writing; an application may be made through the medium of a third person. An address may be made for an indifferent purpose or without any express object; but an application is always occasioned by some serious circumstance.

We address those to whom we speak or write; 'Many are the inconveniences which happen from the improper manner of address, in common speech, between persons of the same or different quality.'—STEELE. We apply to those to whom we wish to communicate some object of personal interest; 'Thus all the words of lordship, honour, and grace, are only repetitions to a man that the king has ordered him to be called so, but no evidences that there is any thing in himself that would give the man, who applies to him, those ideas without the creation of his master.'—STEELE. An address therefore may be made without an application; and an application may be made by means of an address.

It is a privilege of the British Constitution, that the subject may address the monarch, and apply for a redress of grievances. We cannot pass through the streets of the metropolis without being continually addressed by beggars, who apply for the relief of artificial more than for real wants. Men in power are always exposed to be publicly addressed by persons who wish to obtrude their opinions upon them, and to have perpetual applications from those who solicit favours.

An address may be rude or civil, an application may be frequent or urgent. It is impertinent to address any one with whom we are not acquainted, unless we have any reason for making an application to them.

TO ATTEND TO, MIND, REGARD, HEED, NOTICE.

Attend, in French attendre, Latin attendo, compounded of at or ad and tendo to stretch, signifies to stretch or bend the mind to a thing; mind, from the noun mind, signifies to have in the mind; regard, in French regarder, compounded of re and garder, comes from the German wahren to see or look at, signifying to look upon again or with attention; heed, in German hüten, in all probability comes from vito, and the Latin video to see or pay attention to; notice, from the Latin notitia knowledge, signifies to get the knowledge of or have in one's mind.

The idea of fixing the mind on an object is common to all these terms. As this is the characteristic of attention, attend is the generic, the rest are specific terms. We attend in mindings, regarding, heeding, and noticing, and also in many cases in which these words are not employed. To mind is to attend to a thing, so that it may not be forgotten; to regard is to look on a thing as of importance; to heed is to attend to a thing from a principle of caution; to notice is to think on that which strikes the senses.

We attend to a speaker when we hear and understand his words; 'Conversation will naturally furnish us with hints which we did not attend to, and make us enjoy other men's parts and reflections as well as our own.'—ADDISON. We mind what is said when we bear it in mind;

Cease to request me, let us mind our way,
Another song requires another day.—DRYDEN.

We regard what is said by dwelling and reflecting on it; 'The voice of reason is more to be regarded than the bent of any present inclination.'—ADDISON. Heed is given to whatever awakens a sense of danger;

Ah! why was ruin so attractive made,
Or why fond man so easily betray'd?
Why heed we not, while mad we haste along,
The gentle voice of peace or pleasure's song?
COLLINS.

Notice is taken of what passes outwardly; 'I believe that the knowledge of Dryden was gleaned from accidental intelligence and various conversation, by vigilance that permitted nothing to pass without notice.'—JOHNSON. Children should always attend when spoken to, and mind what is said to them; they should regard the counsels of their parents, so as to make them the rule of their conduct, and heed their warnings so as to avoid the evil; they should notice what passes before them so as to apply it to some useful purpose. It is a part of politeness to attend to every minute circumstance which affects the comfort and convenience of those with whom we associate: men who are actuated by any passion seldom pay any regard to the dictates of conscience; nor heed the unfavourable impressions which their conduct makes on others; for in fact they seldom think what is said of them to be worth their notice.

TO ATTEND, HEARKEN, LISTEN.

Attend, v. To attend to; hearken, in German horchten is an intensive of hören to hear; listen probably comes from the German listen to lust after, because listening springs from an eager desire to hear.

Attend is a mental action; hearken both corporeal and mental; listen simply corporeal. To attend is to have the mind engaged on what we hear; to hearken and listen are to strive to hear. People attend when they are addressed;

Hush'd winds the topmost branches scarcely bend,
As if thy tuneful song they did attend.—DRYDEN

They hearken to what is said by others; 'What a deluge of lust, and fraud, and violence would in a little time overflow the whole nation, if these wise advocates for morality (the free thinkers) were universally hearkened to.'—BERKELEY. Men listen to what passes between others;

While Chaos hush'd stands listening to the noise,
And wonders at confusion not his own.—DENNIS.

It is always proper to attend, and mostly of importance to hearken, but frequently improper to listen. The mind that is occupied with another object cannot attend: we are not disposed to hearken when the thing does not appear interesting: curiosity often impels to listening to what does not concern the listener.

Listen is sometimes used figuratively for hearing, so as to attend: it is necessary at all times to listen to the dictates of reason. It is of great importance for a learner to attend to the rules that are laid down: it is essential for young people in general to hearken to the counsels of their elders, and to listen to the admonitions of conscience.

TO HEAR, HEARKEN, OVERHEAR

To hear is properly the act of the ear; it is sometimes totally abstracted from the mind, when we hear and do not understand;

I look'd, I listen'd, dreadful sounds I hear,
And the dire forms of hostile gods appear.
DRYDEN.

To hearken is an act of the ear, and the mind in conjunction; it implies an effort to hear, a tendency of the ear;

But aged Nereus hearkens to his love.—DRYDEN.

To overhear is to hear clandestinely, or unknown to the person who is heard, whether designedly or not;

If he fail of that

He will have other means to cut you off;

I overheard him and his practices.—SHAKESPEARE.

We hear sounds: we hearken for the sense; we overhear the words: a quick ear hears the smallest sound; a willing mind hearkens to what is said: a prying curiosity leads to overhearing.

ATTENTION, APPLICATION, STUDY.

These terms indicate a direction of the thoughts to an object, but differing in the degree of steadiness and force.

Attention (v. To attend to) marks the simple bending of the mind; application (v. To address) marks an envelopment or engagement of the powers; abringing them into a state of close contact; study, from the Latin studeo to desire eagerly, marks a degree of application that arises from a strong desire of attaining the object.

Attention is the first requisite for making a progress in the acquirement of knowledge; it may be given in various degrees, and it rewards according to the proportion in which it is given; a divided attention is however more hurtful than otherwise; it retards the progress of the learner while it injures his mind by improper exercise; 'Those whom sorrow incapacitates to enjoy the pleasures of contemplation, may properly apply to such diversions, provided they are innocent, as lay strong hold on the attention.'—JOHNSON. Application is requisite for the attainment of perfection in any pursuit; it cannot be partial or variable, like attention; it must be the constant exercise of power or the regular and uniform use of means for the attainment of an end: youth is the period for application, when the powers of body and mind are in full vigour; no degree of it in after-life will supply its deficiency in younger years; 'I could heartily wish there was the same application and endeavours to cultivate and improve our church-musick as have been lately bestowed upon that of the stage.'—ADDISON. Study is that species of application which is most purely intellectual in its nature; it is the exercise of the mind for itself and in itself, its native effort to arrive at maturity; it embraces both attention and application. The student attends to all he hears and sees; applies what he has learned to the acquirement of what he wishes to learn, and digests the whole by the exercise of reflection: as nothing is thoroughly understood or properly reduced to practice without study, the professional man must choose this road in order to reach the summit of excellence; 'Other things may be seized with might, or purchased with money, but knowledge is to be gained only with study.'—JOHNSON.

TO DISREGARD, NEGLECT, SLIGHT.

To disregard signifies properly not to regard; neglect, in Latin neglectus, participle of negligo, compounded of nec and lego, signifies not to choose; slight, from light, signifies to make light of or set light by.

We disregard the warnings, the words, or opinions of another; we neglect their injunctions or their precepts. To disregard results from the settled purpose of the mind; to neglect from a temporary forgetfulness or oversight. What is disregarded is seen and passed over; what is neglected is generally not thought of at the time required. What is disregarded does not strike the mind at all; what is neglected enters the mind only when it is before the eye: the former is an action employed on present objects; the latter on that which is past: what we disregard is not esteemed; 'The new notion that has prevailed of late years that the Christian religion is little more than a good system of morality, must in course draw on a disregard to spiritual exercise.'—GIBSON. What we neglect is often esteemed, but not sufficiently to be remembered or practised;

Beauty 's a charm, but soon the charm will pass;
As lilies lie neglected on the plain,
While dusky hyacinths for use remain.—DRYDEN.

A child disregards the prudent counsels of a parent; he neglects to use the remedies which have been prescribed to him.

Disregard and neglect are frequently not personal acts; they respect the thing more than the person; slight is altogether an intentional act towards an individual. We disregard or neglect things often from a heedlessness of temper; the consequence either of youth or habit: we slight a person from feelings of dislike or contempt. Young people should disregard nothing that is said to them by their superiors; nor neglect any thing which they are enjoined to do; nor slight any one to whom they owe personal attention; 'You cannot expect your son should have any regard for one whom he sees you slight.'—LOCKE. Slight is also sometimes applied to moral objects in the same sense; 'When once devotion fancies herself under the influence of a divine impulse, it is no wonder she slights human ordinances.'—ADDISON.

INADVERTENCY, INATTENTION, OVERSIGHT.

Inadvertency, from advert to turn the mind to, is allied to inattention (v. Attentive), when the act of the mind is signified in general terms; and to oversight when any particular instance of inadvertency occurs. Inadvertency never designates a habit, but inattention does; the former term, therefore, is unqualified by the reproachful sense which attaches to the latter: any one may be guilty of inadvertencies, since the mind that is occupied with many subjects equally serious may be turned so steadily towards some that others may escape notice; 'Ignorance or inadvertency will admit of some extenuation.'—SOUTH. Inattention, which designates a direct want of attention, is always a fault, and belongs only to the young, or such as are thoughtless, either by nature or circumstances; 'The expense of attending (the Scottish Parliament), the inattention of the age to any legal or regular system of government, but above all, the exorbitant authority of the nobles, made this privilege of so little value as to be almost neglected.'—ROBERTSON. Since inadvertency is an occasional act, it must not be too often repeated, or it becomes inattention. An oversight is properly a species of inadvertency which arises from looking over, or passing by, a thing. Inadvertency seems to refer rather to the cause of the mistake, namely, the particular abstraction of the mind from the object; the term oversight seems to refer to the mistake itself, namely, the missing something which ought to have been taken: it is an inadvertency in a person to omit speaking to one of the company; it is an oversight in a tradesman who omits to include certain articles in his reckoning: we pardon an inadvertency in another, since the consequences are never serious; we must be guarded against oversights in business, as their consequences may be serious; 'The ancient critics discover beauties which escape the observation of the vulgar, and very often find reasons for palliating such little slips and oversights in the writings of eminent authors.'—ADDISON.

TO NEGLECT, OMIT.

Neglect, v. To disregard; omit, in Latin omitto, or ob and mitto, signifies to put aside.

The idea of letting pass or slip, or of not using, is comprehended in the signification of both these terms; the former is, however, a culpable, the latter an indifferent, action. What we neglect ought not to be neglected;

Heaven,
Where honour due and reverence none neglect.
MILTON.

What we omit may be omitted or otherwise, as convenience requires; 'These personal comparisons I omit, because I would say nothing that may savour of a spirit of flattery.'—BACON. In indifferent matters they may sometimes be applied indifferently; 'It is the great excellence of learning, that it borrows very little from time or place; but this quality which constitutes much of its value is one occasion of neglect. What may be done at all times with equal propriety is deferred from day to day, till the mind is gradually reconciled to the omission."—JOHNSON. These terms differ, however, in the objects to which they are applied: that is neglected which is practicable or serves for action; that is omitted which serves for intellectual purposes: we neglect an opportunity, we neglect the means, the time, the use, and the like; we omit a word, a sentence, a figure, a stroke, a circumstance, and the like.

NEGLIGENT, REMISS, CARELESS, THOUGHTLESS, HEEDLESS, INATTENTIVE.

Negligent (v. To disregard) and remiss respect the outward action: careless, heedless, thoughtless, and inattentive respect the state of the mind.

Negligence and remissness consist in not doing what ought to be done; carelessness and the other mental defects may show themselves in doing wrong, as well as in not doing at all; negligence and remissness are therefore, to carelessness and the others, as the effect to the cause; for no one is so apt to be negligent and remiss as he who is careless, although at the same time negligence and remissness arise from other causes, and carelessness, thoughtlessness, &c. produce likewise other effects. Negligent is a stronger term than remiss: one is negligent in neglecting the thing that is expressly before one's eyes; one is remiss in forgetting that which was enjoined some time previously: the want of will renders a person negligent; the want of interest renders a person remiss: one is negligent in regard to business, and the performance of bodily labour; one is remiss in duty, or in such things as respect mental exertion. Servants are commonly negligent in what concerns their master's interest; teachers are remiss in not correcting the faults of their pupils. Negligence is therefore the fault of persons of all descriptions, but particularly those in low condition; 'The two classes most apt to be negligent of this duty (religious retirement) are the men of pleasure, and the men of business.'—BLAIR. Remissness is a fault peculiar to those in a more elevated station;

My gen'rous brother is of gentle kind,

He seems remiss, but bears a valiant mind.—POPE.

A clerk in an office is negligent in not making proper memorandums; a magistrate, or the head of an institution, is remiss in the exercise of his authority by not checking irregularities.

Careless denotes the want of care (v. Care) in the manner of doing things; thoughtless denotes the want of thought or reflection about things; heedless denotes the want of heeding (v. To attend) or regarding things; inattentive denotes the want of attention to things (v. To attend to).

One is careless only in trivial matters of behaviour; one is thoughtless in matters of greater moment, in what respects the conduct. Carelessness leads children to make mistakes in their exercises, or in whatever they commit to memory or to paper; thoughtlessness leads many who are not children into serious errors of conduct, when they do not think of or bear in mind the consequences of their actions. Carelessness is occasional, thoughtlessness is permanent; the former is inseparable from a state of childhood, the latter is a constitutional defect, and sometimes attends a man to his grave. Carelessness as well as thoughtlessness betrays itself not only in the thing that immediately employs the mind, but thoughtlessness respects that which is past, and carelessness lies in that which regards futurity; 'If the parts of time were not variously coloured, we should never discern their departure and succession, but should live thoughtless of the past, and careless of the future.'—JOHNSON. We may not only be careless in not doing the thing well that we are about, but we may be careless in neglecting to do it at all, or careless about the event, or careless about our future interest; it still differs, however, from thoughtless in this, that it bespeaks a want of interest or desire for the thing; but thoughtless bespeaks the want of thinking or reflecting upon it: the careless person abstains from using the means, because he does not care about the end; the thoughtless person cannot act, because he does not think: the careless person sees the thing, but does not try to obtain it; the thoughtless person has not the thought of it in his mind

Careless is applied to such things as require permanent care; thoughtless to such as require permanent thought; heedless and inattentive are applied to passing objects that engage the senses or the thoughts of the moment. One is careless in business, thoughtless in conduct, heedless in walking or running, inattentive in listening: careless and thoughtless persons neglect the necessary use of their powers; the heedless and inattentive neglect the use of their senses. Careless people are unfit to be employed in the management of any concerns; thoughtless people are unfit to have the management of themselves; heedless children are unfit to go by themselves; inattentive children are unfit to be led by others. One is careless and inattentive in providing for his good; one is thoughtless and heedless in not guarding against evil: a careless person does not trouble himself about advancement; an inattentive person does not concern himself about improvement, a thoughtless person brings himself into distress; a heedless person exposes himself to accidents.

Heedless and inattentive are, for the most part, applied to particular circumstances, and in that case they are not taken in a bad sense. We may be heedless of a thing of which it is not needful to take any heed;

There in the ruin, heedless of the dead,
The shelter-seeking peasant builds his shed.

GOLDSMITH

Or inattentive if the thing does not demand attention; 'In the midst of his glory the Almighty is not inattentive to the meanness of his subjects.'—BLAIR.

THOUGHTFUL, CONSIDERATE, DELIBERATE.

Thoughtful, or full of thinking (v. To think, reflect), considerate, or ready to consider (v. To consider, reflect), and deliberate, ready to deliberate (v. To consult), rise upon each other in their signification: he who is thoughtful does not forget his duty; he who is considerate pauses, and considers properly what is his duty; he who deliberates considers deliberately. It is a recommendation to a subordinate person to be thoughtful in doing what is wished of him; 'Men's minds are in general inclined to levity, much more than to thoughtful melancholy.'—BLAIR. It is the recommendation of a confidential person to be considerate, as he has often to judge according to his own discretion; 'Some things will not bear much zeal; and the more earnest we are about them, the less we recommend ourselves to the approbation of sober and considerate men.'—TILLOTSON. It is the recommendation of a person who is acting for himself in critical matters to be deliberate; 'There is a vast difference between sins of infirmity and those of presumption, as vast as between inadvertency and deliberation.'—SOUTH. There is this farther distinction in the word deliberate, that it may be used in the bad sense to mark a settled intention to do evil; young people may sometimes plead in extenuation of their guilt, that their misdeeds do not arise from deliberate malice.

ATTENTIVE, CAREFUL.

Attentive marks a readiness to attend (v. To attend to); careful signifies full of care (v. Care, solicitude).

These epithets denote a fixedness of mind: we are attentive in order to understand and improve; we are careful to avoid mistakes. An attentive scholar profits by what is told him in learning his task; a careful scholar performs his exercise correctly.

Attention respects matters of judgement; care relates to mechanical or ordinary actions: we listen attentively; we read or write carefully. A servant must be attentive to the orders that are given him, and careful not to injure his master's property. A translator must be attentive; a transcriber careful. A tradesman ought to be attentive to the wishes of his customers, and careful in keeping his accounts. In an extended and moral application of these terms they preserve a similar distinction; 'The use of the passions is to stir up the soul, to awaken the understanding, and to make the whole man more vigorous and attentive in the prosecution of his designs.'—ADDISON. 'We should be as careful of our words as our actions, and as far from speaking as doing ill.'—STERLE.

CARE, SOLICITUDE, ANXIETY.

Care, in Latin cura, comes probably from the Greek κῆπος, power, because whoever has power has a weight of care; solicitude, in French solicitude, Latin solicitude from solicito to disquiet, compounded of solum and cito to put altogether in commotion, signifies a complete state of restless commotion; anxiety, in French anxiété, Latin anxiatus, from anxius and ango, Greek ἀγχω, Hebrew פָּחַן to hang, suffocate, torment, signifies a state of extreme suffering.

These terms express mental pain in different degrees; care less than solicitude, and this less than anxiety. Care consists of thought and feeling; solicitude and anxiety of feeling only. Care respects the past, present, and future; solicitude and anxiety regard the present and future. Care is directed towards the present and absent, near or at a distance; solicitude and anxiety are employed about that which is absent and at a certain distance.

We are careful about the means; solicitous and anxious about the end; we are solicitous to obtain a good; we are anxious to avoid an evil. The cares of a parent exceed every other in their weight. He has an unceasing solicitude for the welfare of his children, and experiences many an anxious thought lest all his care should be lost upon them.

Care, though in some respects an infirmity of our nature, is a consequence of our limited knowledge, which we cannot altogether remove; as it respects the present, it is a bounden duty; but when it extends to futurity, it must be kept within the limits of pious resignation;

But his face

Deep scars of thunder had intrench'd, and care
Sat on his faded cheek.—MILTON.

Solicitude and anxiety, as habits of the mind, are irreconcilable with the faith of a Christian, which teaches him to take no thought for the morrow; 'Can your solicitude alter the course, or unravel the intricacy, of human events?'—BLAIR. 'The story of a man who grew gray in the space of one night's anxiety is very famous.'—SECTATOR.

CARE, CONCERN, REGARD.

Care, in Latin cura, comes probably from the Greek κῆπος, authority, because the weight of care rests with those in authority; concern, from the Latin cerno, compounded of con and cerno, signifies the looking thoroughly into a thing; regard, in French regarder, compounded of re and garder to look, signifies looking back upon a thing.

Care and concern consist both of thought and feeling, but the latter has less of thought than feeling; regard consists of thought only. We care for a thing which is the object of our exertions and wishes;

His trust was equal with the Deity to be deem'd,
Equal in strength, and rather than be less
Care'd not to be at all.—MILTON.

We concern ourselves about a thing when it engages our attention;

Our country's welfare is our first concern.—HAVARD.

We have regard for a thing on which we set some value and bestow some reflection;

Slander meets no regard from noble minds:
Only the base believe what the base only utter.

BELLER.

Care is altogether an active principle: the careful man leaves no means untried in the pursuit of his object; care actuates him to personal endeavours; it is opposed to negligence. Concern is not so active in its nature: the person who is concerned will be contented to see exertions made by others; it is opposed to indifference. Regard is only a sentiment of the mind; it may lead to action, but of itself extends no farther than reflection.

The business of life is the subject of care;

Well, on my terms thou wilt not be my heir:
If thou care'st little, less shall be my care.—DRYDEN.

Religion is the grand object of concern. 'The more the authority of any station in society is extended, the more it concerns publick happiness that it be committed to men fearing God.'—ROGERS The esteem of others is an object of regard; 'He has rendered himself worthy of their most favourable regards.'—SMITH.

No one ought to expect to be exempt from care: the provision of a family, and the education of children, are objects for which we ought to take some care, or at least have some concern, inasmuch as we have a regard for our own welfare, and the well-being of society.

CARE, CHARGE, MANAGEMENT.

Care, v. Care, solicitude; charge, in French charge a burden, in Armorick and Breton carg, which is probably connected with cargo and carry, is figuratively employed in the sense of a burden; a management, in French ménagement, from ménager and mener to lead, and the Latin manus a hand, signifies direction.

Care (v. Care, concern) includes generally both charge and management; but in the strict sense, it comprehends personal labour: charge involves responsibility: management (v. To conduct) includes regulation and order.

A gardener has the care of a garden; a nurse has the charge of children; a steward has the management of a farm: we must always act in order to take care; we must look in order to take charge; we must always think in order to manage.

Care is employed in the ordinary affairs of life: charge in matters of trust and confidence; management in matters of business and experience: the female has the care of the house, and the man that of providing for his family;

Care's a father's right—a pleasing right,
In which he labours with a home-felt joy.—SHIRLEY.

An instructor has the charge of youth; 'I can never believe that the repugnance with which Tiberius took the charge of the government upon him was wholly feigned.'—CUMBERLAND. A clerk has the management of a business; 'The woman, to whom her husband left the whole management of her lodgings, and who persisted in her purpose, soon found an opportunity to put it into execution.'—HAWKESWORTH.

CAREFUL, CAUTIOUS, PROVIDENT.

Careful signifies full of care (v. Care, solicitude); cautious is in Latin cautus, participle of caveo, which comes from cavus hollow, or a cave, which was originally a place of security; hence the epithet cautious in the sense of seeking security; provident, in Latin providens, signifies foreseeing or looking to beforehand, from pro and video.

We are careful to avoid mistakes; cautious to avoid danger; provident to avoid straits and difficulties: care is exercised in saving and retaining what we have; caution must be used in guarding against the evils that may be; providence must be employed in supplying the good, or guarding against the contingent evils of the future. Providence is a determinate and extended kind of caution.

Care consists in the use of means, in the exercise of the faculties for the attainment of an end; a careful person omits nothing;

To cure their mad ambition they were sent

To rule a distant province, each alone;

What could a careful father have done more?

DRYDEN.

Caution consists rather in abstaining from action; a cautious person will not act where he ought not;

Flush'd by the spirit of the genial year,

Be greatly cautious of your sliding hearts.

THOMSON.

Providence respects the use of things; it is both care and caution in the management of property; a provident person acts for the future by abstaining from the present;

Blest above men if he perceives and feels
The blessings he is heir to: he! to whom
His provident forefathers have bequeathed
In this fair district of their native isle
A free inheritance.—CUMBERLAND.

CAUTIONS, WARY, CIRCUMSPECT.

Cautious, v. Careful; wary, from the same as aware (v. To be aware of), signifies ready to look out v. c.

circumspect, in Latin circumspectus, participle of circumspicio to look about, signifies ready to look on all sides.

These epithets denote a peculiar care to avoid evil; but cautious expresses less than the other two; it is necessary to be cautious at all times; to be wary in cases of peculiar danger; to be circumspect in matters of peculiar delicacy and difficulty.

Caution is the effect of fear; wariness of danger; circumspection of experience and reflection. The cautious man reckons on contingencies; he guards against the evils that may be, by pausing before he acts;

The strong report of Arthur's death has worse

Effect on them, than on the common sort;

The vulgar only shake their cautious heads,

Or whisper in the ear wisely suspicious.—CIBBER.

The wary man looks for the danger which he suspects to be impending, and seeks to avoid it; 'Let not that wary caution, which is the fruit of experience, degenerate into craft.'—BLAIR. The circumspect man weighs and deliberates; he looks around and calculates on possibilities and probabilities; he seeks to attain his end by the safest means; 'No pious man can be so circumspect in the care of his conscience, as the covetous man is in that of his pocket.'—STEELE. A tradesman must be cautious in his dealings with all men; he must be wary in his intercourse with designing men; he must be circumspect when transacting business of particular importance and intricacy. The traveller must be cautious when going a road not familiar to him; he must be wary when passing over slippery and dangerous places; he must be circumspect when going through obscure, uncertain, and winding passages.

A person ought to be cautious not to give offence; he ought to be wary not to entangle himself in ruinous litigations; he ought to be circumspect not to engage in what is above his abilities to complete. It is necessary to be cautious not to disclose our sentiments too freely before strangers; to be wary in one's speech before busy bodies and calumniators; to be circumspect whenever we speak on publick matters, respecting either politicks or religion.

MINDFUL, REGARDFUL, OBSERVANT.

Mindful, signifies full of minding, or thinking on that which is past; it mostly regards matters of prudence, or the counsel we receive from others;

Be mindful, when thou hast entomb'd the shoot,

With store of earth around to feed the root.—DRYDEN.

Regardful respects that which in itself demands regard or serious thought;

No, there is none; no ruler of the stars

Regardful of my miseries.—HILL.

Observant respects that which has been imposed upon us, or become a matter of obligation;

Observant of the right, religious of his word.

DRYDEN.

A child should always be mindful of its parents' instructions; they should never be forgotten: every one should be regardful of his several duties and obligations; they never ought to be neglected: one ought to be observant of the religious duties which one's profession enjoins upon him; they cannot with propriety be passed over. By being mindful of what one hears from the wise and good, one learns to be wise and good; by being regardful of what is due to one's self, and to society at large, one learns to pass through the world with satisfaction to one's own mind and esteem from others; by being observant of all rule and order, we afford to others a salutary example for their imitation.

AWARE, ON ONE'S GUARD, APPRIZED, CONSCIOUS.

Aware, compounded of a or on and ware, signifies to be on the look out, from the Saxon waer, German, &c. wahren, Greek ὁρᾶω to see; guard, in French garder, is connected with ward, in Saxon waerd, German, &c. gewahrt, participle of wahren; apprized, in French appris, from apprendre to apprehend, learn, or understand; conscious, in Latin consciens, of con and sciens knowing, signifies knowing within one's self.

The idea of having the expectation or knowledge of a thing is common to all these terms. We are aware of a thing when we calculate upon it; 'The first steps in the breach of a man's integrity are more important than men are aware of.'—STEELE. We are on our guard against an evil when we are prepared for it. 'What establishment of religion more friendly to publick happiness could be desired or framed (than our own). How zealous ought we to be for its preservation; how much on our guard against every danger which threatens to trouble it.'—BLAIR. We are apprized of that of which we have had an intimation, or have been informed of; 'In play the chance of loss and gain ought always to be equal, at least each party should be apprized of the force employed against him.'

—STEELE. We are conscious of that in which we have ourselves been concerned; 'I know nothing so hard for a generous mind to get over as calumny and reproach, and cannot find any method of quieting the soul under them, besides this single one, of our being conscious to ourselves that we do not deserve them.'—ADDISON.

To be aware, and on one's guard, respect the future; to be apprized, either the past or present; to be conscious, only the past. Experience enables a man to be aware of consequences; prudence and caution dictate to him the necessity of being on his guard against evils. Whoever is fully aware of the precarious tenure by which he holds all his goods in this world, will be on his guard to prevent any calamities, as far as the use of means in his control.

We are apprized of events, or what passes outwardly, through the medium of external circumstances; we are conscious only through the medium of ourselves, of what passes within. We are apprized of what has happened from indications that attract our notice; we are conscious of our guilt from the recollection of what we have done. A commander who is not aware of all the contingencies that influence the fate of a battle, who is not on his guard against the stratagems of the enemy, who is not fully apprized of their intentions, and conscious of his own strength to frustrate them, has no grounds to expect a victory; the chances of defeat are greatly against him.

HEED, CARE, ATTENTION

Heed, which through the medium of the German hüthen probably comes from the Latin vito to avoid, and video to see, applies to matters of importance to one's moral conduct; care (v. Care, concern) applies to matters of minor import: a man is required to take heed; a child is required to take care: the former exercises his understanding in taking heed; the latter exercises his thoughts and his senses in taking care: the former looks to the remote and probable consequences of his actions, and endeavours to prevent the evil that may happen; the latter sees principally to the thing that is immediately before him. When a young man enters the world, he must take heed lest he be not ensnared by his companions into vicious practices;

Next you, my servants, heed my strict command,

Without the walls a ruin'd temple stands.

DRYDEN.

In a slippery path we must take care that we do not fall; 'I believe the hiatus should be avoided with more care in poetry than in oratory.'—POPE.

Heed has moreover the sense of thinking on what is proposed to our notice, in which it agrees with attention, which from the Latin attendo, or at and tendo to stretch, signifies a tension or stretching the mind towards an object; hence we speak of giving heed and paying attention: but the former is applied only to that which is conveyed to us by another, in the shape of a direction, a caution, or an instruction; but the latter is said of every thing which we are set to perform. A good child gives heed to his parents when they caution him against any dangerous or false step; he pays attention to the lesson which is set him to learn. He who gives no heed to the counsels of others is made to repent his folly by bitter experience; 'It is a way of calling a man a fool, when no heed is given to what he says.'—L'ESTRANGE. He who fails in paying attention to the instruction of others cannot expect to grow wiser; 'He perceived nothing but silence, and signs of attention to what he would further say.'—BACON.

All were attentive to the godlike man.—DRYDEN.

ESTEEM, RESPECT, REGARD.

Esteem, from the Latin estimo, signifies literally to set a value upon; respect, from the Latin respicio, signifies to look back upon, to look upon with attention; regard, v. To attend to.

A favourable sentiment towards particular objects is included in the meaning of all these terms.

Esteem and respect flow from the understanding; regard springs from the heart, as well as the head: esteem is produced by intrinsic worth; respect by extrinsic qualities; regard is affection blended with esteem: it is in the power of every man, independently of all collateral circumstances, to acquire the esteem of others; but respect and regard are within the reach of a limited number only: the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the equal and the unequal, are each, in their turn, the objects of esteem; 'How great honour and esteem will men declare for one whom perhaps they never saw before.'—TILLOTSON. Those only are objects of respect who have some mark of distinction, or superiority either of birth, talent, acquirements, or the like;

Then for what common good my thoughts inspire,
Attend, and in the son respect the sire.—POPE.

Regard subsists only between friends, or those who stand in close connexion with each other; industry and sobriety excite our esteem for one man, charity and benevolence our esteem for another; superior learning or abilities excite our respect for another; a long acquaintance, or a reciprocity of kind offices, excite a mutual regard; 'He has rendered himself worthy of their most favourable regards.'—SMITH. This latter term is also used figuratively, and in a moral application; 'Cheerfulness bears the same friendly regard to the mind as to the body.'—ADDISON.

TO HONOUR, REVERENCE, RESPECT.

These terms agree in expressing the act of an inferior towards his superior; but honour (v. Glory) expresses less than reverence (v. To adore), and more than respect (v. To esteem).

To honour, as applied to persons, is mostly an outward act; to reverence is either an act of the mind, or the outward expression of a sentiment; to respect is only an act of the mind. We honour God by adoration and worship, as well as by the performance of his will; we honour our parents by obeying them and giving them our personal service; we reverence our Maker by cherishing in our minds a dread of offending him, and making a fearful use of his holy name and word; we reverence our parents by holding a similar sentiment in a less degree; 'This is a duty in the fifth commandment required towards our prince and our parent, a respect which in the notion of it implies a mixture of love and fear, and in the object equally supposes goodness and power.'—ROGERS. 'The foundation of every proper disposition towards God must be laid in reverence, that is, admiration mixed with awe.'—BLAIR. We respect the wise and good; 'Establish your character on the respect of the wise, not on the flattery of dependants.'—BLAIR.

To honour and respect are extended to other objects besides our Maker and our parents; but reverence is confined to objects of a religious description; 'We honour the king and all that are put in authority under him,' by rendering to them the tribute that is due to their station; we respect all who possess superior qualities: the former is an act of duty, it flows out of the constitution of civil society; the latter is a voluntary act flowing out of the temper of the mind towards others. To respect, as I have before observed, signifies merely to feel respect; but to show respect, or a mark of respect, supposes an outward action which brings it still nearer to honour. It is a mark of honour in subjects to keep the birth-day of their sovereign; it is a mark of respect to any individual to give him the upper seat in a room or at a table. Divine honours were formerly paid by the Romans to some of their emperors: respect is always paid to age in all Christian countries; among the heathens it differed according to the temper of the people.

To honour when applied to things is also used in the sense of holding in honour, in which case it expresses a stronger sentiment than respect, which solely implies regard to; 'Of learning, as of virtue, it may be affirmed that it is at once honoured and neglected.'—JOHNSON

The bless'd gods do not love
Ungodly actions; but respect the right
And in the works of pious men delight.—CHAPMAN

HONESTY, HONOUR.

These terms both respect the principle which actuates men in the adjustment of their rights with each other. The words are both derived from the same source, namely, the Hebrew הון substance or wealth (v. Honesty), which, being the primitive source of esteem among men, became at length put for the measure or standard of esteem, namely, what is good. Hence honesty and honour are both founded upon what is estimable; with this difference, that honesty is confined to the first principles or laws upon which civil society is founded, and honour is an independent principle that extends to every thing which by usage has been admitted as estimable or entitled to esteem; 'Honesty, in the language of the Romans, as well as in French, rather signifies a composition of those qualities which generally acquire honour and esteem to those who possess them.'—TEMPLE. 'If by honour be meant any thing distinct from conscience, 'tis no more than a regard to the censure and esteem of the world.'—ROGERS. An honest action, therefore, can never reflect so much credit on the agent as an honourable action; since in the performance of the one he may be guided by motives comparatively low, whereas in the other case he is actuated solely by a fair regard for the honour or the esteem of others. To a breach of honesty is attached punishment and personal inconvenience in various forms; but to a breach of honour is annexed only disgrace or the ill opinion of others: he, therefore, who sets more value or interest on the gratification of his passions, than on the esteem of the world, may gain his petty purpose with the sacrifice of his honour; but he who strives to be dishonest is thwarted in his purpose by the intervention of the laws, which deprive him of his unworthy gains: consequently, men are compelled to be honest whether they will or not, but they are entirely free in the choice of being honourable.

On the other hand, since honesty is founded on the very first principles of human society, and honour on the incidental principles which have been annexed to them in the progress of time and culture; the former is positive and definite, and he who is actuated by this principle can never err; but the latter is indefinite and variable, and as it depends upon opinion it will easily mislead. We cannot have a false honesty, but we may have false honour. Honesty always keeps a man within the line of his duty; but a mistaken notion of what is honourable may carry a man very far from what is right, and may even lead him to run counter to common honesty.

HONESTY UPRIGHTNESS, INTEGRITY, PROBITY.

Honesty, v. Fair; uprightness, from upright, in German aufrichtig or aufgerichtet, from aufrichten to set up, signifies in a straight direction, not deviating nor turning aside.

Honest is the most familiar and universal term, it is applied alike to actions and principles, to a mode of conduct or a temper of mind: upright is applied to the conduct, but always with reference to the moving principle. As it respects the conduct, honesty is a much more homely virtue than uprightness: a man is said to be honest who in his dealings with others does not violate the laws; thus a servant is honest who does not take any of the property of his master, or suffer it to be taken; a tradesman is honest who does not sell bad articles; and people in general are denominated honest who pay what they owe, and do not adopt any methods of defrauding others: honesty in this sense, therefore, consists in negatives; but up rightness is positive, and extends to all matters which are above the reach of the law, and comprehends not only every thing which is known to be hurtful, but also whatever may chance to be hurtful. To be honest requires nothing but a knowledge of the first principles of civil society; it is learned, and may be practised, by the youngest and most ignorant: but to be upright supposes a superiority of understanding or information, which qualifies a person to discriminate between that which may or may not injure another. An honest man is contented with not overcharging another for that which he sells to him; but an upright man seeks to provide him with that which shall fully answer his purpose: a man will not think himself dishonest who leaves another to find out defects which it is possible may escape his notice; but an upright man will rather suffer a loss himself than expose another to an error which may be detrimental to his interests. From this difference between honesty and uprightness arises another, namely, that the honest man may be honest only for his own convenience, out of regard to his character, or a fear of the laws; but the upright man is always upright, from his sense of what is right, and his concern for others.

Honest, in its extended sense, as it is applied to principles, or to the general character of a man, is of a higher cast than the common kind of honesty above mentioned; uprightness, however, in this case, still preserves its superiority. An honest principle is the first and most universally applicable principle, which the mind forms of what is right and wrong; and the honest man, who is so denominated on account of his having this principle, is looked upon with respect, inasmuch as he possesses the foundation of all moral virtue in his dealings with others. Honest is here the generic and uprightness the specific term; the former does not exclude the latter, but the latter includes the former. There may be many honest men and honest minds; but there are not so many upright men nor upright minds. The honest man is rather contrasted with the rogue, and an honest principle is opposed to the selfish or artful principle; but the upright man or the upright mind can be compared or contrasted with nothing but itself. An honest man will do no harm if he know it; but an upright man is careful not to do to another what he would not have another do to him.

Honesty is a feeling that actuates and directs by a spontaneous impulse; uprightness is a principle that regulates or puts every thing into an even course. Honesty can be dispensed with in no case; but uprightness is called into exercise only in certain cases. We characterize a servant or the lowest person as honest; but we do not entitle any one in so low a capacity as upright, since uprightness is exercised in matters of higher moment, and rests upon the evidence of a man's own mind; a judge, however, may with propriety be denominated upright, who scrupulously adheres to the dictates of an unbiassed conscience in the administration of justice.

Uprightness is applicable only to principles and actions; integrity (from the Latin integer whole) is applicable to the whole man or his character; and probity (from probus or prohibus restraining, that is, restraining from evil) is in like manner used only in the comprehensive sense. Uprightness is the straightness of rule by which actions and conduct in certain cases is measured; integrity is the wholeness or unbrokenness of a man's character throughout life in his various transactions; probity is the excellence and purity of a man's character in his various relations. When we call a man upright, we consider him in the detail; we bear in mind the uniformity and fixedness of the principle by which he is actuated: when we call him a man of integrity, we view him in the gross, not in this nor that circumstance of life, but in every circumstance in which the rights and interests of others are concerned. Uprightness may therefore be looked upon in some measure as a part of integrity; with this difference, that the acting principle is in the one case only kept in view, whereas in the other case the conduct and principle are both included. The distinction between these terms is farther evident by observing their different application. We do not talk of a man's uprightness being shaken, or of his preserving his uprightness; but of his integrity being shaken, and his preserving his integrity. We may however, ascribe the particular conduct of any individual as properly to the integrity of his principles or mind, as to the uprightness of his principles. A man's uprightness displays itself in his dealings, be they ever so trifling; but the integrity of his character is seen in the most important concerns of life. A judge shows his uprightness in his daily administration of justice, when he remains uninfluenced by any partial motive; he shows his integrity when he resists the most powerful motives of personal interest and advantage out of respect to right and justice.

Integrity and probity are both general and abstract terms; but the former is relative, the latter is positive: integrity refers to the external injuries by which it may be assailed or destroyed; it is goodness tried and preserved: probity is goodness existing of itself, without reference to any thing else. There is no integrity where private interest is not in question; there is no probity wherever the interests of others are injured: integrity therefore includes probity, but probity does not necessarily suppose integrity. Probity is a free principle, that acts without any force; integrity is a defensive principle, that is obliged to maintain itself against external force. Probity excludes all injustice; integrity excludes in a particular manner that injustice which would favour one's self. Probity respects the rights of every man, and seeks to render to every one what is his due; it does not wait to be asked, it does not require any compulsion; it voluntarily enters into all the circumstances and conditions of men, and measures out to each his portion: probity therefore forbids a man being malignant, hard, cruel, ungenerous, unfair, or any thing else which may press unequally and unjustly on his neighbour: integrity is disinterested; it sacrifices every personal consideration to the maintenance of what is right: a man of integrity will not be contented to abstain from selling himself for gold; he will keep himself aloof from all private partialities or resentments, all party cabals or intrigue, which are apt to violate the integrity of his mind. We look for honesty and uprightness in citizens; it sets every question at rest between man and man: we look for integrity and probity in statesmen, or such as have to adjust the rights of many; they contribute to the public as often as to the private good.

Were I to take an estimate of the comparative value of these four terms, I should denominate honesty a current coin which must be in every man's hands; he cannot dispense with it for his daily use: uprightness is fine silver: probity fine gold without any alloy; and integrity gold tried and purified: all which are in the hands of but comparatively few, yet carry a value with them independently of the use which is made of them.

RECTITUDE, UPRIGHTNESS.

Rectitude is properly rightness, which is expressed in a stronger manner by uprightness: we speak of the rectitude of the judgement; but of the uprightness of the mind, or of the moral character, which must be something more than straight, for it must be elevated above every thing mean or devious; 'We are told by Cumberland that rectitude is merely metaphorical, and that as a right line describes the shortest passage from point to point, so a right action effects a good design by the fewest means.'—JOHNSON.

Who to the fraudulent impostor foul,
In his uprightness, answer thus return'd.

MILTON.

FAIR, HONEST, EQUITABLE, REASONABLE.

Fair, in Saxon fagar, comes probably from the Latin pulcher beautiful; honest, in Latin honestus, comes from honus honour; equitable signifies having equity, or according to equity; reasonable, having reason, or according to reason.

Fair is said of persons or things; honest mostly characterizes the person, either as to his conduct or his principle. When fair and honest are both applied to the external conduct, the former expresses more than the latter: a man may be honest without being fair; he cannot be fair without being honest. Fairness enters into every minute circumstance connected with the interests of the parties, and weighs them alike for both; honesty is contented with a literal conformity to the law, it consults the interest of one party: the fair dealer looks to his neighbour as well as himself; he wishes only for an equal share of advantage; a man may be an honest dealer while he looks to no one's advantage but his own: the fair man always acts from a principle of right; the honest man may be so from a motive of fear.

When these epithets are employed to characterize the man generally, fairness expresses less than honesty. Fairness is employed only in regard to commercial transactions or minor personal concerns; 'If the worldling prefer those means which are the fairest, it is not because they are fair, but because they seem to him most likely to prove successful.'—BLAIR. Honesty ranks among the first moral virtues, and elevates a man high above his fellow-creatures;

An honest man's the noblest work of God.—POPE.

Should he at length, so truly good and great,
Prevail, and rule with honest views the state,
Then must he toil for an ungrateful race,
Submit to clamour, libels, and disgrace.

JENYNS.

A man is fair who is ready to allow his competitor the same advantages as he enjoys himself in every matter however trivial; or he is honest in all his looks, words, and actions: neither his tongue nor his countenance ever belie his heart. A fair man makes himself acceptable.

When fair is employed as an epithet to qualify things, or to designate their nature, it approaches very near in signification to equitable and reasonable; they are all opposed to what is unjust: fair and equitable suppose two objects put in collision; reasonable is employed abstractedly; what is fair and equitable is so in relation to all circumstances; what is reasonable is so of itself. An estimate is fair in which profit and loss, merit and demerit, with every collateral circumstance, is duly weighed; a judgement is equitable which decides suitably and advantageously for both parties; a price is reasonable which does not exceed the limits of reason or propriety. A decision may be either fair or equitable; but the former is said mostly in regard to trifling matters, even in our games and amusements, and the latter in regard to the important rights of mankind. It is the business of the umpire to decide fairly between the combatants or the competitors for a prize; it is the business of the judge to decide equitably between men whose property is at issue; 'A man is very unlikely to judge equitably when his passions are agitated by a sense of wrong.'—JOHNSON.

A demand, a charge, a proposition, or an offer may be said to be either fair or reasonable: but the former term always bears a relation to what is right between man and man; the latter to what is right in itself, according to circumstances; 'The reasonableness of a test is not hard to be proved.'—JOHNSON.

HONOUR, DIGNITY.

Honour (v. Honour) may be taken either for that which intrinsically belongs to a person, or for that which is conferred on him; dignity, from the Latin dignus worthy, signifying worthiness, may be equally applied to what is intrinsic or extrinsic of a man.

In the first case honour has a reference to what is esteemed by others; dignity to that which is esteemed by ourselves: a sense of honour impels a man to do that which is esteemed honourable among men; a sense of dignity to do that which is consistent with the worth and greatness of his nature: the former strives to elevate himself as an individual; the latter to raise himself to the standard of his species: the former may lead a person astray; but the latter is an unerring guide. It is honour which sometimes makes a man first insult his friend, then draw his sword upon him whom he has insulted: it is dignity which makes him despise every paltry affront from others, and apologize for every apparent affront on his own part. This distinction between the terms is kept up in their application to what is extraneous of a man: the honour is that which is conferred on him by others;

When a proud aspiring man meets with honours and preferences, these are the things which are ready to lay hold of his heart and affections.—SOUTH. 'The dignity is the worth or value which is added to his condition;

Him Tullus next in dignity succeeds.—DRYDEN

Hence we always speak of honours as conferred or received; but dignities as possessed or maintained. Honours may sometimes be casual; but dignities are always permanent: an act of condescension from the sovereign is an honour; but the dignity lies in the elevation of the office. Hence it is that honours are mostly civil or political; dignities ecclesiastical.

GLORY, HONOUR.

Glory is something dazzling and widely diffused. The Latin word gloria, anciently written glosia, is in all probability connected with our words gloss, glaze, glitter, glove, through the medium of the northern words gleissen, glotzen, glänzen, glühen, all which come from the Hebrew פָּאָר a live coal. That the moral idea of glory is best represented by light is evident from the glory which is painted round the head of our Saviour; honour is something less splendid, but more solid (v. Honour).

Glory impels to extraordinary efforts and to great undertakings;

Hence is our love of fame; a love so strong,
We think no dangers great nor labours long,
By which we hope our beings to extend,
And to remotest times in glory to descend.

JENYNS

Honour induces to a discharge of one's duty; 'As virtue is the most reasonable and genuine source of honour, we generally find in titles an intimation of some particular merit that should recommend men to the high stations which they possess.'—ADDISON. Excellence in the attainment, and success in the exploit, bring glory; a faithful exercise of one's talents reflects honour. Glory is connected with every thing which has a peculiar public interest; honour is more properly obtained within a private circle. Glory is not confined to the nation or life of the individual by whom it is sought; it spreads over all the earth, and descends to the latest posterity: honour is limited to those who are connected with the subject of it, and eye-witnesses to his actions. Glory is attainable but by few, and may be an object of indifference to any one; honour is more or less within the reach of all, and must be disregarded by no one. A general at the head of an army goes in pursuit of glory; the humble citizen who acts his part in society so as to obtain the approbation of his fellow-citizens is in the road for honour. A nation acquires glory by the splendour of its victories, and its superiority in arts as well as arms; it obtains honour by its strict adherence to equity and good faith in all its dealings with other nations. Our own nation has acquired glory by the help of its brave warriors; it has gained honour by the justice and generosity of its government. The military career of Alexander was glorious; his humane treatment of the Persian princesses who were his prisoners was an honourable trait in his character. The abolition of the slave trade by the English government was a glorious triumph of Christianity over the worst principles of human nature; the national conduct of England during the revolutionary period reflects honour on the English name.

Glory is a sentiment, selfish in its nature, but salutary or pernicious in its effect, according as it is directed;

If glory cannot move a mind so mean,
Nor future praise from fading pleasures wean,
Yet why should he defraud his son of fame,
And grudge the Romans their immortal name?

DRYDEN

Honour is a principle disinterested in its nature, and beneficial in its operations; 'Sir Francis Bacon, for greatness of genius and compass of knowledge, did honour to his age and country.'—ADDISON. A thirst for glory is seldom indulged but at the expense of others, as it is not attainable in the plain path of duty; there are but few opportunities of acquiring it by elevated acts of goodness, and still fewer who have the virtue to embrace the opportunities that offer: a love of honour can never be indulged but to the advantage of others; it is restricted by fixed laws; it requires a sacrifice of every selfish consideration, and a due regard to the rights of others; it is associated with nothing but virtue.

DISHONEST, KNAVISH.

Dishonest marks the contrary to honest; knaveish marks the likeness to a knave.

Dishonest characterizes simply the mode of action; knaveish characterizes the agent as well as the action; what is dishonest violates the established laws of man; what is knaveish supposes peculiar art and design in the accomplishment. It is dishonest to take any thing from another which does not belong to one; it is knaveish to get it by fraud or artifice, or by imposing on the confidence of another. We may prevent dishonest practices by ordinary means of security; but we must not trust ourselves in the company of knaveish people if we do not wish to be overreached; 'Gaming is too unreasonable and dishonest for a gentleman to addict himself to it.'—LORD LYTTELTON. 'Not to laugh when nature prompts is but a knaveish, hypocritical way of making a mask of one's face.'—POPE.

RIGHT, JUST, PROPER.

Right, in German recht, Latin rectus, signifies upright, not leaning to one side or the other, standing as it ought; just, in Latin justus, from jus law, signifies according to a rule of right; fit, v. Fit; proper, in Latin proprius, signifies belonging to a given rule.

Right is here the general term; the others express modes of right. The right and wrong are defined by the written will of God, or are written in our hearts according to the original constitutions of our nature; the just and unjust are determined by the written laws of men; the fit and proper are determined by the established principles of civil society.

Between the right and the wrong there are no gradations; a thing cannot be more right or more wrong; whatever is right is not wrong, and whatever is wrong is not right: the just and unjust, proper and improper, fit and unfit, on the contrary, have various shades and degrees that are not so easily definable by any forms of speech or written rules.

The right and wrong depend upon no circumstance; what is once right or wrong is always right or wrong; but the just or unjust, proper or improper, are relatively so according to the circumstances of the case: it is a just rule for every man to have that which is his own; but what is just to the individual may be unjust to society. It is proper for every man to take charge of his own concerns; but it would be improper for a man in an unsound state of mind to undertake such a charge.

The right and the wrong are often beyond the reach of our faculties to discern; but the just, fit, and proper are always to be distinguished sufficiently to be observed. Right is applicable to all matters, important or otherwise; just is employed only in matters of essential interest; proper is rather applicable to the minor concerns of life. Every thing that is done may be characterized as right or wrong: every thing done to others may be measured by the rule of just or unjust: in our social intercourse, as well as in our private transactions, fitness and propriety must always be consulted. As Christians, we desire to do that which is right in the sight of God and man; as members of civil society, we wish to be just in our dealings; as rational and intelligent beings, we wish to do what is fit and proper in every action, however trivial;

Hear then my argument—confess we must

A God there is supremely wise and just.

If so, however things affect our sight,

As sings our bard, whatever is is right.

JENYNS.

'There is a great difference between good pleading and just composition.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny). 'Visitors are no proper companions in the chamber of sickness.'—JOHNSON.

STRAIGHT, RIGHT, DIRECT.

Straight, from the Latin strictus, participle of stringo to tighten or bind, signifies confined, that is, turning neither to the right nor left. Straight is applied, therefore, in its proper sense, to corporeal objects; a path which is straight is kept within a shorter space than if it were curved; 'Truth is the shortest and nearest way to our end, carrying us thither in a straight line.'—TILLOTSON. Right and direct, from the Latin rectus, regulated or made as it ought, are said of that which is made by the force of the understanding, or by an actual effort, what one wishes it to be: hence, the mathematician speaks of a right line, as the line which lies most justly between two points; and has been made the basis of mathematical figures; and the moralist speaks of the right opinion, as that which has been formed by the best rule of the understanding;

Then from pole to pole

He views in breadth, and without longer pause,

Down right into the world's first region throws

His fight precipitant.—MILTON.

On the same ground, we speak of a direct answer, as that which has been framed so as to bring soonest and easiest to the point desired; 'There be, that are in nature faithful and sincere, and plain and direct, not crafty and involved.'—BACON.

CANDID, OPEN, SINCERE.

Candid, in French candide, Latin candidus, from candeo to shine, signifies to be pure as truth itself; open is in Saxon open, French ouvert, German offen, from the preposition up, German auf, Dutch op, &c., because erectness is a characteristic of truth and openness; sincere, French sincère, Latin sincerus, probably from the Greek σιν and καρ the heart, signifying dictated by or going with the heart.

Candour arises from a conscious purity of intention; openness from a warmth of feeling and love of communication; sincerity from a love of truth.

Candour obliges us to acknowledge whatever may make against ourselves; it is disinterested;

Self-conviction is the path to virtue,

An honourable candour thus adorns

Ingenuous minds.—C. JOHNSON.

Openness impels us to utter whatever passes in the mind; it is unguarded; 'The fondest and firmest friendships are dissolved by such openness and sincerity as interrupt our enjoyment of our own approbation.'—JOHNSON. Sincerity prevents us from speaking what we do not think; it is positive;

His words are bonds, his oaths are oracles,

His love sincere, his thoughts immaculate.

SHAKESPEARE.

A candid man will have no reserve when openness is necessary: an open man cannot maintain a reserve at any time; a sincere man will maintain a reserve only as far as it is consistent with truth.

Candour wins much upon those who come in connexion with it; it removes misunderstandings and obviates differences; the want of it occasions suspicion and discontent. Openness gains as many enemies as friends; it requires to be well regulated not to be offensive; there is no mind so pure and disciplined that all the thoughts and feelings which it gives birth to, may or ought to be made publick. Sincerity is an indispensable virtue; the want of it is always mischievous and frequently fatal.

SINCERE, HONEST, TRUE, PLAIN.

Sincere (v. Candid) is here the most comprehensive term; honest (v. Honesty), true, and plain (v. Even) are but modes of sincerity.

Sincerity is a fundamental characteristic of the person; a man is sincere from the conviction of his mind; honesty is the expression of the feeling; it is the dictate of the heart: we look for a sincere friend, and an honest companion;

Rustick mirth goes round,

The simple joke that takes the shepherd's heart,

Easily pleas'd, the long, loud laugh sincere.

THOMSON.

'This book of the Sybils was afterward interpolated by some Christian, who was more zealous than either honest or wise therein.'—PRIDEAUX. Truth is a characteristic of sincerity; for a sincere friend is a true friend: but sincerity is a permanent quality in the character; and truth may be an occasional one: we cannot be sincere without being true, but we may be true without being sincere; 'Poetical ornaments destroy that character of truth and plainness which ought to characterize history.'—REYNOLDS.

Fear not my truth; the moral of my wit
as plain and true.—SHAKESPEARE.

In like manner a sincere man must be plain: since plainness consists in an unvarnished style, the sincere man will always adopt that mode of speech which expresses his sentiments most forcibly; but it is possible for a person to be occasionally plain who does not act from any principle of sincerity.

It is plain, therefore, that sincerity is the habitual principle of communicating our real sentiments; and that the honest, true, and plain are only the modes which it adopts in making the communication; sincerity is therefore altogether a personal quality, but the other terms are applied also to the acts, as an honest confession, a true acknowledgment, and a plain speech.

FRANK, CANDID, INGENUOUS, FREE, OPEN, PLAIN.

Frank, in French franc, German, &c. frank, is connected with the word frech bold, and frei free; candid and open, v. Candid; ingenuous comes from the Latin ingenus, which signifies literally free-born, as distinguished from the liberti, who were afterward made free: hence the term has been employed by a figure of speech to denote nobleness of birth or character. According to Girard, ingenu in French is taken in a bad sense; and Dr. Trusler, in translating his article Sincerité, franchise, naïveté, ingénuité, has erroneously assigned the same office to our word ingenuous; but this, however, in its use has kept true to the original, by being always an epithet of commendation; free is to be found in most of the northern languages under different forms, and is supposed by Adelung to be connected with the preposition from, which denotes a separation or enlargement; plain, v. Apparent, also Evident.

All these terms convey the idea of a readiness to communicate and be communicated with; they are all opposed to concealment, but under different circumstances. The frank man is under no restraint; his thoughts and feelings are both set at ease, and his lips are ever ready to give utterance to the dictates of his heart; he has no reserve: the candid man has nothing to conceal; he speaks without regard to self-interest or any partial motive; he speaks nothing but the truth: the ingenuous man throws off all disguise; he scorns all artifice, and brings every thing to light; he speaks the whole truth. Frankness is acceptable in the general transactions of society; it inspires confidence, and invites communication: candour is of peculiar use in matters of dispute; it serves the purposes of equity, and invites to conciliation: ingenuousness is most wanted when there is most to conceal; it courts favour and kindness by an acknowledgment of that which is against itself.

Frankness is associated with unpolished manners, and frequently appears in men of no rank or education; sailors have commonly a deal of frankness about them: candour is the companion of uprightness; it must be accompanied with some refinement, as it acts in cases where nice discriminations are made: ingenuousness is the companion of a noble and elevated spirit; it exists most frequently in the unsophisticated period of youth.

Frankness displays itself in the outward behaviour; we speak of a frank air and frank manner: candour displays itself in the language which we adopt, and the sentiments we express: we speak of a candid statement, a candid reply: ingenuousness shows itself in all the words, looks, or actions: we speak of an ingenuous countenance, an ingenuous acknowledgment, an ingenuous answer. Frankness and candour may be either habitual or occasional; ingenuousness is a permanent character: a disposition may be frank, or an air of frankness and candour may be assumed for the time; but an ingenuous character remains one and the same.

Frankness is a voluntary effusion of the mind between equals; a man frankly confesses to his friend the state of his affections or circumstances; 'My own private opinion with regard to such recreations (as poetry and music) I have given with all the frankness imaginable.'—STEELE. Candour is a debt paid to justice from one independent being to another; he who is candid is so from the necessity of the case, when a candid man feels himself to have been in an error which affects another, he is impelled to make the only reparation in his power by acknowledging it; 'If you have made any better remarks of your own, communicate them with candour; if not, make use of those I present you with.'—ADDISON. Ingenuousness is the offering of an uncorrupted mind at the shrine of truth; it presupposes an inferiority in outward circumstances, and a motive, if not a direct necessity, for communication; the lad who does not wish to screen himself from punishment by a lie will ingenuously confess his offence; he who does not wish to obtain false applause will ingenuously disclaim his share in the performance which has obtained the applause; 'We see an ingenuous kind of behaviour not only make up for faults committed, but in a manner expiate them in the very commission.'—STEELE.

Free, open, and plain have not so high an office as the first three: free and open may be taken either in a good, bad, or indifferent sense; but seldom in the first than in the two last senses.

The frank, free, and open man all speak without constraint; but the frank man is not impertinent like the free man, nor indiscreet like the open man. The frank man speaks only of what concerns himself; the free man speaks of what concerns others: a frank man may confess his own faults or inadvertencies; the free man corrects those which he sees in another: the frank man opens his heart from the warmth of his nature; the free man opens his mind from the conceit of his temper; and the open man says all he knows and thinks, from the inconsiderate levity of his temper.

A frank man is not frank to all, nor on all occasions; he is frank to his friends, or he is frank in his dealings with others; but the open man lets himself out like a running stream to all who choose to listen, and communicates trivial or important matters with equal eagerness: on the other hand, it is sometimes becoming in one to be free where counsel can be given with advantage and pleasure to the receiver; and it is pleasant to see an open behaviour, particularly in young persons, when contrasted with the odious trait of cunning and reserve;

We cheer the youth to make his own defence,
And freely tell us what he was and whence.

DRYDEN.

'If I have abused your goodness by too much freedom, I hope you will attribute it to the openness of my temper.'—POPE.

Plainness, the last quality to be here noticed, is a virtue which, though of the humbler order, is not to be despised: it is sometimes employed like freedom in the task of giving counsel; but it does not convey the idea of any thing unauthorized either in matter or manner. A free counsellor is more ready to display his own superiority, than to direct the wanderer in his way; he rather aggravates faults, than instructs how to amend them; he seems more like a supercilious enemy than a friendly monitor: the plain man is free from these faults: he speaks plainly but truly; he gives no false colouring to his speech; it is not calculated to offend, and it may serve for improvement: it is the part of a true friend to be plain with another whom he sees in imminent danger. A free speaker is in danger of being hated; a plain dealer must at least be respected; 'Pope hardly drank tea without a stratagem. If at the house of his friends he wanted any accommodation, he was not willing to ask for it in plain terms but would mention it remotely as something convenient.'—JOHNSON.

HEARTY, WARM, SINCERE, CORDIAL.

Hearty, which signifies having the heart in a thing, and warm (v. Fire), express a stronger feeling than sincere; cordial, from cor, signifying according to the heart, is a mixture of the warm and sincere. There are cases in which it may be peculiarly proper to be hearty, as when we are supporting the cause of religion and virtue; there are other cases in which it is peculiarly proper to be warm, as when the affections ought to be roused in favour of our friends; in all cases we ought to be sincere, when we express either a sentiment or a feeling; and it is peculiarly happy to be on terms of cordial regard with those who stand in any close relation to us. The man himself should be hearty; the heart should be warm; the professions sincere; and the reception cordial. It is also possible to speak of a hearty reception, but this conveys the idea of less refinement than cordial;

Yet should some neighbour feel a pain

Just in the parts where I complain,

How many a message would he send,

What hearty prayers that I should mend.—SWIFT.

* Youth is the season of warm and generous emotions.
—BLAIR.

I have not since we parted been at peace,
Nor known one joy sincere.—ROWE.

With a gratitude the most cordial, a good man looks up to that Almighty Benefactor, who aims at no end but the happiness of those whom he blesses.—BLAIR.

INGENUOUS, INGENIOUS.

It would not have been necessary to point out the distinction between these two words, if they had not been confounded in writing, as well as in speaking. Ingenuous, in Latin ingenuus, and ingenious, in Latin ingeniosus, are, either immediately or remotely, both derived from ingigno to be inborn; but the former respects the freedom of the station, and consequent nobleness of the character which is inborn; the latter respects the genius or mental powers which are inborn. Truth is coupled with freedom or nobility of birth; the ingenious, therefore, bespeaks the inborn freedom, by asserting the noblest right, and following the noblest impulse, of human nature, namely, that of speaking the truth: genius is altogether a natural endowment, that is born with us, independent of external circumstances; the ingenious man, therefore, displays his powers as occasion may offer. We love the ingenuous character, on account of the qualities of his heart; we admire the ingenious man on account of the endowments of his mind. One is ingenuous as a man; or ingenious as an author: a man confesses an action ingenuously; he defends it ingeniously; 'Compare the ingenuous plainness to virtuous counsels which is in youth, to the confirmed obstinacy in an old sinner.'
—SOUTH.

Ingenious to their ruin, every age

Improves the arts and instruments of rage.

WALLER.

TO APPRAISE, OR APPRECIATE, ESTIMATE, ESTEEM.

Appraise, appreciate, from apprecio and appreciatus, participle of apprecio, compounded of ap or ad and pretium a price, signify to set a price or value on a thing; estimate comes from estimatus, participle of estimo to value; to esteem is a variation of estimate.

Appraise and appreciate are used in precisely the same sense for setting a value on any thing according to relative circumstances; but the one is used in the proper, and the other in the figurative sense: a sworn appraiser appraises goods according to the condition of the article and its saleable property; the characters of men are appreciated by others when their good and bad qualities are justly put in a balance; 'To the finishing of his course, let every one direct his eye; and let him now appreciate life according to the value it will be found to have when summed up at the close.'
—BLAIR. To estimate a thing is to get the sum of its value by calculation; to esteem any thing is to judge its actual and intrinsic value.

Estimate is used either in a proper or a figurative acceptance; esteem only in a moral sense: the expense of an undertaking, losses by fire, gains by trade, are estimated at a certain sum; the estimate may be too high or too low; 'The extent of the trade of the Greeks, how highly soever it may have been estimated in ancient times, was in proportion to the low condition of their marine.'—ROBERTSON The moral worth of men is often estimated above or below the reality according to the particular bias of the estimator; but there are individuals of such an unquestionable worth that they need only be known in order to be esteemed; 'If a lawyer were to be esteemed only as he uses his parts in contending for justice, and were immediately despicable when he appeared in a cause which he could not but know was an unjust one, how honourable would his character be?'—STEELE.

TO ESTIMATE, COMPUTE, RATE.

Estimate has the same signification as in the preceding article; compute, in Latin computo, or con and puto to think, signifies to put together in one's mind; rate, in Latin ratus, participle of reor to think, signifies to weigh in the mind.

All these terms mark the mental operation by which the sum, amount, or value of things is obtained: to estimate is to obtain the aggregate sum in one's mind, either by an immediate or a progressive act; to compute is to obtain the sum by the gradual process of putting together items; to rate is to fix the relative value in one's mind by deduction and comparison: a builder estimates the expense of building a house on a given plan; a proprietor of houses computes the probable diminution in the value of his property in consequence of wear and tear; the surveyor rates the present value of lands or houses.

In the moral acceptance they bear the same analogy to each other: some men are apt to estimate the adventitious privileges of birth or rank too high; 'To those who have skill to estimate the excellence and difficulty of this great work (Pope's translation of Homer) it must be very desirable to know how it was performed.'—JOHNSON. It would be a useful occupation for men to compute the loss they sustain by the idle waste of time on the one hand, and its necessarily unprofitable consumption on the other; 'From the age of sixteen the life of Pope, as an author, may be computed.'—JOHNSON. He who rates his abilities too high is in danger of despising the means which are essential to secure success; and he who rates them too low is apt to neglect the means, from despair of success;

Sooner we learn and seldomer forget

What critics scorn, than what they highly rate.

HUGHES

TO CALCULATE, COMPUTE, RECKON, COUNT, OR ACCOUNT, NUMBER.

Calculate, in Latin calculatus, participle of calculus comes from calculus, Greek χάλιξ a pebble; because the Greeks gave their votes, and the Romans made out their accounts, by little stones; hence it denotes the action itself of reckoning; compute signifies the same as in the preceding article; reckon, in Saxon reccan, Dutch rekenen, German rechnen, is not improbably derived from row, in Dutch reck, because stringing of things in a row was formerly, as it is now sometimes, the ordinary mode of reckoning; count, in French compter, is but a contraction of computer, but signifies a forming into an account, or setting down in an account; to number signifies literally to put into a number.

These words indicate the means by which we arrive at a certain result in regard to quantity.

To calculate is the generic term, the rest are specific: * computation and reckoning are branches of calculation, or an application of those operations to the objects of which a result is sought: to calculate comprehends arithmetical operations in general, or particular applications of the science of numbers, in order to obtain a certain point of knowledge: to compute is to combine certain given numbers in order to learn the grand result: to reckon is to enumerate and set down things in the detail: to count is to add up the individual items contained in many different parts, in order to determine the quantity.

Calculation particularly respects the operation itself compute respects the gross sum; reckon and count refer to the details. To calculate denotes any numerical operation in general, but in its limited sense; it is the abstract science of figures used by mathematicians and philosophers; computation is a numerical estimate, a simple species of calculation used by historians, chronologists, and financial speculators, in drawing great results from complex sources: reckon and count are still simpler species of calculation, applicable to the ordinary business of life, and employed by tradesmen, mechanicks, and people in general; reckoning and counting were the first efforts made by men in acquiring a knowledge of number, quantity, or degree.

* Vide Roubaud: "Calculer, supputer, compter"

The astronomer calculates the return of the stars; the geometrician makes algebraic calculations. The Barilians, Indian merchants, make prodigious calculations in an instant on their thumb nails, doubtless after the manner of algebra, by signs, which the calculator employs as he pleases. The chronologist computes the times of particular events, by comparing them with those of other known events. Many persons have attempted from the prophecies to make a computation as to the probable time of the millennium: financiers compute the produce of a tax according to the measure and circumstances of its imposition. At every new consulate the Romans used to drive a nail into the wall of the Capitol, by which they reckoned the length of time that their state had been erected; tradesmen reckon their profits and losses. Children begin by counting on their fingers, one, two, three.

An almanack is made by calculation, computation, and reckoning. The rising and setting of the heavenly bodies are calculated; from given astronomical tables is computed the moment on which any celestial phenomenon may return; and by reckoning are determined the days on which holidays, or other periodical events fall.

Buffon, in his moral arithmetick, has calculated tables as guides to direct our judgements in different situations, where we have only vague probability, on which to draw our conclusions. By this we have only to compute what the fairest gain may cost us; how much we must lose in advance from the most favourable lottery; how much our hopes impose upon us, our cupidity cheats us, and our habits injure us.

Calculate and reckon are employed in a figurative sense; compute and count in an extended application of the same sense.

Calculate, reckon, and count respect mostly the future; compute the past.

Calculate is rather a conjectural deduction from what is, as to what may be; computation is a rational estimate of what has been, from what is; reckoning is a conclusive conviction, a complacent assurance that a thing will happen; counting indicates an expectation. We calculate on a gain; compute any loss sustained, or the amount of any mischief done; we reckon on a promised pleasure; we count the hours and minutes until the time of enjoyment arrives.

A spirit of calculation arises from the cupidity engendered by trade; it narrows the mind to the mere prospect of accumulation and self-interest; 'In this bank of fame, by an exact calculation, and the rules of political arithmetick, I have allotted ten hundred thousand shares; five hundred thousand of which is the due of the general; two hundred thousand I assign to the general officers; and two hundred thousand more to all the commissioned officers, from the colonels to ensigns; the remaining hundred thousand must be distributed among the non-commissioned officers and private men: according to which computation, I first sergeant Hall is to have one share and a fraction of two-fifths.'—STEELE. Computations are inaccurate that are not founded upon exact numerical calculations; 'The time we live ought not to be computed by the number of years, but by the use that has been made of it.'—ADDISON. Inconsiderate people are apt to reckon on things that are very uncertain, and then lay up to themselves a store of disappointments; 'Men reckon themselves possessed of what their genius inclines them to, and so bend all their ambition to excel in what is out of their reach.'—SPECTATOR. Children who are uneasy at school count the hours, minutes, and moments for their return home;

The vicious count their years, virtuous their acts.

JOHNSON.

Those who have experienced the instability of human affairs, will never calculate on an hour's enjoyment.

beyond the moment of existence. It is difficult to compute the loss which an army sustains upon being defeated, especially if it be obliged to make a long retreat. Those who know the human heart will never reckon on the assistance of professed friends in the hour of adversity. A mind that is ill at ease seeks a resource and amusement in counting the moments as they fly; but this is often an unhappy delusion that only adds to the bitterness of sorrow.

To reckon, count or account, and number are very nearly allied to each other in the sense of esteeming or giving to any object a place in one's account or reckoning; they differ mostly in the application, reckoning being applied to more familiar objects than the others, which are only employed in the grave style; 'Reckoning themselves all saved by Mary's attachment to Bothwell from the engagements which they had come under when she yielded herself a prisoner, they carried her next evening, under a strong guard, to the castle of Lochleven.'—ROBERTSON. 'Applause and admiration are by no means to be counted among the necessities of life.'—JOHNSON. 'There is no bishop of the Church of England but accounts it his interest, as well as his duty, to comply with this precept of the Apostle Paul to Titus, "These things teach and exhort."'—SOUTH. 'He whose mind never pauses from the remembrance of his own sufferings, may justly be numbered among the most miserable of human beings.'—JOHNSON.

ACCOUNT, RECKONING, BILL.

Account, compounded of ac or ad and count, signifies to count to a person, or for a thing; an account is the thing so counted: reckoning, from the verb to reckon, signifies the thing reckoned up: bill, in Saxon byla, in all probability comes from the Swedish byla, to build, signifying a written contract for building vessels, which in German is still called a baulbrief; hence it has been employed to express various kinds of written documents. These words, which are very similar in signification, may frequently be substituted for one another.

Account is the generic, the others the specific terms: a reckoning and bill is an account, though not always vice versa: account expresses the details, with the sum of them counted up; reckoning implies the register and rotation of the things to be reckoned up: bill denotes the details, with their particular charges. An account should be correct, containing neither more nor less than is proper; a reckoning should be explicit, leaving nothing unnoticed as to dates and names; a bill should be fair.

We speak of keeping an account, of coming to a reckoning, of sending in a bill. Customers have an account with their tradespeople; masters have a reckoning with their workpeople; tradesmen send in their bills at stated periods.

Account, from the extensive use of the term, is applicable to every thing that is noted down; the particulars of which are considered worthy of notice individually or collectively: merchants keep their accounts; an account is taken at the Custom House of all that goes in and out of the kingdom; an account is taken of all transactions, of the weather, of natural phenomena, and whatever is remarkable;

At many times I brought in my accounts,
Laid them before you; you would throw them off,
And say you found them in my honesty.

SHAKESPEARE.

Reckoning, as a particular term, is more partial in its use: it is mostly confined to the dealings of men with one another; in which sense it is superseded by the preceding term, and now serves to express only an explanatory enumeration, which may be either verbal or written; 'Merchant with some rudeness demanded a room, and was told that there was a good fire in the next parlour, which the company were about to leave, being then paying their reckoning.'—JOHNSON. Bill, as implying something charged or engaged, is used not only in a mercantile but a legal sense: hence we speak of a bill of lading; a bill of parcels; a bill of exchange; a bill of indictment, or a bill in parliament; 'Ordinary expense ought to be limited by a man's estate, and ordered to the best, that the bills may be less than the estimation abroad.'—BACON.

CALENDAR, ALMANACK, EPHEMERIS.

Calendar comes from calendæ, the Roman name for the first days of every month; almanack, that is al and mana, signifies properly the reckoning or thing reckoned, from the Arabic mana and Hebrew מנה to reckon; ephemeris, in Greek ἐφημερίς, from ἐμ and ἡμερα the day, implies that which happens by the day.

These terms denote a date-book: but the calendar is a book which registers events under every month; the almanack is a book which registers times, or the divisions of the year; and an ephemeris is a book which registers the planetary movements every day. An almanack may be a calendar, and an ephemeris may be both an almanack and a calendar; but every almanack is not a calendar, nor every calendar an almanack. The Gardener's calendar is not an almanack, and sheet almanacks are seldom calendars; likewise the nautical ephemeris may serve as an almanack, although not as a calendar; 'He was sitting upon the ground upon a little straw, in the farthest corner of his dungeon, which was alternately his chair and bed: a little calendar of small sticks were laid at the head, notched all over with the dismal nights and days he had passed there.'—STERNE. 'When the reformers were purging the calendar of legions of visionary saints, they took due care to defend the niches of real martyrs from profanation. They preserved the holy festivals which had been consecrated for many ages to the great luminaries of the church, and at once paid proper observance to the memory of the good, and fell in with the proper humour of the vulgar, which loves to rejoice and mourn at the discretion of the almanack.'—WALPOLE. 'That two or three suns or moons appear in any man's life or reign, it is not worth the wonder; but that the same should fall out at a remarkable time or point of some decisive action, that those two should make but one line in the book of fate, and stand together in the great ephemerides of God, besides the philosophical assignment of the cause, it may admit a Christian apprehension in the signal.'—BROWN'S VULGAR ERRORS.

COUPLE, BRACE, PAIR.

Couple, in French couple, comes from the Latin copula to join or tie together, copula, in Hebrew ככל a rope or a shackle, signifying things tied together; and as two things are with most convenience bound together, it has by custom been confined to this number: brace, from the French bras arm, signifies things locked together after the manner of the folded arms, which on that account are confined to the number of two: pair, in French paire, Latin par equal, signifies things that are equal, which can with propriety be said only of two things with regard to each other.

From the above illustration of these terms, it is clear that the number of two, which is included in all them, is, with regard to the first, entirely arbitrary; of that with regard to the second, it arises from the nature of the junction; and with regard to the third, it arises altogether from the nature of the objects: couples and braces are made by coupling and bracing; pairs are either so of themselves, or are made so by others: couples and braces always require a junction in order to make them complete; pairs require similarity only to make them what they are: couples are joined by a foreign tie; braces are produced by a peculiar mode of junction with the objects themselves.

Couple and pair are said of persons or things; brace in particular cases only of animals or things, except in the burlesque style, where it may be applied to persons. When used for persons, the word couple has relation to the marriage tie; the word pair to the association or the moral union: the former term is therefore more appropriate when speaking of those who are soon to be married, or have just entered that state; the latter when speaking of those who are already fixed in that state: most couples that are joined together are equally happy in prospect, but not so in the completion of their wishes: it is the lot of comparatively very few to claim the title of the happy pair; 'Scarce any couple comes together, but their nuptials are declared in the newspaper with encomiums on each party.'—JOHNSON.

Your fortune, happy pair, already made,
Leaves you no farther wish.—DRYDEN.

The term pair may be used in the burlesque style for any two persons allied to each other by similarity of sentiment or otherwise;

Dear Sheridan! a gentle pair
Of Gaulstown lads (for such they are),
Besides a brace of grave divines,
Adore the smoothness of your lines.—SWIFT

When used for things, couple is promiscuously employed in familiar discourse for any two things put together; 'In the midst of these sorrows which I had in my heart, methought there passed by me a couple of coaches with purple liveries.'—ADDISON. Brace is used by sportsmen for birds which are shot, and supposed to be locked together; by sailors for a part of their tackling, which is folded crosswise; as also in common life for an article of convenience crossed in a singular way, which serves to keep the dress of men in its proper place;

First hunter then, pursu'd a gentle brace,
Goodliest of all the forest, hart and hind.—MILTON.

Pair is of course restricted in its application to such objects only as are really paired;

Six wings he wore, to shade
His lineaments divine; the pair that clad
Each shoulder broad came mantling o'er his breast
With regal ornament.—MILTON.

RATE, PROPORTION, RATIO.

Rate signifies the thing rated, or the measure at which it is rated; ratio has the same original meaning as rate; proportion, v. Proportionate.

Rate and ratio are in sense species of proportion; that is, they are supposed or estimated proportions, in distinction from proportions that lie in the nature of things. The first term, rate, is employed in ordinary concerns; a person receives a certain sum weekly at the rate of a certain sum yearly; 'At Ephesus and Athens, Anthony lived at his usual rate in all manner of luxury.'—PRIDEAUX. Ratio is applied only to numbers and calculations; as two is to four, so is four to eight, and eight to sixteen; the ratio in this case being double; 'The rate of interest (to lenders) is generally in a compound ratio formed out of the inconvenience and the hazard.'—BLACKSTONE. Proportion is employed in matters of science, and in all cases where the two more specific terms are not admissible; the beauty of an edifice depends upon observing the doctrine of proportions; in the disposing of soldiers a certain regard must be had to proportion in the height and size of the men; 'Repentance cannot be effectual but as it bears some proportion to sin.'—SOUTH.

PROPORTIONATE, COMMENSURATE, ADEQUATE.

Proportionate, from the Latin proportio, compounded of pro and portio, signifies having a portion suitable to, or in agreement with, some other object; commensurate, from the Latin communis or commetior signifies measuring in accordance with some other thing, being suitable in measure to something else; adequate, in Latin adequatus, participle of adequo signifies made level with some other body.

Proportionate is here a term of general use; the others are particular terms, employed in a similar sense, in regard to particular objects: that is proportionate which rises as a thing rises, and falls as a thing falls; that is commensurate which is made to rise to the same measure or degree; that is adequate which is made to come up to the height of another thing. Proportionate is employed either in the proper or improper sense; in all recipes and prescriptions of every kind, proportionate quantities must always be taken; when the task increases in difficulty and complication, a proportionate degree of labour and talent must be employed upon it; 'All envy is proportionate to desire.'—JOHNSON. Commensurate and adequate are employed only in the moral sense; the former in regard to matters of distribution, the latter in regard to the equalizing of powers: a person's recompense should in some measure be commensurate with his labour and deserts; 'Where the matter is not commensurate to the words, all speaking is but tautology.'—SOUTH. A person's resources should be adequate to the work he is engaged in, 'Outward actions are not adequate expressions of our virtues.'—ADDISON.

DISPARITY, INEQUALITY.

Disparity, from dis and par, in Greek παρά with or by, signifies an unfitness of objects to be by one another; inequality, from the Latin æquus even, signifies having no regularity.

Disparity applies to two or more objects which should meet or stand in coalition with each other; inequality is applicable to objects that are compared with each other: the disparity of age, situation, and circumstances, is to be considered with regard to persons entering into a matrimonial connexion; the inequality in the portion of labour which is to be performed by two persons, is a ground for the inequality of their recompense: there is a great inequality in the chance of success, where there is a disparity of acquisitions in rival candidates: the disparity between David and Goliath was such as to render the success of the former more strikingly miraculous; 'Between Elihu and the rest of Job's familiars, the greatest disparity was but in years.'—HOOKER. The inequality in the conditions of men is not attended with a corresponding inequality in their happiness; 'Inequality of behaviour, either in prosperity or adversity, are alike ungraceful in man that is born to die.'—STEELE.

SYMMETRY, PROPORTION.

Symmetry, in Latin symmetria, Greek συμμετρία, from σύν and μέτρον, signifies a measure that accords; proportion, in Latin proportio, compounded of pro and portio, signifies every portion or part according with the other, or with the whole.

The signification of these terms is obviously the same, namely, a due admeasurement of the parts to each other and to the whole: but symmetry seems to convey the idea of a beautiful adaptation; and proportion is applied in general to every thing which admits of dimensions and an adaptation of the parts: hence we speak of symmetry of feature, or symmetry abstractly;

She by whose lines proportion should be Examin'd, measure of all symmetry;
Whom had that ancient seer, who thought souls made
Of harmony, he would at next have said
That harmony was she.—DONNE.

But we say proportion of limbs, the proportion of the head to the body; 'The inventors of stuffed hips had a better eye for due proportion than to add to a redundancy, because in some cases it was convenient to fill up a vacuum.'—CUMBERLAND.

EQUAL, EVEN, EQUABLE, LIKE, OR ALIKE, UNIFORM.

Equal, in Latin æqualis, comes from æquus, and probably the Greek ἴσος, similis, like; even is in Saxon efen, German eben, Sweden efwen, jafn, or aem, Greek ὅλος like; equable, in Latin equabilis, signifies susceptible of equality; like, in Dutch lijk, Saxon gelig, German gleich, Gothic tholick, Latin talis, Greek ὅμοιος such as; uniform, compounded of unus one and forma form, bespeaks its own meaning.

All these epithets are opposed to difference. Equal is said of degree, quantity, number, and dimensions, as equal in years, of an equal age, an equal height: even is said of the surface and position of bodies; a board is made even with another board; the floor or the ground is even: like is said of accidental qualities in things, as alike in colour or in feature: uniform is said of things only as to their fitness to correspond; those which are unlike in colour, shape, or make, or not uniform, cannot be made to match as pairs: equable is used only in the moral acceptation, in which all the others are likewise employed.

As moral qualities admit of degree, they admit of equality; justice is dealt out in equal portions to the rich and the poor; God looks with an equal eye on all mankind. Some men are equal to others in external circumstances; 'Equality is the life of conversation, and he is as much out who assumes to himself any part above another, as he who considers himself below the rest of society'—STEELE. As the natural path is rendered uneven by high and low ground, so the evenness of the temper, in the figurative sense, is destroyed by changes of humour, by elevations and depressions of the spirits; 'Good-nature is insufficient (in the marriage state) unless it be steady and uniform, and accompanied with an evenness of temper.'—SPECTATOR. The equability of the mind is hurt by the vicissitudes of life, from prosperous to adverse; 'There is also moderation in toleration of fortune which of Tully is called equabilitie.'—SIR T. ELYOT. This term may also be applied to motion, as the equable motion of the planets; and figuratively to the style; 'In Swift's works is found an equable tenour of easy language, which rather trickles than flows.'—JOHNSON. Even and equable are applied to the same mind in relation to itself; like or alike is used to the minds of two or more: hence we say they are alike in disposition, in sentiment, in wishes, &c.;

E'en now as familiar as in life he came;
Alas! how diff'rent, yet how like the same.—POPE.

Uniform is applied to the temper, habits, character, or conduct; hence a man is said to preserve a uniformity of behaviour towards those whom he commands. The term may also be applied to the modes which may be adopted by men in society; 'The only doubt is about the manner of their unity, how far churches are bound to be uniform in their ceremonies, and what way they ought to take for that purpose.'—HOOKER. Friendship requires that the parties be equal in station, alike in mind, and uniform in their conduct: wisdom points out to us an even tenour of life, from which we cannot depart either to the right or to the left, without disturbing our peace; it is one of her maxims that we should not lose the equability of our temper under the most trying circumstances.

FLAT, LEVEL.

Flat, in German flach, is connected with platt broad, and that with the Latin latus, and Greek πλάτος; level, in all probability from libella and libra a balance, signifies the evenness of a balance.

Flat is said of a thing with regard to itself; it is opposed to the round or protuberant; level as it respects another; the former is opposed to the uneven: a country is flat which has no elevation; a wall is level with the roof of a house when it rises to the height of the roof; 'A flat can hardly look well on paper.'—COUNT-ESS OF HERTFORD.

At that black hour, which gen'ral horror sheds
On the low level of the inglorious throng.—YOUNG

EVEN, SMOOTH, LEVEL, PLAIN.

Even (v. Equal) and smooth, which is in all probability connected with smear, are both opposed to roughness; but that which is even is free only from great roughnesses or irregularities; that which is smooth is free from every degree of roughness, however small: a board is even which has no knots or holes; it is not smooth unless its surface be an entire plane: the ground is said to be even, but not smooth; the sky is smooth, but not even; 'When we look at a naked wall, from the evenness of the object the eye runs along its whole space, and arrives quickly at its termination.'—BURKE. 'The effects of a rugged and broken surface seem stronger than where it is smooth and polished.'—BURKE.

Even is to level (v. Flat), when applied to the ground, what smooth is to even: the even is free from protuberances and depressions on its exterior surface; the level is free from rises or falls: a path is said to be even; a meadow is level: ice may be level, though it is not even; a walk up the side of a hill may be even, although the hill itself is the reverse of a level: the even is said of that which unites and forms one uninterrupted surface; but the level is said of things which are at a distance from each other, and are discovered by the eye to be in a parallel line: hence the floor of a room is even with regard to itself; it is level with that of another room;

The top is level, an offensive seat
Of war.—DRYDEN

'A blind man would never be able to imagine how the several prominences and depressions of a human body could be shown on a plain piece of canvass that has on it no unevenness."—ADDISON.

Evenness respects the surface of bodies; plainness respects the direction of bodies and their freedom from external obstructions: a path is even which has no indentures or footmarks; a path is plain which is not stopped up or interrupted by wood, water, or any other thing intervening.

When applied figuratively, these words preserve their analogy: an even temper is secured from all violent changes of humour; a smooth speech is divested of every thing which can ruffle the temper of others: but the former is always taken in a good sense; and the latter mostly in a bad sense, as evincing an illicit design or a purpose to deceive; 'A man who lives in a state of vice and impotence can have no title to that evenness and tranquillity of mind which is the health of the soul.'—ADDISON.

This smooth discourse and mild behaviour oft Conceal a traitor.—ADDISON.

A plain speech, on the other hand, is divested of every thing obscure or figurative, and is consequently a speech free from disguise and easy to be understood;

Express thyself in plain, not doubtful, words,
That ground for quarrels or disputes affords.

DENHAM.

Even and level are applied to conduct or condition; the former as regards ourselves; the latter as regards others: he who adopts an even course of conduct is in no danger of putting himself upon a level with those who are otherwise his inferiours; 'Falsehood turns all above us into tyranny and barbarity; and all of the same level with us into discord.'—SOUTH.

ODD, UNEVEN.

Odd, probably a variation from add, seems to be a mode of the uneven; both are opposed to the even; but odd is only said of that which has no fellow; the uneven is said of that which does not square or come to an even point: of numbers we say that they are either odd or uneven; but of gloves, shoes, and every thing which is made to correspond, we say that they are odd, when they are single; but that they are uneven when they are not exactly alike: in like manner a plank is uneven which has an unequal surface, or disproportionate dimensions; but a piece of wood is odd which will not match nor suit with any other piece.

VALUE, WORTH, RATE, PRICE.

Value, from the Latin valere to be strong, respects those essential qualities of a thing which constitute its strength; worth, in German worth, from währen to perceive, signifies that good which is experienced or felt to exist in a thing; rate signifies the same as under the article Rate, proportion; price, in Latin pretium, from the Greek πράσσω to sell, signifies what a thing is sold for.

Value is a general and indefinite term applied to whatever is really good or conceived as such in a thing; the worth is that good only which is conceived or known as such. The value therefore of a thing is as variable as the humours and circumstances of men; it may be nothing or something very great in the same object at the same time in the eyes of different men;

Life has no value as an end, but means:
An end deplorable! A means divine.—YOUNG.

The worth is however that value which is acknowledged; it is therefore something more fixed and permanent: we speak of the value of external objects which are determined by taste; but the worth of things as determined by rule. The value of a book that is out of print is fluctuating and uncertain; but its real worth may not be more than what it would fetch for waste paper;

Pay

No moment, but in purchase of its worth;
And what its worth ask death-beds.—YOUNG.

The rate and price are the measures of that value or worth; the former in a general, the latter in a particular application to mercantile transactions. Whatever we give in exchange for another thing, whether according to a definite or an indefinite estimation, that is said to be done at a certain rate; thus we purchase pleasure at a dear rate, when it is at the expense of our health. 'If you will take my humour as it runs, you shall have hearty thanks into the bargain, for taking it off at such a rate.'—EARL OF SHAFTESBURY. Price is the rate of exchange estimated by coin or any other medium; hence price is a fixed rate, and may be figuratively applied in that sense to moral objects; as when health is expressly sacrificed to pleasure, it may be termed the price of pleasure;

The soul's high price
Is writ in all the conduct of the skies.—YOUNG.

TO VALUE, PRIZE, ESTEEM.

To value is in the literal sense to fix the real value of a thing; to prize, signifying to fix a price, and esteem (v. Esteem), are both modes of valuing. In the extended sense, to value may mean to ascertain the relative or supposed value of a thing: in this sense men value gold above silver, or an appraiser values goods. To value may either be applied to material or spiritual subjects, to corporeal or mental actions: prize and esteem are taken only as mental actions; the former in reference to sensible or moral objects, the latter only to moral objects: we may value books according to their market price, or we may value them according to their contents; we prize books only for their contents, in which sense prize is a much stronger term than value; we also prize men for their usefulness to society;

The prize, the beauteous prize, I will resign,
So dearly valu'd, and so justly mine.—POPE.

We esteem men for their moral characters; 'Nothing makes women esteemed by the opposite sex more than chastity; whether it be that we always prize those most who are hardest to come at, or that nothing besides chastity, with its collateral attendants, fidelity and constancy, gives a man a property in the person he loves.'—ADDISON.

COST, EXPENSE, PRICE, CHARGE.

Cost, in German kost or kosten, from the Latin gustare to taste, signifies originally support, and by an extended sense what is given for support; expense is compounded of ex and pense, in Latin pensus participle of pendo to pay, signifying the thing paid or given out; price, from the Latin pretium, and the Greek πράσσω to sell, signifies the thing given for what is bought; charge, from to charge, signifies the thing laid on as a charge.

The cost is what a thing costs or occasions to be laid out; the expense is that which is actually laid out; the price is that which a thing may fetch or cause to be laid out; the charge is that which is required to be laid out. As a cost commonly comprehends an expense, the terms are on various occasions used indifferently for each other: we speak of counting the cost or counting the expense of doing any thing; at a great cost or at a great expense: on the other hand, of venturing to do a thing to one's cost, of growing wise at other people's expense.

The cost and the price have respect to the thing and its supposed value; the expense and the charge depend on the option of the persons. The cost of a thing must precede the price, and the expense must succeed the charge; we can never set a price on any thing until we have ascertained what it has cost us; nor can we know or defray the expense until the charge be made. There may, however, frequently be a price where there is no cost, and vice versâ; there may also be an expense where there is no charge; but there cannot be a charge without an expense; 'Would a man build for eternity, that is, in other words, would he be saved, let him consider with himself what charges he is willing to be at that he may be so.'—SOUTH. Costs in suit often exceed in value and amount the thing contended for: the price of things depends on their relative value in the eyes of others: what costs nothing sometimes fetches a high price; and other things cannot obtain a price equal to the first cost. Expenses vary with modes of living and men's desires; whoever wants much, or wants that which is not easily obtained, will have many expenses to defray; when the charges are exorbitant the expenses must necessarily bear a proportion.

Between the epithets costly and expensive there is the same distinction. Whatever is costly is naturally expensive, but not vice versâ. Articles of furniture, of luxury, or indulgence, are costly, either from their variety or their intrinsic value; every thing is expensive which is attended with much expense, whether of little or great value. Jewels are costly; travelling is expensive. The costly treasures of the East are imported into Europe for the gratification of those who cannot be contented with the produce of their native soil: those who indulge themselves in expensive pleasures often lay up in store for themselves much sorrow and repentance in the time to come.

In the moral acceptance, the attainment of an object is said to cost much pains;

The real patriot bears his private wrongs,
Rather than right them at the publick cost,
BELLER.

A thing is persisted in at the expense of health, of honour, or of life; 'If ease and politeness be only attainable at the expense of sincerity in the men, and chastity in the women, I flatter myself there are few of my readers who would not think the purchase made at too high a price.'—ABERCROMBY.

UNWORTHY, WORTHLESS.

Unworthy is a term of less reproach than worthless; for the former signifies not to be worthy of praise or honour; the latter signifies to be without any worth, and consequently in the fullest sense bad. It may be a mark of modesty or humility to say that I am an unworthy partaker of your kindness; but it would be folly and extravagance to say, that I am a worthless partaker of your kindness. There are many unworthy members in every religious community; but every society that is conducted upon proper principles will take care to exclude worthless members. In regard to one another we are often unworthy of the distinctions or privileges we enjoy; in regard to our Maker we are all unworthy of his goodness, for we are all worthless in his eyes;

Since in dark sorrow I my days did spend,
Till now disdaining his unworthy end,
DENHAM.

'The school of Socrates was at one time deserted by every body, except Æschines the parasite of the tyrant Dionysius, and the most worthless man living.'—CUMBERLAND.

VALUABLE, PRECIOUS, COSTLY.

Valuable signifies fit to be valued; precious, having a high price; costly, costing much money. Valuable expresses directly the idea of value; precious and costly express the same idea indirectly: on the other hand, that which is valuable is only said to be fit or deserving of value; but precious and costly denote that which is highly valuable, according to the ordinary measure of valuing objects, that is, by the price they bear: hence, the two latter express the idea much more strongly than the former. A book is valuable according to its contents, or according to the estimate which men set upon it, either individually or collectively; 'What an absurd thing it is to pass over all the valuable parts of a man, and fix our attention on his infirmities.'—ADDISON. 'The Bible is the only precious book in the world that has intrinsic value, that is, set above all price;' 'It is no improper comparison that a thankful heart is like a box of precious ointment.'—HOWELL. 'There are many costly things, which are only valuable to the individuals who are disposed to expend money upon them; 'Christ is sometimes pleased to make the profession of himself costly.'—SOUTH.

INTRINSICK, REAL, GENUINE, NATIVE.

Intrinsic, in Latin intrinsecus, signifies on the inside, that is, lying in the thing itself; real, from the Latin res, signifies belonging to the very thing: genuine, in Latin genuinus from geno or gigno to bring forth, signifies actually brought forth, or springing out of a thing; native, in Latin nativus and natus born, signifies actually born, or arising from a thing.

The value of a thing is either intrinsic or real: but the intrinsic value is said in regard to its extrinsic value; the real value in regard to the artificial: the intrinsic value of a book is that which it will fetch when sold in a regular way, in opposition to the extrinsic value, as being the gift of a friend, a particular edition, or a particular type: the real value of a book, in the proper sense, lies in the fineness of the paper, the costliness of its binding; and, in the improper sense, it lies in the excellence of its contents, in opposition to the artificial value which it acquires in the minds of bibliomaniacs from being a scarce edition; 'Men, however distinguished by external accidents or intrinsic qualities, have all the same wants, the same pains, and, as far as the senses are consulted, the same pleasures.'—JOHNSON. 'You have settled, by an economy as perverted as the policy, two establishments of government, one real, the other fictitious.'—BURKE.

The worth of a man is either genuine or native: the genuine worth of a man lies in the excellence of his moral character, as opposed to his adventitious worth, which he acquires from the possession of wealth, power, and dignity; his native worth is that which is inborn in him, and natural, in opposition to the meretricious and borrowed worth which he may derive from his situation, his talent, or his efforts to please;

His genuine and less guilty wealth 'I explore.
Search not his bottom, but survey his shore.
DENHAM.

'How lovely does the human mind appear in its native purity.'—EARL OF CHATHAM.

An accurate observer will always discriminate between the intrinsic and extrinsic value of every thing; a wise man will always appreciate things according to their real value; the most depraved man will sometimes be sensible of genuine worth when it displays itself; it is always pleasant to meet with those unsophisticated characters whose native excellence shines forth in all their words, looks, and actions

EXTRANEOUS, EXTRINSICK, FOREIGN.

Extraneous, compounded of extraneus, or ex and terra, signifies out of the land, not belonging to it; extrinsic, in Latin extrinsecus, compounded of extra and secus, signifies outward, external; foreign, from the Latin foris out of doors, signifies not belonging to the family, tribe, or people.

The extraneous is that which forms no necessary or natural part of any thing: the extrinsic is that which forms a part or has a connexion, but only in an indirect form; it is not an inherent or component part: the foreign is that which forms no part whatever, and has no kind of connexion. A work is said to contain extraneous matter, which contains much matter not necessarily belonging to, or illustrative of the subject. A work is said to have extrinsic merit when it borrows its value from local circumstances, in distinction from the intrinsic merit, or that which lies in the contents.

Extraneous and extrinsic have a general and abstract sense; but foreign has a particular signification; they always pass over to some object either expressed or understood: hence we say extraneous ideas, or extrinsic worth; but that a particular mode of acting is foreign to the general plan pursued. Anecdotes of private individuals would be extraneous matter in a general history; 'That which makes me believe is something extraneous to the thing that I believe.'—LOCKE. The respect and credit which men gain from their fellow-citizens by an adherence to rectitude is the extrinsic advantage of virtue, in distinction from the peace of a good conscience and the favour of God, which are its intrinsic advantages; 'Affluence and power are advantages extrinsic and adventitious.'—JOHNSON. It is foreign to the purpose of one who is making an abridgment of a work, to enter into details in any particular part;

For loveliness
Needs not the aid of foreign ornaments;
But is when unadorn'd adorn'd the most.
THOMSON.

DESERT, MERIT, WORTH.

Desert, from deserve, in Latin deservio, signifies to do service or be serviceable; merit, in Latin meritus, participle of mereor, comes from the Greek melos to distribute, because merit serves as a rule for distributing or apportioning; worth, in German worth, is connected with würde dignity, and bürde a burden, because one bears worth as a thing attached to the person.

Desert is taken for that which is good or bad; merit for that which is good only. We deserve praise or blame; we merit a reward. The desert consists in the action, work, or service performed; the merit has regard to the character of the agent or the nature of the action. The person does not deserve the recompense until he has performed the service; he does not merit approbation if he has not done his part well.

Deserve is a term of ordinary import; merit applies to objects of greater moment: the former includes matters of personal and physical gratification; the latter those altogether of an intellectual nature. Children are always acting so as to deserve either reproof or commendation, reward or punishment;

The beauteous champion views with marks of fear,
Smit with a conscious sense, retires behind,
And shuns the fate he well deserv'd to find.—POPE.

Candidates for publick applause or honours conceive they have frequent occasion to complain that they are not treated according to their merits;

Praise from a friend or censure from a foe
Are lost on hearers that our merits know.—POPE.

Criminals cannot always be punished according to their deserts; a noble mind is not contented with barely obtaining, it seeks to merit what it obtains.

The idea of value, which is prominent in the signification of the term merit, renders it closely allied to that of worth. The man of merit looks to the advantages which shall accrue to himself; the man of worth contented with the consciousness of what he possesses in himself: merit respects the attainments or qualifications of a man; worth respects his moral qualities only. It is possible therefore for a man to have great merit and little or no worth. He who has great powers, and uses them for the advantage of himself or others, is a man of merit;

She valued nothing less
Than titles, figures, shape, and dress;
That merit should be chiefly plac'd
In judgement, knowledge, wit, and taste.—SWIFT.

He only who does good from a good motive is a man of worth;

To birth or office no respect be paid,
Let worth determine here.—POPE.

We look for merit among men in the discharge of their several offices or duties; we look for worth in their social capacities.

From these words are derived the epithets deserved and merited, in relation to what we receive from others; and deserving, meritorious, worthy, and worth, in regard to what we possess in ourselves: a treatment is deserved or undeserved; reproofs are merited or unmerited: the harsh treatment of a master is easier to be borne when it is undeserved than when it is deserved; the reproaches of a friend are very severe when unmerited.

A person is deserving on account of his industry or perseverance; 'A man has frequent opportunities of mitigating the fierceness of a party; or doing justice to the character of a deserving man.'—ADDISON. An artist is meritorious on account of his professional abilities, or a statesman in the discharge of his duties; 'He carried himself meritoriously in foreign employments in time of the interdict, which held up his credit among the patriots.'—WALTON. But for the most part actions, services, &c. are said to be meritorious; 'Pillimages to Rome were represented as the most meritorious acts of devotion.'—HUME. A citizen is worthy on account of his benevolence and uprightness;

Thun the last worthies of declining Greece,
Fate call'd to glory, in unequal times,
Pensive appear.—THOMSON.

One person deserves to be well paid and encouraged; another merits the applause which is bestowed on him;

a third is worthy of confidence and esteem from all men. Between worthy and worth there is this difference, that the former is said of the intrinsic and moral qualities, the latter of extrinsic qualities: a worthy man possesses that which calls for the esteem of others, but a man is worth the property which he can call his own: so in like manner a subject may be worthy the attention of a writer, or a thing may not be worth the while to consider.

COMPENSATION, SATISFACTION, AMENDS, REMUNERATION, RECOMPENSE, REQUITAL, REWARD.

The first three of these terms are employed to express a return for some evil; remuneration, recompense, and requit, a return for some good; reward, a return for either good or evil.

Compensation, Latin compensatio, compounded of com and pensatio, pensus and pendo to pay, signifies the paying what has become due; satisfaction, from satisfy, signifies the thing that satisfies, or makes up in return; amends, from the word to amend, signifies the thing that makes good what has been bad; remuneration, from remunerate, Latin remuneratus or remunere compounded of re and munus an office or service, signifies what is given in return for a service; recompense compounded of re and compense, signifies the thing paid back as an equivalent; requit, compounded of re and quit, or quital, from quit, signifies the making one's self clear by a return; reward is probably connected with regard, implying to take cognizance of the deserts of any one.

A compensation is something real; it is made for some positive injury sustained; justice requires that it should be equal in value, if not like in kind, to that which is lost or injured;

(All other debts may compensation find,
But love is strict, and will be paid in kind.)
DRYDEN.

A satisfaction may be imaginary, both as to the injury and the return; it is given for personal injuries, and depends on the disposition of the person to be satisfied; amends is real, but not always made so much for injuries done to others, as for offences committed by ourselves. Sufferers ought to have a compensation for the injuries they have sustained through our means, but there are injuries, particularly those which wound the feelings, for which there can be no compensation: tenacious and quarrelsome people demand satisfaction; their offended pride is not satisfied without the humiliation of their adversary: an amends is honourable which serves to repair a fault; the best amends which an offending person can make is to acknowledge his error, and avoid a repetition: Christianity enjoins upon its followers to do good, even to its enemies; but there is a thing called honour, which impels some men after they have insulted their friends to give them the satisfaction of shedding their blood; this is termed an honourable amends; but will the survivors find any compensation in such an amends for the loss of a husband, a father, or a brother? Not to offer any compensation to the utmost of our power, for any injury done to another, evinces a gross meanness of character, and selfishness of disposition: satisfaction can seldom be demanded with any propriety for any personal affront; although the true Christian will refuse no satisfaction which is not inconsistent with the laws of God and man. As respects the offence of man towards his Maker, nothing but the atonement of our Saviour could be a satisfaction;

Die he or justice must; unless for him
Some other able, and as willing, pay
The rigid satisfaction, death for death.—MILTON.

Compensation often denotes a return for services done, in which sense it approaches still nearer to remuneration, recompense, and requit: but the first two are obligatory; the latter are gratuitous. Compensation is an act of justice; the service performed involves a debt; the omission of paying it becomes an injury to the performer: the labourer is worthy of his hire; the time and strength of a poor man ought not to be employed without his receiving a compensation. Remuneration is a higher species of compensation; it is a matter of equity dependent upon a principle of honour in those who make it; it differs from the ordinary compensation, both in the nature of the service, and of the return. Compensation is made for bodily labour and mental offices; remuneration for mental exertions, for literary, civil, or political offices: compensation is made to inferiours, or subordinate persons; remuneration to equals, and even superiours in education and birth, though not in wealth: a compensation is prescribed by a certain ratio; remuneration depends on collateral circumstances; 'Remuneratory honours are proportioned at once to the usefulness and difficulty of performances.'—JOHNSON. A recompense is voluntary, both as to the service and the return; it is an act of generosity; it is not founded on the value of the service so much as on the intention of the server; it is not received as a matter of right, but of courtesy; there are a thousand acts of civility performed by others which are entitled to some recompense, though not to any specifick compensation;

Patriots have toiled, and in their country's cause
Bled nobly, and their deeds, as they deserve,
Receive proud recompense.—COWPER.

Requit is a return for a kindness; the making it is an act of gratitude; the omission of it wounds the feelings: it sometimes happens that the only requital which our kind action obtains, is the animosity of the person served; 'As the world is unjust in its judgements, so it is ungrateful in its requitals.'—BLAIR.

It belongs to the wealthy to make compensation for the trouble they give: it is scarcely possible to estimate too high what is done for ourselves, nor too low what we do for others. It is a hardship not to obtain the remuneration which we expect, but it is folly to expect that which we do not deserve. He who will not serve another, until he is sure of a recompense, is not worthy of a recompense. Those who befriend the wicked must expect to be ill requited.

Reward conveys no idea of obligation; whoever rewards acts altogether optionally; the conduct of the agent produces the reward. In this sense, it is comparable with compensation, amends, and recompense; but not with satisfaction, remuneration, or requital: things, as well as persons, may compensate, make amends, recompense, and reward; but persons only can give satisfaction, remuneration, and requital.

Reward respects the merit of the action; but compensate and the other words simply refer to the connexion between the actions and their results; what accrues to a man as the just consequence of his conduct, be it good or bad, is the reward. Rewards and punishments do always presuppose something willingly done, well or ill; without which respect, though we may sometimes receive good, yet then it is only a benefit and not a reward. Compensation and amends serve to supply the loss or absence of any thing; recompense and reward follow from particular exertions. It is but a poor compensation for the loss of peace and health to have one's coffers filled with gold;

Now goes the nightly thief prowling abroad
For plunder, much solicitous how best
He may compensate for a day of sloth,
By works of darkness and nocturnal wrongs.
COWPER.

A social intercourse by letter will make amends for the absence of those who are dear; 'Nature has obscurely fitted the mole with eyes. But for amends, what she is capable of for her defence, and warning of danger, she has very eminently conferred upon her, for she is very quick of hearing.'—ADDISON. It is a mark of folly to do any thing, however trifling, without the prospect of a recompense, and yet we see this daily realized in persons who give themselves much trouble to no purpose;

Thou'rt so far before,
That swiftest wing of recompense is slow
To overtake thee.—SHAKESPEARE.

The reward of industry is ease and content: when a deceiver is caught in his own snare, he meets with the reward which should always attend deceit; 'There are no honorary rewards among us which are more esteemed by the person who receives them, and are cheaper to the prince, than the giving of medals.'—ADDISON.

What can compensate for the loss of honour?

What can make amends to a frivolous mind for the want of company? What recompenses so sweet as the consciousness of having served a friend? When reward equals the reward of a good conscience?

RESTORATION RESTITUTION, REPARATION, AMENDS.

Restoration is employed in the ordinary application of the verb restore; restitution, from the same verb, is employed simply in the sense of making good that which has been unjustly taken. Restoration of property may be made by any one, whether the person taking it or not: restitution is supposed to be made by him who has been guilty of the injustice. The dethronement of a king may be the work of one set of men, and his restoration that of another; 'All men (during the usurpation) longed for the restoration of the liberties and laws.'—HUME. But it is the bounden duty of every individual who has committed any sort of injustice to another to make restitution to the utmost of his power; 'The justices may, if they think it reasonable, direct restitution of a ratable share of the money given with an apprentice (upon his discharge).'—BLACKSTONE.

Restitution and reparation are both employed in the sense of undoing that which has been done to the injury of another; but the former respects only injuries that affect the property, and reparation those which affect a person in various ways. He who is guilty of theft, or fraud, must make restitution by either restoring the stolen article or its full value: he who robs another of his good name, or does any injury to his person, has it not in his power so easily to make reparation; 'Justice requires that all injuries should be repaired.'—JOHNSON.

Reparation and amends (v. Compensation) are both employed in cases where some mischief or loss is sustained; but the reparation comprehends the idea of the act of repairing, as well as the thing by which we repair; amends is employed only for the thing that will amend or make better: hence we speak of the reparation of an injury; but of the amends by itself. The reparation comprehends all kinds of injuries, particularly those of a serious nature; the amends is applied only to matters of inferior importance.

It is impossible to make reparation for taking away the life of another; 'The king should be able, when he had cleared himself, to make him reparation.'—BACON. It is easy to make amends to any one for the loss of a day's pleasure; 'We went to the cabin of the French, who, to make amends for their three weeks' silence, were talking and disputing with greater rapidity and confusion than I ever heard in an assembly even of that nation.'—MANDEVILLE.

RESTORE, RETURN, REPAY.

Restore, in Latin restauo, from the Greek καυδο; a pale, signifies properly to new pale, that is, to repair by a new paling, and, in an extended application, to make good what has been injured or lost; return signifies properly to turn again, or to send back; and repay to pay back.

The common idea of all these terms is that of giving back. What we restore to another may or may not be the same as what we have taken; justice requires that it should be an equivalent in value, so as to prevent the individual from being in any degree a sufferer: what we return and repay must be precisely the same as we have received; the former in application to general objects, the latter in application only to pecuniary matters. We restore upon a principle of equity; we return upon a principle of justice and honour; we repay upon a principle of undeniable right. We cannot always claim that which ought to be restored; but we can not only claim but enforce the claim in regard to what is to be returned or repaid: an honest man will be scrupulous not to take any thing from another without restoring to him its full value. Whatever we have borrowed we ought to return; and when it is money which we have obtained, we ought to repay it with punctuality. We restore to many as well as to one, to communities as well as to individuals; we restore a king to his crown; or one nation restores a territory to another;

When both the chiefs are sunder'd from the fight,
Then to the lawful king restore his right.

DRYDEN.

We return and repay not only individually, but personally and particularly: we return a book to its owner;

The swain

Receives his easy food from Nature's hand,
And just returns of cultivated land.—DRYDEN.

We repay a sum of money to him from whom it was borrowed.

Restore and return may be employed in their improper application, as respects the moral state of persons and things; as a king restores a courtier to his favour, or a physician restores his patient to health: we return a favour; we return an answer or a compliment;

When answer none return'd, I set me down.

MILTON.

Repay may be figuratively employed in regard to moral objects, as an ungrateful person repays kindnesses with reproaches;

Cæsar, whom, fraught with eastern spoils,
Our heav'n, the just reward of human toils,
Securely shall repay with rights divine.—DRYDEN.

RETALIATION, REPRISAL.

Retaliation, from retaliare, in Latin retaliatum, participle of retalio, compounded of re and talis such, signifies such again, or like for like; reprisal, in French reprisal, from repris and reprandre, in Latin reprehendo to take again, signifies to take in return for what has been taken. The idea of making another suffer in return for the suffering he has occasioned is common to these terms; but the former is employed in ordinary cases; the latter mostly in regard to a state of warfare, or to active hostilities. A trick practised upon another in return for a trick is a retaliation; but a reprisal always extends to the capture of something from another, in return for what has been taken. When neighbours fall out, the incivilities and spite of the one are too often retaliated by like acts of incivility and spite on the part of the other: when one nation commences hostilities against another by taking any thing away violently, it produces reprisals on the part of the other. Retaliation is very frequently employed in the good sense for what passes innocently between friends: reprisal has always an unfavourable sense. Goldsmith's poem, entitled the Retaliation, was written for the purpose of retaliating on his friends the humour they had practised upon him; 'Therefore, I pray, let me enjoy your friendship in that fair proportion, that I desire to return unto you by way of correspondence and retaliation.'—HOWELL. When the quarrels of individuals break through the restraints of the law, and lead to acts of violence on each other's property, reprisals are made alternately by both parties;

Go publish o'er the plain,
How mighty a proselyte you gain!
How noble a reprisal on the great!—SWIFT

RETRIBUTION, REQUITAL.

Retribution, from tribuo to bestow, signifies a bestowing back or giving in return; requital, v. Reward.

Retribution is a particular term; requital is general: the retribution comes from Providence; requital is the act of man: retribution is by way of punishment; 'Christ substituted his own body in our room, to receive the whole stroke of that dreadful retribution inflicted by the hand of an angry Omnipotence.'—SOUTH. Requital is mostly by way of reward; 'Leander was indeed a conquest to boast of, for he had long and obstinately defended his heart, and for a time made as many requitals upon the tender passions of her sex as she had raised contributions upon his.'—CUMBERLAND. Retribution is not always dealt out to every man according to his deeds; it is a poor requital for one who has done a kindness, to be abused.

TO RECOVER, RETRIEVE, REPAIR, RECRUIT.

Recover is to get again under one's cover or protection; retrieve, from the French trouver to find, is to get again that which has been lost: repair, in French reparer, Latin reparo, from paro to get, signifies likewise to get again, or make good as it was before; recruit, in French recru, from cru, and the Latin creasco to grow, signifies to grow again, or come fresh again.

Recover is the most general term, and applies to objects in general; retrieve, repair, and the others, are only partial applications: we recover things either by our own means or by casualties; we retrieve and repair by our own efforts only: we recover that which has been taken, or that which has been any way lost; we retrieve that which we have lost; we repair that which has been injured; we recruit that which has been diminished: we recover property from those who wish to deprive us of it; or we recover our principles &c.; 'The serious and impartial retrospect of our conduct is indisputably necessary to the confirmation or recovery of our virtue.'—JOHNSON. We retrieve our misfortunes, or our lost reputation;

Why may not the soul receive

New organs, since ev'n art can these retrieve?

JENYNS.

We repair the mischief which has been done to our property;

Your men shall be received, your fleet repaired.

DRYDEN.

We recruit the strength which has been exhausted;

With greens and flowers recruit their empty hives.

DRYDEN.

We do not seek after that which we think irrecoverable; we give that up which is irretrievable; we lament over that which is irreparable; our power of recruiting depends upon circumstances; he who makes a moderate use of his resources may in general easily recruit himself when they are gone.

RECOVERY, RESTORATION.

Recovery is one's own act; restoration is the act of another; we recover the thing we have lost, when it comes again into our possession; but it is restored to us by another; 'Let us study to improve the assistance which this revelation affords for the restoration of our nature, and the recovery of our felicity.'—BLAIR. A king recovers his crown by force of arms from the hands of a usurper; his crown is restored to him by the will of his people: the recovery of property is good fortune; the restoration of property an act of justice.

Both are employed likewise in regard to one's health; but the former simply designates the regaining of health; the latter refers to the instrument by which it is brought about: the recovery of one's health is an object of the first importance to every man; the restoration of one's health seldom depends upon the efficacy of medicine, than the benignant operations of nature.

TO REDEEM, RANSOM.

Redeem, in Latin redimo, is compounded of re and emo to buy off, or back to one's self; ransom is in all probability a variation of redeem.

Redeem is a term of general application; ransom is employed only on particular occasions: we redeem persons as well as things; we ransom persons only: we may redeem by labour, or any thing which supplies as an equivalent to money; we ransom property with money only: we redeem a watch, or whatever has been given in pawn; we ransom a captive: redeem is employed in the improper application; ransom only in the proper sense: we may redeem our character, redeem our life, or redeem our honour; and in this sense our Saviour redeems repentant sinners;

Thus in her crime her confidence she plac'd,
And with new reasons would redeem the past.

DRYDEN.

But those who are ransomed only recover their bodily liberty; 'A third tax was paid by vassals to the king, to ransom him if he should happen to be taken prisoner.'—ROBERTSON.

GRATUITY, RECOMPENSE.

The distinction between these terms is very similar to the terms Gratuitous, Voluntary. They both imply a gift, and a gift by way of return for some supposed service: but the gratuity is independent of all expectation as well as right; the recompense is founded upon some admissible claim. Those who wish to confer a favour in a delicate manner, will sometimes do it under the shape of a gratuity; 'If there be one or two scholars more, that will be no great addition to his trouble, considering that, perhaps, their parents may recompense him by their gratuities.'—MOLYNEUX. Those who overrate their services will in all probability be disappointed in the recompense they receive;

What could be less than to afford him praise,
The easiest recompense.—MILTON.

GRATUITOUS, VOLUNTARY.

Gratuitous is opposed to that which is obligatory; voluntary is opposed to that which is compulsory, or involuntary. A gift is gratuitous which flows entirely from the free will of the giver, independent of right: an offer is voluntary which flows from the free will, independent of all external constraint. Gratuitous is therefore to voluntary as a species to the genus. What is gratuitous is voluntary, although what is voluntary is not always gratuitous. The gratuitous is properly the voluntary in regard to the disposal of one's property; 'The heroic band of cashiers of monarchs were in haste to make a generous diffusion of the knowledge which they had thus gratuitously received.'—BURKE. The voluntary is applicable to subjects in general; 'Their privileges relative to contribution were voluntarily surrendered.'—BURKE.

THANKFULNESS, GRATITUDE.

Thankfulness or a fulness of thanks, is the outward expression of a grateful feeling; gratitude, from the Latin gratitudo, is the feeling itself. Our thankfulness is measured by the number of our words; our gratitude is measured by the nature of our actions. A person appears very thankful at the time, who afterward proves very ungrateful. Thankfulness is the beginning of gratitude; gratitude is the completion of thankfulness.

TO AFFIRM, ASSEVERATE, ASSURE, VOUCH, AVER, PROTEST.

Affirm, in French affirmer, Latin affirmo, compounded of af or ad and firma to strengthen, signifies to give strength to what has been said; asseverate, in Latin asseveratus, participle of assevero, compounded of as or ad and severo, signifies to make strong and positive; assure, in French assurer, is compounded of the intensive syllable as or ad and sure, signifying to make sure; vouch is probably changed from vow; aver, in French averer, is compounded of the intensive syllable a or ad and verus true, signifying to bear testimony to the truth; protest, in French protester, Latin protesto, is compounded of pro and testor to call to witness, signifying to call others to witness as to what we think about a thing.

All these terms indicate an expression of a person's conviction.

In one sense, to affirm is to declare that a thing is in opposition to denying or declaring that it is not; in the sense here chosen, it signifies to declare a thing as a fact on our credit. To asseverate is to declare it with confidence. To vouch is to rest the truth of another's declaration on our own responsibility. To aver is to express the truth of a declaration unequivocally. To protest is to declare a thing solemnly, and with strong marks of sincerity.

Affirmations are made of the past and present; a person affirms what he has seen and what he sees;

An infidel, and fear!

Fear what? a dream? a fable?—How thy dread,

Unwilling evidence, and therefore strong,

Affords my cause an undesigned support!

How disbelief affirms what it denies!—YOUNG.

Asseverations are strong affirmations, made in cases of doubt to remove every impression disadvantageous to one's sincerity; 'I judge in this case as Charles the Second victualled his navy, with the bread which one of his dogs chose of several pieces thrown before him, rather than trust to the asseverations of the victuallers.'—STEELE. Assurances are made of the past, present, and future; they mark the conviction of the speaker as to what has been, or is, and his intentions as to what shall be; they are appeals to the estimation which another has in one's word; 'My learned friend assured me that the earth had lately received a shock from a comet that crossed its vortex.'—STEELE. Vouching is an act for another; it is the supporting of another's assurance by our own; 'All the great writers of the Augustan age, for whom singly we have so great an esteem, stand up together as vouchers for one another's reputation.'—ADDISON. Averring is employed in matters of fact; we aver as to the accuracy of details; we aver on positive knowledge that sets aside all question; 'Among ladies, he positively averred that nonsense was the most prevailing part of eloquence, and had so little complaisance as to say, "a woman is never taken by her reason but always by her passion."'¹—STEELE. Protestations are stronger than either asseverations or assurances; they are accompanied with every act, look, or gesture that can tend to impress conviction on another; 'I have long loved her, and I protest to you, bestowed much on her, followed her with a doting observance.'—SHAKESPEARE.

Affirmations are employed in giving evidence, whether accompanied with an oath or not; liars deal much in asseverations and protestations. People asseverate in order to produce a conviction of their veracity; they protest in order to obtain a belief of their innocence; they aver where they expect to be believed. Assurances are altogether personal; they are always made to satisfy some one of what they wish to know and believe. We ought to be sparing of our assurances of regard for another, as we ought to be suspicious of such assurances when made to ourselves. Whenever we affirm any thing on the authority of another, we ought to be particularly cautious not to vouch for its veracity, if it be not unquestionable.

TO AFFIRM, ASSERT.

Affirm, v. To affirm, asseverate; assert, in Latin assertus, participle of asserto, compounded of as or ad and sero to connect, signifies to connect words into a proposition.

To affirm is said of facts; to assert, of opinions: we affirm what we know; we assert what we believe; whoever affirms what he does not know to be true is guilty of falsehood; 'That this man, wise and virtuous as he was, passed always unentangled through the snares of life, it would be prejudice and temerity to affirm.'—JOHNSON (Life of Collins). Whoever asserts what he cannot prove to be true is guilty of folly; 'It is asserted by a tragick poet, that "est miser nemo nisi comparatus,"—"no man is miserable, but as he is compared with others happier than himself." This position is not strictly and philosophically true.'—JOHNSON. We contradict an affirmation; we confute an assertion.

TO ASSERT, MAINTAIN, VINDICATE

To assert, v. To affirm, assert; maintain, in French maintenir, from the Latin manus and teneo, signifies to hold by the hand, that is, closely and firmly; vindicate, in Latin vindicatus, participle of vindico, compounded of vim and dico, signifies to pronounce a violent or positive sentence.

To assert is to declare a thing as our own; to maintain is to abide by what we have so declared; to vindicate is to stand up for that which concerns ourselves or others. We assert any thing to be true; 'Sophocles also, in a fragment of one of his tragedies, asserts the unity of the Supreme Being.'—CUMBERLAND. We maintain an opinion by adducing proofs, facts, or arguments; 'I am willing to believe that Dryden wanted rather skill to discover the right, than virtue to maintain it.'—JOHNSON. We vindicate our own conduct or that of another when it is called in question; 'This is no vindication of her conduct. She still acts a mean part, and through fear becomes an accomplice in endeavouring to betray the Greeks.'—BROOME. We assert boldly or impudently; we maintain steadily or obstinately; we vindicate resolutely or insolently. A right or claim is asserted which is avowed to belong to any one;

When the great soul buoys up to this high point,
Leaving gross Nature's sediments below,
Then, and then only, Adam's offspring quits
The sage and hero of the fields and woods,
Asserts his rank, and rises into man.—YOUNG.

A right is maintained when attempts are made to prove its justice, or regain its possession; the cause of the assertor or maintainer is vindicated by another;

'T is just that I should vindicate alone,
The broken truce, or for the breach atone.

DRYDEN.

Innocence is asserted by a positive declaration; it is maintained by repeated assertions and the support of testimony; it is vindicated through the interference of another.

The most guilty persons do not hesitate to assert their innocence with the hope of inspiring credit; and some will persist in maintaining it, even after their guilt has been pronounced; but the really innocent man will never want a friend to vindicate him when his honour or his reputation is at stake. Assertions which are made hastily and inconsiderately are seldom long maintained without exposing a person to ridicule;
those who attempt to vindicate a bad cause expose themselves to as much reproach as if the cause were their own.

TO ACKNOWLEDGE, OWN, CONFESS, AVOW.

Acknowledge, compounded of ac or ad and knowledge, implies to bring to knowledge, to make known;
own is a familiar figure, signifying to take to one's self,
to make one's own: it is a common substitute for confess; confess, in French confesser, Latin confessus, participle of confiteor, compounded of con and fateor, signifies to impart to any one; avow, in French avouer,
Latin advoveo, signifies to vow, or protest to any one.

Acknowledging is a simple declaration; confessing or owning is a specific private communication; avowal is a public declaration. We acknowledge facts; confess our own faults; avow motives, opinions, &c.

We acknowledge in consequence of a question; we confess in consequence of an accusation; we own in consequence of a charge; we avow voluntarily. We acknowledge having been concerned in a transaction;
we confess our guilt; we own that a thing is wrong;
but we are ashamed to avow our motives. Candour leads to an acknowledgment; repentance produces a confession; the desire of forgiveness leads to owning; generosity or pride occasions an avowal.

An acknowledgment of what is not demanded may be either politic or impolitic, according to circumstances; 'I must acknowledge, for my own part, that I take greater pleasure in considering the works of the creation in their immensity, than in their minuteness.'
—ADDISON. A confession dictated merely by fear is of avail only in the sight of man;

Spite of herself e'en Envy must confess,
That I the friendship of the great possess.

FRANCIS.

Those who are most ready to own themselves in an error are not always the first to amend; 'And now, my dear, cried she to me, I will fairly own, that it was I that instructed my girls to encourage our landlord's addresses.'—GOLDSMITH. An avowal of the principles which actuate the conduct is often the greatest aggra-vation of guilt; 'Whether by their settled and avowed scorn of thoughtless talkers, the Persians were able to diffuse to any great extent the virtue of taciturnity, we are hindered by the distance of those times from being able to discover.'—JOHNSON.

RECOGNISE, ACKNOWLEDGE.

Recognise, in Latin recognoscere, is to take the knowledge of, or bring to one's own knowledge; acknowledge, v. To acknowledge.

To recognise is to take cognizance of that which comes again before our notice; to acknowledge is to admit to one's knowledge whatever comes fresh under our notice. We recognise a person whom we have known before; we recognise him either in his former character or in some newly assumed character; we acknowledge either former favours, or those which have been just received. Princes recognise certain principles which have been admitted by previous consent; they acknowledge the justice of claims which are preferred before them; 'When conscience threatens punishment to secret crimes, it manifestly recognises a Supreme Governour from whom nothing is hidden.'— BLAIR. 'I call it atheism by establishment, when any state, as such, shall not acknowledge the existence of God, as the moral governour of the world.'—BURKE.

TO PROFESS, DECLARE.

Profess, in Latin professus, participle of profiteor, compounded of pro and fateor to speak, signifies to set forth, or present to publick view; declare, v. To declare.

An exposure of one's thoughts or opinions is the common idea in the signification of these terms; but they differ in the manner of the action, as well as the object: one professes by words or by actions; one declares only by words; a man professes to believe that on which he acts; but he declares his belief of it either with his lips or in his writings. The profession may be general and partial; it may amount to little more than an intimation: the declaration is positive and explicit; it leaves no one in doubt: a profession may, therefore, sometimes be hypocritical; he who professes may wish to imply that which is not real;
'A naked profession may have credit, where no other evidence can be given.'—SWIFT. A declaration must be either directly true or false; he who declares expressly commits himself upon his veracity; 'We are a considerable body, who, upon a proper occasion, would not fail to declare ourselves.'—ADDISON. One professes either as respects single actions, or a regular course of conduct; one declares either passing thoughts or settled principles. A person professes to have walked to a certain distance; to have taken a certain route, and the like: a Christian professes to follow the doctrine and precepts of Christianity; a person declares that the thing is true or false, or he declares his firm belief in a thing.

To profess is employed only for what concerns one's self; to declare is likewise employed for what concerns others: one professes the motives and principles by which one is guided; one declares facts and circumstances with which one is acquainted: one professes nothing but what one thinks may be creditable and fit to be known, or what may be convenient for one's purpose;

Pretending first

Wise to fly pain, professing next the spy,
Argues no leader.—MILTON.

One declares whatever may have fallen under one's notice, or passed through one's mind, as the case requires; 'It is too common to find the aged at declared enquiry with the whole system of present customs and manners.'—BLAIR. There is always a particular and private motive for profession; there are frequently public grounds for making a declaration. A general profession of Christianity, according to established forms, is the bounden duty of every one born in the Christian persuasion; but a particular profession, according to a singular and extraordinary form, is seldom adopted by any who do not deceive themselves, or wish to deceive others: no one should be ashamed of making a declaration of his opinions, when the cause of truth is thereby supported; every one should be ready to declare what he knows, when the purposes of justice are forwarded by the declaration; 'There are no where so plain and full declarations of mercy and love to the sons of men, as are made in the Gospel'.
—TILLOTSON.

TO DECLARE, PUBLISH, PROCLAIM.

The idea of making known is common to all these terms: this is simply the signification of declare (v. To profess); but publish (v. To announce) and proclaim, in Latin proclamo, compounded of pro and clamo signifying to cry before or in the ears of others, include accessory ideas.

The word declare does not express any particular mode or circumstance of making known, as is implied by the others: we may declare publicly or privately;
we publish and proclaim only in a publick manner;

we may declare by word of mouth, or by writing; we publish or proclaim by any means that will render the thing most generally known.

In declaring, the leading idea is that of speaking out that which passes in the mind; in publishing, the leading idea is that of making public or common; in proclaiming, the leading idea is that of crying aloud: we may therefore often declare by publishing and proclaiming: a declaration is a personal act; it concerns the person declaring, or him to whom it is declared; its truth or falsehood depends upon the veracity of the speaker: a publication is of general interest; the truth or falsehood of it does not always rest with the publisher: a proclamation is altogether a public act, in which no one's veracity is implicated. Facts and opinions and feelings are declared;

The Greeks in shouts their joint assent declare,
The priest to rev'rence and release the fair.

POPE.

Events and circumstances are published; 'I am surprised that none of the fortune-tellers, or, as the French call them, the Disseurs de bonne aventure, who publish their bills in every quarter of the town, have not turned our lotteries to their advantage.'—ADDISON. The measures of government are proclaimed;

Nine sacred heralds now, proclaiming loud
The monarch's will, suspend the list'ning crowd.

POPE.

It is folly for a man to declare any thing to be true, which he is not certain to be so, and wickedness in him to declare that to be true which he knows to be false: whoever publishes all he hears will be in great danger of publishing many falsehoods; whatever is proclaimed is supposed to be of sufficient importance to deserve the notice of all who may hear or read.

In cases of war or peace, princes are expected to declare themselves on one side or the other; in the political world intelligence is quickly published through the medium of the public papers; in private life domestic occurrences are published with equal celerity through the medium of tale-bearers; a proclamation is the ordinary mode by which a prince makes known his wishes, and issues his commands to his subjects; it is an act of indiscretion very common to young and ardent inquirers to declare their opinions before they are properly matured; the publication of domestic circumstances is oftentimes the source of much disquiet and ill-will in families; ministers of the Gospel are styled messengers, who should proclaim its glad tidings to all people, and in all tongues.

DECREE, EDICT, PROCLAMATION.

Decree, in French decret, Latin decretus, from decerno to give judgement or pass sentence, signifies the sentence or resolution that is passed; edict, in Latin edictus, from edico to say out, signifies the thing spoken out or sent forth; proclamation, v. To declare.

A decree is a more solemn and deliberative act than an edict; on the other hand an edict is more authoritative than a decree. A decree is the decision of one or many; an edict speaks the will of an individual: councils and senates, as well as princes, make decrees; despotic rulers issue edicts.

Decrees are passed for the regulation of publick and private matters; they are made known as occasion requires, but are not always publick;

If you deny me, fie upon your law!
There is no force in the decrees of Venice:

SHAKESPEARE.

Edicts and proclamations contain the commands of the sovereign authority, and are directly addressed by the prince to his people. An edict is peculiar to a despotic government; 'This statute or act of parliament is placed among the records of the kingdom, there needing no formal promulgation to give it the force of a law, as was necessary by the civil law with regard to the emperor's edicts.'—BLACKSTONE. A proclamation is common to a monarchical and aristocratic form of government; 'From the same original of the king's being the fountain of justice, we may also deduce the prerogative of issuing proclamations, which is vested in the king alone.'—BLACKSTONE. The ukase in Russia is a species of edict, by which the emperor makes known his will to his people; the king of England communicates to his subjects the determinations of himself and his council by means of a proclamation.

TO ANNOUNCE, PROCLAIM, PUBLISH, ADVERTISE.

Announce, in Latin annuncio, is compounded of an or ad and nuncio to tell to any one in a formal manner; proclaim, in Latin proclamo, is compounded of pro and clamo to cry before, or cry aloud; publish, in Latin publico, from publicus and populus, signifies to make public or known to the people at large; advertise, from the Latin adverto, or ad and verto, signifies to turn the attention to a thing.

The characteristic sense of these words is the making of a thing known to several individuals: a thing is announced to an individual or small community; it is proclaimed to a neighbourhood, and published to the world. An event that is of particular interest is announced; 'We might with as much reason doubt whether the sun was intended to enlighten the earth, as whether he who has framed the human mind intended to announce righteousness to mankind as a law.'—BLAIR. An event is proclaimed that requires to be known by all the parties interested;

But witness, heralds! and proclaim my vow,
Witness to gods above, and men below.—POPE.

That is published which is supposed likely to interest all who know it; 'It very often happens that none are more industrious in publishing the blemishes of an extraordinary reputation, than such as lie open to the same censures in their own character.'—ADDISON.

Announcements are made verbally, or by some well known signal; proclamations are made verbally, and accompanied by some appointed signal; publications are ordinarily made through the press, or by oral communication from one individual to another. The arrival of a distinguished person is announced by the ringing of the bells; the proclamation of peace by a herald is accompanied with certain ceremonies calculated to excite notice; the publication of news is the office of the journalist.

Advertise denotes the means, and publish the end. To advertise is to direct the publick attention to any event or circumstance; 'Every man that advertises his own excellence should write with some consciousness of a character which dares to call the attention of the publick.'—JOHNSON. To publish is to make known either by an oral or printed communication; 'The criticisms which I have hitherto published, have been made with an intention rather to discover beauties and excellences in the writers of my own time, than to publish any of their faults and imperfections.'—ADDISON.

We publish by advertising, but we do not always advertise when we publish. Mercantile and civil transactions are conducted by means of advertisements. Extraordinary circumstances are speedily published in a neighbourhood by circulating from mouth to mouth.

TO PUBLISH, PROMULGATE, DIVULGE, REVEAL, DISCLOSE.

To publish signifies the same as in the preceding article; promulgate, in Latin promulgatus, participle of promulgo, for provulgo, signifies to make vulgar; divulge, in Latin divulgo, that is, in diversos vulgo, signifies to make vulgar in different parts; reveal, in Latin revelo, from velo to veil, signifies to take off the veil or cover; disclose signifies to make the reverse of close.

To publish is the most general of these terms, conveying in its extended sense the idea of making known; 'By the execution of several of his benefactors, Maximin published in characters of blood the indelible history of his baseness and ingratitude.'—GIBSON. Publishing is an indefinite act, whereby we may make known to many or few; but to promulgate is always to make known to many. We may publish that which is a domestic or a national concern, we promulgate properly only that which is of general interest; the affairs of a family or of a nation are published in the newspapers; doctrines, principles, precepts, and the like, are promulgated; 'An absurd theory on one side of a question forms no justification for alleging a false fact or promulgating mischievous maxims on the other.'—BURKE. We may publish things to be known, or things not to be known; we divulge things mostly not to be known; we may publish our own shame, or the shame of another, and we may publish that which is advantageous to another; but we commonly divulge the secrets or the crimes of another;

Tremble, thou wretch,
That hast within thee undivulged crimes.
SHAKESPEARE.

To publish is said of that which was never before known, or never before existed; to reveal and disclose are said of that which has been only concealed or lay hidden: we publish the events of the day; we reveal the secret or the mystery of a transaction; 'In confession, the revealing is not for worldly use, but for the ease of a man's heart.'—BACON. We disclose the whole of an affair from beginning to end, which has never been properly known or accounted for;

Then earth and ocean various forms disclose.
DRYDEN.

TO UNCOVER, DISCOVER, DISCLOSE.

To uncover, like discover, implies to take off the covering; but the former refers to an artificial material and occasional covering; the latter to a moral, natural, or permanent covering: plants are uncovered that they may receive the benefit of the air; they are discovered to gratify the researches of the botanist. To discover and disclose both signify to lay open, but they differ in the object and manner of the action: that is discovered which is supposed to be covered; and that is disclosed which is supposed to be shut out from the view: a country is discovered, a scene is disclosed;

Go draw aside the curtains, and discover
The several caskets to this noble prince.
SHAKESPEARE.

'The shells being broken, struck off, and gone, the stone included in them is thereby disclosed and set at liberty.'—WOODWARD. A plot is discovered when it becomes known to one's self; a secret is disclosed when it is made known to another; 'He shall never, by any alteration in me, discover my knowledge of his mis take.'—POPE.

If I disclose my passion,
Our friendship's at an end; if I conceal it,
The world will call me false.—ADDISON.

TO DISCOVER, MANIFEST, DECLARE.

The idea of making known is conveyed by all these terms; but discover, which signifies simply the taking off the covering from any thing, expresses less than manifest, and that than declare: we discover by indirect means or signs more or less doubtful; we manifest by unquestionable marks; we declare by express words: talents and dispositions discover themselves; particular feelings and sentiments manifest themselves; facts, opinions, and sentiments are declared: children early discover a turn for some particular art or science; 'Several brute creatures discover in their actions something like a faint glimmering of reason.'—ADDISON. A person manifests his regard for another by unequivocal proofs of kindness; 'At no time perhaps did the legislature manifest a more tender regard to that fundamental principle of British constitutional policy, hereditary monarchy, than at the time of the revolution.'—BURKE. A person of an open disposition is apt to declare his sentiments without disguise; 'Langhorne, Boyer, and Powell, presbyterian officers who commanded bodies of troops in Wales, were the first that declared themselves against the parliament.'—HUME.

Things are said to discover, persons only manifest or declare in the proper sense; but they may be used figuratively: it is the nature of every thing sublimary to discover symptoms of decay more or less early; it is particularly painful when any one manifests an unfriendly disposition from whom we had reason to expect the contrary.

TO PROVE, DEMONSTRATE, EVINCE, MANIFEST.

Prove, in Latin probo, signifies to make good: demonstrate, from the Latin demonstro, signifies, by virtue of the intensive syllable de, to show in a specific manner; evince, v. To argue; manifest signifies to make manifest.

Prove is here the general and indefinite term, the rest imply different modes of proving; to demonstrate is to prove specifically: we may prove any thing by simple assertion; but we must demonstrate by intellectual efforts: we may prove that we were in a certain place; but we demonstrate some point in science: we may prove by personal influence; but we can demonstrate only by the force of evidence: we prove our own merit by our actions; we demonstrate the existence of a Deity by all that surrounds us;

Why on those shores are they with joy survey'd,
Admir'd as heroes, and as gods obey'd,
Unless great acts superiour merit prove?—POPE.

'By the very setting apart and consecrating places for the service of God, we demonstrate our acknowledgment of his power and sovereignty over us.'—BRYERIDGE.

To prove, evince, and manifest are the acts either of persons or things; to demonstrate, that of persons only: in regard to persons, we prove either the facts which we know, or the mental endowments which we possess: we evince and manifest a disposition or a state of mind: we evince our sincerity by our actions; it is a work of time; 'We must evince the sincerity of our faith by good works.'—BLAIR. We manifest a friendly or a hostile disposition by a word or a single action, it is the act of the moment; 'In the life of a man of sense, a short life is sufficient to manifest himself a man of honour and virtue.'—STEELE. All these terms are applied to things, inasmuch as they may tend either to produce conviction, or simply to make a thing known: to prove and evince are employed in the first case; to manifest in the latter case: the beauty and order in the creation prove the wisdom of the Creator; a persistence in a particular course of conduct may either evince great virtue or great folly; the miracles wrought in Egypt manifested the Divine power.

PROOF, EVIDENCE, TESTIMONY.

The proof is that which simply proves; the evidence is that which makes evident, which rises in sense upon the proof; the testimony is a species of evidence by means of witnesses, from testis a witness.

In the legal acceptance of the terms, proofs are commonly denominated evidence, because no proof can be admitted as such which does not tend to make evident, but as the word proof is sometimes taken for the act of proving as well as the thing proved, the terms are not always indifferently used; 'Positive proof is always required, where, from the nature of the case, it appears it might possibly have been had. But next to positive proof, circumstantial evidence, or the doctrine of presumptions, must take place.'—BLACKSTONE. 'Evidence is either written or parol.'—BLACKSTONE. Testimony is properly parol evidence; but the term is only used in relation to the person giving the evidence; 'Our law considers that there are many transactions to which only one person is privy, and therefore does not always demand the testimony of two.'—BLACKSTONE.

In an extended application of the words they are taken in the sense of a sign or mark, by which a thing is known to exist; and, with a similar distinction, the proof is the sign which proves; 'Of the fallaciousness of hope, and the uncertainty of schemes, every day gives some new proof.'—JOHNSON. The evidence is the sign which makes evident; hence we speak of the evidences of the senses; 'Cato Major, who had borne all the great offices, has left us an evidence, under his own hand, how much he was versed in country affairs.'—LOCKE. The testimony is that which is offered or given by persons or things personified in proof of any thing; 'Evidence is said to arise from testimony, when we depend upon the credit and relation of others for the truth or falsehood of any thing.'—WILKINS. Hence a person makes another a present, or performs any other act of kindness as a testimony of his regard: and persons or things personified bear testimony in favour of persons; 'I must bear this testimony to Otway's memory, that the passions are truly touched in his Venice Preserved.'—DRYDEN.

Ye Trojan flames, your testimony bear
What I perform'd, and what I suffer'd there.
DRYDEN.

The proof is employed mostly for facts or physical objects; the evidence is applied to that which is moral or intellectual. All that our Saviour did and said were evidences of his divine character, which might have produced faith in the minds of many, even if they had not such numerous and miraculous proofs of his power. The evidence may be internal, or lie in the thing itself; 'Of Swift's general habits of thinking, if his letters can be supposed to afford any evidence, he was not a man to be either loved or envied.'—JOHNSON. The proof is always external: 'Men ought not to expect either sensible proof or demonstration for such matters as are not capable of such proofs, supposing them to be true.'—WILKINS. The internal evidences of the truth of Divine Revelation are even more numerous than those which are external: our Saviour's reappearance among his disciples did not satisfy the unbelieving Thomas of his identity, until he had the farther proofs of feeling the holes in his hands and his side.

DEPONENT, EVIDENCE, WITNESS.

Deponent, from the Latin depono, is the one laying down or open what he has heard or seen; evidence, from evidens, is the one producing evidence or making evident; witness, from the Saxon witan, Teutonic weisen, Greek εἰδέναι, and Hebrew יָדַע to know, is one who knows or makes known.

The deponent always declares upon oath; he serves to give information: the evidence is likewise generally bound by an oath; he serves to acquit or condemn: the witness is employed upon oath or otherwise he serves to confirm or invalidate;

The pleader having spoke his best,
And witness ready to attest;
Who fairly could on oath depose,
When questions on the fact arose,
That ev'ry article was true.

Nor further these deponents knew.—SWIFT

A deponent declares either in writing or by word of mouth; the deposition is preparatory to the trial: an evidence may give evidence either by words or action; whatever serves to clear up the thing, whether a person or an animal, is used as an evidence; the evidence always comes forward on the trial; 'Of the evidence which appeared against him (Savage) the character of the man was not unexceptionable; that of the woman notoriously infamous.'—JOHNSON. A witness is always a person in the proper sense, but may be applied figuratively to inanimate objects; he declares by word of mouth what he personally knows. Every witness is an evidence at the moment of trial, but every evidence is not a witness. When a dog is employed as an evidence he cannot be called a witness; 'In case a woman be forcibly taken away and married, she may be a witness against her husband in order to convict him of felony.'—BLACKSTONE. 'In every man's heart and conscience, religion has many witnesses to its importance and reality.'—BLAIR.

Evidence on the other hand is confined mostly to judicial matters; and witness extends to all the ordinary concerns of life. One person appears as an evidence against another on a criminal charge: a witness appears for or against; he corroborates the word of another, and is a security in all dealings or matters of question between man and man.

TO CONVICT, DETECT, DISCOVER.

Convict, from the Latin convictus, participle of convincere to make manifest, signifies to make clear; detect, from the Latin detectus, participle of detegere, compounded of the privative de and tegere to cover, signifies to uncover or lay open. To detect and discover serve to denote the laying open of crimes or errors. A person is convicted by means of evidence; he is detected by means of ocular demonstration. One is convicted of having been the perpetrator of some evil deed; 'Advice is offensive, not because it lays us open to unexpected regret, or convicts us of any fault which had escaped our notice, but because it shows us that we are known to others as well as ourselves.'—JOHNSON. One is detected in the very act of committing the deed. One is convicted of crimes in a court of judicature; one is detected in various misdemeanours by different casualties; 'Every member of society feels and acknowledges the necessity of detecting crimes.'—JOHNSON. Punishment necessarily follows the conviction; but in the case of detection, it rests in the breast of the individual against whom the offence is committed.

Detect is always taken in a bad sense: discover (v. Uncover) in an indifferent sense. A person is detected in what he wishes to conceal; a person or a thing is discovered that has unintentionally lain concealed. Thieves are detected in picking pockets; a lost child is discovered in a wood, or in some place of security. Detection is the act of the moment; it is effected by the aid of the senses: a discovery is the consequence of efforts, and is brought about by circuitous means, and the aid of the understanding. A plot is detected by any one who communicates what he has seen and heard; many murders have been discovered after a lapse of years by ways the most extraordinary. Nothing is detected but what is actually passing; many things are discovered which have long passed. Wicked men go on in their career of vice with the hope of escaping detection; the discovery of one villainy often leads to that of many more; 'Cunning when it is once detected loses its force.'—ADDISON. 'We are told that the Spartans, though they punished theft in the young men when it was discovered, looked upon it as honourable if it succeeded.'—ADDISON.

TO FIND, FIND OUT, DISCOVER, ESPY, DESCRY.

Find, in German finden, &c. is most probably connected with the Latin venio, signifying to come in the way: discover, v. To uncover; espy, in French espier, comes from the Latin espicio, signifying to see a thing out; descry, from the Latin discerno, signifies to distinguish a thing from others.

To find signifies simply to come within sight of a thing, which is the general idea attached to all these terms: they vary, however, either in the mode of the action or in the object. What we find may become visible to us by accident, but what we find out is the result of an effort. We may find any thing as we pass along in the streets; but we find out mistakes in an account by carefully going over it, or we find out the difficulties which we meet with in learning, by redoubling our diligence; 'Socrates, who was a great admirer of Cretan institutions, set his excellent wit to find out some good cause and use of this evil inclination (the love of boys).'
—WALSH. What is found may have been lost to ourselves, but visible to others;

He finds the fraud, and with a smile demands,
On what design the boy had bound his hands.

DRYDEN.

What is discovered is always remote and unknown, and when discovered is something new; 'Cunning is a kind of short-sightedness that discovers the minutest objects which are near at hand, but is not able to discern things at a distance.'—ADDISON. A piece of money may be found lying on the ground; but a mine is discovered under ground. When Captain Cook discovered the islands in the South Sea, many plants and animals were found. What is not discoverable may be presumed not to exist; but that which is found may be only what has been lost. What has once been discovered cannot be discovered again; but what is found may be many times found. Find out and discover differ principally in the application; the former being applied to familiar, and the latter to scientific objects: scholars find out what they have to learn; men of research discover what escapes the notice of others.

To espy is a species of finding out, namely, to find out what is very secluded or retired;

There Agamemnon, Priam here he spies,
And fierce Achilles, who both kings defies.

DRYDEN.

Descry is a species of discovering, or observing at a distance, or among a number of objects;

Through this we pass, and mount the tower from whence,
With unavailing arms, the Trojans make defence;
From this the trembling king had oft descried,
The Grecian camp, and saw their navy ride.

DRYDEN.

An astronomer discovers fresh stars or planets; he finds those on particular occasions which have been already discovered. A person finds out by continued inquiry any place to which he had been wrong directed: he espies an object which lies concealed in a corner or secret place: he describes a horseman coming down a hill.

Find and discover may be employed with regard to objects, either of a corporeal or intellectual kind; espy and descry only with regard to sensible objects of corporeal vision: find, either for those that are external or internal; discover, only for those that are external. The distinction between them is the same as before; we find by simple inquiry; we discover by reflection and study: we find or find out the motives which influence a person's conduct; we discover the reasons or causes of things: the finding serves the particular purpose of the finder; the discovery serves the purpose of science, by adding to the stock of general knowledge.

When find is used as a purely intellectual operation, it admits of a new view, in relation both to discover and to invent, as may be seen in the following article.

TO FIND, FIND OUT, DISCOVER, INVENT.

To find or find out (v. To find) is said of things which do not exist in the forms in which a person finds them: to discover (v. To uncover) is said of that which exists in an entire state: invent, in Latin inventum, from invenio, signifying to come at or light upon, is said of that which is new made or modelled. The merit of finding or inventing consists in newly applying or modifying the materials which exist separately; the merit of discovering consists in removing the obstacles which prevent us from knowing the real nature of the thing: imagination and industry are requisite for finding or inventing; acuteness and penetration for discovering. A person finds reasons for justifying himself: he discovers traits of a bad disposition in another. Cultivated minds find sources of amusement within themselves, or a prisoner finds means of escape. Many traces of a universal deluge have been discovered: the physician discovers the nature of a particular disorder.

Find is applicable to the operative arts;

Long practice has a sure improvement found,
With kindled fires to burn the barren ground.

DRYDEN.

Discover is applied to speculative objects; 'Since the harmonick principles were discovered, musick has been a great independent science.'—SEWARD. Invent is applied to the mechanical arts;

The sire of gods and men, with hard decrees,
Forbids our plenty to be bought with ease;
Himself invented first the shining share,
And whetted human industry by care.—DRYDEN.

We speak of finding modes for performing actions, and effecting purposes; of inventing machines, instruments, and various matters of use or elegance; of discovering the operations and laws of nature. Many fruitless attempts have been made to find the longitude: men have not been so unsuccessful in finding out various arts for communicating their thoughts, commemorating the exploits of their nations, and supplying themselves with luxuries; nor have they failed in every species of machine or instrument which can aid their purpose. Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood: Torricelli discovered the gravity of the air: by geometry the properties of figures are discovered; by chymistry the properties of compound substances: but the geometriician finds by reasoning the solution of any problem; or by investigating, he finds out a clearer method of solving the same problems; or he invents an instrument by which the proof can be deduced from ocular demonstration. Thus the astronomer discovers the motions of the heavenly bodies, by means of the telescope which has been invented.

EMISSARY, SPY.

Emissary, in Latin emissarius, from emitto to send forth, signifies one sent out; spy, in French espion, from the Latin specio to look into or look about, signifies one narrowly searched.

Both these words designate a person sent out by a body on some publick concern among their enemies, but they differ in their office according to the etymology of the words.

The emissary is by distinction sent forth, he is sent so as to mix with the people to whom he goes, to be in all places, and to associate with every one individually as may serve his purpose; the spy, on the other hand, takes his station wherever he can best perceive what is passing; he keeps himself at a distance from all but such as may particularly aid him in the object of his search.

The object of an emissary is by direct communication with the enemy to sow the seeds of dissension, to spread false alarms, and to disseminate false principles; the object of a spy is to get information of an enemy's plans and movements.

Although the office of emissary and spy are neither of them honourable, yet that of the former is more disgraceful than that of the latter. The emissary is generally employed by those who have some illegitimate object to pursue; 'The Jesuits send over emissaries with instructions to personate themselves members of the several sects among us.'—SWIFT. Spies on the other hand are employed by all regular governments in a time of warfare; 'He (Henry I.) began with the Earl of Shrewsbury, who was watched for some time by spies and then indicted upon a charge of forty-five articles.'—HUME.

In the time of the Revolution, the French sent their emissaries into every country, civilized or uncivilized, to fan the flame of rebellion against established governments. At Sparta, the trade of a spy was not so vile as it has been generally esteemed; it was considered as a self-devotion for the publick good, and formed a part of their education.

These terms are both applied in an extended application with a similar distinction; 'What generally makes pain itself, if I may so say, more painful, is that it is considered as the emissary of the king of terrors.'—BURKE.

These wretched spies of wit must soon confess,
They take more pains to please themselves less.

DRYDEN.

MARK, PRINT, IMPRESSION, STAMP.

Mark is the same in the northern languages, and in the Persian marz; print and impression, both from the Latin premo to press, signify the visible effect produced by printing or pressing; stamp signifies the effect produced by stamping.

The word mark is the most general in sense: whatever alters the external face of an object is a mark; the print is some specifick mark, or a figure drawn upon the surface of an object; the impression is the mark pressed either upon or into a body; the stamp is the mark that is stamped in or upon the body. The mark is confined to no size, shape, or form; the print is a mark that represents an object: the mark may consist of a spot, a line, a stain, or a smear; but a print describes a given object, as a house, a man, &c. A mark is either a protuberance or a depression; an impression is always a sinking in of the object: a hillock or a hole are both marks; but the latter is properly the impression: the stamp mostly resembles the impression, unless in the case of a seal, which is stamped upon paper, and occasions an elevation with the wax.

The mark is occasioned by every sort of action, gentle or violent, artificial or natural; by the voluntary act of a person, or the unconscious act of inanimate bodies; by means of compression or friction; by a touch or a blow, and the like: all the others are occasioned by one or more of these modes; 'De la Chambre asserts positively that from the marks on the body, the configuration of the plalets at a nativity may be gathered.'—WALSH. The print is occasioned by artificial means of compression, as when the print of letters or pictures is made on paper; or by accidental and natural compression, as when the print of the hand is made on the wall, or the print of the foot is made on the ground;

From hence Astrea took her flight, and here
The prints of her departing steps appear.

DRYDEN.

The impression is made by means more or less violent, as when an impression is made upon wood by the axe or hammer; or by means gradual and natural, as by the dripping of water on stone. The stamp is made by means of direct pressure with an artificial instrument.

Mark is of such universal application that it is confined to no objects whatever, either in the natural or moral world; print is mostly applied to material objects, the face of which undergoes a lasting change, as the printing made on paper or wood; impression is more commonly applied to such natural objects as are particularly solid; stamp is generally applied to paper, or still softer and more yielding bodies. Impression and stamp have both a moral application: events or speeches make an impression on the mind: things bear a certain stamp which bespeaks their origin. Where the passions have obtained an ascendancy, the occasional good impressions which are produced by religious observances but too frequently die away; 'No man can offer at the change of the government established, without first gaining new authority, and in some degree debasing the old by appearance and impressions of contrary qualities in those who before enjoyed it.'—TEMPLE. The Christian religion carries with itself the stamp of truth;

Adult'rate metals to the sterling stamp
Appear not meaner than mere human lines
Compar'd with those whose inspiration shines.

ROSCOMMON.

MARK, SIGN, NOTE, SYMPTOM, TOKEN, INDICATION.

Mark, v. Mark, impression; sign, in Latin signum, Greek σημα from σῆμα to punctuate, signifies the thing that points out; symptom, in Latin sympnoma, Greek συμπτωμα from συμπίπτω to fall out in accordance with any thing, signifies what presents itself to confirm one's opinion; token, through the medium of the northern languages, comes from the Greek τεκνον; indication, in Latin indicatio from indico, and the Greek ἐνδεικναι to point out, signifies the thing which points out.

The idea of an external object which serves to direct the observer, is common to all these terms; the difference consists in the objects that are employed. Any thing may serve as a mark, a stroke, a dot, a stick set up, and the like; it serves simply to guide the senses: the sign is something more complex; it consists of a figure or representation of some object, as the twelve signs of the zodiac, or the signs which are affixed to houses of entertainment, or to shops. Marks are arbitrary; every one chooses his mark at pleasure: signs have commonly a connexion with the object that is to be observed: a house, a tree, a letter, or any external object may be chosen as a mark; but a tobaccoconist chooses the sign of a black man; the innkeeper chooses the head of the reigning prince. Marks serve in general simply to aid the memory in distinguishing the situation of objects, or the particular circumstances of persons or things, as the marks which are set up in the garden to distinguish the ground that is occupied; they may, therefore, be private, and known only to the individual or individuals that make them, as the private marks by which a tradesman distinguishes the prices; they may likewise be changeable and fluctuating, according to the humour and convenience of the maker, as the private marks which are employed by the military on guard. Signs, on the contrary, serve to direct the understanding; they have either a natural or an artificial resemblance to the object to be represented; they are consequently chosen, not by the will of one, but by the universal consent of a body; they are not chosen for the moment, but for a permanency, as in the case of language, either oral or written, in the case of the zodiacal signs, or the sign of the cross, the algebrical signs, and the like. It is clear, therefore, that many objects may be both a mark and a sign, according to the above illustration: the cross which is employed in books, by way of reference to notes, is a mark only, because it serves merely to guide the eye, or assist the memory; but the figure of the cross, when employed in reference to the cross of our Saviour, is a sign, inasmuch as it conveys a distinct idea of something else to the mind; so likewise, little strokes over letters, or even letters themselves, may merely be marks, while they only point out a difference between this or that letter, this or that object; but this same stroke becomes a sign, if, as in the first declension of Latin nouns, it points out the ablative case, it is the sign of the ablative case; and a single letter affixed to different parcels is merely a mark so long as it simply serves this purpose; but the same letter, suppose it were a word, is a sign when it is used as a sign. It is, moreover, clear from the above, that there are many objects which serve as marks, which are never signs; and on the other hand, although signs are mostly composed, yet there are two sorts of signs which have nothing to do with the mark; namely, those which we obtain by any other sense than that of sight; or those which are only figures in the mind. When words are spoken, and not written, they are signs and not marks; and in like manner the sign of the cross, when made on the forehead of children in baptism, is a sign, but not a mark. This illustration of these two words in their strict and proper sense, will serve to explain them in their extended and metaphorical sense. A mark stands for nothing but what is visible; the sign stands for that only which is real. A star on the breast of an officer or nobleman is a mark of distinction or honour, because it distinguishes one person from another, and in a way that is apt to reflect honour; but it is not a sign of honour, because it is not the indubitable test of a man's honourable feelings, since it may be conferred by favour or by mistake, or from some partial circumstance.

The mark and sign may both stand for the appearance of things, and in that case the former shows the cause by the effect, the latter the consequent by the antecedent. When a thing is said to bear the marks of violence, the cause of the mark is judged of by the mark itself; but when we say that a lowering sky is a sign of rain, the future or consequent event is judged of by the present appearance;

So plain the signs, such prophets are the skies.

DRYDEN.

So likewise we judge by the marks of a person's foot that some one has been walking in a given place: when mariners meet with birds at sea, they consider them a sign that land is near at hand.

It is here worthy of observation, however, that mark is only used for that which may be seen, but that the sign may serve to direct our conclusions, even in that which affects the hearing, feeling, smell, or taste; thus hoarseness is a sign that the person has a cold; the effects which it produces on the patient are to himself sensible signs that he labours under such an affection. The smell of fire is a sign that some place is on fire; one of the two travellers, in La Mothe's fable, considered the taste of the wine as a sign that there must be leather in the bottle, and the other that there must be iron; and it proved that they were both right, for a little key with a bit of leather tied to it was found at the bottom.

In this sense of the words they are applied to moral objects with precisely the same distinction: the mark illustrates the spring of the action; the sign shows the state of the mind or sentiments: it is a mark of folly or weakness in a man to yield himself implicitly to the guidance of an interested friend; 'The ceremonial laws of Moses were the marks to distinguish the people of God from the Gentiles.'—BACON. 'Tears are not always a sign of repentance; 'The sacring of the kings of France (as Loyal says) is the sign of their sovereign priesthood.'—TEMPLE.

A note is rather a sign than a mark; but it is properly the sign which consists of marks, as a note of admiration (C), and likewise a note which consists of many letters and words.

Symptom is rather a mark than a sign; it explains the cause or origin of complaints, by the appearances they assume, and is employed as a technical term only

In the science of medicine: as a foaming at the mouth, and an abhorrence of drink, are symptoms of canine madness; motion and respiration are signs of life. Symptom may likewise be used figuratively in application to moral objects; 'This fall of the French monarchy was far from being preceded by any exterior symptoms of decline.'—BURKE.

Token is a species of mark in the moral sense, indication a species of sign; the mark shows what is, the token serves to keep in mind what has been: a gift to a friend is a mark of one's affection and esteem; if it be permanent in its nature it becomes a token: friends who are in close intercourse have perpetual opportunities of showing each other marks of their regard by reciprocal acts of courtesy and kindness; when they separate for any length of time, they commonly leave some token of their tender sentiments in each other's hands, as a pledge of what shall be, as well as an evidence of what has been; 'The famous bull-feasts are an evident token of the Quixotism and romantic taste of the Spaniards.'—SOMERVILLE.

Sign, as it respects an indication, is said in abstract and general propositions: indication itself is only employed for some particular individual referred to; it bespeaks the act of the persons; but the sign is only the face or appearance of the thing. When a man does not live consistently with the profession which he holds, it is a sign that his religion is built on a wrong foundation; parents are gratified when they observe the slightest indications of genius or goodness in their children; 'It is certain Virgil's parents gave him a good education, to which they were inclined by the early indications he gave of a sweet disposition and excellent wit.'—WALSH.

MARK, TRACE, VESTIGE, FOOTSTEP, TRACK.

The word mark has already been considered at large in the preceding article, but it will admit of farther illustration when taken in the sense of that which is visible, and serves to show the existing state of things; mark is here, as before, the most general and unqualified term; the other terms varying in the circumstances or manner of the mark; trace, in Italian traccia, Greek τρέχειν to run, and Hebrew דרך way, signifies any continued mark; vestige, in Latin vestigium, not improbably contracted from pedis and stigium or stigma, from στίγω to imprint, signifies a print of the foot; footstep is taken for the place in which the foot has stepped, or the mark made by that step; track, derived from the same source as trace, signifies the way run, or the mark produced by that running.

The mark is said of a fresh and uninterrupted line; the trace is said of that which is broken by time; a carriage, in driving along the sand leaves marks of the wheels, but in a short time all traces of its having been there will be lost: the mark is produced by the action of bodies on one another in every possible form; the spilling of a liquid may leave a mark on the floor; the blow of a stick leaves a mark on the body;

I have served him
In this old body; yet the marks remain
Of many wounds.—ORWAY.

The trace is a mark produced only by bodies making a progress or proceeding in a continued course: the ship that cuts the waves, and the bird that cuts the air, leaves no traces of their course behind; so men pass their lives, and after death they leave no traces that they ever were; 'The greatest favours to an ungrateful man are but like the motion of a ship upon the waves: they leave no trace, no sign behind them.'—SOUTH. These words are both applied to moral objects, but the mark is produced by objects of inferior importance; it excites a momentary observation, but does not carry us back to the past; its cause is either too obvious or too minute to awaken attention; a trace is generally a mark of something which we may wish to see. Marks of haste and imbecility in a common writer excite no surprise, and call forth no observation;

These are the monuments of Helen's love,
The shame I bear below, the marks I bore above.
DRYDEN.

In a writer of long standing celebrity, we look for traces of his former genius.

The vestige is a species of the mark caused literally by the foot of man, and consequently applied to such places as have been inhabited, where the active industry of man has left visible marks; it is a species of trace, inasmuch as it carries us back to that which was, but is not at present. We discover by marks that things have been; we discover by traces and vestiges what they have been: a hostile army always leaves sufficiently evident marks of its having passed through a country; there are traces of the Roman roads still visible in London and different parts of England: Rome contains many vestiges of its former greatness; 'Both Britain and Ireland had temples for the worship of the gods, the vestiges of which are now remaining.'—PARSONS.

Mineralogists assert that there are many marks of a universal deluge discoverable in the fossils and strata of the earth; philological inquirers imagine that there are traces in the existing languages of the world sufficient to ascertain the progress by which the earth became populated after the deluge; the pyramids are vestiges of antiquity which raise our ideas of human greatness beyond any thing which the modern state of the arts can present. Vestige, like the two former may be applied to moral as well as natural objects with the same line of distinction. A person betrays marks of levity in his conduct. Wherever we discover traces of the same customs or practices in one country which are prevalent in another, we suppose those countries to have had an intercourse or connexion of some kind with one another at a certain remote period.

Footstep and track are sometimes employed as a mark, but often as a road or course: when we talk of following the footsteps of another, it may signify either to follow the marks of his footsteps as a guide for the course we should take, or to walk in the very same steps as he has done: the former is the act of one who is in pursuit of another; the latter is the act of him who follows in a train. Footsteps is employed only for the steps of an individual; the track is made by the steps of many; it is the line which has been beaten out or made by stamping: the term footstep can only be employed for men or brutes; but track is applied to inanimate objects, as the wheel of a carriage. When Cacus took away the oxen of Hercules, he dragged them backward that they might not be traced by their footsteps: a track of blood from the body of a murdered man may sometimes lead to the detection of the murderer.

In the metaphorical application they do not signify a mark, but a course of conduct; the former respects one's moral feelings or mode of dealing; the latter one's mechanical and habitual manner of acting: the former is the consequence of having the same principles; the latter proceeds from imitation or constant repetition.

A good son will walk in the footsteps of a good father. In the management of business it is rarely wise in a young man to leave the track which has been marked out for him by his superiors in age and experience;

Virtue alone ennobles humankind,
And power should on her glorious footsteps wait.
WYNNE.

Though all seems lost, 't is impious to despair,
The tracks of Providence like rivers wind.

HIGGONS

MARK, BADGE, STIGMA.

Mark (v. Mark, print) is still the general, and the two other specific terms; they are employed for whatever externally serves to characterize persons, or to betoken any part either of his character or his circumstances: mark is employed either in a good, bad, or indifferent sense; badge in an indifferent; stigma in a bad sense: a thing may either be a mark of honour, of disgrace, or of simple distinction: a badge is a mark simply of distinction; the stigma is a mark of disgrace. The mark is conferred upon a person for his merits, as medals, stars, and ribands are bestowed by princes upon meritorious officers and soldiers; or the mark attaches to a person, or is affixed to him, in consequence of his demerits; as a low situation in his class is a mark of disgrace to a scholar; or a fool's cap is a mark of ignominy affixed to idlers and dunces; or a brand in the forehead is a mark of ignominy for criminals; 'In these revolutionary meetings, every counsel, in proportion as it is daring and violent and perfidious, is taken for the mark of superiourgenius.'—BURKE. The badge is voluntarily assumed by one's self according to established custom; it consists of dress by which the office, station, and even religion of a particular community is distinguished: as the gown and wig is the badge of gentlemen in the law; the gown and surplice that of clerical men; the uniform of charity children is the badge of their condition; the peculiar habit of the Quakers and Methodists is the badge of their religion; The people of England look upon hereditary succession as a security for their liberty, not as a badge of servitude.'—BURKE.

The stigma consists not so much in what is openly imposed upon a person as what falls upon him in the judgement of others; it is the black mark which is set upon a person by the publick, and is consequently the strongest of all marks, which every one most dreads, and every good man seeks least to deserve. A simple mark may sometimes be such only in our own imagination; as when one fancies that dress is a mark of superiority, or the contrary; that the courtesies which we receive from a superiour are marks of his personal esteem and regard; but the stigma is not what an individual imagines for himself, but what is conceived towards him by others; the office of a spy and informer is so odious, that every man of honest feeling holds the very name to be a stigma; although a stigma is in general the consequence of a man's real unworthiness, yet it is possible for particular prejudices and ruling passions to make that a stigma which is not so deservedly; as in the case of men's religious profession, inasmuch as it is not accompanied with any moral depravity; it is mostly unjust to attach a stigma to a whole body of men for their speculative views; 'The cross, which our Saviour's enemies thought was to stigmatize him with infamy, became the ensign of his renown.'—BLAIR.

MARK, BUTT.

After all that has been said upon the word mark (v. Mark, print), it has this additional meaning in common with the word butt, that it implies an object aimed at: the mark is however literally a mark that is said to be shot at by the marksman with a gun or a bow;

A fluttering dove upon the top they tie,
The living mark at which their arrows fly.

DRYDEN.

Or it is metaphorically employed for the man who by his peculiar characteristics makes himself the object of notice; he is the mark at which every one's looks and thoughts are directed;

He made the mark
For all the people's hate, the prince's curses.

DENHAM.

The butt, from the French but the end, is a species of mark in this metaphorical sense; but the former only calls forth general observation, the latter provokes the laughter and jokes of every one. Whoever renders himself conspicuous by his eccentricities either in his opinions or his actions, must not complain if he becomes a mark for the derision of the publick; it is a man's misfortune rather than his fault if he become the butt of a company who are rude and unfeeling enough to draw their pleasures from another's pain; 'I mean those honest gentlemen that are pelted by men, women, and children, by friends and foes, and in a word stand as butts in conversation.'—ADDISON.

TO DERIVE, TRACE, DEDUCE.

Derive, from the Latin de and rivus a river, signifies to drain after the manner of water from its source; trace, in Italian tracciare, Greek τρέχω to run, Hebrew רץ to go, signifies to go by a line drawn out, to follow the line; deduce, in Latin deduco, signifies to bring from.

The idea of drawing one thing from another is included in all the actions designated by these terms. The act of deriving is immediate and direct; that of tracing a gradual process; that of deducing by a ratiocinative process.

We discover causes and sources by derivation; we discover the course, progress, and commencement of things by tracing; we discover the grounds and reasons of things by deduction. A person derives his name from a given source; he traces his family up to a given period; principles or powers are deduced from circumstances or observations. The Trojans derived the name of their city from Tros, a king of Phrygia; they traced the line of their kings up to Dardanus; 'The kings among the heathens ever derived them selves or their ancestors from some good.'—TEMPLE

Let Newton, pure intelligence! whom God
To mortals lent to trace his boundless works,
From laws sublimely simple speak thy fame.

THOMSON.

Copernicus deduced the principle of the earth's turning round from several simple observations, particularly from the apparent and contrary motion of bodies that are really at rest. The English tongue is of such mixed origin that there is scarcely any known language from which some one of its words is not derivable; it is an interesting employment to trace the progress of science and civilization in countries which have been involved in ignorance and barbarism; from the writings of Locke and other philosophers of an equally loose stamp, have been deduced principles both in morals and politics that are destructive to the happiness of men in civil society; 'From the discovery of some natural authority may perhaps be deduced a truer original of all governments among men than from any contracts.'—TEMPLE.

TO IMPLANT, INGRAFT, INCULCATE, INSTIL, INFUSE.

To plant is properly to fix plants in the ground, to implant is, in the improper sense, to fix principles in the mind. Graft is to make one plant grow on the stock of another; to ingraft is to make particular principles flourish in the mind, and form a part of the character. Calco is in Latin to tread; and inculcate to stamp into the mind. Stillo, in Latin, is literally to fall dropwise; instillo, to instil, is, in the improper sense, to make sentiments as it were drop into the mind. Fundo, in Latin, is literally to pour in a stream; infundo, to infuse, is, in the improper sense, to pour principles or feelings into the mind.

To implant, ingraft, and inculcate are said of abstract opinions, or rules of right and wrong; instil and infuse of such principles as influence the heart, the affections, and the passions. It is the business of the parent in early life to implant sentiments of virtue in his child;

With various seeds of art deep in the mind
Implanted.—THOMSON.

It is the business of the teacher to ingraft them; 'The reciprocal attraction in the minds of men is a principle ingrafted in the very first formation of the soul, by the Author of our nature.'—BERKELEY. The belief of a Deity, and all the truths of Divine Revelation, ought to be implanted in the mind of the child as soon as it can understand anything: if it have not enjoyed this privilege in its earliest infancy, the task of ingrafting these principles afterward into the mind is attended with considerable difficulty and uncertainty of success. 'To inculcate is a more immediate act than either to implant or ingraft. It is the business of the preacher to inculcate the doctrines of Christianity from the pulpit; 'To preach practical sermons, as they are called, that is, sermons upon virtues and vices, without inculcating the great Scripture truths of redemption, grace, &c. which alone can enable and incite us to forsake sin and follow after righteousness; what is it, but to put together the wheels and set the hands of a watch, forgetting the spring which is to make them all go?'—BISHOP HORNE. Instilling is a corresponding act with implanting; we implant belief; we instil the feeling which is connected with this belief. It is not enough to have an abstract belief of a God implanted into the mind: we must likewise have a love and a fear of him, and reverence for his holy name and Word, instilled into the mind.

To instil is a gradual process which is the natural work of education; to infuse is a more arbitrary and immediate act. Sentiments are instilled into the mind, not altogether by the personal efforts of any individual, but likewise by collateral endeavours; they are now-ever infused at the express will, and with the express endeavour of some person. By the reading of the Scriptures, an attendance on publick worship, and the influence of example, combined with the instructions of a parent, religious sentiments are instilled into the mind; 'The apostle often makes mention of sound doctrine in opposition to the extravagant and corrupt opinions which false teachers, even in those days, instilled into the minds of their ignorant and unwary disciples.'—BEVERIDGE. By the counsel and conversation of an intimate friend, an even current of the feeling becomes infused into the mind;

No sooner grows
The soft infusion prevalent and wide,
Than, all alive, at once their joy o'erflows
In musick unconfin'd.—THOMSON.

Instil is applicable only to permanent sentiments; infuse may be said of any partial feeling: hence we speak of infusing a poison into the mind by means of insidious and mischievous publications, or infusing a jealousy by means of crafty insinuations, or infusing an ardour into the minds of soldiers by means of spirited addresses coupled with military successes.

TO IMPRINT, IMPRESS, ENGRAVE.

Print and press are both derived from pressus, participle of premo, signifying in the literal sense to press, or to make a mark by pressing; to impress and imprint are morally employed in the same sense. Things are impressed on the mind so as to produce a conviction: they are imprinted on it so as to produce recollection. If the truths of Christianity be impressed on the mind, they will show themselves in a corresponding conduct: whatever is imprinted on the mind in early life, or by any particular circumstance, is not readily forgotten;

Whence this disdain of life in ev'ry breast,
But from a notion on their minds impress'd
That all who for their country die are bless'd!
JENYNS.

'Such a strange, sacred, and inviolable mystery has God imprinted upon this faculty (the conscience), that it can never be deposed.'—SOUTH. Engrave, from grave and the German graben to dig, expresses more in the proper sense than either, and the same in its moral application; for we may truly say that if the truths of Christianity be engraved in the minds of youth, they can never be eradicated;

Deep on his front engraven,
Deliberation sat, and publick care.—MILTON.

SEAL, STAMP.

Seal is a specifick, stamp a general, term: there cannot be a seal without a stamp; but there may be many stamps where there is no seal. Seal, in Latin sigillum, signifies a signet or little sign, consisting of any one's coat of arms, or any other device; the stamp is, in general, any impression whatever which has been made by stamping, that is, any impression which is not easily to be effaced. In the improper sense, the seal is the authority; thus to set one's seal is the same as to authorize, and the seal of truth is any outward mark which characterizes it;

Therefore, not long in force this charter stood,
Wanting that seal, it must be seal'd in blood.
DENHAM.

In the stamp is the impression by which we distinguish the thing; thus a thing is said to bear the stamp of truth, of sincerity, of veracity, and the like;

Wisdom for parts is madness for the whole,
This stamps the paradox, and gives us leave
To call the wisest weak.—YOUNG.

PICTURE, PRINT, ENGRAVING.

Picture (v. Painting) is any likeness taken by the hand of the artist; the print is the copy of the painting in a printed state; and the engraving is that which is produced by an engraver: every engraving is a print; but every print is not a picture; for the picture may be printed off from something besides an engraving, as in the case of wood cuts. The picture is sometimes taken for any representation of a likeness without regard to the mode by which it is formed: in this case it is employed mostly for the representations of the common kind that are found in books; but the print and engraving are said of the higher specimens of the art. On certain occasions the word engraving is most appropriate, as to take an engraving of a particular object; on other occasions the word print, as a handsome print or a large print;

The pictures plac'd for ornament and use,
The twelve good rules, the royal game of goose.
GOLDSMITH

Tim, with surprise and pleasure staring,
Ran to the glass, and then comparing
His own sweet figure with the print,
Distinguish'd every feature in 't.—SWIFT.

'Since the publick has of late begun to express a relish for engravings, drawings, copyings, and for the original paintings of the chief Italian school, I doubt not that in very few years we shall make an equal progress in this other science.'—EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

TO MARK, NOTE, NOTICE.

Mark is here taken in the intellectual sense, fixing as it were a mark (v. Mark) upon a thing so as to keep it in mind, which is in fact to fix one's attention upon it in such a manner as to be able to distinguish it by its characteristic qualities; to mark is therefore altogether an intellectual act: to note has the same end as that of marking, namely, to aid the memory; but one notes a thing by making a written note of it; this is therefore a mechanical act: to notice, on the other hand, is a sensible operation, from notitia knowledge signifying to bring to one's knowledge, perception, or understanding by the use of our senses. We mark and note that which particularly interests us. Marking serves a present purpose. Noting is applied to that which may be of use in future. The impatient lover marks the hours until the time arrives for meeting his mistress; 'Many who mark with such accuracy the course of time appear to have little sensibility of the decline of life.'—JOHNSON. Travellers note whatever strikes them of importance to be remembered when they return home;

O treach'rous conscience! while she seems to sleep,
Unnoted, notes each moment misapp'ly'd.—YOUNG.

To notice may serve either for the present or the future: we may notice things merely by way of amusement, as a child will notice the actions of animals; or we may notice a thing for the sake of bearing it in mind, as a person notices a particular road when he wishes to return; 'An Englishman's notice of the weather is the natural consequence of changeable skies and uncertain seasons.'—JOHNSON.

TO NOTICE, REMARK, OBSERVE.

To notice (v. To attend to) is either to take or to give notice: to remark, compounded of re and mark (v. Mark), signifies to reflect or bring back any mark to our own mind, or communicate the same to another: to mark is to mark a thing once, but to remark is to mark it again; observe (v. Looker-on) signifies either to keep a thing present before one's own view, or to communicate our view to another.

In the first sense of these words, as the action respects ourselves, to notice and remark require simple attention, to observe requires examination. To notice is a more cursory action than to remark; we may notice a thing by a single glance, or on merely turning one's head; but to remark supposes a reaction of the mind on an object: we notice that a person passes our door on a certain day and at a certain hour; but we remark to others that he goes past every day at the same hour: we notice that the sun sets this evening under a cloud, and we remark that it has done so for several evenings successively; we notice the state of a person's health or his manners in company, we remark his habits and peculiarities in domestic life. What is noticed and remarked strikes on the senses, and awakens the mind: what is observed is looked after and sought for. Noticing and remarking are often involuntary acts; we see, hear, and think, because the objects obtrude themselves uncalled for: but observing is intentional as well as voluntary; we see, hear, and think on that which we have watched. We remark things as matters of fact; we observe them in order to judge of, or draw conclusions from, them: we remark that the wind lies for a long time in a certain quarter; we observe that whenever it lies in a certain quarter it brings rain with it. A general notice any thing particular in the appearance of his army; he remarks that the men have not for a length of time worn contented faces; he consequently observes their actions, when they think they are not seen, in order to discover the cause of their dissatisfaction: people who have no curiosity are sometimes attracted to notice the stars or planets, when they are particularly bright; those who look frequently will remark that the same star does not rise exactly in the same place for two successive nights; but the astronomer goes farther, and observes all the motions of the heavenly bodies, in order to discover the scheme of the universe; 'The depravity of mankind is so easily discoverable, that nothing but the desert or cell can exclude it from notice.'—JOHNSON. 'The glass that magnifies its objects contracts the sight to a point, and the mind must be fixed upon a single character, to remark its minute peculiarities.'—JOHNSON. 'The course of time is so visibly marked, that it is observed even by the birds of passage.'—JOHNSON.

In the latter sense of these verbs, as respects the communications to others of what passes in our own minds, to notice is to make known our sentiments by various ways; to remark and observe are to make them known only by means of words: to notice is a personal act towards an individual, in which we direct our attention to him, as may happen either by a bow, a nod, a word, or even a look; 'As some do perceive, yea, and like it well, they should be so noticed.'—HOWARD. To remark and observe are said only of the thoughts which pass in our own minds, and are expressed to others: friends notice each other when they meet; they remark to others the impression which passing objects make upon their minds; 'He cannot distinguish difficult and noble speculations from trifling and vulgar remarks.'—COLLIER. The observations which intelligent people make are always entitled to notice from young persons; 'Wherever I have found her notes to be wholly another's, which is the case in some hundreds, I have barely quoted the true proprietor, without observing upon it.'—POPE.

OBSERVATION, OBSERVANCE.

These terms derive their use from the different significations of the verb; observation is the act of observing objects with the view to examine them (v. To notice); observance is the act of observing a thing in the sense of keeping or holding it sacred (v. To keep). From a minute observation of the human body, anatomists have discovered the circulation of the blood, and the source of all the humours; 'The pride which, under the check of public observation would have been only vented among domestics, becomes, in a country baronet, the torment of a province.'—JOHNSON. By a strict observance of truth and justice, a man acquires the title of an upright man; 'You must not fail to behave yourself towards my Lady Clare, your grandmother, with all duty and observance.'—EARL STAFFORD.

EXTRAORDINARY, REMARKABLE,

Are epithets both opposed to the ordinary; and in that sense the extraordinary is that which in its own nature is remarkable: but things, however, may be extraordinary which are not remarkable, and the contrary. The extraordinary is that which is out of the ordinary course; but it does not always excite remark, and is not therefore remarkable; as when we speak of an extraordinary loan, an extraordinary measure of government: on the other hand, when extraordinary conveys the idea of what deserves notice, it expresses much more than remarkable. There are but few extraordinary things; many things are remarkable: the remarkable is eminent; the extraordinary is supereminent: the extraordinary excites our astonishment; the remarkable only awakens our interest and attention. The extraordinary is unexpected; the remarkable is sometimes looked for: every instance of sagacity and fidelity in a dog is remarkable, and some extraordinary instances have been related, which would almost stagger our belief; 'The love of praise is a passion deep in the mind of every extraordinary person.'—HUGHES 'The heroes of literary history have been no less remarkable for what they have suffered than for what they have achieved.'—JOHNSON.

REMARK, OBSERVATION, COMMENT, NOTE, ANNOTATION, COMMENTARY.

Remark and observation, v. To notice; comment, in Latin commentum, from commisitor to call to mind, are either spoken or written; note, annotation, v. Note; and commentary, a variation of comment, are always written. Remark and observation, admitting of the same distinction in both cases, have been sufficiently explained in the article referred to; 'Spence, in his remarks on Pope's Odyssey, produces what he thinks an unconquerable quotation from Dryden's preface to the Æneid, in favour of translating an epic poem into blank verse.'—JOHNSON. 'If the critic has published nothing but rules and observations on criticism, I then consider whether there be a propriety and elegance in his thoughts and words.'—ADDISON. Comment is a species of remark which often loses in good-nature what it gains in seriousness; it is mostly applied to particular persons or cases, and more commonly employed as a vehicle of censure than of commendation; public speakers and public performers are exposed to all the comments which the vanity, the envy, and ill-nature of self-constituted critics can suggest; but when not employed in personal cases, it serves for explanation;

Sublime or low, unbended or intense,
The sound is still a comment to the sense.

ROSCOMMON

The other terms are used in this sense only, but with certain modifications: the note is most general, and serves to call the attention to, as well as illustrate, particular passages in the text; 'The history of the notes (to Pope's Homer) has never been traced.'—JOHNSON. Annotations and commentaries are more minute; the former being that which is added by way of appendage, the latter being employed in a general form; as the annotations of the Greek scholiasts, and the commentaries on the sacred writings; 'I love a critic who mixes the rules of life with annotations upon writers.'—STEELE. 'Memoirs or memorials are of two kinds whereof the one may be termed commentaries, the other registers.'—BACON.

TO MENTION, NOTICE.

These terms are synonymous only inasmuch as they imply the act of calling things to another person's mind. Mention, from mens mind, signifies here to bring to mind. We mention a thing in direct terms. To notice (v. To mark), signifies to take notice of a thing indirectly or in a casual manner: we mention that which may serve as information; we notice that which may be merely of a personal or incidental nature. One friend mentions to another what has passed at a particular meeting: in the course of conversation he notifies or calls to the notice of his companion the badness of the road, the wideness of the street, or the like; 'The great critic I have before mentioned, though a heathen, has taken notice of the sublime manner in which the lawgiver of the Jews has described the creation.'—ADDISON.

TO SHOW, POINT OUT, MARK, INDICATE

Show, in German schauen, &c. Greek θεδουαι, comes from the Hebrew שׁוּן to look upon; to point out is to fix a point upon a thing.

Show is here the general term, and the others specific: the common idea included in the signification of them all is that of making a thing visible to another. To show is an indefinite term; one shows by simply setting a thing before the eyes of another; to point out is specific; it is to show some particular point by a direct and immediate application to it: we show a person a book, when we put it into his hands; but we point out the beauties of its contents by making a point upon them, or accompanying the action with some particular movement which shall direct the attention of the observer in a specific manner. Many things, therefore, may be shown which cannot be pointed out: a person shows himself but he does not point himself out; towns, houses, gardens, and the like, are shown; but single things of any description are pointed out.

To show and point out are personal acts, which are addressed from one individual to another; but to mark (v. Mark, impression) is an indirect means of making a thing visible or observable: a person may mark something in the absence of others, by which he intends to distinguish it from all others: thus a tradesman marks the prices and names of the articles which he sets forth in his shop. We show by holding in one's hand; we point out with the finger; we mark with a pen or pencil. To show and mark are the acts either of a conscious or an unconscious agent; to point out is the act of a conscious agent only, unless taken figuratively;

His faculties unfolded, pointed out
Where Javish nature the directing hand
Of art demanded.—THOMSON.

To indicate (v. Mark, sign) that of an unconscious agent only: persons or things show, persons only point out, and things only indicate.

As applied to things, show is a more positive term than mark or indicate; that which shows serves as a proof;

The glow-worm shows the matin to be near,
And 'gins to pale his ineffectual fire.—SHAKESPEARE.

That which marks serves as a rule or guide for distinguishing; 'For our quiet possession of things useful, they are naturally marked where there is need.'—GREY. Nothing shows us the fallacy of forming schemes for the future, more than the daily evidences which we have of the uncertainty of our existence; nothing marks the character of a man more strongly than the manner in which he bestows or receives favours. To mark is commonly applied to that which is habitual and permanent; to indicate to that which is temporary or partial. A single act or expression sometimes marks the ruling temper of the mind; a look may indicate what is passing in the mind at the time. A man's abstinence to give relief to great distress when it is in his power, marks an unfeeling character; when a person gives another a cold reception, it indicates at least that there is no cordiality between them; 'Amid this wreck of human nature, traces still remain which indicate its author.'—BLAIR.

TO SHOW, EXHIBIT, DISPLAY.

To show is here, as before, the generic term; to exhibit (v. To give), and display, in French deployer, in all probability changed from the Latin plico, signifying to unfold or set forth to view, are specific: they may all designate the acts of either persons or things: the first, however, does this either in the proper or the improper sense; the two latter rather in the improper sense. To show is an indefinite action applied to every object: we may show that which belongs to others, as well as ourselves; we commonly exhibit that which belongs to ourselves: we show corporeal or mental objects; we exhibit that which is mental or the work of the mind: one shows what is worth seeing in a house or grounds; he exhibits his skill on a stage. To show is an indifferent action: we may show accidentally or designedly, to please others, or to please ourselves;

If I do feign
O let me in my present wildness die,
And never live to show the incredulous world
The noble change that I have purposed.

SHAKESPEARE.

We exhibit and display with an express intention, and that mostly to please ourselves; we may show in a private or a public manner before one or many; we commonly exhibit and display in a public manner, or at least in such a manner as will enable us best to be seen. Exhibit and display have this farther distinction, that the former is mostly taken in a good or an indifferent sense, the latter in a bad sense: we may exhibit our powers from a laudable ambition to be esteemed; but we seldom make a display of any quality that is in itself praiseworthy, or from any motive but vanity: what we exhibit is, therefore, intrinsically good; what we display may often be only an imaginary or fictitious excellence. A musician exhibits his skill on any particular instrument; a fop displays his gold seals, or an ostentatious man displays his plate or his fine furniture; 'The exhibitors of that show politically had placed whiffers armed and linked through the hall.'—GUYTON. 'They are all couched in a pit, with obscured lights, which at the very instant of our meeting they will at once display to the night.'—SHAKESPEARE.

Exhibit, when taken as the involuntary act of persons, may be applied to unfavourable objects in the sense of setting forth to the view of others; 'One of an unfortunate constitution is perpetually exhibiting a miserable example of the weakness of mind and body.'

—POPE. Display, on the other hand, is applied in a favourable sense; but it expresses the setting forth to view more strikingly than the word exhibit;

Thou heav'n's alternate beauty canst display
The blush of morning and the milky way.

DRYDEN.

When said of things, they differ principally in the manner and degree of clearness with which the thing appears to present itself to view: to show is, as before, altogether indefinite, and implies simply to bring to view; exhibit implies to bring inherent properties to light, that is, apparently by a process; to display is to set forth so as to strike the eye: the windows on a frosty morning will show the state of the weather;

Then let us fall, but fall amid our foes;
Despair of life the means of living shows.

DRYDEN.

Experiments with the air-pump exhibit the many wonderful and interesting properties of air; 'The world has ever been a great theatre, exhibiting the same repeated scene of the follies of men.'—BLAIR. The beauties of the creation are peculiarly displayed in the spring season;

Which interwoven Britons seem to raise,
And show the triumph that their shame displays.

DRYDEN.

SHOW, EXHIBITION, REPRESENTATION, SIGHT, SPECTACLE.

Show signifies the thing shown (v. To show): exhibition signifies the thing exhibited (v. To show); representation, the thing represented: sight, the thing to be seen; and spectacle, from the Latin specto, stands for the thing to be beheld.

Show is here, as in the former article, the most general term. Every thing set forth to view is shown; and if set forth for the amusement of others, it is a show. This is the common idea included in the terms exhibition and representation: but show is a term of vulgar meaning and application; the others have a higher use and signification. The show consists of that which merely pleases the eye; it is not a matter either of taste or action, but merely of curiosity;

Charm'd with the wonders of the show,
On ev'ry side, above, below,
She now of this or that inquires,
What least was understood admirers.—GAY.

Exhibition, on the contrary, presents some effort of talent or some work of genius; 'Copley's picture of Lord Chatham's death is an exhibition of itself.'—BEATTIE. Representation sets forth the image or imitation of some thing by the power of art; 'There are many virtues which in their own nature are incapable of any outward representation.'—ADDISON. Hence we speak of a show of wild beasts; an exhibition of paintings; and a theatrical representation. The conjurer makes a show of his tricks at a fair to the wonder of the gazing multitude; the artist makes an exhibition of his works; representations of men and manners are given on the stage: shows are necessary to keep the populace in good humour; exhibitions are necessary for the encouragement of genius; representations are proper for the amusement of the cultivated, and the refinement of society. The show, exhibition and representation are presented by some one to the view of others; the sight and spectacle present themselves to view. Sight, like show, is a vulgar term; and spectacle the nobler term. Whatever is to be seen to excite notice is a sight, in which general sense it would comprehend every show, but in its particular sense it includes only that which casually offers itself to view: a spectacle, on the contrary, is that species of sight which has something in it to interest either the heart or the head of the observer: processions, reviews, sports, and the like, are sights; but battles, bull-fights, or public games of any description are spectacles, which interest but shock the feelings;

Their various arms afford a pleasing sight.
DRYDEN.

The weary Britons, whose warlike youth
Was by Maximilian lately led away,
Were to those pagans made an open prey,
And daily spectacle of sad decay.—SPENSER.

SHOW, OUTSIDE, APPEARANCE, SEMBLANCE.

Where there is show (v. To show) there must be outside and appearance; but there may be the last without the former. The term show always denotes an action, and refers to some person as agent; but the outside may be merely the passive quality of something. We speak, therefore, of a thing as mere show, to signify that what is shown is all that exists; and in this sense it may be termed mere outside, as consisting only of what is on the outside;

You'll find the friendship of the world is show,
Mere outward show.—SAVAGE.

The greater part of men behold nothing more than the rotation of human affairs. This is only the outside of things.—BLAIR. In describing a house, however, we speak of its outside, and not of its show; as also of the outside of a book, and not of the show. Appearance denotes an action as well as show; but the former is the act of an unconscious agent, the latter of one that is conscious and voluntary: the appearance presents itself to the view; the show is purposely presented to view. A person makes a show so as to be seen by others; his appearance is that which shows itself in him. To look only to show, or be concerned for show only, signifies to be concerned for that only which will attract notice; to look only to the outside signifies to be concerned only for that which may be seen in a thing, to the disregard of that which is not seen: to look only to appearances signifies the same as the former, except that outside is said in the proper sense of that which literally strikes the eye; but appearances extend to the conduct, and whatever may affect the reputation; 'Every accusation against persons of rank was heard with pleasure (by James I. of Scotland). Every appearance of guilt was examined with rigour.'—ROBERTSON.

Semblance or seeming (v. To seem) always conveys the idea of an unreal appearance, or at least is contrasted with that which is real; he who only wears the semblance of friendship would be ill deserving the confidence of a friend;

But man, the wildest beast of prey,
Wears friendship's semblance to betray.—MOORE.

SHOW, PARADE, OSTENTATION.

These terms are synonymous when they imply abstract actions: show is here, as in the preceding article, taken in the vulgar sense; ostentation and parade include the idea of something particular: a man makes a show of his equipage, furniture, and the like, by which he strikes the eye of the vulgar, and seeks to impress them with an idea of his wealth and superior rank; this is often the paltry refuge of weak minds to conceal their nothingness: a man makes a parade with his wealth, his knowledge, his charities, and the like, by which he endeavours to give weight and dignity to himself, proportioned to the solemnity of his proceedings: the show is, therefore, but a simple setting forth to view;

Great in themselves
They smile superior of external show.
SOMERVILLE.

The parade requires art, it is a forced effort to attract notice by the number and extent of the ceremonies: 'It was not in the mere parade of royalty that the Mexican potentates exhibited their power.'—ROBERTSON. The show and parade are confined to the act of showing, or the means which are employed to show; but the ostentation necessarily includes the purpose for which the display is made; he who does a thing so as to be seen and applauded by others, does it from ostentation, particularly in application to acts of charity, or of public subscription, in which a man strives to impress others with the extent of his wealth by the liberality of his gift; 'We are dazzled with the splendour of titles, the ostentation of learning, and the noise of victories.'—SPECTATOR.

SHOWY, GAUDY, GAY

Showy, having or being full of show (v. Show, outside), is mostly an epithet of dispraise; that which is showy has seldom any thing to deserve notice beyond that which catches the eye; gaudy, from the Latin gaudeo to rejoice, signifies literally full of joy; and is applied figuratively to the exterior of objects, but with the annexed bad idea of being striking to an excess: gay, on the contrary, which is only a contraction of gaudy, is used in the same sense as an epithet of praise. Some things may be showy, and in their nature properly so; thus the tail of a peacock is showy: artificial objects may likewise be showy, but they will not be preferred by persons of taste; 'Men of warm imaginations neglect solid and substantial happiness for what is showy and superficial.'—ADDISON. That which is gaudy is always artificial, and is always chosen by the vain, the vulgar, and the ignorant; a maid servant will bedizen herself with gaudy coloured ribbons;

The gaudy, babbling, and remorseful day
Is crept into the bosom of the sea.—SHAKESPEARE.

That which is gay is either nature itself, or nature imitated in the best manner: spring is a gay season, and flowers are its gayest accompaniments;

Jocund day
Upon the mountain tops sits gayly dress'd.
SHAKESPEARE.

MAGNIFICENCE, SPLENDOUR, POMP.

Magnificence, from magnus and facio, signifies doing largely, or on a large scale; splendour, in Latin splendor, from splendo to shine, signifies brightness in the external; pomp, in Latin pompa, in Greek πομπή procession, from πέμνω to send, signifies in general formality and ceremony.

Magnificence lies not only in the number and extent of the objects presented, but in their degree of richness as to their colouring and quality; splendour is but a characteristic of magnificence, attached to such objects as dazzle the eye by the quantity of light, or the beauty and strength of colouring: the entertainments of the eastern monarchs and princes are remarkable for their magnificence, from the immense number of their attendants, the crowd of equipages, the size of their palaces, the multitude of costly utensils, and the profusion of viands which constitute the arrangements for the banquet;

Not Babylon,
Nor great Alcairo, such magnificence
Equall'd in all their glories.—MILTON.

The entertainments of Europeans present much splendour, from the richness, the variety, and the brilliancy of dress, of furniture, and all the apparatus of a feast, which the refinements of art have brought to perfection;

Vain transitory splendours could not all
Relieve the tottering mansion from its fall.
GOLDSMITH.

Magnificence is seldom unaccompanied with splendour than splendour with magnificence; since quantity, as well as quality, is essential to the one; but quality, more than quantity, is an essential to the other: a large army drawn up in battle array is a magnificent spectacle, from the immensity of their numbers, and the order of their disposition; it will in all probability be a splendid scene if there be much richness in the dresses; the pomp will here consist in such large bodies of men acting by one impulse, and directed by one will. hence military pomp; it is the appendage of power, when displayed to publick view: on particular occasions, a monarch seated on his throne, surrounded by his courtiers, and attended by his guards, is said to appear with pomp;

Was all that pomp of wo for this prepar'd?
These fires, this fun'ral pile, these altars rear'd?
DRYDEN.

MAGISTERIAL, MAJESTICK, STATELY, POMPOUS, AUGUST, DIGNIFIED.

Magisterial, from magister a master, and majestick, from majestas, are both derived from magis more or major greater, that is, more or greater than others: but they differ in this respect, that the magisterial is something assumed, and is therefore often false; the majestick is natural, and consequently always real: an upstart, or an intruder into any high station or office, may put on a magisterial air, in order to impose on the multitude; but it will not be in his power to be majestick, which never shows itself in a borrowed shape; none but those who have a superiority of character, of birth, or outward station, can be majestick: a petty magistrate in the county may be magisterial; 'Government being the noblest and most mysterious of all arts, is very unfit for those to talk magisterially of who never bore any share in it.'—SOUTH. A king or queen cannot uphold their station without a majestick deportment;

Then Aristides lifts his honest front,
In pure majestick poverty rever'd.—THOMSON.

The stately and pompous are most nearly allied to the magisterial; the august and dignified to the majestick: the former being merely extrinsic and assumed; the latter intrinsic and inherent. Magisterial respects the authority which is assumed; stately regards the splendour and rank; 'There is for the most part as much real enjoyment under the meanest cottage, as within the walls of the stateliest palace.'—SOUTH. Pompous regards the personal importance, with all the appendages of greatness and power;

Such seems thy gentle height, made only proud
To be the basis of that pompous load.—DENHAM.

A person is magisterial in the exercise of his office, and the distribution of his commands; he is stately in his ordinary intercourse with his inferiours and equals; he is pompous on particular occasions of appearing in publick: a person demands silence in a magisterial tone; he marches forward with a stately air; he comes forward in a pompous manner, so as to strike others with a sense of his importance.

Majestick is an epithet that characterizes the exterior of an object;

A royal robe he wore with graceful pride,
Embroider'd sandals glitter'd as he trod,
And forth he mov'd, majestick as a god.

POPE.

August is that which marks an essential characteristic in the object;

How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
How complicate, how wonderful, is man!

YOUNG.

Dignified serves to characterize the action, or the station;

Nor can I think that God, Creator wise,
Though threat'ning, will in earnest so destroy
Us, his prime creatures, dignified so high.

MILTON.

The form of a female is termed majestick which has something imposing in it, suited to the condition of majesty, or the most elevated station in society; a monarch is entitled august in order to describe the extent of his empire; an assembly is denominated august to bespeak its high character, and its weighty influence in the scale of society; a reply is termed dignified when it upholds the individual and personal character of a man, as well as his relative character in the community to which he belongs: the two former of these terms are associated only with grandeur of outward circumstances; the last is applicable to men of all stations, who have each in his sphere a dignity to maintain which belongs to a man as an independent moral agent.

GRANDEUR, MAGNIFICENCE.

Grandeur, from grand, in French grande, Latin grandis, probably from yeptads ancient, because the term in Latin is applied mostly to great age, and afterward extended in its application to greatness in general, but particularly that greatness which is taken in the good sense; magnificence, in Latin magnificencia, from magnus and facio, signifies made on a large scale.

An extensive assemblage of striking qualities in the exterior constitutes the common signification of these terms, of which grandeur is the genus, and magnificence the species. Magnificence cannot exist without grandeur, but grandeur exists without magnificence: the former is distinguished from the latter both in degree and in application. When applied to the same objects they differ in degree; magnificence being the highest degree of grandeur. As it respects the style of living, grandeur is within the reach of subjects; magnificence is mostly confined to princes. A person is said to live in a style of grandeur, who rises above the common level, as to the number of his servants, the quality of his equipage, and the size of his establishment. No one is said to live in a style of magnificence who does not surpass the grandeur of his contemporaries. Wealth, such as falls to the lot of many, may enable them to display grandeur; but nothing short of a princely fortune gives either a title or a capacity to aim at magnificence. Grandeur admits of degrees and modifications; it may display itself in various ways, according to the taste of the individual; but magnificence is that which has already reached the highest degree of superiority in every particular.

Those who are ambitious for earthly grandeur are rarely in a temper of mind to take a just view of themselves and of all things that surround them; they forget that there is any thing above this, in comparison with which it sinks into insignificance and meanness; 'There is a kind of grandeur and respect, which the meanest and most insignificant part of mankind endeavour to procure in the little circle of their friends and acquaintance.'—ADDISON. The grandeur of European courts is lost in a comparison with the magnificence of eastern princes; 'The wall of China is one of those eastern pieces of magnificence which makes a figure even in the map of the world, although an account of it would have been thought fabulous, were not the wall itself extant.'—ADDISON.

Grandeur is applicable to the works of nature as well as art, of mind as well as matter; magnificence is altogether the creature of art. A structure, a spectacle, an entertainment, and the like, may be grand or magnificent; but a scene, a prospect, a conception, and the like, are grand, but not magnificent.

NOBLE, GRAND.

Noble, in Latin nobilis, from nosco to know, signifies knowable, or worth knowing; grand, v. Grandeur.

Noble is a term of general import; it simply implies the quality by which a thing is distinguished for excellence above other things: the grand is, properly speaking, one of those qualities by which an object acquires the name of noble; but there are many noble objects which are not denominated grand. A building may be denominated noble for its beauty as well as its size; but a grand building is rather so called for the expense which is displayed upon it: nobleness of acting or thinking comprehends all moral excellence that rises to a high pitch; but grandeur of mind is peculiarly applicable to such actions or traits as denote an elevation of character, rising above all that is common. A family may be either noble or grand; but it is noble by birth; it is grand by wealth, and an expensive style of living;

What then worlds

In a far thinner element sustain'd,
And acting the same part with greater skill,
More rapid movement, and for noblest ends?

YOUNG.

More obvious ends to pass, are not these stars,
The seats majestick, proud imperial thrones,
On which angelic delegates of heav'n
Discharge high trusts of vengeance or of love,
To clothe in outward grandeur grand designs?

GREAT GRAND, SUBLIME.

these terms are synonymous only in the moral application. Great simply designates extent; grand includes likewise the idea of excellence and superiority. A great undertaking characterizes only the extent of the undertaking; a grand undertaking bespeaks its superior excellence: great objects are seen with facility; grand objects are viewed with admiration. It is a great point to make a person sensible of his faults; it should be the grand aim of all to aspire after moral and religious improvement; 'There is nothing in this whole art of architecture which pleases the imagination, but as it is great, uncommon, or beautiful.'—ADDISON. 'There is generally in nature something more grand and august than what we meet with in the curiosities of art.'—ADDISON.

Grand and sublime are both superiour to great; but the former marks the dimension of greatness; the latter, from the Latin sublimis, designates that of height. A scene may be either grand or sublime; it is grand as it fills the imagination with its immensity; it is sublime as it elevates the imagination beyond the surrounding and less important objects. There is something grand in the sight of a vast army moving forward, as it were, by one impulse; there is something peculiarly sublime in the sight of huge mountains and craggy cliffs of ice, shaped into various fantastick forms. Grand may be said either of the works of art or nature: sublime is applicable only to the works of nature. The Egyptian pyramids, or the ocean, are both grand objects; a tempestuous ocean is a sublime object. Grand is sometimes applied to the mind; sublime is applied both to the thoughts and the expressions; 'Homer fills his readers with sublime ideas.'—ADDISON. There is a grandeur of conception in the writings of Milton; there is a sublimity in the inspired writings, which far surpasses all human productions

TO EXPRESS, DECLARE, SIGNIFY, TESTIFY, UTTER.

To express, from the Latin exprimo to press out, is said of whatever passes in the mind; to declare (v. To declare) is said only of sentiments and opinions. A man expresses anger, joy, sorrow, and all the affections in their turn; he declares his opinion for or against any particular measure.

To express is the simple act of communication, resulting from our circumstances as social agents; to declare is a specific and positive act that is called for by the occasion: the former may be done in private, the latter is always more or less publick. An expression of one's feelings and sentiments to those whom we esteem is the supreme delight of social beings; the declaration of our opinions may be prudent or imprudent, according to circumstances. Words, looks, gestures, or movements, serve to express;

Thus Roman youth, deriv'd from ruin'd Troy,
In rude Saturnian rhymes express their joy.

DRYDEN.

Actions, as well as words, may sometimes declare;

Th' unerring sun by certain signs declares,
What the late ev'n or early morn prepares.

DRYDEN.

Sometimes we cannot express our contempt in so strong a manner as by preserving a perfect silence when we are required to speak; an act of hostility, on the part of a nation, is as much a declaration of war as if it were expressed in positive terms; 'As the Supreme Being has expressed, and as it were printed his ideas in the creation, men express their ideas in books.'—ADDISON.

On him confer the Poet's sacred name,
Whose lofty voice declares the heavenly flame.

ADDISON.

To express and signify are both said of words; but express has always regard to the agent, and the use which he makes of the words. Signify, from signum a sign, and facio to make, has respect to the things of which the words are made the usual signs: hence it is that a word may be made to express one thing while it signifies another; and hence it is that many words, according to their ordinary signification, will not express what the speaker has in his mind, and wishes to communicate: the monosyllable no signifies simple negation; but according to the temper of the speaker and the circumstances under which it is spoken, it may express ill-nature, anger, or any other bad passion; 'If there be no cause expressed, the jailer is not bound to detain the prisoner. For the law judges in this respect, saith sir Edward Coke, like Festus the Roman governour, that it is unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not to signify withal the crimes alleged against him.'—BLACKSTONE.

To signify and testify, like the word express, are employed in general for any act of communication otherwise than by words; but express is used in a stronger sense than either of the former. The passions and strongest movements of the soul are expressed; the simple intentions or transitory feelings of the mind are signified or testified. A person expresses his joy by the sparkling of his eye, and the vivacity of his countenance; he signifies his wishes by a nod; he testifies his approbation by a smile. People of vivid sensibility must take care not to express all their feelings; those who expect a ready obedience from their inferiours must not adopt a haughty mode of signifying their will; nothing is more gratifying to an ingenuous mind than to testify its regard for merit wherever it may discover itself.

Express may be said of all sentient beings, and, by a figure of speech, even of those which have no sense; signify is said of rational agents only. The dog has the most expressive mode of showing his attachment and fidelity to his master;

And four fair queens, whose hands sustain, a flow'r,
Th' expressive emblem of their softer pow'r.—POPE.

A significant look or smile may sometimes give rise to suspicion, and lead to the detection of guilt; 'Common life is full of this kind of significant expressions, by knocking, beckoning, frowning, and pouting; and dumb persons are sagacious in the use of them.'—HOLDER. To signify and testify, though closely allied in sense and application, have this difference, that to signify is simply to give a sign of what passes inwardly, to testify is to give that sign in the presence of others. A person signifies by letter his intention of being at a certain place at a given time; he testifies his sense of favours conferred by every mark of gratitude and respect: 'What consolation can be had, Dryden has afforded, by living to repent, and to testify his repentance (for his immoral writings).'—JOHNSON.

Utter, from the preposition out, signifying to bring out, differs from express in this, that the latter respects the thing which is communicated, and the former the means of communication. We express from the heart; we utter with the lips: to express an uncharitable sentiment is a violation of Christian duty; to utter an unseemly word is a violation of good manners: those who say what they do not mean, utter, but not express; those who show by their looks what is passing in their hearts, express but do not utter;

The multitude of angels, with a shout
Loud as from numbers without number, sweet
As from blessed voices, uttering joy.—MILTON

SIGN, SIGNAL.

Sign and signal are both derived from the same source (v. Mark, sign), and the latter is but a species of the former; the sign enables us to recognise an object; it is therefore sometimes natural: signal serves to give warning; it is always arbitrary.

The movements which are visible in the countenance are commonly the signs of what passes in the heart;

The nod that ratifies the Will Divine,
The faithful, fix'd, irrevocable sign,
This seals thy suit.—POPE.

The beat of the drum is the signal for soldiers to repair to their post;

Then first the trembling earth the signal gave,
And flashing fires enlighten all the cave.—DRYDEN.

We converse with those who are present by signs; we make ourselves understood by those who are at a distance by means of signals.

* Vide Girard: "Signe, signal."

SIGNIFICANT' EXPRESSIVE.

The significant is that which serves as a sign; the expressive is that which speaks out or declares: the latter is therefore a stronger term than the former: a look is significant when it is made to express an idea that passes in the mind; but it is expressive when it is made to express a feeling of the heart: looks are but occasionally significant, but the countenance may be habitually expressive. Significant is applied in an indifferent sense, according to the nature of the thing signified; but expressive is always applied to that which is good: a significant look may convey a very bad idea; 'I could not help giving my friend the merchant a significant look upon this occasion.'—CUMBERLAND. An expressive countenance always expresses good feeling; 'The English, Madam, particularly what we call the plain English, is a very copious and expressive language.'—RICHARDSON.

The distinction between these words is the same when applied to things as to persons: a word is significant of whatever it is made to signify; but a word is expressive according to the force with which it conveys an idea. The term significant, in this case, simply explains the nature; but the epithet expressive characterizes it as something good: technical terms are significant only of the precise ideas which belong to the art; most languages have some terms which are peculiarly expressive, and consequently adapted for poetry.

SIGNIFICATION, MEANING, IMPORT, SENSE.

The signification (v. To express) is that of which the word is made the sign; the meaning is that which the person attaches to it; the import is that which is imported or carried into the understanding; the sense is that which is comprehended by the sense or the understanding.

The signification of a word includes either the whole or the part of what is understood by it; 'A lie consists in this, that it is a false signification knowingly and voluntarily used.'—SOUTH. The meaning is that which the person wishes to convey who makes use of a word. This may be correct or incorrect according to the information of the person explaining himself; 'When beyond her expectation I hit upon her meaning, I can perceive a sudden cloud of disappointment spread over her face.'—JOHNSON. The import of a word includes its whole force and value; 'To draw near to God is an expression of awful and mysterious import.'—BLAIR. The sense of a word is applicable mostly to a part of its signification; 'There are two senses in which we may be said to draw near, in such a degree as mortality admits, to God.'—BLAIR. The signification of a word is fixed by the standard of custom; it is not therefore to be changed by any individual: the import of a term is estimated by the various acceptations in which it is employed: a sense is sometimes arbitrarily attached to a word which is widely different from that in which it is commonly acknowledged.

It is necessary to get the true signification of every word, or the particular meaning attached to it, to weigh the import of every term, and to comprehend the exact sense in which it is taken. Every word expressing either a simple or a complex idea, is said to have a signification, though not an import. Technical and moral terms have an import and different senses. A child learns the significations of simple terms as he hears them used; a writer must be acquainted with the full import of every term which he has occasion to make use of. The different senses which words admit of is a great source of ambiguity and confusion with illiterate people.

Signification and import are said mostly of single words only; sense is said of words either in connexion with each other, or as belonging to some class: thus we speak of the signification of the word house, of the import of the term love; but the sense of the sentence, the sense of the author, the employment of words in a technical, moral, or physical sense.

TO DENOTE, SIGNIFY, IMPLY.

Denote, in Latin denoto or noto, from notum, participle of nosco, signifies to cause to know; signify, from the Latin signum a sign and fi to become, is to become or be made a sign, or guide for the understanding; imply, from the Latin implico to fold in, signifies to fold or involve an idea in an object.

Denote is employed with regard to things and their characters; signify with regard to the thoughts or movements. A letter or character may be made to denote any number, as words are made to signify the intentions and wishes of the person. Among the ancient Egyptians hieroglyphicks were very much employed to denote certain moral qualities; in many cases looks or actions will signify more than words. Devices and emblems of different descriptions drawn either from fabulous history or the natural world are likewise now employed to denote particular circumstances or qualities: the cornucopia denotes plenty; the beehive denotes industry; the dove denotes meekness; and the lamb gentleness: he who will not take the trouble to signify his wishes otherwise than by nods or signs must expect to be frequently misunderstood; 'Another may do the same thing, and yet the action want that air and beauty which distinguish it from others, like that inimitable sunshine Titian is said to have diffused over his landscapes, which denotes them his.'—SPECTATOR. 'Simple abstract words are used to signify some one simple idea, without much adverting to others which may chance to attend it.'—BURKE.

To signify and imply may be employed either as respects actions or words. In the first case signify is the act of the person making known by means of a sign, as we signify our approbation by a look: imply marks the value or force of the action; our assent is implied in our silence. When applied to words or marks, signify denotes the positive and established act of the thing; imply is its relative act: a word signifies whatever it is made literally to stand for; it implies that which it stands for figuratively or morally. The term house signifies that which is constructed for a dwelling; the term residence implies something superfluous to a house. A cross, thus, + signifies addition in arithmetic or algebra; a long stroke, thus, —, with a break in the text of a work, implies that the whole sentence is not completed. It frequently happens that words which signify nothing particular in themselves, may be made to imply a great deal by the tone, the manner, and the connexion; 'Words signify not immediately and primarily things themselves, but the conceptions of the mind concerning things.'—SOUTH. 'Pleasure implies a proportion and agreement to the respective states and conditions of men.'—SOUTH.

SIGNIFICATION, AVAIL, IMPORTANCE, CONSEQUENCE, WEIGHT, MOMENT.

Signify (v. To signify) is here employed with regard to events of life, and their relative importance; avail (v. To avail) is never used otherwise. That which a thing signifies is what it contains; if it signifies nothing, it contains nothing, and is worth nothing; if it signifies much, it contains much, and is worth much. That which avails produces: if it avails nothing it produces nothing, is of no use; if it avails much, it produces or is worth much.

We consider the end as to its signification, and the means as to their avail. Although it is of little or no signification to a man what becomes of his remains, yet no one can be reconciled to the idea of leaving them to be exposed to contempt; words are but too often of little avail to curb the unruly wills of children, 'As for wonders, what signifieth telling us of them?'—CUMBERLAND. 'What avail a parcel of statutes against gaming, when they who make them conspire together for the infraction of them.'—CUMBERLAND.

Importance, from porto to carry, signifies the carrying or bearing with, or in itself; consequence, from consequor to follow, or result, signifies the following or resulting from a thing.

Weight signifies the quantum that the thing weighs, moment, from momentum, signifies the force that puts in motion.

Importance is what things have in themselves; they may be of more or less importance, according to the value which is set upon them: this may be real or unreal; it may be estimated by the experience of their past utility, or from the presumption of their utility for the future: the idea of importance, therefore, enters into the meaning of the other terms more or less: He that considers how soon he must close his life, will find nothing of so much importance as to close it well.'

—JOHNSON. Consequence is the importance of a thing from its consequence. This term therefore is peculiarly applicable to such things, the consequences of which may be more immediately discerned either from the neglect or the attention: it is of consequence for a letter to go off on a certain day, for the affairs of an individual may be more or less affected by it; an hour's delay sometimes in the departure of a military expedition may be of such consequence as to determine the fate of a battle; 'The corruption of our taste is not of equal consequence with the deprivation of our virtue.' —WARTON. The term weight implies a positively great degree of importance: it is that importance which a thing has intrinsically in itself, and which makes it weigh in the mind: it is applied therefore to such things as offer themselves to deliberation; hence the counsels of a nation are always weighty, because they involve the interests of so many; 'The finest works of invention are of very little weight, when put in the balance with what refines and exalts the rational mind.'

—SPECTATOR. Moment is that importance which a thing has from the power in itself to produce effects, or to determine interests: it is applicable, therefore, only to such things as are connected with our prosperity or happiness: when used without any adjunct, it implies a great degree of importance, but may be modified in various ways; as a thing of no moment, or small moment, or great moment; but we cannot say with the same propriety, a thing of small weight, and still less a thing of great weight: it is a matter of no small moment for every one to choose that course of conduct which will stand the test of a death-bed reflection; 'Whoever shall review his life, will find that the whole tenour of his conduct has been determined by some accident of no apparent moment.' —JOHNSON.

UNIMPORTANT, INSIGNIFICANT, IMMATERIAL, INCONSIDERABLE.

The want of importance, of consideration, of signification, and of matter or substance, is expressed by these terms. They differ therefore principally according to the meaning of the primitives; but they are so closely allied that they may be employed sometimes indifferently. Unimportant regards the consequences of our actions: it is unimportant whether we use this or that word in certain cases; 'Nigro and Guerra made no discoveries of any importance.' —ROBERTSON. Inconsiderable and insignificant respect those things which may attract notice: the former is more adapted to the grave style, to designate the comparative low value of things; the latter is a familiar term which seems to convey a contemptuous meaning: in a description we may say that the number, the size, the quantity, &c. is inconsiderable; in speaking of persons we may say they are insignificant in stature, look, talent, station, and the like; or speaking of things, an insignificant production, or an insignificant word; 'That the soul cannot be proved mortal by any principle of natural reason is, I think, no inconsiderable point gained.' —SOUTH. 'As I am insignificant to the company in public places, I gratify the vanity of all who pretend to make an appearance.' —ADDISON. Immaterial is a species of the unimportant, which is applied only to familiar subjects; it is immaterial whether we go to-day or to-morrow; it is immaterial whether we have a few or many; 'If in the judgement of impartial persons the arguments be strong enough to convince an unbiassed mind, it is not material whether every wrangling atheist will sit down contented with them.' —STILLINGFLEET.

TRIFLING, TRIVIAL, PETTY, FRIVOLOUS, FUTILE.

Trifling, trivial, both come from trivium, a common place of resort where three roads meet, and signify common; petty is in French petit little, in Latin putus a boy or minion, and the Hebrew פתח foolish; frivolous, in Latin frivolus, comes in all probability from frivo to crumble into dust, signifying reduced to nothing; futile, in Latin futilis, from futio to pour out, signifies cast away as worthless.

All these epithets characterize an object as of little or no value: trifling and trivial differ only in degree; the latter denoting a still lower degree of value than the former. What is trifling or trivial is that which does not require any consideration, and may be easily passed over as forgotten: trifling objections can never weigh against solid reason; trivial remarks only expose the shallowness of the remarker; 'We exceed the ancients in doggerel humour, burlesque, and all the trivial arts of ridicule.' —ADDISON. What is petty is beneath our consideration, it ought to be disregarded and held cheap; it would be a petty consideration for a minister of state to look to the small savings of a private family; 'There is scarcely any man without some favourite trifle which he values above greater attainments; some desire of petty praise which he cannot patiently suffer to be frustrated.' —JOHNSON. What is frivolous and futile is disgraceful for any one to consider; the former in relation to all the objects of our pursuit or attachment, the latter only in regard to matters of reasoning: dress is a frivolous occupation when it forms the chief business of a rational being; 'It is an endless and frivolous pursuit to act by any other rule than the care of satisfying our own minds.' —STEELE. The objections of freethinkers against revealed religion are as futile as they are mischievous; 'Out of a multiplicity of criticisms by various hands many are sure to be futile.' —COWPER.

SUPERFICIAL, SHALLOW, FLIMSY.

The superficial is that which lies only at the surface: it is therefore by implication the same as the shallow, which has nothing underneath: shallow being a variation of hollow or empty. Hence a person may be called either superficial or shallow, to indicate that he has not a profundity of knowledge; but otherwise, superficiality is applied to the exercise of the thinking faculty, and shallowness to its extent. Men of free sentiments are superficial thinkers, although they may not have understandings more shallow than others. Superficial and shallow are applicable to things as well as persons: flimsy is applicable to things only. Flimsy most probably comes from flame, that is, flamy, showy easily seen through. In the proper sense, we may speak of giving a superficial covering of paint or colour to a body; of a river or piece of water being shallow; of cotton or cloth being flimsy. In the im proper sense, a survey or a glance may be superficial which does not extend beyond the superficies of things; 'By much labour we acquire a superficial acquaintance with a few sensible objects.' —BLAIR. A conversation or a discourse may be shallow, which does not contain a body of sentiment;

I know thee to thy bottom; from within

Thy shallow centre to the utmost skin. —DRYDEN

A work or performance may be flimsy which has nothing solid in it to engage the attention;

Proud of a vast extent of flimsy lines. —POPE

SURFACE, SUPERFICIES.

Surface, compounded of sur for super and face, is a variation of the Latin term superficies; and yet they have acquired this distinction, that the former is the vulgar, and the latter the scientific term: of course the former has a more indefinite and general application than the latter. A surface is either even or uneven, smooth or rough; but the mathematician always conceives of a plane superficies on which he founds his operations. They are employed in a figurative sense with a similar distinction;

Errours like straws upon the surface flow;

He who would search for pearls must dive below.

DRYDEN.

'Those who have undertaken the task of reconciling mankind to their present state frequently remind us that we view only the superficies of life.' —JOHNSON.

TO EXPLAIN, EXPOUND, INTERPRET.

To explain is to make plain; expound, from the Latin expono, compounded of ex and pono, signifies to set forth in detail; interpret, in Latin interpreto and interpretes, compounded of inter and arbitrio that

l. tēguas tongues, signifies literally to get the sense of one language by means of another.

To explain is the generic term, the rest are specific: to expound and interpret are each modes of explaining. Single words or sentences are explained; a whole work, or considerable parts of it, are expounded; the sense of any writing or symbolical sign is interpreted. It is the business of the philologist to explain the meaning of words by a suitable definition; 'It is a serious thing to have connexion with a people, who live only under positive, arbitrary, and changeable institutions; and these not perfected, nor supplied, nor explained, by any common acknowledged rule of moral science.'—BURKE. It is the business of the divine to expound Scripture;

One meets now and then with persons who are extremely learned and knotty in expounding clear cases.'—STEELE. It is the business of the antiquarian to interpret the meaning of old inscriptions on stones, or of hieroglyphicks on buildings; 'It does not appear that among the Romans any man grew eminent by interpreting another; and perhaps it was more frequent to translate for exercise or amusement than for fame.'—JOHNSON.

An explanation serves to assist the understanding, to supply a deficiency, and remove obscurity; an exposition is an ample explanation, in which minute particulars are detailed, and the connexion of events in the narrative is kept up; it serves to assist the memory and awaken the attention: both the explanation and exposition are employed in clearing up the sense of things as they are, but the interpretation is more arbitrary; it often consists of affixing or giving a sense to things which they have not previously had; hence it is that the same passages in authors admit of different interpretations, according to the character or views of the commentator.

There are many practical truths in the Bible which are so plain and positive, that they need no literal explanation; but its doctrines, when faithfully expounded, may be brought home to the hearts and consciences of men; although the partial interpretations of illiterate and enthusiastick men are more apt to disgrace than to advance the cause of religion.

To explain and interpret are not confined to what is written or said, they are employed likewise with regard to the actions of men; exposition is, however, used only with regard to writings. The major part of the misunderstandings and animosities which arise among men, might easily be obviated by a timely explanation; it is the characteristick of good-nature to interpret the looks and actions of men as favourably as possible. The explanation may sometimes flow out of circumstances; the interpretation is always the act of a voluntary and rational agent. The discovery of a plot or secret scheme will serve to explain the mysterious and strange conduct of such as were previously acquainted with it. According to an old proverb, "Silence gives consent;" for thus at least they are pleased to interpret it, who are interested in the decision.

TO MISCONSTRUE, MISINTERPRET.

Misconstrue and misinterpret signify to explain in a wrong way; but the former respects the sense of one's words or the implication of one's actions: those who indulge themselves in a light mode of speech towards children are liable to be misconstrued; a too great tenderness to the criminal may be easily misinterpreted into favour of the crime.

These words may likewise be employed in speaking of language in general; but the former respects the literal transmission of foreign ideas into our native language; the latter respects the general sense which one affixes to any set of words, either in a native or foreign language: the learners of a language will unavoidably misconstrue it at times; in all languages there are ambiguous expressions, which are liable to misinterpretation. Misconstruing is the consequence of ignorance;

In ev'ry act and turn of life he feels

Public calamities or household ills:

The judge corrupt, the long-depending cause,

And doubtful issue of misconstrued laws.—PRIOR.

Misinterpretation of particular words are oftener the consequence of prejudice and voluntary blindness, particularly in the explanation of the law of the Scriptures; 'Some purposely misrepresent or put a wrong interpretation on the virtues of others.'—ADDISON.

DEFINITE, POSITIVE.

Definite, in Latin definitum, participle of definire, compounded of de and finis, signifies that which is bounded by a line or limit; positive, in Latin positivus, from pono to place, signifies that which is placed or fixed.

The understanding and reasoning powers are connected with what is definite; the will with what is positive. A definite answer leaves nothing to be explained; a positive answer leaves no room for hesitation or question. It is necessary to be definite in giving instructions, and to be positive in giving commands. A person who is definite in his proceedings with another, puts a stop to all unreasonable expectations; 'We are not able to judge of the degree of conviction which operated at any particular time upon our own thoughts, but as it is recorded by some certain and definite effect.'—JOHNSON. It is necessary for those who have to exercise authority to be positive, in order to enforce obedience from the self-willed and contumacious; 'The Earl Rivers being now in his own opinion on his death-bed, thought it his duty to provide for Savage among his other natural children, and therefore demanded a positive account of him.'—JOHNSON.

DEFINITION, EXPLANATION.

A definition is properly a species of explanation. The former is used scientifically, the latter on ordinary occasions; the former is confined to words, the latter is employed for words or things.

A definition is correct or precise; an explanation is general or ample.

The definition of a word defines or limits the extent of its signification; it is the rule for the scholar in the use of any word; 'As to politeness, many have attempted definitions of it. I believe it is best to be known by description, definition not being able to comprise it.'—LORD CHATHAM. The explanation of a word may include both definition and illustration: the former admits of no more words than will include the leading features in the meaning of any term; the latter admits of an unlimited scope for diffuseness on the part of the explainer; 'If you are forced to desire further information or explanation upon a point, do it with proper apologies for the trouble you give.'—LORD CHATHAM.

TO EXPLAIN, ILLUSTRATE, ELUCIDATE.

Explain, v. To explain, expound; illustrate, in Latin illustratus, participle of illustro, compounded of the intensive syllable in and lustrō, signifies to make a thing bright, or easy to be surveyed and examined; elucidate, in Latin elucidatus, participle of elucido, from lux light, signifies to bring forth into the light.

To explain is simply to render intelligible; to illustrate and elucidate are to give additional clearness. Every thing requires to be explained to one who is ignorant of it; but the best informed will require to have abstruse subjects illustrated, and obscure subjects elucidated. We always explain when we illustrate or elucidate, and we always elucidate when we illustrate, but not vice versâ.

We explain by reducing compounds to simples, and generals to particulars; 'I know I meant just what you explain; but I did not explain my own meaning so well as you.'—POPE. We illustrate by means of examples, similes, and allegorical figures; 'It is indeed the same system as mine, but illustrated with a ray of your own.'—POPE. We elucidate by commentaries, or the statement of facts; 'If our religious tenets should ever want a farther elucidation, we shall not call on atheism to explain them.'—BURKE. Words are the common subject of explanation; moral truths require illustration; poetical allusions and dark passages in writers require elucidation. All explanations given to children should consist of as few words as possible, so long as they are sufficiently explicit.

EXPLANATORY, EXPLICIT, EXPRESS.

Explanatory signifies containing or belonging to explanation (v. To explain); explicit, in Latin explicitus, from explico to unfold, signifies unfolded or laid open; express, in Latin expressus, signifies the same as expressed or delivered in specifick terms.

The explanatory is that which is superadded to clear up difficulties or obscurities. A letter is explanatory which contains an explanation of something preceding, in lieu of any thing new; 'An explanatory law stops the current of a precedent statute, nor does either of them admit extension afterwards.'—BACON. The explicit is that which of itself obviates every difficulty; in explicit letter, therefore, will leave nothing that requires explanation; 'Since the revolution the bounds of prerogative and liberty have been better defined, the principles of government more thoroughly examined and understood, and the rights of the subject more explicitly guarded by legal provisions, than in any other period of the English history.'—BLACKSTONE. The explicit admits of a free use of words; the express requires them to be unambiguous. A person ought to be explicit when he enters into an engagement; he ought to be express when he gives commands, or conveys his wishes; 'I have destroyed the letter I received from you by the hands of Lucius Aruntius, though it was much too innocent to deserve so severe a treatment; however, it was your express desire I should destroy it, and I have complied accordingly.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero).

TO EXPOSTULATE, REMONSTRATE.

Expostulate, from postulo to demand, signifies to demand reasons for a thing; remonstrate, from monstro to show, signifies to show reasons against a thing.

We expostulate in a tone of authority; we remonstrate in a tone of complaint. He who expostulates passes a censure, and claims to be heard; he who remonstrates presents his case, and requests to be heard. Expostulation may often be the precursor of violence; remonstrance mostly rests on the force of reason and representation: he who admits of expostulation from an inferior undermines his own authority; he who is deaf to the remonstrances of his friends is far gone in folly: the expostulation is mostly on matters of personal interest; the remonstrance may as often be made on matters of propriety. The Scythian ambassadors expostulated with Alexander against his invasion of their country; King Richard expostulated with Wat Tyler on the subject of his insurrection; 'With the hypocrite it is not my business at present to expostulate.'—JOHNSON. Artabanus remonstrated with Xerxes on the folly of his projected invasion; 'I have been but a little time conversant with the world, yet I have had already frequent opportunities of observing the little efficacy of remonstrance and complaint.'—JOHNSON.

TO UTTER, SPEAK, ARTICULATE, PRONOUNCE.

Utter, from ut, out, signifies to put out; that is, to send forth a sound: this therefore is a more general term than speak, which is to utter an intelligible sound. We may utter a groan; we speak words only, or that which is intended to serve as words. To speak therefore is only a species of utterance; a dumb man has utterance, but not speech;

At each word that my destruction utter'd
My heart recoiled.—OTWAY.

What you keep by you, you may change and mend,
But words once spoke, can never be recall'd.

WALLER.

Articulate and pronounce are modes of speaking; to articulate, from articulum a joint, is to pronounce distinctly the letters or syllables of words; which is the first effort of a child beginning to speak. It is of great importance to make a child articulate every letter when he first begins to speak or read. To pronounce, from the Latin pronuncio to speak out loud, is a formal mode of speaking.

A child must first articulate the letters and the syllables, then he pronounces or sets forth the whole word; this is necessary before he can speak to be understood; 'The torments of disease can sometimes only be signified by groans or sobs, or inarticulate ejaculations.'—JOHNSON. 'Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you.'—SHAKESPEARE.

TO SPEAK, TALK, CONVERSE, DISCOURSE.

Speak, in Saxon specan, is probably connected with the German sprechen to speak, and brechen to break, the Latin precor to pray, and the Hebrew כָּרַךְ talk is but a variation of tell; converse, v. Conversation; discourse, in Latin discursus, expresses properly an examining or deliberating upon.

The idea of communicating with, or communicating to, another, by means of signs, is common in the signification of all these terms: to speak is an indefinite term, specifying no circumstance of the action; we may speak only one word or many; but we talk for a continuance: we speak from various motives; we talk for pleasure; we converse for improvement or intellectual gratification: we speak with or to a person, we talk commonly to others; we converse with others. Speaking a language is quite distinct from writing; publick speaking has at all times been cultivated with great care, but particularly under popular governments; 'Falsehood is a speaking against our thoughts.'—SOUTH. Talking is mostly the pastime of the idle and the empty; those who think less talk most; 'Talkers are commonly vain, and credulous withal; for he that talketh what he knoweth, will also talk what he knoweth not.'—BACON. Conversation is the rational employment of social beings, who seek by an interchange of sentiment to purify the affections, and improve the understanding;

Go, therefore, half this day, as friend with friend,
Converse with Adam.—MILTON.

Conversation is the act of many together; talk and discourse may be the act of one addressing himself to others: conversation loses its value when it ceases to be general; talk has seldom any value but what the talker attaches to it; the discourse derives its value from the nature of the subject as well as the character of the speaker: conversation is adapted for mixed companies; children talk to their parents, or to their companions; parents and teachers discourse with young people on moral duties;

Let thy discourse be such, that thou mayst give Profit to others, or from them receive.—DENHAM

TO BABBLE, CHATTER, CHAT, PRATTLE, PRATE.

Babble, in French babiller, probably receives its origin from the tower of Babel, when the confusion of tongues took place, and men talked unintelligibly to each other; chatter, chat, is in French caquet, Low German atern, High German schnattern, Latin blatero, Hebrew bata; prattle, prate, in Low German praten, is probably connected with the Greek φραζω to speak.

All these terms mark a superfluous or improper use of speech: babble and chatter are onomatopœias drawn from the noise or action of speaking; babbling denotes rapidity of speech which renders it unintelligible; hence the term is applied to all who make use of many words to no purpose; 'To stand up and babble to a crowd in an ale-house, till silence is commanded by the stroke of a hammer, is as low an ambition as can taint the human mind.'—HAWKSWORTH. Chatter is an imitation of the noise of speech properly applied to magpies or parrots, and figuratively to a corresponding vicious mode of speech in human beings;

Some birds there are who, prone to noise,
Are hir'd to silence wisdom's voice;
And, skil'd to chatter out the hour,
Rise by their emptiness to power.—MOORE.

The vice of babbling is most commonly attached to men, that of chattering to women; the babblers talk much to impress others with his self-importance; the chatterer is actuated by self-conceit, and a desire to display her volubility: the former cares not whether he is understood; the latter cares not if she be but heard.

Chattering is harmless, if not respectable: the winter's fireside, and the neighbours to assemble and chat away many an hour which might otherwise hang heavy on hand, or be spent less inoffensively ;

Sometimes I dress, with women sit,
And chat away the gloomy fit.—GREEN.

Chatting is the practice of adults ; prattling and prating that of children ; the one innocently, the other impudently ; the prattling of babes has an interest for every feeling mind, but for parents it is one of their highest enjoyments ;

Now blows the surly north, and chills throughout
The stiff'ning regions ; while by stronger charms
Than Circe e'er or fell Medea brew'd,
Each brook that wont to prattle to its banks
Lies all bestill'd.—ARMSTRONG.

Prating is the consequence of ignorance and childish assumption : a prattler has all the unaffected gayety of an uncontaminated mind ; a prater is forward, obtrusive, and ridiculous ;

My prudent counsels prop the state ;
Magpies were never known to prate.—MOORE.

TALKATIVE, LOQUACIOUS, GARRULOUS.

Talkative implies ready or prone to talk (v. To speak) ; loquacious, from loquor to speak or talk, has the same original meaning ; garrulous, in Latin garrulus, from garrir to blab, signifies prone to tell or make known.

These reproachful epithets differ principally in the degree. To talk is allowable and consequently it is not altogether so unbecoming to be occasionally talkative ; but loquacity, which implies always an immoderate propensity to talk, is always bad, whether springing from affectation or an idle temper ; and garrulity, which arises from the excessive desire of communicating, is a failing that is pardonable only in the aged, who have generally much to tell ; 'Every absurdity has a champion to defend it, for error is always talkative.'—GOLDSMITH.

Thersites only clamour'd in the throng,
Loquacious, loud, and turbulent of tongue.—POPE.
Pleas'd with that social, sweet garrulity,
The poor disbanded vet'ran's sole delight.

SOMERVILLE.

UNSPEAKABLE, INEFFABLE, UNUTTERABLE, INEXPRESSIBLE.

Unspeakable and ineffable, from the Latin for to speak, have precisely the same meaning ; but unspeakable is said of objects in general, particularly of that which is above human conception, and surpasses the power of language to describe ; as the unspeakable goodness of God ; 'The vast difference of God's nature from ours makes the difference between them so unspeakable great.'—SOUTH. Ineffable is said of such objects as cannot be painted in words with adequate force, as the ineffable sweetness of a person's look ; 'The influences of the Divine nature enliven the mind with ineffable joy.'—SOUTH. Unutterable and inexpressible are extended in their signification to that which is incommunicable by signs from one being to another ; thus grief is unutterable which it is not in the power of the sufferer by any sounds to bring home to the feelings of another ; grief is inexpressible which is not to be expressed by looks, or words, or any signs. Unutterable is therefore applied only to the individual who wishes to give utterance ; inexpressible may be said of that which is to be expressed concerning others : our own pains are unutterable ; the sweetness of a person's countenance is inexpressible ;

Nature breeds,
Perverse, all monstrous, all prodigious things,
Abominable, unutterable.—MILTON.
The evil which lies lurking under a temptation is intolerable and inexpressible.—SOUTH.

CONVERSATION, DIALOGUE, CONFERENCE, COLLOQUY.

Conversation denotes the act of holding converse ; dialogue, in French dialogue, Latin dialogus, Greek diálogos, compounded of diá and lógos, signifies a speech between two ; conference, from the Latin con and fero to put together, signifies consulting together on subjects ; colloquy, in Latin colloquium, from col or con and loquor to speak, signifies the act of talking together.

A conversation is always something actually held between two or more persons ; a dialogue is mostly fictitious, and written as if spoken ; any number of persons may take part in a conversation ; but a dialogue always refers to the two persons who are expressly engaged : a conversation may be desultory, in which each takes his part at pleasure ; a dialogue is formal, in which there will always be reply and rejoinder : a conversation may be carried on by any signs besides words, which are addressed personally to the individual present ; a dialogue must always consist of express words : a prince holds frequent conversations with his ministers on affairs of state ; 'I find so much Arabic and Persian to read, that all my leisure in a morning is hardly sufficient for a thousandth part of the reading that would be agreeable and useful, as I wish to be a match in conversation with the learned natives whom I happen to meet.'—SIR WM. JONES. Cicero wrote dialogues on the nature of the gods, and many later writers have adopted the dialogue form as a vehicle for conveying their sentiments ; 'Aurengzebe is written in rhyme, and has the appearance of being the most elaborate of all Dryden's plays. The personages are imperial, but the dialogue is often domestic, and therefore susceptible of sentiments accommodated to familiar incidents.'—JOHNSON. A conference is a species of conversation ; a colloquy is a species of dialogue : a conversation is indefinite as to the subject, or the parties engaged in it ; a conference is confined to particular subjects and descriptions of persons ; a conversation is mostly occasional ; a conference is always specifically appointed : a conversation is mostly on indifferent matters ; a conference is mostly on national or public concerns. Men hold a conversation as friends ; they hold a conference as ministers of state ; 'The conference between Gabriel and Satan abounds with sentiments proper for the occasion, and suitable to the persons of the two speakers.'—ADDISON.

The dialogue naturally limits the number to two ; the colloquy is indefinite as to number : there may be dialogues therefore which are not colloquies ; but every colloquy may be denominated a dialogue ; 'The close of this divine colloquy (between the Father and the Son) with the hymn of Angels that follow, are wonderfully beautiful and poetical.'—ADDISON.

ANSWER, REPLY, REJOINDER, RESPONSE

Answer, in Saxon andswaren and varan, Goth. awari and ward, German antwort, compounded of ant or ans against, and wort a word, signifies a word used against or in return for another ; reply comes from the French repliquer, Latin replico to unfold, signifying to unfold or enlarge upon by way of explanation ; rejoin is compounded of re and join, signifying to join or add in return ; response, in Latin responsus, participle of respondeo, compounded of re and spondeo, signifies to declare or give a sanction to in return.

Under all these terms is included the idea of using words in return for other words. An answer is given to a question ; a reply is made to an assertion ; a rejoinder is made to a reply ; a response is made in accordance with the words of another.

One answers either for the purpose of affirmation, assent, information, or contradiction ;

The blackbird whistles from the thorny brake,
The mellow bulfinch answers from the grove.

THOMSON.

We always reply, or rejoin in order to explain or confute ; 'He again took some time to consider, and civilly replied, "I do."—"If you do agree with me," rejoined I, "in acknowledging the complaint, tell me if you will concur in promoting the cure."—CUMBERLAND. Responses are made by way of assent or confirmation, and sometimes in the case of oracular answers by way of information ; 'Lacedæmon, always disposed to control the growing consequence of her neighbours, and sensible of the bad policy of her late measures, had opened her eyes to the folly of expelling Hippias on the forged responses of the Pythia.'—CUMBERLAND. It is impolite not to answer when we are addressed ; arguments are maintained by the alternate replies and rejoinders of two parties; but such arguments seldom tend to the pleasure and improvement of society: the responses in the liturgy are peculiarly calculated to keep alive the attention of those who take a part in the devotion.

An answer may be either spoken or written; reply and rejoinder are used in personal discourse only; a response may be said or sung.

RETORT, REPARTEE.

Retort, from re and torqueo to twist or turn back, to recoil, is an ill-natured reply: repartee, from the word part, signifies a smart reply, a ready taking one's own part. The retort is always in answer to a censure, objection, or argument against a thing, for which one returns a like censure; 'Those who have so vehemently urged the dangers of an active life, have made use of arguments that may be retorted upon themselves.'—JOHNSON. The repartee is commonly in answer to the wit of another, where one returns wit for wit; 'Henry IV. of France would never be transported beyond himself with choler, but he would pass by any thing with some repartee.'—HOWELL. In the acrimony of disputes it is common to hear retort upon retort to an endless extent; the vivacity of discourse is sometimes greatly enhanced by the quick repartee of those who take a part in it. There is nothing wanting in order to make a retort, but the disposition to aggravate one with whom we are offended; the talent for repartee is altogether a natural endowment which does not depend in any degree upon the will of the individual.

FACETIOUS, CONVERSABLE, PLEASANT, JOCULAR, JOCOSE.

All these epithets designate that companionable quality which consists in liveliness of speech. Facetious, in Latin facetus, may probably come from for to speak, denoting the versatility with which a person makes use of his words; conversable is literally able to hold a conversation; pleasant (v. Agreeable) signifies making ourselves pleasant with others, or them pleased with us; jocular, after the manner of a joke; jocose, using or having jokes.

Facetious may be employed either for writing or conversation; the rest only in conversation: the facetious man deals in that kind of discourse which may excite laughter; 'I have written nothing since I published, except a certain facetious history of John Gilpin.'—COWPER. A conversable man may instruct as well as amuse;

But here my lady will object,
Your intervals of time to spend,
With so conversable a friend,
It would not signify a pin
Whatever climate you were in.—SWIFT.

The pleasant man says every thing in a pleasant manner; his pleasantries even on the most delicate subject is without offence; 'Aristophanes wrote to please the multitude; his pleasantries are coarse and impolite.'—WARTON. The person speaking is jocose; the thing said, or the manner of saying it, is jocular: it is not for one to be always jocose, although sometimes one may assume a jocular air when we are not at liberty to be serious;

Thus Venus sports,
When, cruelly jocose,
She ties the fatal noose,
And binds unequals to the brazen yokes.—CREECH.

'Pope sometimes condescended to be jocular with servants or inferiours.'—JOHNSON. A man is facetious from humour; he is conversable by means of information; he indulges himself in occasional pleasantry, or allows himself to be jocose, in order to enliven conversation; a useful hint is sometimes conveyed in jocular terms

ADDRESS, SPEECH, HARANGUE, ORATION.

Address, v. To address; speech, from speak, signifies the thing spoken; harangue probably comes from ara an altar, where harangues used to be delivered; oration, from the Latin oro to beg or entreat, signifies that which is said by way of entreaty

All these terms denote a set form of words directed or supposed to be directed to some person: an address in this sense is always written, but the rest are really spoken or supposed to be so; 'When Louis of France had lost the battle of Fontenoy, the addresses to him at that time were full of his fortitude.'—HUGHES. A speech is in general that which is addressed in a formal manner to one person or more; 'Every circumstance in their speeches and actions is with justice and delicacy adapted to the persons who speak and act.'—ADDISON on Milton. An harangue is a noisy, tumultuous speech addressed to many; 'There is scarcely a city in Great Britain but has one of this tribe who takes it into his protection, and on the market days harangues the good people of the place with aphorisms and recipes.'—PEARCE on Quacks. An oration is a solemn speech for any purpose; 'How cold and unaffected the best oration in the world would be without the proper ornaments of voice and gesture, there are two remarkable instances in the case of Ligarius and that of Milo.'—SWIFT.

Addresses are frequently sent up to the throne by publick bodies. Speeches in Parliament, like harangues at elections, are often little better than the crude effusions of party spirit. The orations of Demosthenes and Cicero, which have been so justly admired, received a polish from the correcting hand of their authors, before they were communicated to the publick.

Addresses of thanks are occasionally presented to persons in high stations by those who are anxious to express a sense of their merits. It is customary for the King to deliver speeches to both houses of Parliament at their opening. In all popular governments there is a set of persons who have a trick of making harangues to the populace, in order to render them dissatisfied with the men in power. Funeral orations are commonly spoken over the grave.

TO ACCOST, SALUTE, ADDRESS.

Accost, in French accoster, is compounded of ac or ad, and the Latin costa a rib or side, signifying to come by the side of a person; salute, in Latin saluto, from salus health, signifies to bid good speed; address, in French adresser, is compounded of ad and dresser, from the Latin dirigi, preterit of dirigo to direct or apply, signifying to direct one's discourse to a person.

We accost a stranger whom we casually meet by the way; we salute our friends on meeting them; we address indifferent persons in company. Curiosity or convenience prompt men to accost; 'When Æneas is sent by Virgil to the shades, he meets Dido, the Queen of Carthage, whom his perfidy had hurried to the grave: he accosts her with tenderness and excuses, but the lady turns away like Ajax in mute disdain.'—JOHNSON. Good-will or intimacy prompt men to salute others; business or social communication lead men to address each other. Rude people accost every one whom they meet; familiar people salute those with whom they are barely acquainted; impertinent people address those with whom they have no business; 'I was harassed by the multitude of eager salutations, and returned the common civilities with hesitation and impropriety.'—JOHNSON. 'I still continued to stand in the way, having scarcely strength to walk farther, when another soon addressed me in the same manner.'—JOHNSON.

We must accost by speaking; but we may salute by signs as well as words; and address by writing as well as by speaking.

SALUTE, SALUTATION, GREETING.

Salute and salutation, from the Latin salus, signifies literally wishing health to a person; greeting comes from the German grüssen to kiss or salute.

Salute respects the thing, and salutation the person giving the salute; a salute may consist either of a word or an action; 'Strabo tells us he saw the statue of Memnon, which, according to the poets, saluted the morning sun, every day, at its first rising, with an harmonious sound.'—PRIDEAUX. Salutations pass from one friend to another; 'Josephus makes mention of a Manaken who had the spirit of prophecy, and one time meeting with Herod among his school-fellows greeted him with this salutation, "Hail, King of the Jews."—PRIDEAUX. The salute may be either direct or indirect; the salutation is always direct and personal: guns are fired by way of a salute; bows are given in the way of a salutation; greeting is a familiar kind of salutation, which may be given vocally or in writing;

Not only those I nam'd I there shall greet,
But my own gallant, virtuous Cato meet.
DENHAM.

ELOCUTION, ELOQUENCE, ORATORY, RHETORICK.

Elocution and eloquence are derived from the same Latin verb eloquor to speak out; oratory, from oro to implore, signifies the art of making a set speech.

Elocution consists in the manner of delivery; eloquence in the matter that is delivered. We employ elocution in repeating the words of another; we employ eloquence to express our own thoughts and feelings. Elocution is requisite for an actor; eloquence for a speaker,

Soft elocution does thy style renown,
And the sweet accents of the peaceful gown,
Gentle or sharp, according to thy choice,
To laugh at follies or to lash at vice.—DRYDEN.

Athens or free Rome, where eloquence
Flourish'd, since mute.—MILTON.

Eloquence lies in the person; it is a natural gift: oratory lies in the mode of expression; it is an acquired art; 'As harsh and irregular sounds are not harmony, so neither is banging a cushion oratory.'—SWIFT. Rhetorick, from ῥῆω to speak, is properly the theory of that art of which oratory is the practice. But the term rhetrick may be sometimes employed in an improper sense for the display of oratory or scientific speaking. Eloquence speaks one's own feelings; it comes from the heart, and speaks to the heart: oratory is an imitative art; it describes what is felt by another. Rhetorick is the affectation of oratory; 'Be but a person in credit with the multitude, he shall be able to make popular rambling stuff pass for high rhetorick and moving preaching.'—SOUTH.

An afflicted parent, who pleads for the restoration of her child that has been torn from her, will exert her eloquence; a counsellor at the bar, who pleads the cause of his client, will employ oratory; vulgar partisans are full of rhetorick.

Eloquence often consists in a look or an action; oratory must always be accompanied with language. There is a dumb eloquence which is not denied even to the brutes, and which speaks more than all the studied graces of speech and action employed by the orator;

His infant softness pleads a milder doom,
And speaks with all the eloquence of tears.—HEIGH.

Between eloquence and oratory there is the same distinction as between nature and art: the former can never be perverted to any base purposes; it always speaks truth: the latter will as easily serve the purposes of falsehood as of truth. The political partisan, who paints the miseries of the poor in glowing language and artful periods, may often have oratory enough to excite dissatisfaction against the government, without having eloquence to describe what he really feels.

EFFUSION, EJACULATION.

Effusion signifies the thing poured out, and ejaculation the thing ejaculated or thrown out, both indicating a species of verbal expression; the former either by utterance or in writing, the latter only by utterance. The effusion is not so vehement or sudden as the ejaculation; the ejaculation is not so ample or diffuse as the effusion; effusion is seldom taken in a good sense; ejaculation rarely otherwise. An effusion commonly flows from a heated imagination uncorrected by the judgement; it is therefore in general not only incoherent, but extravagant and senseless: an ejaculation is produced by the warmth of the moment, but never without reference to some particular circumstance. Enthusiasts are full of extravagant effusions; contrite sinners will often express their penitence in pious ejaculations; 'Brain-sick opinators please themselves in nothing but the ostentation of their own extemporary effusions.'—SOUTH. 'All which prayers of our Saviour's and others of like brevity are properly such as we call ejaculations.'—SOUTH.

WORD, TERM, EXPRESSION.

* Word is here the generic term; the other two are specific. Every term and expression is a word; but every word is not denominated a term or expression. Language consists of words; they are the connected sounds which serve for the communication of thought. Term, from terminus a boundary, signifies any word that has a specific or limited meaning; expression (v. To express) signifies any word which conveys a forcible meaning. Usage determines words; science fixes terms; sentiment provides expressions. The purity of a style depends on the choice of words; the precision of a writer depends upon the choice of his terms; the force of a writer depends upon the aptitude of his expressions.

The grammarian treats on the nature of words; the philosopher weighs the value of scientific terms; the rhetorician estimates the force of expressions. The French have coined many new words since the revolution; terms of art admit of no change after the signification is fully defined; expressions vary according to the connexion in which they are introduced;

As all words in few letters live,
Thou to few words all sense dost give.—COWLEY.

'The use of the word minister is brought down to the literal signification of it, a servant; for now, to serve and to minister, servile and ministerial, are terms equivalent.'—SOUTH. 'A maxim, or moral saying, naturally receives this form of the antithesis, because it is designed to be engraven on the memory, which recalls it more easily by the help of such contrasted expressions.'—BLAIR.

VERBAL, VOCAL, ORAL.

Verbal, from verbum a word, signifies after the manner of a spoken word; oral, from os the mouth, signifies by word of mouth; and vocal, from vox the voice, signifies by the voice: the two former of these words are used to distinguish speaking from writing; the latter to distinguish the sounds of the voice from any other sounds, particularly in singing: a verbal message is distinguished from one written on a paper, or in a note; 'Among all the northern nations, shaking of hands was held necessary to bind the bargain, a custom which we still retain in many verbal contracts.'—BLACKSTONE. Oral tradition is distinguished from that which is handed down to posterity by means of books; 'In the first ages of the world instruction was commonly oral.'—JOHNSON. Vocal music is distinguished from instrumental; vocal sounds are more harmonious than those which proceed from any other bodies;

Forth came the human pair,
And join'd their vocal worship to the choir
Of creatures wanting voice.—MILTON.

VOTE, SUFFRAGE, VOICE.

Vote, in Latin vetum, from voveo to vow, is very probably derived from vox a voice, signifying the voice that is raised in supplication to heaven; suffrage, in Latin suffragium, is in all probability compounded of sub and frango to break out or declare for a thing; voice is here figuratively taken for the voice that is raised in favour of a thing.

The vote is the wish itself, whether expressed or not; a person has a vote, that is, the power of wishing: but the suffrage and the voice are the wish that is expressed; a person gives his suffrage or his voice.

The vote is the settled and fixed wish; it is that by which the most important concerns in life are determined;

The popular vote
Inclines here to continue.—MILTON.

The suffrage is a vote given only in particular cases; 'Reputation is commonly lost, because it never was

* Girard: "Terme, expression" deserved; and was conferred at first, not by the suffrage of criticism, but by the fondness of friendship.'—JOHNSON. The voice is a partial or occasional wish, expressed only in matters of minor importance;

I've no words.

My voice is in my sword! Thou bloodier villain
Than terms can give thee out.—SHAKESPEARE.

But sometimes it may be employed to denote the public opinion;

That something 's ours when we from life depart,
This all conceive, all feel it at the heart;
The wise of learn'd antiquity proclaim
This truth; the publick voice declares the same.

JENYNS.

The vote and voice are given either for or against a person or thing; the suffrage is commonly given in favour of a person: in all publick assemblies the majority of votes decides the question; members of Parliament are chosen by the suffrages of the people; in the execution of a will every executor has a voice in all that is transacted.

LANGUAGE, TONGUE, SPEECH, IDIOM, DIALECT.

Language, from the Latin lingua a tongue, signifies, like the word tongue, that which is spoken by the tongue; speech is the act or power of speaking, or the thing spoken; idiom, in Latin idioma, Greek ἰδιωμα, from idios proprius proper or peculiar, signifies a peculiar mode of speaking; dialect, in Latin dialectus, Greek διὰλεκτικός, from διαλέγομαι to speak in a distinct manner, signifies a distinct mode of speech.

All these terms mark the manner of expressing our thoughts, but under different circumstances. Language is the most general term in its meaning and application; it conveys the general idea without any modification, and is applied to other modes of expression, besides that of words, and to other objects besides persons: the language of the eyes frequently supplies the place of that of the tongue; the deaf and dumb use the language of signs; birds and beasts are supposed to have their peculiar language;

Nor do they trust their tongue alone,

But speak a language of their own.—SWIFT.

On the other hand, tongue, speech, and the others, are applicable only to human beings. Language is either written or spoken; but a tongue is conceived of mostly as a something to be spoken; and speech is, in the strict sense, that only which is spoken or uttered. A tongue is a totality, or an entire assemblage, of all that is necessary for the expressions; it comprehends not only words, but modifications of meaning, changes of termination, modes and forms of words, with the whole scheme of syntactical rules; a tongue therefore comprehended, in the first instance, only those languages which were originally formed: the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin are in the proper sense tongues; but those which are spoken by Europeans, and owe their origin to the former, commonly bear the general denomination of languages; 'What if we could discourse with people of all the nations upon the earth in their own mother tongue? Unless we know Jesus Christ, also, we should be lost for ever.'—BEVERIDGE.

Speech is an abstract term, implying either the power of uttering articulate sounds, as when we speak of the gift of speech, which is denied to those who are dumb; or the words themselves which are spoken, as when we speak of the parts of speech; or the particular mode of expressing one's self, as when we say that a man is known by his speech; 'When speech is employed only as the vehicle of falsehood, every man must disunite himself from others.'—JOHNSON. Idiom and dialect are not properly a language, but the properties of language: the idiom is the peculiar construction and turn of a language, which distinguishes it altogether from others; it is that which enters into the composition of the language, and cannot be separated from it; 'The language of this great poet is sometimes obscured by old words, transpositions, and foreign idioms.'—ADDISON. The dialect is that which is engrafted on a language by the inhabitants of particular parts of a country, and admitted by its writers and learned men to form an incidental part of the language; as the dialects which originated with the Ionians, the Athenians, the Æolians, and were afterward amalgamated into the Greek tongue; as also the dialects of the High and Low German which are distinguished by similar peculiarities; 'Every art has its dialect, uncouth and ungrateful to all whom custom has not reconciled to its sound.'—JOHNSON.

Languages simply serve to convey the thoughts: tongues consist of words written or spoken: speech consists of words spoken: idioms are the expression of national manners, customs, and turns of sentiment, which are the most difficult to be transferred from one language to another: dialects do not vary so much in the words themselves, as in the forms of words; they are prejudicial to the perspicuity of a language, but add to its harmony.

DICTION, STYLE, PHRASE, PHRASEOLOGY.

Diction, from the Latin dictio, saying, is put for the mode of expressing ourselves; style comes from the Latin stylus the bodkin with which the Romans both wrote and corrected what they had written on their waxen tablets: whence the word has been used for the manner of writing in general; phrase, in Greek φράσις, from φράσσω to speak; and phraseology from φράσις and λόγος, both signify the manner of speaking.

Diction expresses much less than style: the former is applicable to the first efforts of learners in composition; the latter only to the original productions of a matured mind. Errors in grammar, false construction, a confused disposition of words, or an improper application of them, constitutes bad diction; but the niceties, the elegancies, the peculiarities, and the beauties of composition, which mark the genius and talent of the writer, are what is comprehended under the name of style. Diction is a general term, applicable alike to a single sentence or a connected composition; style is used in regard to a regular piece of composition.

As diction is a term of inferior import, it is of course mostly confined to ordinary subjects, and style to the productions of authors. We should speak of a person's diction in his private correspondence, but of his style in his literary works. Diction requires only to be pure and clear; 'Prior's diction is more his own than that of any among the successors of Dryden.'—JOHNSON. Style may likewise be terse, polished, elegant, florid, poetick, sober, and the like; 'I think we may say with justice, that when mortals converse with their Creator, they cannot do it in so proper a style as in that of the Holy Scriptures.'—ADDISON.

Diction is said mostly in regard to what is written; phrase and phraseology are said as often of what is spoken as what is written; as that a person has adopted a strange phrase or phraseology. The former respects single words; the latter comprehends a succession of phrases;

Rude am I in speech,
And little blest with the soft phrase of speech.

SHAKESPEARE.

'I was no longer able to accommodate myself to the accidental current of my conversation; my notions grew particular and paradoxical, and my phraseology formal and unfashionable.'—JOHNSON.

DICTIONARY, ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

Dictionary, from the Latin dictum a saying or word, is a register of words; encyclopædia, from the Greek ἐγκυκλοπαιδία or ἐν κύκλῳ παιδία learning, signifies a register of things.

The definition of words, with their various changes, modifications, uses, acceptations, and applications, are the proper subjects of a dictionary; 'If a man that lived an age or two ago should return into the world again, he would really want a dictionary to help him to understand his own language.'—TILLOTSON. The nature and property of things, with their construction, uses, powers, &c. are the proper subjects of an encyclopædia; 'Every science borrows from all the rest, and we cannot attain any single one without the encyclopædia.'—GLANVILLE. A general acquaintance with all arts and sciences as far as respects the use of technical terms, and a perfect acquaintance with the classical writers in the language, are essential for the composition of a dictionary; an entire acquaintance with all the minutiae of grammar is requisite for the composition of an encyclopædia. A single individual may qualify himself for the task of writing a dictionary; but the universality and diversity of knowledge contained in an encyclopædia render it necessarily the work of many.

A dictionary has been extended in its application to any work alphabetically arranged, as biographical, medical, botanical dictionaries, and the like, but still preserving this distinction, that the dictionary always contains only a general or partial illustration of the subject proposed, while the encyclopædia embraces the whole circle of science.

DICTIONARY, LEXICON, VOCABULARY, GLOSSARY, NOMENCLATURE.

Dictionary (v. Dictionary) is a general term. Lexicon from λέγω to say, vocabulary from vox a word, glossary from gloss to explain, and nomenclature from nomen, are all species of the dictionary.

Lexicon is a species of dictionary appropriately applied to the dead languages. A Greek or Hebrew lexicon is distinguished from a dictionary of the French or English. A vocabulary is a partial kind of dictionary which may comprehend a simple list of words, with or without explanation, arranged in order or otherwise. A glossary is an explanatory vocabulary, which commonly serves to explain the obsolete terms employed in any old author. A nomenclature is literally a list of names, and in particular reference to proper names.

TURGID, TUMID, BOMBASTICK.

Turgid and tumid both signify swollen, but they differ in their application: turgid belongs to diction, as a turgid style; tumid is applicable to the water and other objects, as the tumid waves. Bombastick, from bombyz a kind of cotton, signifies puffed up like cotton, and is, like turgid, applicable to words; but the bombastick includes the sentiments expressed: turgidity is confined mostly to the mode of expression. A writer is turgid who expresses a simple thought in a lofty language: a person is bombastick who deals in large words and introduces high sentiments in common discourse.

DIFFUSE, PROLIX.

Both mark defects of style opposed to brevity. Diffuse, in Latin diffusus, participle of diffundere to pour out or spread wide, marks the quality of being extended in space; prolix, in French prolizer, changed from prolaxus, signifies to let loose in a wide space.

The diffuse is properly opposed to the precise; the prolix to the concise or laconic. A diffuse writer is fond of amplification, he abounds in epithets, tropes, figures, and illustrations; the prolix writer is fond of circumlocution, minute details, and trifling particulars. Diffuseness is a fault only in degree, and according to circumstances; prolixity is a positive fault at all times. The former leads to the use of words unnecessarily; the latter to the use of phrases as well as words that are altogether useless: the diffuse style has too much of repetition; the prolix style abounds in tautology. Diffuseness often arises from an exuberance of imagination; prolixity from the want of imagination; on the other hand the former may be coupled with great superficiality, and the latter with great solidity.

Gibbon and other modern writers have fallen into the error of diffuseness. Lord Clarendon and many English writers preceding him are chargeable with prolixity; 'Few authors are more clear and perspicuous on the whole than Archbishop Tillotson and Sir William Temple, yet neither of them are remarkable for precision; they are loose and diffuse.'—BLAIR. 'I look upon a tedious talker, or what is generally known by the name of a story-teller, to be much more insufferable than a prolix writer.'—STEELE.

SENTENCE, PROPOSITION, PERIOD, PHRASE.

Sentence, in Latin sententia, is but a variation of sentiment (v. Opinion); proposition, v. Proposal; period, in Latin periodus, Greek περίοδος, from περί about and ὁδός way, signifies the circuit or round of words, which renders the sense complete; phrase, from the Greek φράζω to speak, signifies the words uttered

The sentence consists of any words which convey sentiment; the proposition consists of the thing set before the mind, that is, either before our own minds or the minds of others; hence the term sentence has more especial regard to the form of words, and the proposition to the matter contained; 'Some extent in letters pointed sentences and forcible periods.'—JOHNSON. 'In 1417, it required all the eloquence and authority of the famous Gerson to prevail upon the council of Constance to condemn this proposition, that there are some cases in which assassination is a virtue more meritorious in a knight than a squire.'—ROBERTSON. Sentence and proposition are both used technically or otherwise: the former in grammar and rhetoric, the latter in logic. The sentence is simple and complex; the proposition is universal or particular. Period and phrase, like sentence, are forms of words, but they are solely so, whereas the sentence depends on the connexion of ideas by which it is formed; we speak of sentences either as to their structure or their sentiment; hence the sentence is either grammatical or moral; 'A sentence may be defined, a moral instruction couched in a few words.'—BROOME. The period regards only the structure; it is either well or ill-turned, long or short, it is in fact a complete sentence from one full stop to another; 'Periods are beautiful when they are not too long.'—BEN JONSON. The term phrase denotes the character of the words;

Disastrous words can best disasters show,
In angry phrase the angry passions glow.

ELPHINSTONE.

Hence it is either vulgar or polite, idiomatick or general: the sentence must consist of at least two words to make sense; the phrase may be a single word or otherwise

SILENCE, TACITURNITY.

* The Latins have the two verbs sileo and taceo; the former of which is interpreted by some to signify to cease to speak; and the latter not to begin to speak: others maintain the direct contrary. According to the present use of the words, silence expresses less than taciturnity: the silent man does not speak; the taciturn man will not speak at all. The Latins designated the most profound silence by the epithet of taciturna silentia.

Silence is either occasional or habitual; it may arise from circumstances or character: taciturnity is mostly habitual, and springs from disposition. A loquacious man may be silent if he has no one to speak to him, and a prudent man will always be silent where he finds that speaking would be dangerous: a taciturn man, on the other hand, may occasionally make an effort to speak, but he never speaks without an effort. When silence is habitual, it does not spring from an unamiable character; but taciturnity has always its source in a vicious temper of the mind. A silent man may frequently contract a habit of silence from thoughtfulness, modesty, or the fear of offending: a man is taciturn only from the sullenness and gloominess of his temper. Habits of retirement render men silent; savages seldom break their silence; company will not correct taciturnity, but rather increase it. The observer is necessarily silent; if he speaks, it is only in order to observe: the melancholy man is naturally taciturn; if he speaks, it is with pain to himself. Seneca says, talk little with others and much with yourself; the silent man observes this precept; the taciturn man exceeds it;

Silence is the perfectest herald of joy:

I were but little happy, if I could say how much.

SHAKESPEARE.

'Pythagoras enjoined his scholars in absolute silence for a long novitiate. I am far from approving such a taciturnity; but I highly approve the end and intent of Pythagoras' injunction.'—CHATHAM.

SILENT, DUMB, MUTE, SPEECHLESS.

Not speaking is the common idea included in the signification of these terms, which differ either in the cause or the circumstance: silent (v. Silent) is altogether an indefinite and general term, expressing little more than the common idea. We may be silent

* V'de Abbe Roubaud: "Silencieux, taciturne."

because we will not speak, or we may be silent because we cannot speak; but in distinction from the other terms it is always employed in the former case. Sometimes it is also used figuratively to denote sending forth no sound;

And just before the confines of the wood,
The gliding Lethe leads her silent flood.

DRYDEN.

Dumb, from the German dumm stupid or idiotick, denotes a physical incapacity to speak: hence persons are said to be born dumb; they may likewise be dumb from temporary physical causes, as from grief, shame, and the like; or a person may be struck dumb; 'The truth of it is, half the great talkers in the nation would be struck dumb were this fountain of discourse (party lies) dried up.'—ADDISON.

'T is listening fear and dumb amazement all.

THOMSON.

Mute, in Latin mutus, Greek μῦτος from μῦω to shut, signifies having a shut mouth, or a temporary disability to speak from arbitrary and incidental causes: hence the office of mutes, or of persons who engage not to speak for a certain time; and, in like manner, persons are said to be mute who dare not give utterance to their thoughts;

Mute was his tongue, and upright stood his hair.

DRYDEN.

Long mute he stood, and leaning on his staff,
His wonder witness'd with an idiot laugh.

DRYDEN.

Speechless, or void of speech, denotes a physical incapacity to speak from incidental causes; as when a person falls down speechless in an apoplectick fit, or in consequence of a violent convulsion;

But who can paint the lover as he stood,
Pierc'd by severe amazement, hating life,
Speechless, and fix'd in all the death of wo.

THOMSON.

TO SPEAK, SAY, TELL.

Speak, v. To speak; say, in Saxon seegan, German sagen, Latin seco or sequor, changed into dico, and Hebrew דָּבַר to vociferate; tell, in Saxon taellan, Low German tellan, &c., is probably an onomatopoeia in language.

To speak may simply consist in uttering an articulate sound; but to say is to communicate some idea by means of words: a child begins to speak the moment it opens its lips to utter any acknowledged sound; but it will be some time before it can say any thing; a person is said to speak high or low, distinctly or indistinctly; but he says that which is true or false, right or wrong: a dumb man cannot speak; a fool cannot say any thing that is worth hearing: we speak languages, we speak sense or nonsense, we speak intelligibly or unintelligibly; but we say what we think at the time. In an extended sense, speak may refer as much to sense as to sound; but then it applies only to general cases, and say to particular and passing circumstances of life: it is a great abuse of the gift of speech not to speak the truth; it is very culpable in a person to say that he will do a thing and not to do it.

To say and tell are both the ordinary actions of men in their daily intercourse; but say is very partial, it may comprehend single, unconnected sentences, or even single words: we may say yes or no; but we tell that which is connected, and which forms more or less of a narrative. To say is to communicate that which passes in our own minds, to express our ideas and feelings as they rise; to tell is to communicate events or circumstances respecting ourselves or others: it is not good to let children say foolish things for the sake of talking; it is still worse for them to be encouraged in telling every thing they hear: when every one is allowed to say what he likes and what he thinks, there will commonly be more speakers than hearers; those who accustom themselves to tell long stories impose a tax upon others, which is not repaid by the pleasure of their company.

Men's reputations depend upon what others say of them; reports are spread by means of one man telling another; 'He that questioneth much shall learn much, and content much for he shall give occasion to those whom he asketh to please themselves in speaking.'—BACON.

Say, Yorke (for sure, if any, thou canst tell),
What virtue is, who practise it so well.

JENYNS.

NEWS, TIDINGS.

News implies any thing new that is related or circulated; but tidings, from tide, signifies that which flows in periodically like the tide, and comes in at the moment the thing happens. News is unexpected; it serves to gratify idle curiosity; 'I wonder that in the present situation of affairs you can take pleasure in writing any thing but news.'—SPECTATOR. Tidings are expected; they serve to allay anxiety;

Too soon some demon to my father bore
The tidings that his heart with anguish tore

FALCONER

In time of war the publick are eager after news; and they who have relatives in the army are anxious to have tidings of them.

TO REPEAT, RECITE, REHEARSE, RECAPITULATE.

The idea of going over any words, or actions, is common to all these terms. Repeat, from the Latin repeto to seek, or go over again, is the general term including only the common idea. To recite, rehearse and recapitulate, are modes of repetition, conveying each some accessory idea. To recite is to repeat in a formal manner; to rehearse is to repeat or recite by way of preparation; to recapitulate is to repeat in a minute and specifick manner. We repeat both actions and words; we recite only words: we repeat single words, or even sounds; we recite always a form of words: we repeat our own words, or the words of another; we recite only the words of another: we repeat a name; we recite an ode, or a set of verses: we repeat for purposes of general convenience; we recite for the convenience or amusement of others; we rehearse for some specifick purpose, either for the amusement or instruction of others: we recapitulate for the instruction of others. One repeats that which he wishes to be heard;

I could not half those horrid crimes repeat,
Nor half the punishments those crimes have met.

DRYDEN

A piece of poetry is recited before a company 'Whenever the practice of recitation was disused, the works, whether poetical or historical, perished with the authors.'—JOHNSON. A piece is rehearsed in private, which is intended to be recited in publick;

Now take your turns, ye muses, to rehearse
His friend's complaints, and mighty magick verse.

DRYDEN

One recapitulates the general heads of that which we have already spoken in detail; 'The parts of a judge are to direct the evidence to moderate length, repetition, or impertinency of speech, to recapitulate, select, and collate the material points of that which has been said.'—BACON. A master must always repeat to his scholars the instruction which he wishes them to remember; Homer is said to have recited his verses in different parts; players rehearse their different parts before they perform in publick; ministers recapitulate the leading points in their discourse.

To repeat is commonly to use the same words; to recite, to rehearse, and to recapitulate, do not necessarily require any verbal sameness. We repeat literally what we hear spoken by another; but we recite and rehearse events; and we recapitulate in a concise manner what has been uttered in a particular manner. An echo repeats with the greatest possible precision; Homer recites the names of all the Grecian and Trojan leaders, together with the names and account of their countries, and the number of the forces which they commanded; Virgil makes Aeneas to rehearse before Dido and her courtiers the story of the capture of Troy, and his own adventures; a judge recapitulates evidence to a jury.

To repeat, recite, and recapitulate are employed in writing, as well as in speaking; rehearse is only a mode of speaking. It is sometimes a beauty in style to repeat particular words on certain occasions; an historian finds it necessary to recapitulate the principal events of any particular period.

REPETITION, TAUTOLOGY.

Repetition is to tautology as the genus to the species: the latter being a species of vicious repetition. There may be frequent repetitions which are warranted by necessity or convenience; but tautology is that which nowise adds to either the sense or the sound. A repetition may, or may not, consist of literally the same words; but tautology, from the Greek ταυτο the same, and λόγος a word, supposes such a sameness in expression, as renders the signification the same. In the liturgy of the church of England there are some repetitions, which add to the solemnity of the worship; in most extemporary prayers there is much tautology, that destroys the religious effect of the whole; 'That is truly and really tautology, where the same thing is repeated, though under never so much variety of expression.'—SOUTH.

TO RELATE, RECOUNT, DESCRIBE.

Relate, in Latin relatus, participle of referro, signifies to bring that to the notice of others which has before been brought to our own notice; recount is properly to count again, or count over again; describe, from the Latin scribo to write, is literally to write down.

The idea of giving an account of events or circumstances is common to all these terms, which differ in the object and circumstances of the action. Relate is said generally of all events, both of those which concern others as well as ourselves;

O Muse! the causes and the crimes relate,
What goddess was provok'd, and whence her hate.
DRYDEN.

Recount is said particularly of those which concern ourselves, or in which we are interested;

To recount Almighty works
What words or tongue of seraph can suffice?
MILTON.

Those who relate all they hear often relate that which never happened; it is a gratification to an old soldier to recount all the transactions in which he bore a part during the military career of his early youth. Events are related that have happened at any period of time immediate or remote; one recounts mostly those things which have been long passed: in recounting, the memory reverts to past scenes, and counts over all that has deeply interested the mind. Travellers are pleased to relate to their friends whatever they have seen remarkable in other countries; the recounting of our adventures in distant regions of the globe has a peculiar interest for all who hear them. We may relate either by writing or by word of mouth; we recount only by word of mouth: writers of travels sometimes give themselves a latitude in relating more than they have either heard or seen; he who recounts the exploits of heroism, which he has either witnessed or performed, will always meet with a delighted audience.

Relate and recount are said of that only which passes; describe is said of that which exists: we relate the particulars of our journey; and we describe the country we pass through. Personal adventure is always the subject of a relation; the quality and condition of things are those of the description. We relate what happened on meeting a friend; we describe the dress of the parties, or the ceremonies which are usual on particular occasions; 'In describing a rough torrent or deluge, the numbers should run easy and flowing.'—POPE.

RELATION, RECITAL, NARRATION.

Relation, from the verb relate, denotes the act of relating; recital, from recite, denotes the act of reciting; narrative, from narrate, denotes the thing narrated. Relation is here, as in the former paragraph (v. To relate), the general, and the others particular terms. Relation applies to every object which is related, whether of a publick or private, a national or an individual nature; history is the relation of national events; biography is the relation of particular lives; 'Those relations are commonly of most value in which the writer tells his own story.'—JOHNSON. Recital is the relation or repetition of actual or existing circumstances; we listen to the recital of misfortunes, distresses, and the like; 'Old men fall easily into recitals of past transactions.'—JOHNSON. The relation may concern matters of indifference; the recital is always of something that affects the interests of some individual: the pages of the journalist are filled with the relation of daily occurrences which simply amuse in the reading; but the recital of another's woes often draws tears from the audience to whom it is made.

Relation and recital are seldom employed but in connexion with the object related or recited; narrative is mostly used by itself: hence we say the relation of any particular circumstance; the recital of any one's calamities; but an affecting narrative, or a simple narrative; 'Cynthia was much taken with my narrative.'—TATLER.

ANECDOTES, MEMOIRS, CHRONICLES, ANNALS.

Anecdote, from the Greek ἀνέκδοτος, signifies what is communicated in a private way; memoirs, in French mémoires, from the word memory, signifies what serves to help the memory; chronicle, in French chronicle, from the Greek χρόνος time, signifies an account of the times; annals, from the French annales, the Latin annus a year, signifies a detail of what passes in the year.

All these terms mark a species of narrative more or less connected, that may serve as materials for a regular history.

Anecdotes consist of personal or detached circumstances of a publick or private nature, involving one subject or more. Anecdotes may be either moral or political, literary or biographical; they may serve as characteristics of any individual, or of any particular nation or age; 'I allude to those papers in which I treat of the literature of the Greeks, carrying down my history in a chain of anecdotes from the earliest poets to the death of Menander.'—CUMBERLAND

Memoirs may include anecdotes, as far as they are connected with the leading subject on which they treat; memoirs are rather connected than complete; they are a partial narrative respecting an individual, and comprehending matter of a publick or private nature; they serve as memorials of what ought not to be forgotten, and lay the foundation either for a history or a life; 'Caesar gives us nothing but memoirs of his own times.'—CULLEN.

Chronicles and annals are altogether of a publick nature; and approach the nearest to the regular and genuine history. Chronicles register the events as they pass; annals digest them into order, as they occur in the course of the year. Chronicles are minute as to the exact point of time; annals only preserve a general order within the period of a year.

Chronicles detail the events of small as well as large communities, as of particular districts and cities; annals detail only the events of nations. Chronicles include domestic incidents or such things as concern individuals. The word annals, in its proper sense, relates only to such things as affect the great body of the publick, but it is frequently employed in an improper sense. Chronicles may be confined to simple matter of fact; annals may enter into the causes and consequences of events; 'His eye was so piercing that, as ancient chronicles report, he could blunt the weapons of his enemies only by looking at them.'—JOHNSON.

Could you with patience hear, or I relate,
O nymph! the tedious annals of our fate,
Through such a train of woes if I should run
The day would sooner than the tale be done.
DRYDEN.

Anecdotes require point and vivacity, as they seem rather to amuse than instruct; the grave historian will always use them with caution; memoirs require authenticity; chronicles require accuracy; annals require clearness of narration, method in the disposition, impartiality in the representation, with almost every requisite that constitutes the true historian.

Anecdotes and memoirs are of more modern use: chronicles and annals were frequent in former ages; they were the first historic monuments which were stamped with the impression of the simple, frank, and rude manners of early times. The chronicles of our present times are principally to be found in newspapers and magazines; the annals in annual registers or retrospects

ACCOUNT, NARRATIVE, DESCRIPTION.

Account, v. Account, reckoning; narrative, from narrate, is in Latin narratus, participle of narrare or gnarrare, signifies that which is made known; description, from describe, in Latin describo, or de and scribo, signifies that which is written down.

Account is the most general of these terms; whatever is noted as worthy of remark is an account; narrative is an account narrated; description an account described.

Account has no reference to the person giving the account; a narrative must have a narrator; a description must have a describer. An account may come from one or several quarters, or no specified quarter; but a narrative and description bespeak themselves as the production of some individual.

An account may be the statement of a single fact only; a narrative must always consist of several connected incidents; a description of several unconnected particulars respecting some common object.

An account and a description may be communicated either verbally or in writing; a narrative is mostly written.

An account may be given of political events, natural phenomena, and domestic occurrences; as the signing of a treaty, the march of an army, the death and funeral of an individual; 'A man of business, in good company, who gives an account of his abilities and despatches, is hardly more insupportable than her they call a notable woman.'—STEELE. A narrative is mostly personal, respecting the adventures, the travels, the dangers, and the escapes of some particular person; 'Few narratives will, either to men or women, appear more incredible than the histories of the Amazons.'—JOHNSON. A description does not so much embrace occurrences, as characters, appearances, beauties, defects, and attributes in general; 'Most readers, I believe, are more charmed with Milton's description of paradise than of hell.'—ADDISON.

Accounts from the armies are anxiously looked for in time of war. Whenever a narrative is interesting, it is a species of reading eagerly sought after. The descriptions which are given of the eruptions of volcanoes are calculated to awaken a strong degree of curiosity. An account may be false or true; a narrative clear or confused; a description lively or dull.

FABLE, TALE, NOVEL, ROMANCE.

Fable, in Latin fabula, from for to speak or tell, and tale, from to tell, both designate a species of narration; novel, in Italian novella, is an extended tale that has novelty; romance, from the Italian romanzo, is a wonderful tale, or a tale of wonders, such as was most in vogue in the dark ages of European literature.

Different species of composition are expressed by the above words. The fable is allegorical; its actions are natural, but its agents are mostly imaginary; 'When I travelled, I took a particular delight in hearing the songs and fables that are come from father to son, and are most in vogue among the common people.'—ADDISON. The tale is fictitious, but not imaginary; both the agents and actions are drawn from the passing scenes of life;

Of Jason, Theseus, and such worthies old,
Light seem the tales antiquity has told.—WALLER.

Gods and goddesses, animals and men, trees, vegetables, and inanimate objects in general, may be made the agents of a fable: but of a tale, properly speaking, only men or supernatural spirits can be the agents: of the former description are the celebrated fables of Æsop; and of the latter the tales of Marmontel, the ales of the Genii, the Chinese tales, &c. Fables are written for instruction; tales principally for amusement: fables consist mostly of only one incident or action from which a moral may be drawn; tales always of many, which excite an interest for an individual.

The tale when compared with the novel is a simple kind of fiction, it consists of but few persons in the drama; while the novel on the contrary admits of every possible variety in characters: the tale is told without much art or contrivance to keep the reader in suspense, without any depth of plot or importance in the catastrophe; the novel affords the greatest scope for exciting an interest by the rapid succession of events, the involvements of interests, and the unraveling of its plots; 'A novel conducted upon one uniform plan, containing a series of events in familiar life, is in effect a protracted comedy not divided into acts.'—CUMBERLAND. If the novel awakens the attention, the romance rivets the whole mind and engages the affections; it presents nothing but what is extraordinary and calculated to fill the imagination: of the former description, Cervantes, La Sage, and Fielding have given us the best specimens; and of the latter we have the best modern specimens from the pen of Mrs. Radcliffe; 'In the romances formerly written, every transaction and sentiment was so remote from all that passes among men, that the reader was in little danger of making any application to himself.'—JOHNSON.

ANECDOTE, STORY, TALE.

Anecdote, v. Anecdotes; story, like history, comes from the Greek ιστορίω to relate.

An anecdote (v. Anecdotes) has but little incident, and no plot; a story may have many incidents, and an important catastrophe annexed to it, the word story being a contraction of history: there are many anecdotes related of Dr. Johnson, some of which are of a trifling nature, and others characteristic; stories are generally told to young people of ghosts and visions, which are calculated to act on their fears.

An anecdote is pleasing and pretty; a story is frightful or melancholy: an anecdote always consists of some matter of fact; a story is founded on that which is real. Anecdotes are related of some distinguished persons, displaying their characters or the circumstances of their lives; 'How admirably Rabin, the most popular among the French critics, was qualified to sit in judgment upon Homer and Thucydides, Demosthenes and Plato, may be gathered from an anecdote preserved by Menage, who affirms upon his own knowledge that Le Fevre and Saumur furnished this assuming critic with the Greek passages which he had to cite, Rabin himself being totally ignorant of that language.'—WARTON. Stories from life, however striking and wonderful, will seldom impress so powerfully as those which are drawn from the world of spirits; 'This story I once intended to omit, as it appears with no great evidence; nor have I met with any confirmation but in a letter of Farquhar, and he only relates that the funeral of Dryden was tumultuary and confused.'—JOHNSON. Anecdotes serve to amuse men, stories to amuse children.

The story is either an actual fact, or something feigned; the tale is always feigned: stories are circulated respecting the accidents and occurrences which happen to persons in the same place; tales of distress are told by many merely to excite compassion. When both are taken for that which is fictitious, the story is either an untruth, or falsifying of some fact, or it is altogether an invention; the tale is always an invention. As an untruth, the story is commonly told by children; and as a fiction, the story is commonly made for children;

Meantime the village rouses up the fire,
While well attested, and as well believed,
Heard solemn, goes the goblin story round.

THOMSON.

The tale is of deeper invention, and serves for a more serious end, good or bad;

He makes that pow'r to trembling nations known,
But rarely this, not for each vulgar end,
As superstitious idle tales pretend.—JENYNS.

CAST, TURN, DESCRIPTION, CHARACTER.

Cast, from the verb to cast (v. To cast), signifies that which is cast, and here, by an extension of the sense, the form in which it is cast; turn, from the verb to turn, signifies also the act of turning, or the manner of turning; description signifies the act of describing, or the thing which is to be described; character is that by which the character is known or determined (v. Character).

What is cast is artificial; what turns is natural: the former is the act of some foreign agent; the latter is the act of the subject itself: hence the cast, as applicable to persons, respects that which they are made by circumstances; the turn, that which they are by themselves: thus there are religious casts in India, that is, men cast in a certain form of religion; and men of a particular moral cast, that is, such as are cast in a particular mould as respects their thinking and acting; so in like manner men of a particular turn, that is, as respects their inclinations and tastes; 'My mind is of such a particular cast, that the falling of a shower of rain, or the whistling of the wind at such a time (the night season) is apt to fill my thoughts with something awful and solemn.'—ADDISON. 'There is a very odd turn of thought required for this sort of writing (the fairy way of writing, as Dryden calls it); and it is impossible for a poet to succeed in it, who has not a particular cast of fancy.'—ADDISON. Description is a term less definite than either of the two former; it respects all that may be said of a person, but particularly that which distinguishes a man from others, either in his mode of thinking or acting, in his habits, in his manners, in his language, or his taste; 'Christian statesmen think that those do not believe Christianity who do not care it should be preached to the poor. But as they know that charity is not confined to any description, they are not deprived of a due and anxious sensation of pity to the distresses of the miserable great.'—BURKE. The character in this sense is a species of description, namely, the description of the prominent features by which an object is distinguished;

Each drew fair characters, yet none
Of those they feign'd excels their own.

DENHAM.

The cast is that which marks a man to others; the turn is that which may be known only to a man's self; the description or character is that by which he is described or made known to others.

The cast is that which is fixed and unchangeable; the turn is that which may be again turned; and the description or character is that which varies with the circumstances.

LIST, ROLL, CATALOGUE, REGISTER.

List, in French liste, and German liste, comes from the German leiste a last, signifying in general any long and narrow body; roll signifies in general any thing rolled up, particularly paper with its written contents; catalogue, in Latin catalogus, Greek κατάλογος, from κατάλογω to write down, signifies a written enumeration; register comes from the Latin verb regero (v. To enrol).

A collection of objects brought into some kind of order is the common idea included in the signification of these terms. The contents and disposition of a list is the most simple; it consists of little more than names arranged under one another in a long narrow line, as a list of words, a list of plants and flowers, a list of voters, a list of visits, a list of deaths, of births, of marriages; 'After I had read over the list of the persons elected into the Tiers Etat, nothing which they afterward did could appear astonishing.'—BURKE. Roll, which is figuratively put for the contents of a roll, is a list rolled up for convenience, as a long roll of saints; 'It appears from the ancient rolls of parliament, and from the manner of choosing the lords of articles, that the proceedings of that high court must have been in a great measure under their direction.'—ROBERTSON. Catalogue involves more details than a simple list; it specifies not only names, but dates, qualities, and circumstances. A list of books contains their titles; a catalogue of books contains an enumeration of their size, price, number of volumes, edition, &c.; a roll of saints simply specifies their names; a catalogue of saints enters into particulars of their ages, deaths, &c.;

Ay! in the catalogue ye go for men,
As hounds, and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs,
All by the name of dogs.—SHAKESPEARE.

A register contains more than either; for it contains events, with dates, actors, &c. in all matters of public interest; I am credibly informed by an antiquary who has searched the registers, that the maids of honour, in Queen Elizabeth's time, were allowed three rumps of beef for their breakfast.'—ADDISON.

TO ENROL, ENLIST OR LIST, REGISTER, RECORD.

Enrol, compounded of en or in and roll, signifies to place in a roll, that is, in a roll of paper or a book; enlist, compounded of in and list, signifies to put down in a list; register is in Latin registrum, from regeſtum, participle of regero, signifying to put down in writing; record, in Latin recordor, compounded of re back or again, and cor the heart, signifies to bring back to the heart, or call to mind by a memorandum.

Enrol and enlist respect persons only; register respects persons and things; record respects things only. Enrol is generally applied to the act of inserting names in an orderly manner into any book; 'Anciently no man was suffered to abide in England above forty days, unless he were enrolled in some tithing or decennary.'—BLACKSTONE. Enlist is a species of enrolling applicable only to the military, or persons intended for military purposes; 'The lords would, by listing their own servants, persuade the gentlemen of the town to do the like.'—CLARENDON. The enrolment is an act of authority; the enlisting is the voluntary act of an individual. Among the Romans it was the office of the censor to enrol the names of all the citizens in order to ascertain their number, and estimate their property. In modern times soldiers are mostly raised by means of enlisting.

In the moral application of the terms, to enrol is to assign a certain place or rank; to enlist is to put one's self under a leader, or attach one's self to a party. Hercules was enrolled among the gods; 'We find ourselves enrolled in this heavenly family as servants and as sons.'—SPRAT. The common people are always ready to enlist on the side of anarchy and rebellion; 'The time never was when I would have enlisted under the banners of any faction, though I might have carried a pair of colours, if I had not spurned them, in either legion.'—SIR WM. JONES.

To enrol and register both imply writing down in a book; but the former is a less formal act than the latter. The insertion of the bare name or designation in a certain order is enough to constitute an enrolment. Registering comprehends the birth, family, and other collateral circumstances of the individual. The object of registering likewise differs from that of enrolling. What is registered serves for future purposes and is of permanent utility to society in general; but what is enrolled often serves only a particular or temporary end. Thus in numbering the people it is necessary simply to enrol their names; but when in addition to this it was necessary, as among the Romans, to ascertain their rank in the state, every thing connected with their property, their family, and their connexions required to be registered. So in like manner in more modern times, it has been found necessary for the good government of the state to register the births, marriages, and deaths of every citizen. It is manifest, therefore, that what is registered, as far as respects persons, may be said to be enrolled; but what is enrolled is not always registered; 'I hope you take care to keep an exact journal, and to register all occurrences and observations, for your friends here expect such a book of travels as has not often been seen.'—JOHNSON.

Register, in regard to records, has a no less obvious distinction: the former is used for domestic and civil transactions, the latter for public and political events. What is registered serves for the daily purposes of the community collectively and individually; what is recorded is treasured up in a special manner for particular reference and remembrance at a distant period. The number or names of streets, houses, carriages, and the like, are registered in different offices; the deeds and documents which regard grants, charters, privileges, and the like, either of individuals or particular towns, are recorded in the archives of nations. To record is, therefore, a formal species of registering: we register when we record, but we do not always record when we register; 'The medals of the Romans were their current money; when an action deserved to be recorded in coin, it was stamped perhaps upon a hundred thousand pieces of money, like our shillings or halfpence.'—ADDISON.

In an extended and figurative application things may be said to be registered in the memory, or events recorded in history. We have a right to believe that the actions of good men are registered in heaven, and that their names are enrolled among the saints and angels; the particular sayings and actions of princes are recorded in history, and handed down to the latest posterity.

RECORD, REGISTER, ARCHIVE.

Record is taken for the thing recorded; register, either for the thing registered, or the place in which it is registered; archive, mostly for the place, and sometimes for the thing. The records are either historical details, or short notices; the registers are but short notices of particular and local circumstances; the archives are always connected with the state. Every place of antiquity has its records of the different circumstances which have been connected with its rise and progress, and the various changes which it has experienced. In public registers we find accounts of families, and of their various connexions and fluctuations; in public archives we find all legal deeds and instruments, which involve the interests of the nation, both in its internal and external economy.

TO CALL, BID, SUMMON, INVITE.

Call, in its abstract and original sense, signifies simply to give an expression of the voice, in which it agrees with the German schall, Swedish skalla a sound, Greek καλέω to call, Hebrew קרא the voice; bid and invite have the same derivation as explained in the preceding article; summon, in French sommer, changed from summoner, Latin submoneo, signifies to give private notice.

The idea of signifying one's wish to another to do any thing is included in all these terms.

To call is not confined to any particular sound; we may call by simply raising the voice; to invite is not even confined to sounds; we may invite by looks, or signs, or even by writing: to bid and summon require the express use of words. The actions of calling and inviting are common to animals as well as men: the sheep call their young when they bleat, and the oxen their companions when they low; cats and other females among the brutes invite their young to come out from their bed when it is proper for them to begin to walk; to bid and summon are altogether confined to human beings.

Call and bid are direct addresses: to invite and summon may pass through the medium of a second person. I call or bid the person whom I wish to come, but I send him a summons or invitation.

Calling of itself expresses no more than the simple desire; but according to circumstances it may be made to express a command or entreaty. When equals call each other, or inferiours call their superiours, it amounts simply to a wish; 'Ladronius, that famous captain, was called up and told by his servants that the general was fled.'—KNOWLES. When the dam calls her young it amounts to supplicating entreaty; but when a father calls his son, or a master his servant, it is equivalent to a command: 'Why came not the slave back when I called him?'—SHAKESPEARE. To bid expresses either a command or an entreaty: when superiours bid it is a positive command;

Saint Withold footed thrice the wold;
He met the night-mare and her ninefold,
Bid her alight and her troth plight.—SHAKESPEARE.

When equals bid it is an act of civility, particularly in the phrases to bid welcome, to bid God speed, to bid farewell, and the like, which, though they may be used by superiours, are nevertheless terms of kindness and equality;

I am bid forth to supper, Jessica;
There are my keys.—SHAKESPEARE.

To summon is always imperative; to invite always in the spirit of kindness and courtesy. Persons in all stations of life have occasion to call each other; but it is an action most befitting the superiour; to bid and invite are alike the actions of superiours and equals. to summon is the act of a superiour only.

Calling is mostly for the purpose of drawing the object to or from a person or another object, whence the phrases to call up, or to call off, &c. Bidding, as a command, may be employed for what we wish to be done; but bidding in the sense of an invitation is employed for drawing the object to our place of residence. Inviting is employed for either purpose. Summoning is an act of authority, by which a person is obliged to make his appearance at a given place.

These terms preserve the same distinction in their extended and figurative acceptation;

In a deep vale, or near some ruin'd wall,
He would the ghosts of slaughter'd soldiers call.

DRYDEN.

'Be not amazed, call all your senses to you, defend my reputation, or bid farewell to your good life for ever.'—SHAKESPEARE. 'The soul makes use of her memory to call to mind what she is to treat of.'—DUPPA.

The star that bids the shepherd fold,
Now the top of heaven doth hold.—MILTON.

This minute may be mine, the next another's;
But still all mortals ought to wait the summons.

SMITH.

Still follow where auspicious fates invite,
Caress the happy, and the wretched slight.—LEWIS.

TO CITE, SUMMON.

Cite, v. To cite, quote; summon, in French sommer, Latin summoneo or submoneo, compounded of sub and moneo, signifies to give a private intimation.

The idea of calling a person authoritatively to appear is common to these terms. Cite is used in a general sense, summon in a particular and technical sense: a person may be cited to appear before his superiour; he is summoned to appear before a court: the station of the individual gives authority to the act of citing; the law itself gives authority to that of summoning.

When cite is used in a legal sense, it is mostly employed for witnesses, and summon for every occasion: a person is cited to give evidence, he is summoned to answer a charge. Cite is seldom used in the legal sense than in that of calling by name, in which general acceptation it is employed with regard to authors, as specified in the succeeding article: it may, however, be sometimes used in a general sense;

E'en social friendship duns his ear,
And cites him to the publick sphere.—SHENSTONE.

The legal is the ordinary sense of summon; it may, however, be extended in its application to any call for which there may be occasion; as when we speak of the summons which is given to attend the death-bed of a friend, or, figuratively, death is said to summon mortals from this world;

The sly enchantress summon'd all her train,
Alluring Venus, queen of vagrant love,
The boon companion Bacchus, loud and vain,
And tricking Hermes, god of fraudulent gain.—WEST

TO CITE, QUOTE.

Cite and quote are both derived from the same Latin verb cito to move, and the Hebrew נוד to stir up, signifying to put in action.

To cite is employed for persons or things; to quote for things only: authors are cited; passages from their works are quoted: we cite only by authority; we quote for general purposes of convenience. Historians ought to cite their authority in order to strengthen their evidence and inspire confidence; 'The great work of which Justinian has the credit, consists of texts collected from law books of approved authority; and those texts are adjusted according to a scientific analysis: the names of the original authors and the titles of their several books being constantly cited.'—SIR WM. JONES. Controversialists must quote the objectionable passages in those works which they wish to confute: it is prudent to cite no one whose authority is questionable; it is superfluous to quote any thing that can be easily perused in the original; 'Let us consider what is truly glorious according to the author I have to-day quoted in the front of my paper.'—STEELE

NOISE, CRY, OUTCRY, CLAMOUR.

Noise is any loud sound; cry, outcry, and clamour are particular kinds of noises, differing either in the cause or the nature of the sounds. A noise proceeds either from animate or inanimate objects; the cry proceeds only from animate objects. The report of a cannon, or the loud sounds occasioned by a high wind, are noises, but not cries;

Nor was his ear less peal'd
With noises loud and ruinous.—MILTON.

Cries issue from birds, beasts, and men;

From either host, the mingled shouts and cries
Of Trojans and Rutilians rend the skies.—DRYDEN.

A noise is produced often by accident; a cry is always occasioned by some particular circumstance: when many horses and carriages are going together, they make a great noise; hunger and pain cause cries to proceed both from animals and human beings.

Noise, when compared with cry, is sometimes only an audible sound; the cry is a very loud noise; whatever disturbs silence, as the falling of a pin in a perfectly still assembly, is denominated a noise; but a cry is that which may often drown other noises, as the cries of people selling things about the streets. A cry is in general a regular sound, but outcry and clamour are irregular sounds; the former may proceed from one or many, the latter from many in conjunction. A cry after a thief becomes an outcry when set up by many at a time; it becomes a clamour, if accompanied with shouting, bawling, and noises of a mixed and tumultuous nature;

And now great deeds
Had been achiev'd, whereof all hell had rung,
Had not the snaky sorceress that sat
Fast by hell gate, and kept the fatal key,
Ris'n, and with hideous outcry rush'd between.

MILTON.

Their darts with clamour at a distance drive,
And only keep the languish'd war alive.—DRYDEN.

These terms may all be taken in an improper as well as a proper sense. Whatever is obtruded upon the public notice so as to become the universal subject of conversation and writing, is said to make a noise; in this manner a new and good performer at the theatre makes a noise on his first appearance; 'What noise have we had about transplantation of diseases, and transfusion of blood.'—BAKER. 'Socrates lived in Athens during the great plague, which has made so much noise through all ages, and never caught the infection.'—ADDISON. Noise and clamour may be for or against an object; cry and outcry are always against the object, varying in the degree and manner in which they display themselves: the cry is less than the outcry, and this is less than the clamour. When the public voice is raised in an audible manner against any particular matter, it is a cry; if it be mingled with intemperate language it is an outcry; if it be vehement, and exceedingly noisy, it is a clamour. Partisans raise a cry in order to form a body in their favour;

Amazement seizes all; the general cry
Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die.—DRYDEN.

The discontented are ever ready to set up an outcry against men in power; 'These outcries the magistrates there shun, since they are hearkened unto here.'—SPENSER (on Ireland). 'A clamour for peace in the time of war is easily raised by those who wish to thwart the government; 'The people grew then exorbitant in their clamours for justice.'—CLARENDON.

TO CRY, WEEP.

Cry comes from the Greek κραῖνω, and the Hebrew קָרַע to cry or call; weep, in Low German wäpen, is a variation of whine, in German weinen, which is an onomatopœia. An outward indication of pain is expressed by both these terms, but the former comprehends an audible expression accompanied or not with tears; the latter simply indicates the shedding of tears.

Crying arises from an impatience in suffering corporal pains; children and weak people commonly cry; weeping is occasioned by mental grief; the wisest and best of men will not disdain sometimes to weep.

Crying is as selfish as it is weak; it serves to relieve the pain of the individual to the annoyance of the hearer;

The babe clung crying to his nurse's breast,
Scared at the dazzling helm and nodding crest

POPE

Weeping, when called forth by others' sorrows, is an infirmity which no man would wish to be without; as an expression of generous sympathy it affords essential relief to the sufferer;

Thy Hector, wrapt in everlasting sleep,
Shall neither hear thee sigh, nor see thee weep

POPE.

TO CRY, SCREAM, SHRIEK.

Cry, v. To cry, weep; scream and shriek are variations of cry.

To cry indicates the utterance of an articulate or an inarticulate sound; scream is a species of crying in the first sense of the word; shriek is a species of crying in its latter sense.

Crying is an ordinary mode of loud utterance resorted to on common occasions; one cries in order to be heard: screaming is an intemperate mode of crying, resorted to from an impatient desire to be heard, or from a vehemence of feeling. People scream to deaf people from the mistaken idea of making themselves heard; whereas a distinct articulation will always be more efficacious. It is frequently necessary to cry when we cannot render ourselves audible by any other means; but it is never necessary or proper to scream.

Shriek may be compared with cry and scream, as expressions of pain; in this case to shriek is more than to cry, and less than to scream. They both signify to cry with a violent effort. We may cry from the slightest pain or inconvenience; but one shrieks or screams only on occasions of great agony, either corporeal or mental. A child cries when it has hurt its finger; it shrieks in the moment of terror at the sight of a frightful object; or screams until some one comes to its assistance.

To cry is an action peculiar to no age or sex; to scream and to shriek are the common actions of women and children. Men cry, and children scream, for assistance; excess of pain will sometimes compel a man to cry out; a violent alarm commonly makes females shriek;

Like a thin smoke he sees the spirit fly,
And hears a feeble, lamentable cry.—POPE.

Rapacious at the mother's throat they fly,
And tear the screaming infant from her breast

THOMSON.

The house is fill'd with loud laments and cries,
And shrieks of women rend the vaulted throne.

DRYDEN

TO CRY, EXCLAIM, CALL.

All these terms express a loud mode of speaking, which is all that is implied in the sense of the word cry, while in that of the two latter are comprehended accessory ideas.

To exclaim, from the Latin exclamo or ex and clamo, to cry out or aloud, signifies to cry with an effort; call comes from the Greek καλέω.

We cry from the simple desire of being heard at a distance: we exclaim from a sudden emotion or agitation of mind. As a cry bespeaks distress and trouble, an exclamation bespeaks surprise, grief, or joy. We cry commonly in a large assembly or an open space, but we may exclaim in conversation with an individual.

To cry is louder and more urgent than to call. A man who is in danger of being drowned cries for help, he who wants to raise a load calls for assistance: a cry is a general or indirect address; a call is a particular and immediate address. We cry to all or any who may be within hearing; we call to an individual by name with a direct reference to him;

There while you groan beneath the load of life,
They cry, behold the mighty Hector's wife!—POPE

The dreadful day
No pause of words admits, no dull delay;
Fierce Discord storms, Apollo loud exclaims,
Fame calls, Mars thunders, and the field's in flames

POPE

LOUD, NOISY, HIGHSOUNDING, CLAMOROUS.

Loud is doubtless connected, through the medium of the German laut a sound, and lauschen to listen, with the Greek αὐτός to hear, because sounds are the object of hearing: noisy, having a noise, like noisome and noxious, comes from the Latin noceo to hurt, signifying in general offensive, that is, to the sense of hearing, of smelling, and the like: highsounding signifies the same as pitched upon an elevated key, so as to make a great noise, to be heard at a distance: clamorous, from the Latin clamo to cry, signifies crying with a loud voice.

Loud is here the generic term, since it signifies a great sound, which is the idea common to them all. As an epithet for persons, loud is mostly taken in an indifferent sense; all the others are taken for being loud beyond measure: noisy is to be intemperately loud; highsounding is only to be loud from the bigness of one's words; clamorous is to be disagreeably and painfully loud. We must speak loudly to a deaf person in order to make ourselves heard;

The clowns, a boist'rous, rude, ungovern'd crew,
With furious haste to the loud summons flew.

DRYDEN.

Children will be noisy at all times if not kept under control;

O leave the noisy town.—DRYDEN.

Flatterers are always highsounding in their eulogiums of those by whom they expect to be served; 'I am touched with sorrow at the conduct of some few men, who have lent the authority of their highsounding names to the designs of men with whom they could not be acquainted.'—BURKE. Children will be clamorous for what they want, if they expect to get it by dint of noise; they will be turbulent in case of refusal, if not under proper discipline;

Clam'rous around the royal hawk they fly.

DRYDEN.

In the improper application, loud is taken in as bad a sense as the rest: the loudest praises are the least to be regarded: the applause of a mob is always noisy: highsounding titles serve only to excite contempt where there is not some corresponding sense: it is the business of an opposition party to be clamorous, which serves the purpose of exciting turbulence among the ignorant.

TO NOMINATE, NAME.

Nominate comes immediately from the Latin nominatus, participle of nominare: name comes from the Teutonic, &c. name, and both from the Latin nomen, &c. (v. To name).

To nominate and to name are both to mention by name; but the former is to mention for a specific purpose; the latter is to mention for general purposes: persons only are nominated; things as well as persons are named: one nominates a person in order to propose him, or appoint him, to an office; 'Elizabeth nominated her commissioners to hear both parties.'—ROBERTSON. One names a person casually, in the course of conversation, or one names him in order to make some inquiry respecting him;

Then Calchas (by Ulysses first inspir'd)

Was urg'd to name whom th' angry gods requir'd.

DRYDEN.

To be nominated is a public act; to be named is generally private: one is nominated before an assembly; one is named in any place: to be nominated is always an honour; to be named is either honourable, or the contrary, according to the circumstances under which it is mentioned: a person is nominated as member of Parliament; he is named in terms of respect or otherwise whenever he is spoken of.

TO NAME, CALL.

Name is properly to pronounce some word, from the Latin nomen, Greek ὄνομα, Hebrew שֵׁם; call, v. To call.

Both these words imply the direction of the sound to an object; but naming is confined to the use of some distinct and significant sound, calling is said of any sound whatever: we may call without naming, but we cannot name without calling. A person is named by his name, whether proper, patronymick, or whatever is usual; he is called according to the characteristics by which he is distinguished. The emperor Tiberius was named Tiberius; he was called a monster. William the First of England is named William; he is called the Conqueror. Helen went three times round the wooden horse in order to discover the snare, and, with the hope of taking the Greeks by surprise, called their principal captains, naming them by their names, and counterfeiting the voices of their wives. Many ancient nations in naming any one called him the son of some one, as Richardson the son of Richard, and Robertson the son of Robert;

Some haughty Greek who lives thy tears to see,
Imbitters all thy woes by naming me.—POPE.

I lay the deep foundations of a wall,
And Ænos, nam'd from me, the city call.—DRYDEN.

NAME, APPELLATION, TITLE, DENOMINATION.

Name, v. To name; appellation, in French appellation, Latin appellatio, from appello to call, signifies that by which a person or thing is called; title, in French titre, Latin titulus, from the Greek τίσις to honour, signifies that appellation which is assigned to any one for the purpose of honour; denomination signifies that which denominates or distinguishes.

Name is a generic term, the rest are specific. Whatever word is employed to distinguish one thing from another is a name; therefore an appellation and a title is a name, but not vice versâ;

Then on your name shall wretched mortals call,
And offer'd victims at your altars fall.—DRYDEN.

A name is either common or proper; an appellation is generally a common name given for some specific purpose as characteristic. Several kings of France had the names of Charles, Louis, Philip, but one was distinguished with the appellation of Stammerer, another by that of the Simple, and a third by that of the Hardy, arising from particular characters or circumstances; 'The names derived from the profession of the ministry in the language of the present age, are made but the appellatives of scorn.'—SOUTH. A title is a species of appellation, not drawn from anything personal, but conferred as a ground of political distinction. An appellation may be often a term of reproach; but a title is always a mark of honour. An appellation is given to all objects, animate or inanimate; a title is given mostly to persons, sometimes to things. A particular house may have the appellation of 'the Cottage,' or 'the Hall'; as a particular person may have the title of Duke, Lord, or Marquis; 'We generally find in titles an intimation of some particular merit that should recommend men to the high stations which they possess.'—ADDISON.

Denomination is to particular bodies, what appellation is to an individual; namely, a term of distinction, drawn from their peculiar character and circumstances. The Christian world is split into a number of different bodies or communities, under the denominations of Catholics, Protestants, Calvinists, Presbyterians, &c. which have their origin in the peculiar form of faith and discipline adopted by these bodies; 'It has cost me much care and thought to marshal and fix the people under their proper denominations.'—ADDISON.

TO NAME, DENOMINATE, STYLE, ENTITLE, DESIGNATE, CHARACTERIZE.

To name (v. To name, call) signifies simply to give a name to, or to address or specify by the given name; 'I could name some of our acquaintance who have been obliged to travel as far as Alexandria in pursuit of money.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero). To denominate is to give a specific name upon some specific ground, or to distinguish by the name; 'A fable in tragick or epick poetry is denominated simple when the events it contains follow each in an unbroken tenour.'—WATSON. To style, from the noun style or manner (v. Diction, style), signifies to address by a specific name;

Happy those times,
When lords were styled fathers of families.

SHAKESPEARE.

'To entitle is to give a specifick or appropriate name; Besides the Scripture, the books which they call ecclesiastical were thought not unworthy to be brought into publick audience, and with that name they entitiled the books which we term Apocryphal.'—HOOKER. Adam named every thing; we denominate the man who drinks excessively 'a drunkard;' subjects style their monarch 'His Majesty;' books are entitiled according to the judgement of the author.

To name, denominate, style, and entitle are the acts of conscious agents only. To designate, signifying to mark out, and characterize, signifying to form a characteristick, are said only of things, and agree with the former only inasmuch as words may either designate or characterize; thus the word 'capacity' is said to designate the power of holding; and 'finesse' characterizes the people by whom it was adopted; 'This is a plain designation of the Duke of Marlborough; one kind of stuff used to fatten land is called marle, and every one knows that borough is the name of town.'—SWIFT. 'There are faces not only individual, but gentilitious and national. European, Asiatick, Chinese, African, and Grecian faces are characterized.'—ARBUETHNOT.

NAME, REPUTATION, REPUTE, CREDIT.

Name is here taken in the improper sense for a name acquired in publick by any peculiarity or quality in an object; reputation and repute, from reputo or re and puto to think back, or in reference to some immediate object, signifies the state of being thought of by the publick, or held in publick estimation; credit (v. Credit) signifies the state of being believed or trusted in general.

Name implies something more specifick than reputation; and reputation something more substantial than name: a name may be acquired by some casualty or by some quality that has more show than worth; reputation is acquired only by time, and built only on merit: a name may be arbitrarily given, simply by way of distinction; reputation is not given, but acquired, or follows as a consequence of one's honourable exertions. A physician sometimes gets a name by a single instance of professional skill, which by a combination of favourable circumstances he may convert to his own advantage in forming an extensive practice; but unless he have a commensurate degree of talent, this name will never ripen into a solid reputation;

Who fears not to do ill, yet fears the name,
And, free from conscience, is a slave to fame.

DENHAM.

'Splendour of reputation is not to be counted among the necessities of life.'—JOHNSON.

Inanimate objects get a name, but reputation is applied only to persons or that which is personal. Fashion is liberal in giving a name to certain shops, certain streets, certain commodities, as well as to certain trades-people, and the like. Universities, academies, and publick institutions, acquire a reputation for their learning, their skill, their encouragement and promotion of the arts or sciences: name and reputation are of a more extended nature than repute and credit. Strangers and distant countries hear of the name and the reputation of any thing; but only neighbours and those who have the means of personal observation can take a part in its repute and credit. It is possible, therefore, to have a name and reputation without having repute and credit, and vice versâ, for the objects which constitute the former are sometimes different from those which produce the latter. A manufacturer has a name for the excellence of a particular article of his own manufacture; a book has a name among wittlings and pretenders to literature: a good writer, however, seeks to establish his reputation for genius, learning, industry, or some praiseworthy characteristick: a preacher is in high repute among those who attend him: a master gains great credit from the good performances of his scholars; Mutton has likewise been in great repute among our valiant countrymen.'—ADDISON.

Would you true happiness attain,
Let honesty your passions rein,
So live in credit and esteem,
And the good name you lost, redeem —GAY.

Name and repute are taken either in a good or bad sense; reputation and credit are taken in the good sense only: a person or thing may get a good or an ill name; a person or thing may be in good or ill repute; reputation may rise to different degrees of height, or it may sink again to nothing, but it never sinks into that which is bad; credit may likewise be high or low but when it becomes bad it is discredit. Families get an ill name for their meanness; houses of entertainment get a good name for their accommodation; houses fall into bad repute when said to be haunted; a landlord comes into high repute among his tenants, if he be considerate and indulgent towards them.

CHARACTER, REPUTATION.

From the natural sense of a stamp or mark (v. Character, letter), this word is figuratively employed for the moral mark which distinguishes one man from another; reputation, from the French reputer, Latin reputo to think, signifies what is thought of a person: character lies in the man; it is the mark of what he is; it shows itself on all occasions: reputation depends upon others; it is what they think of him.

A character is given particularly: a reputation is formed generally. Individuals give a character of another from personal knowledge: publick opinion constitute the reputation. Character has always some foundation; it is a positive description of something: reputation has more of conjecture in it; its source is hearsay.

It is possible for a man to have a fair reputation who has not in reality a good character; although men of really good character are not likely to have a bad reputation; 'Let a man think what multitudes of those among whom he dwells are totally ignorant of his name and character; how many imagine themselves too much occupied with their own wants and pursuits to pay him the least attention; and where his reputation is in any degree spread, how often it has been attacked, and how many rivals are daily rising to abate it.'—BLAIR.

FAME, REPUTATION, RENOWN.

Fame, from the Greek φήμη to say, is the most noisy and uncertain; it rests upon report: reputation (v. Character, reputation) is silent and solid; it lies more in the thoughts, and is derived from observation: renown, in French renommée, from nom a name, signifies the reverberation of a name; it is as loud as fame, but more substantial and better founded; hence we say that a person's fame has gone abroad; his reputation is established; and he has got renown.

Fame may be applied to any object, good, bad, or indifferent;

Europe with Afric in his fame shall join,
But neither shore his conquests shall confine.

DRYDEN.

Reputation is applied only to real eminence in some department; 'Pope doubtless approached Addison, when the reputation of their wit first brought them together, with the respect due to a man whose abilities were acknowledged.'—JOHNSON. Renown is employed only for extraordinary men and brilliant exploits; 'Well constituted governments have always made the profession of a physician both honourable and advantageous. Homer's Machaon and Virgil's Iapis were men of renown, heroes in war.'—JOHNSON. The fame of a quack may be spread among the ignorant multitude by means of a lucky cure, or the fame of an author may be spread by means of a popular work; 'The artist finds greater returns in profit, as the author in fame.'—ADDISON. The reputation of a physician rests upon his tried skill and known experience; the renown of a general is proportioned to the magnitude of his achievements;

How doth it please and fill the memory,
With deeds of brave renown, while on each hand
Historic urns and breathing statues rise,
And speaking busts.—DYER.

FAME, REPORT, RUMOUR, HEARSAY.

Fame (v. Fame) has a reference to the thing which gives birth to it; it goes about of itself without any apparent instrumentality. The report, from re and porto, to carry back, or away from an object, has always a reference to the reporter. Rumour, in Latin rumor, from ruo to rush or to flow, has a reference to the flying nature of words that are carried; it is therefore properly a flying report. Hearsay refers to the receiver of that which is said; it is limited therefore to a small number of speakers or reporters. The fame serves to form or establish a character either of a person or a thing; it will be good or bad according to circumstances; the fame of our Saviour's miracles went a-broad through the land;

Space may produce new worlds, whereof so rife
There went a fame in heav'n, that he ere long Intended to create.—MILTON.

The report serves to communicate information of events; it may be more or less correct according to the veracity or authenticity of the reporter; reports of victories mostly precede the official confirmation; 'What liberties any man may take in imputing words to me which I never spoke, and what credit Caesar may give to such reports, these are points for which it is by no means in my power to be answerable.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero). The rumour serves the purposes of fiction; it is more or less vague, according to the temper of the times and the nature of the events; every battle gives rise to a thousand rumours;

For which of you will stop
The vent of hearing, when loud rumour
Speaks?—SHAKESPEARE.

The hearsay serves for information or instruction, and is seldom so incorrect as it is familiar; 'What influence can a mother have over a daughter, from whose example the daughter can only have hearsay benefits?'—RICHARDSON.

FAMOUS, CELEBRATED, RENOWNED, ILLUSTRIOUS.

Famous signifies literally having fame or being the cause of fame; it is applicable to that which causes a noise or sensation; to that which is talked of, written upon, discussed, and thought of; to that which is reported of far and near; to that which is circulated among all ranks and orders of men: celebrated signifies literally kept in the memory by a celebration or memorial, and is applicable to that which is praised and honoured with solemnity: renowned signifies literally possessed of a name, and is applicable to whatever extends the name, or causes the name to be often repeated: illustrious signifies literally what has or gives a lustre; it is applicable to whatever confers dignity.

Famous is a term of indefinite import; it conveys of itself frequently neither honour nor dishonour, since it is employed indifferently as an epithet for things praiseworthy or otherwise; it is the only one of these terms which may be used in a bad sense. The others rise in a gradually good sense; 'I thought it an agreeable change to have my thoughts diverted from the greatest among the dead and fabulous heroes, to the most famous among the real and living.'—ADDISON.

* The celebrated is founded upon merit and the display of talent in the arts and sciences; it gains the subject respect; 'While I was in this learned body, I applied myself with so much diligence to my studies, that there are very few celebrated books either in the learned or modern tongues which I am not acquainted with.'—ADDISON. The renowned is founded upon the possession of rare or extraordinary qualities, upon successful exertions and an accordance with public opinion; it brings great honour or glory to the subject;

Castor and Pollux first in martial force,
One bold on foot, and one renown'd for horse.

POPE.

The illustrious is founded upon those solid qualities which not only render one known but distinguished; it ensures regard and veneration; 'The reliefs of the envious man are those little blemishes that discover themselves in an illustrious character.'—ADDISON.

A person may be famous for his eccentricities; celebrated as an artist, a writer, or a player; renowned

* Vide Abbe Girard; 'Fameux, illustre, celebre, renommé' as a warrior or a statesman; illustrious as a prince, a statesman, or a senator.

The maid of Orleans, who was decried by the English, and idolized by the French, is equally famous in both nations. There are celebrated authors whom to censure even in that which is censurable, would endanger one's reputation. The renowned heroes of antiquity have, by the perusal of their exploits, given birth to a race of modern heroes not inferior to themselves. Princes may shine in their lifetime, but they cannot render themselves illustrious to posterity except by the monuments of goodness and wisdom which they leave after them.

NOTED, NOTORIOUS.

Noted (v. Distinguished) may be employed either in a good or a bad sense; notorious is never used but in a bad sense: men may be noted for their talents, or their eccentricities; they are notorious only for their vices: noted characters excite many and diverse remarks from their friends and their enemies; notorious characters are universally shunned;

An engineer of noted skill,
Engag'd to stop the growing ill.—GAY.

'What principles of ordinary prudence can warrant a man to trust a notorious cheat?'—SOUTH.

DISTINGUISHED, CONSPICUOUS, NOTED, EMINENT, ILLUSTRIOUS.

Distinguished signifies having a mark of distinction by which a thing is to be distinguished; conspicuous, in Latin conspicuos, from conspicio, signifies easily to be seen; noted, from notus known, signifies well known; eminent, in Latin eminens, from eminere or e and maneo, signifies remaining or standing out above the rest; illustrious, in Latin illustrius, from lustrum to shine, signifies shone upon.

The idea of an object having something attached to it to excite notice is common to all these terms.

Distinguished in its general sense expresses little more than this idea; the rest are but modes of the distinguished. A thing is distinguished in proportion as it is distinct or separate from others; it is conspicuous in proportion as it is easily seen; it is noted in proportion as it is widely known. In this sense a rank is distinguished; a situation is conspicuous; a place is noted. Persons are distinguished by external marks or by characteristic qualities; persons or things are conspicuous mostly from some external mark; persons or things are noted mostly by collateral circumstances.

A man may be distinguished by his decorations, or he may be distinguished by his manly air, or by his abilities; 'It has been observed by some writers that man is more distinguished from the animal world by devotion than by reason.'—ADDISON. A person is conspicuous by the gaudiness of his dress; a house is conspicuous that stands on a hill;

Before the gate stood Pyrrhus, threat'ning loud,
With glitt'ring arms, conspicuous in the crowd.

DRYDEN.

A person is noted for having performed a wonderful cure; a place is noted for its fine waters; 'Upon my calling in lately at one of the most noted Temple coffee-houses, I found the whole room, which was full of young students, divided into several parties, each of which was deeply engaged in some controversy.'—BUDGELL.

We may be distinguished for things, good, bad, or indifferent: we may be conspicuous for our singularities or that which only attracts vulgar notice: we may be noted for that which is bad, and mostly for that which is the subject of vulgar discourse: we can be eminent and illustrious only for that which is really good and praiseworthy; the former applies however mostly to those things which set a man high in the circle of his acquaintance; the latter to that which makes him shine before the world. A man of distinguished talent will be apt to excite envy if he be not also distinguished for his private virtue: affectation is never better pleased than when it can place itself in such a conspicuous situation as to draw all eyes upon itself: lovers of fame are sometimes contented to render themselves noted for their vices or absurdities nothing is more gratifying to a man than to render himself eminent for his professional skill; 'Of Prior, eminent as he was both by his abilities and station, very few memorials have been left by his contemporaries.'—JOHNSON. It is the lot of but few to be illustrious, and those few are very seldom to be envied;

Hail, sweet Saturnian soil! of fruitful grain
Great parent, greater of illustrious men.

DRYDEN.

In an extended and moral application, these terms may be employed to heighten the character of an object; a favour may be said to be distinguished, piety eminent, and a name illustrious; 'Amid the agitations of popular government, occasions will sometimes be afforded for eminent abilities to break forth with peculiar lustre. But while public agitations allow a few individuals to be uncommonly distinguished, the general condition of the publick remains calamitous and wretched.'—BLAIR.

Next add our cities of illustrious name,
Their costly labour and stupendous frame

DRYDEN.

SIGNAL, MEMORABLE.

Signal signifies serving as a sign; memorable signifies worthy to be remembered.

They both express the idea of extraordinary, or being distinguished from ordinary, or being distinguished from every thing else: whatever is signal deserves to be stamped on the mind, and to serve as a sign of some property or characteristic; whatever is memorable impresses upon the memory, and refuses to be forgotten: the former applies to the moral character; the latter to events and times: the Scriptures furnish us with many signal instances of God's vengeance against impenitent sinners, as also of his favour towards those who obey his will; 'We find, in the Acts of the Apostles, not only no opposition to Christianity from the Pharisees, but several signal occasions in which they assisted its first teachers.'—WORTON. The Reformation is a memorable event in the annals of ecclesiastical history; 'That such deliverances are actually afforded, those three memorable examples of Abimelech, Esau, and Balaam sufficiently demonstrate.'—SOUTH.

TO SIGNALIZE, DISTINGUISH.

To signalize, or make one's self a sign of any thing, is a much stronger term than simply to distinguish; it is in the power of many to do the latter, but few only have the power of effecting the former; the English have always signalized themselves for their unconquerable valour in battle; 'The knight of La Mancha gravely recounts to his companion the adventure by which he is to signalize himself.'—JOHNSON. There is no nation that has not distinguished itself, at some period or another, in war;

The valued file
Distinguishes the swift, the slow, the subtle.
SHAKESPEARE.

OF FASHION, OF QUALITY, OF DISTINCTION.

These epithets are employed promiscuously in colloquial discourse; but not with strict propriety;* by men of fashion are understood such men as live in the fashionable world, and keep the best company; 'The free manner in which people of fashion are discoursed on at such meetings (of tradespeople), is but a just reproach of their failures in this kind (in payment).'—STEELE. By men of quality are understood men of rank or title; 'The single dress of a lady of quality is often the product of a hundred climes.'—ADDISON. By men of distinction are understood men of honourable superiority, whether by wealth, office, or pre-eminence in society; 'It behooves men of distinction, with their power and example, to preside over the publick diversions in such a manner as to check any thing that tends to the corruption of manners.'—STEELE.

* Vide Trusler: "Of fashion, of quality, of distinction."

Gentry and merchants, though not men of quality, may, by their mode of living, be men of fashion; and by the office they hold in the state, they may likewise be men of distinction.

PROMINENT, CONSPICUOUS.

Prominent signifies hanging over; conspicuous (in Distinguished) signifies easy to be beheld: the former is, therefore, to the latter, in some measure, as the species to the genus: what is prominent is, in general, on that very account conspicuous; but many things may be conspicuous besides those which are prominent. The terms prominent and conspicuous have, however, an application suited to their peculiar meaning: nothing is prominent but what projects beyond a certain line: every thing is conspicuous which may be seen by many: the nose on a man's face is a prominent feature, owing to its projecting situation; and it is sometimes conspicuous, according to the position of the person: a figure in a painting is said to be prominent, if it appears to stand forward or before the others; but it is not properly conspicuous, unless there be something in it which attracts the general notice, and distinguishes it from all other things: on the contrary, it is conspicuous, but not expressly prominent, when the colours are vivid; 'Lady Macbeth's walking in her sleep is an incident so full of tragick horror, that it stands out as a prominent feature in the most sublime drama in the world.'—CUMBERLAND. 'That innocent mirth which had been so conspicuous in Sir Thomas More's life, did not forsake him to the last.'—ADDISON.

BRIGHTNESS, LUSTRE, SPLENDOUR, BRILLIANCY.

Brightness, from the English bright, Saxon breorht, probably comes, like the German pracht splendour, from the Hebrew כָּרַךְ to shine or glitter; lustre, in French lustre, Latin lustrum a purgation or cleansing, that is, to make clean or pure; splendour, in French splendeur, Latin splendor, from splendeo to shine, comes either from the Greek σπληνδός embers, or σπινθήρ a spark; brilliance, from brilliant and briller to shine, comes from the German brille spectacles, and the middle Latin beryllus a crystal.

Brightness is the generic, the rest are specific terms: there cannot be lustre, splendour, and brilliance, without brightness; but there may be brightness where these do not exist. These terms rise in sense; lustre rises on brightness, splendour on lustre, and brilliance on splendour.

Brightness and lustre are applied properly to natural lights; splendour and brilliance have been more commonly applied to that which is artificial: there is always more or less brightness in the sun or moon; there is an occasional lustre in all the heavenly bodies when they shine in their unclouded brightness; there is splendour in the eruptions of flame from a volcano or an immense conflagration; there is brilliance in a collection of diamonds. There may be both splendour and brilliance in an illumination: splendour arises from the mass and richness of light; brilliance from the variety and brightness of the lights and colours. Brightness may be obscured, lustre may be tarnished, splendour and brilliance diminished.

The analogy is closely preserved in the figurative application. Brightness attaches to the moral character of men in ordinary cases; 'Earthly honours are both short-lived in their continuance, and, while they last, tarnished with spots and stains. On some quarter or other their brightness is obscured. But the honour which proceeds from God and virtue is unmixed and pure. It is a lustre which is derived from heaven.'—BLAIR. Lustre attaches to extraordinary instances of virtue and greatness; splendour and brilliance attach to the achievements of men; 'Thomson's diction is in the highest degree florid and luxuriant, such as may be said to be to his images and thoughts "both their lustre and their shade;" such as invest them with splendour through which they are not easily discernible.'—JOHNSON. 'There is an appearance of brilliance in the pleasures of high life which naturally dazzles the young.'—CRAIG.

Our Saviour is strikingly represented to us as the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person. The humanity of the English in the hour of conquest adds a lustre to their victories which are either splendid or brilliant, according to the number and nature of the circumstances which render them remarkable.

FIRE, HEAT, WARMTH, GLOW.

In the proper sense these words are easily distinguished, but not so easily in the improper sense; and as the latter depends principally upon the former, it is not altogether useless to enter into some explanation of their physical meaning.

Fire is with regard to heat as the cause to the effect: it is itself an inherent property in some material bodies, and when in action communicates heat; * fire is perceptible to us by the eye, as well as the touch; heat is perceptible only by the touch: we distinguish fire by means of the flame it sends forth, or by the changes which it produces upon other bodies; but we discover heat only by the sensations which it produces in ourselves.

Fire has within itself the power of communicating heat to other bodies at a distance from it; but heat, when it lies in bodies without fire, is not communicable or even perceptible, except by coming in contact with the body. Fire is producible in some bodies at pleasure, and when in action will communicate itself without any external influence; but heat is always to be produced and kept in being by some external agency: fire spreads; but heat dies away. Fire is producible only in certain bodies; but heat may be produced in many more bodies; fire may be elicited from a flint, or from wood, steel, and some few other materials; but heat is producible, or exists to a greater or less degree, in all material substances.

Heat and warmth differ principally in degree; the latter being a gentle degree of the former. The term heat is, however, in its most extensive sense applicable to that universal principle which pervades all nature, animate and inanimate, and seems to vivify the whole; it is this principle which appears either under the form of fire, or under the more commonly conceived form of heat, as it is generally understood, and as I have here considered it. Heat in this limited sense is less active than fire, and more active than warmth; the former is produced in bodies, either by the violent action of fire, as in the boiling of water, the melting of lead, or the violent friction of two hard bodies; the latter is produced by the simple expulsion of the cold, as in the case of feathers, wool, and other substances, which produce and retain warmth.

Heat may be the greatest possible remove, but warmth may be the smallest possible remove, from cold; the latter is opposed to the cool, which borders on the cold. Heat is that which to our feelings is painful; but warmth is that which is always grateful. In animate bodies fire cannot long exist, as it is in its nature consuming and destructive; it is incompatible with animal life: heat will not exist, unless when the body is in a diseased or disordered state: but warmth is that portion of heat which exists in every healthy subject; by this the hen hatches and rears her young, by this the operation of gestation is carried on in the female. Glow is a partial heat or warmth which exists or is known to exist, mostly in the human frame; it is commonly produced in the body when it is in its most vigorous state, and its nerves are firmly braced by the cold.

From the above analysis the figurative application of these terms, and the grounds upon which they are so employed, will be easily discerned. As fire is the strongest and most active principle in nature, which seizes every thing within its reach with the greatest possible rapidity, genius is said to be possessed of fire which flies with rapidity through all the regions of thought, and forms the most lively images and combinations;

That modern love is no such thing,
As what those ancient poets sing,
A fire celestial, chaste, refined.—SWIFT.

But when fire is applied to the eye or the looks, it borrows its meaning from the external property of flame, which is very aptly depicted in the eye or the looks of lively people. As heat is always excessive and mostly violent, those commotions and fermentations of the mind which flow from the agitation of the passions, particularly of the angry passions, is termed heat. As warmth is a gentle and grateful property, it has with most propriety been ascribed to the affections. As glow is a partial but vivid feeling of the body, so is friendship a strong but particular affection of the mind: hence the propriety of ascribing a glow to friendship.

Age damps the fire of the poet. Disputants in the heat of the contest are apt to forget all the forms of good-breeding; 'The heat of Milton's mind might be said to sublimiate his learning.'—JOHNSON. A man of tender moral feelings speaks with warmth of a noble action, or takes a warm interest in the concerns of the innocent and the distressed; 'I fear I have pressed you farther upon this occasion than was necessary: however, I know you will excuse my warmth in the cause of a friend.'—MELMOUTH (Letters of Cicero to Caesar). A youth in the full glow of friendship feels himself prepared to make any sacrifice in supporting the cause of his friend;

The frost-concocted glebe
Draws in abundant vegetable soul,
And gathers vigour for the coming year:
A stronger glow sits on the lively cheek
Of ruddy fire.—THOMSON.

FERVOUR, ARDOUR.

Fervour, from ferreo to boil, is not so violent a heat as ardour, from ardeo to burn. The affections are properly fervent; the passions are ardent: we are fervent in feeling, and ardent in acting; the fervour of devotion may be rational; but the ardour of zeal is mostly intemperate. The first martyr, Stephen, was filled with a holy fervour; St. Peter, in the ardour of his zeal, promised his master to do more than he was able to perform; 'The joy of the Lord is not to be understood of high raptures and transports of religious fervour.'—BLAIR. 'Do men hasten to their devotions with that ardour that they would to a lewd play?'—SOUTH.

HOT, FIERY, BURNING, ARDENT.

Hot, in German heiss, Latin æstus, comes from the Hebrew ḥay fire; fiery signifies having fire; burning, the actual state of burning; ardent, the having ardour (v. Fervour).

These terms characterize either the presence of heat or the cause of heat; hot is the general term which marks simply the presence of heat: fiery goes farther, it denotes the presence of fire which is the cause of heat; burning denotes the action of fire, and consequently is more expressive than the two; ardent, which is literally the same in signification, is employed either in poetry or in application to moral objects: a room is hot; a furnace or the tail of a comet fiery; a coal burning; the sun ardent;

Let loose the raging elements. Breath'd hot
From all the boundless furnace of the sky,
And the wide, glittering waste of burning sand
A suffocating wind the pilgrim smites
With instant death.—THOMSON.

E'en the camel feels,
Shot through his wither'd heart, the fiery blast.
THOMSON.

The royal eagle draws his vigorous young,
Strong pounc'd, and ardent with paternal fire.
THOMSON.

In the figurative application, a temper is said to be hot or fiery; rage is burning; the mind is ardent in pursuit of an object. Zeal may be hot, fiery, burning, and ardent; but in the first three cases, it denotes the intemperance of the mind when heated by religion or politics; the latter is admissible so long as it is confined to a good object.

RADIANCE, BRILLIANCY

Both these terms express the circumstance of a great light in a body: but radiance, from radius a ray, denotes the emission of rays, and is, therefore, peculiarly applicable to bodies naturally luminous, like the heavenly bodies; and brilliance (v. Bright) denotes the whole body of light emitted and may, therefore be applied equally to natural and artificial light. The radiancy of the sun, moon, and stars constitutes a part of their beauty; the brilliancy of a diamond is frequently compared with that of a star.

* Vide Eberhardt: "Hitze, feuer, wärme."

TO SHINE, GLITTER, GLARE, SPARKLE, RADIATE.

Shine, in Saxon schinean, German scheinen, is in all probability connected with the words show, see, &c.; glitter and glare are variations from the German gleissen, glänzen, &c. which have a similar meaning; to sparkle signifies to produce sparks; and spark is in Saxon spearce, Low German and Dutch spark; to radiate is to produce rays, from the Latin radius a ray.

The emission of light is the common idea conveyed by these terms. To shine expresses simply this general idea; glitter and the other verbs include some collateral ideas in their signification.

To shine is a steady emission of light; to glitter is an unsteady emission of light, occasioned by the reflection on transparent or bright bodies: the sun and moon shine whenever they make their appearance; but a set of diamonds glitter by the irregular reflection of the light on them; or the brazen spire of a steeple glitters when the sun in the morning shines upon it. In a moral application, what shines appears with a true light;

Yet something shines more glorious in his word,
His mercy this.—WALLER.

What glitters appears with a false or borrowed light; 'The happiness of success glittering before him withdraws his attention from the atrociousness of the guilt.'—JOHNSON.

Shine specifies no degree of light; it may be barely sufficient to render itself visible, or it may be a very strong degree of light: glare on the contrary denotes the highest possible degree of light: the sun frequently glares, when it shines only at intervals; 'This glorious morning star was not the transitory light of a comet which shines and glares for a while, and then presently vanishes into nothing.'—SOUTH. All naked light, the strength of which is diminished by any shade, will produce a glare, as the glare of the eye when fixed full upon an object;

Against the Capitol I met a lion,
Who glar'd upon me, and went surly by
Without annoying me.—SHAKESPEARE.

To shine is to emit light in a full stream; but to sparkle is to emit it in small portions; and to radiate is to emit it in long lines. The fire sparkles in the burning of wood; or the light of the sun sparkles when it strikes on knobs or small points: the sun radiates when it seems to emit its light in rays;

His eyes so sparkled with a lively flame.

DRYDEN.

Now had the sun withdrawn his radiant light.

DRYDEN.

FLAME, BLAZE, FLASH, FLARE, GLARE.

Flame, in Latin flamma, from the Greek φλέγω to burn, signifies the luminous exhalation emitted from fire; blaze, from the German blasen to blow, signifies a flame blown up, that is, an extended flame; flash and flare, which are but variations of flame, denote different species of flame; the former a sudden flame, the latter a dazzling, unsteady flame. Glare, which is a variation of glow, denotes a glowing, that is a strong flame, that emits a strong light: a candle burns only by flame, paper commonly by a blaze, gunpowder by a flash, a torch by a flare, and a conflagration by a glare;

His lightning your rebellion shall confound,
And hurl ye headlong flaming to the ground.

POPE.

Swift as a flood of fire when storms arise
Floats the wide field, and blazes to the skies.

POPE.

Have we not seen round Britain's peopled shore,
Her useful sons exchang'd for useless ore,

Seen all her triumphs but destruction haste,
Like flaring tapers brightening as they waste.

GOLDSMITH.

Ev'n in the height of noon oppress'd, the sun
Sheds weak and blunt, his wide refracted ray,
Whence glaring oft, with many a broaden'd orb
He frights the nations.—THOMSON.

GLARING, BAREFACED.

Glaring is here used in the figurative sense, drawn from its natural signification of broad light, which strikes powerfully upon the senses; barefaced signifies literally having a bare or uncovered face, which denotes the absence of all disguise or all shame.

Glaring designates the thing; barefaced characterizes the person: a glaring falsehood is that which strikes the observer in an instant to be falsehood; a barefaced lie or falsehood betrays the effrontery of him who utters it. A glaring absurdity will be seen instantly without the aid of reflection; 'The glaring side is that of enmity.'—BURKE. A barefaced piece of impudence characterizes the agent as more than ordinarily lost to all sense of decorum; 'The animosities increased, and the parties appeared barefaced against each other.'—CLARENDON.

GLEAM, GLIMMER, RAY, BEAM.

Gleam is in Saxon gleomen, German glimmen, &c. Glimmer is a variation of the same verb; ray is connected with the word row; beam comes from the German baum a tree.

Certain portions of light are designated by all these terms: but gleam and glimmer are indefinite; ray and beam are definite. A gleam is properly the commencement of light, or that portion of opening light which interrupts the darkness; a glimmer is an unsteady gleam;

A dreadful gleam from his bright armour came,
And from his eye-balls flash'd the living flame.

POPE.

'The glimmering light which shot into the chaos from the utmost verge of the creation, is wonderfully beautiful and poetick.'—ADDISON. Ray and beam are portions of light which emanate from some luminous body; the former from all luminous bodies in general, the latter more particularly from the sun: the former is, as its derivation denotes, a row or line of light issuing in a greater or less degree from any body; the latter is a great line of light, like a pole issuing from a body;

A sudden ray shot beaming o'er the plain,
And show'd the shores, the navy, and the main

POPE

The stars shine smarter; and the moon adorns,
As with unborrow'd beams, her horns.

DRYDEN

There may be a gleam of light visible on the wall of a dark room, or a glimmer if it be moveable; there may be rays of light visible at night on the back of a glow-worm, or rays of light may break through the shutters of a closed room;

The stars emit a shiver'd ray.—THOMSON.

The sun in the height of its splendour sends forth its beams; and in the same manner the human countenance or eyes may be said to send forth beams;

The modest virtues mingle in her eyes,
Still on the ground dejected, darting all
Their humid beams into the blooming flowers.

THOMSON.

Gleam and ray may be applied figuratively; beam only in the natural sense: a gleam of light may break in on the benighted understanding; but a glimmer of light rather confuses; rays of light may dart into the mind of the most ignorant savage who is taught the principles of Christianity by the pure practice of its professors.

CLEAR, LUCID, BRIGHT, VIVID.

Clear, v. To absolve; lucid, in Latin lucidus, from luceo to shine, and lux light, signifies having light bricht, v. Brightness; vivid, Latin vividus from vivo to live, signifies being in a state of life.

These epithets mark a gradation in their sense: the idea of light is common to them; but clear expresses less than lucid, lucid than bright, and bright less than vivid; a mere freedom from stain or dulness constitutes clearness;

Some choose the clearest light,
And boldly challenge the most piercing eye.

ROSCOMMON.

The return of light, and consequent removal of darkness, constitutes lucidity;

Nor is the stream
Of purest crystal, nor the lucid air,
Though one transparent vacancy it seems,
Void of their unseen people.—THOMSON.

Brightness supposes a certain strength of light;

This place, the brightest mansion of the sky,
I'll call the palace of the Deity.—DRYDEN.

Vividness indicates freshness combined with strength, and even a degree of brilliancy;

From the moist meadow to the wither'd hill,
Led by the breeze, the vivid verdure runs,
And swells, and deepens to the cherish'd eye.

THOMSON.

A sky is clear that is divested of clouds; the atmosphere is lucid in the day, but not in the night; the sun shines bright when it is unobstructed by any thing the atmosphere; lightning sometimes presents a vivid redness, and sometimes a vivid paleness: the light of the stars may be clear, and sometimes bright, but never vivid; the light of the sun is rather bright than clear or vivid; the light of the moon is either clear, bright, or vivid.

These epithets may with equal propriety be applied to colour, as well as to light: a clear colour is unmixed with any other; a bright colour has something striking and strong in it; a vivid colour something lively and fresh in it.

In their moral application these epithets preserve a similar distinction: a conscience is said to be clear when it is free from every stain or spot; 'I look upon a sound imagination as the greatest blessing of life, next to a clear judgement, and a good conscience.'—ADDISON.

A deranged understanding may have lucid intervals; 'I believe were Rousseau alive, and in one of his lucid intervals, he would be shocked at the practical phrensy of his scholars.'—BURKE. A bright intellect throws light on every thing around it;

But in a body which doth freely yield
His parts to reason's rule obedient,
There Alma, like a virgin queen most bright,
Doth flourish in all beauty excellent.—SPENSER.

A vivid imagination glows with every image that nature presents;

There let the classic page thy fancy lead
Through rural scenes, such as the Mantuan swain
Paints in the matchless harmony of song,
Or catch thyself the landscape, glided swift
Athwart imagination's vivid eye.—THOMSON.

PELLUCID, TRANSPARENT.

Pellucid, in Latin pellucidus changed from perlucidus, signifies very shining; transparent, in Latin transparens, from trans through or beyond, and pareo to appear, signifies visible throughout.

Pellucid is said of that which is pervious to the light, or that into which the eye can penetrate; transparent is said of that which is throughout bright: a stream is pellucid; it admits of the light so as to reflect objects, but it is not transparent for the eye.

CLEARLY, DISTINCTLY.

That is seen clearly of which one has a general view; that is seen distinctly which is seen so as to distinguish the several parts.

We see the moon clearly whenever it shines; but we cannot see the spots in the moon distinctly without the help of glasses.

What we see distinctly must be seen clearly, but a thing may be seen clearly without being seen distinctly.

A want of light, or the intervention of other objects, prevents us from seeing clearly; distance, or a defect in the sight, prevents us from seeing distinctly.

* Old men often see clearly but not distinctly; they perceive large or luminous objects at a distance, but they cannot distinguish such small objects as the characters of a book without the help of convex glasses; short-sighted persons, on the contrary, see near objects distinctly, but they have no clear vision of distant ones, unless they are viewed through concave glasses; 'The custom of arguing on any side, even against our persuasion, dims the understanding, and makes it by degrees lose the faculty of discerning clearly between truth and falsehood.'—LOCKE. 'Whether we are able to comprehend all the operations of nature, and the manners of them, it matters not to inquire; but this is certain, that we can comprehend no more of them than we can distinctly conceive.'—LOCKE.

CLEARNESS, PERSPICUITY.

Clearness, from clear (v. Clear, lucid), is here used figuratively, to mark the degree of light by which one sees things distinctly; perspicuity, in French perspicuité, Latin perspicuitas from perspicuus and perspicuo to look through, signifies the quality of being able to be seen through.

These epithets denote qualities equally requisite to render a discourse intelligible, but each has its peculiar character. † Clearness respects our ideas, and springs from the distinction of the things themselves that are discussed; perspicuity respects the mode of expressing the ideas, and springs from the good qualities of style. It requires a clear head to be able to see a subject in all its bearings and relations; to distinguish all the niceties and shades of difference between things that bear a strong resemblance, and to separate it from all irrelevant objects that intermingle themselves with it. But whatever may be our clearness of conception, it is requisite, if we would communicate our conceptions to others, that we should observe a purity in our mode of diction, that we should be particular in the choice of our terms, careful in the disposition of them, and accurate in the construction of our sentences; that is perspicuity, which, as it is the first, so, according to Quintilian, it is the most important part of composition.

Clearness of intellect is a natural gift; perspicuity is an acquired art: although intimately connected with each other, yet it is possible to have clearness without perspicuity, and perspicuity without clearness. People of quick capacities will have clear ideas on the subjects that offer themselves to their notice, but for want of education they may often use improper or ambiguous phrases; or by errors of construction render their phraseology the reverse of perspicuous: on the other hand, it is in the power of some to express themselves perspicuously on subjects far above their comprehension, from a certain facility which they acquire of catching up suitable modes of expression.

The study of the classics and mathematics are most fitted for the improvement of clearness; the study of grammar, and the observance of good models, will serve most effectually for the acquirement of perspicuity; 'Whenever men think clearly and are thoroughly interested, they express themselves with perspicuity and force.'—ROBERTSON. 'No modern orator can dare to enter the lists with Demosthenes and Tully. We have discourses, indeed, that may be admired for their perspicuity, purity, and elegance; but can produce none that abound in a sublimity which whirls away the auditor like a mighty torrent.'—WARTON.

FAIR, CLEAR.

Fair, in Saxon fagar, probably from the Latin pulcher beautiful; fair (v. Clear) is used in a positive sense; clear in a negative sense: there must be some brightness in what is fair; there must be no spots in what is clear. The weather is said to be fair, which is not only free from what is disagreeable, but somewhat enlivened by the sun; it is clear when it is free from clouds or mists. A fair skin approaches to white; a clear skin is without spots or irregularities;

* Vide Trusler: "Clearly, distinctly."

† Vide Abbe Girard: "Clarté, perspicuité."

His fair large front, and eyes sublime, declar'd
Absolute rule.—MILTON.

I thither went
With unexperienced thought, and laid me down
On the green bank, to look into the clear
Smooth lake —MILTON.

In the moral application, a fair fame speaks much in praise of a man; a clear reputation is free from faults. A fair statement contains every thing that can be said pro and con; a clear statement is free from ambiguity or obscurity. Fairness is something desirable and inviting; clearness is an absolute requisite, it cannot be dispensed with.

APPARENT, VISIBLE, CLEAR, PLAIN, OBVIOUS, EVIDENT, MANIFEST.

Apparent, in Latin apparens, participle of appareo to appear, signifies the quality of appearing; visible, in Latin visibilis, from visus, participle of video to see, signifies capable of being seen; clear, v. Clear, lucid; plain, in Latin planus even, signifies what is so smooth and unencumbered that it can be seen; obvious, in Latin obvius, compounded of ob and via, signifies the quality of lying in one's way, or before one's eyes; evident, in French evident, Latin evidens, from video, Greek εἶδω, Hebrew יָרָא to know, signifies as good as certain or known; manifest, in French manifeste, Latin manifestus, compounded of manus the hand, and festus, participle of the old verb fendo to fall in, signifies the quality of falling in or coming so near that it can be laid hold of by the hand.

These words agree in expressing various degrees in the capability of seeing; but visible is the only one used purely in a physical sense; apparent, clear, plain, and obvious are used physically and morally; evident and manifest solely in a moral acceptation. That which is simply an object of sight is visible;

The visible and present are for brutes:

A slender portion, and a narrow bound.—YOUNG.

That of which we see only the surface is apparent; 'The perception intellective often corrects the report of phantasy, as in the apparent bigness of the sun, and the apparent crookedness of the staff in air and water.' —HALE. The stars themselves are visible to us; but their size is merely apparent: the rest of these terms denote not only what is to be seen, but what is easily to be seen: they are all applied as epithets to objects of mental discernment.

What is apparent appears but imperfectly to view; it is opposed to that which is real: what is clear is to be seen in all its bearings; it is opposed to that which is obscure: what is plain is seen by a plain understanding; it requires no deep reflection nor severe study; it is opposed to what is intricate: what is obvious presents itself readily to the mind of every one; it is seen at the first glance, and is opposed to that which is abstruse: what is evident is seen forcibly, and leaves no hesitation on the mind; it is opposed to that which is dubious: manifest is a greater degree of the evident; it strikes on the understanding and forces conviction; it is opposed to that which is dark.

A contradiction may be apparent; on closer observation it may be found not to be one. Men's virtues or religion may be only apparent; 'The outward and apparent sanctity of actions should flow from purity of heart.' —ROGERS. A case is clear; it is decided on immediately; 'We pretend to give a clear account how thunder and lightning are produced.' —TEMPLE. A truth is plain; it is involved in no perplexity; it is not multifarious in its bearings: a falsehood is plain; it admits of no question; 'It is plain that 'our skill in literature is owing to the knowledge of Greek and Latin, which that they are still preserved among us, can be ascribed only to a religious regard.' —BERKELEY. A reason is obvious; it flows out of the nature of the case; 'It is obvious to remark that we follow nothing heartily unless carried to it by inclination.' —GROVE. A proof is evident; it requires no discussion, there is nothing in it that clashes or contradicts; the guilt or innocence of a person is evident when every thing serves to strengthen the conclusion; 'It is evident that fame, considered merely as the immortality of a name, is not less likely to be the reward of bad actions than of good.' —JOHNSON. A contradiction or absurdity is manifest, which is felt by all as soon as it is perceived, 'Among the many inconsistencies which folly produces in the human mind, there has often been observed a manifest and striking contrariety between the life of an author and his writings.' —JOHNSON.

APPEARANCE, AIR, ASPECT.

Appearance, which signifies the thing that appears, is the generic: air, v. Air, manner; and aspect, in Latin aspectus, from aspicio to look upon, signifying the thing that is looked upon or seen, are specific terms. 'The whole external form, figure, or colours, whatever is visible to the eye, is its appearance;' 'The hero answers with the respect due to the beautiful appearance she made.' —STEELE. Air is a particular appearance of any object as far as it is indicative of its quality, condition, or temper; an air of wretchedness or of assumption; 'Some who had the most assuming air went directly of themselves to errour without expecting a conductor.' —PARNELL. Aspect is the partial appearance of a body as it presents one of its sides to view; a gloomy or cheerful aspect; 'Her motions were steady and composed, and her aspect serious but cheerful; her name was Patience.' —ADISON.

It is not safe to judge of any person or thing altogether by appearances; the appearance and reality are often at variance: the appearance of the sun is that of a moving body, but modern astronomers are of opinion that it has no motion round the earth; there are particular towns, habitations, or rooms, which have always an air of comfort, or the contrary; this is a sort of appearance the most to be relied on. Politicians of a certain stamp are always busy in judging of the future from the aspect of affairs; but their predictions, like those of astrologers, who judge from the aspect of the heavens, turn out to the discredit of the prophet.

HIDEOUS, GHASTLY, GRIM, GRISLY.

Hideous, in French hideux, comes probably from hide, signifying fit only to be hidden from the view; ghastly signifies like a ghost; grim, in German grimm, signifies fierce; grisly, from grizzle, signifies grizzled, or motley-coloured.

An unseemly exterior is characterized by these terms; but the hideous respects natural objects, and the ghastly more properly that which is supernatural or what resembles it. A mask which monstrous grinning features looks hideous;

From the broad margin to the centre grew

Shelves, rocks, and whirlpools, hideous to the view.

FALCONER.

A human form with a visage of deathlike paleness is ghastly;

And death

Grinn'd horribly a ghastly smile.—MILTON.

The grim is applicable only to the countenances; dogs or wild beasts may look very grim;

Even hell's grim king Alcides' pow'r confess'd.—POPE.

Grisly refers to the whole form, but particularly to the colour; as blackness or darkness has always something terrific in it, a grisly figure, having a monstrous assemblage of dark colour, is particularly calculated to strike terror;

All parts resound with tumults, plaints, and fears,

And grisly death in sundry shapes appears.—POPE.

Hideous is applicable to objects of hearing also, as a hideous roar; but the rest to objects of sight only.

FACE, FRONT,

Figuratively designate the particular parts of bodies which bear some sort of resemblance to the human face or forehead.

The face is applied to that part of bodies which serves as an index or rule, and contains certain marks to direct the observer; the front is employed for that part which is most prominent or foremost: hence we speak of the face of a wheel or clock, the face of a painting, or the face of nature; but the front of a house or building, and the front of a stage: hence likewise, the propriety of the expressions, to put a good face on a thing, to show a bold front; 'A common soldier, a child, a girl, the door of an inn, have changed the face of fortune, and almost of nature.'—BURKE.

Where the deep trench in length extended lay,
Compacted troops stand wedged in firm array,
A dreadful front.—POPE.

FACE, COUNTENANCE, VISAGE.

Face, in Latin facies, from facio to make, signifies the whole form or make; countenance, in French contenance, from the Latin continere, signifies the contents, or what is contained in the face; visage, from visuo and video to see, signifies the particular form of the face as it presents itself to view; properly speaking a kind of countenance.

The face consists of a certain set of features; the countenance consists of the general aggregate of looks produced by these features; the visage consists of such looks in particular cases: the face is the work of nature; the countenance and visage are the work of the mind; the face remains the same, but the countenance and visage are changeable. The face belongs to brutes as well as men; the countenance is the peculiar property of man; visage is a term peculiarly applicable to superior beings; it is employed only in the grave or lofty style; 'No part of the body besides the face is capable of as many changes as there are different emotions in the mind, and of expressing them all by those changes.'—HUGHES. 'As the countenance admits of so great variety it requires also great judgement to govern it.'—HUGHES.

A sudden trembling seized on all his limbs
His eyes distorted grew, his visage pale;
His speech forsook him.—OTWAY.

TO GAPE, STARE, GAZE.

To gape, in German gaffen, Saxon geopnian to make open or wide, is to look with an open or wide mouth; stare, from the German starr fixed, signifies to look with a fixed eye; gaze comes very probably from the Greek ἀντὶσπου to admire, because it signifies to look steadily from a sentiment of admiration.

Gape and stare are taken in the bad sense; the former indicating the astonishment of gross ignorance; the latter not only ignorance but impertinence; gaze is taken always in a good sense, as indicating a laudable feeling of astonishment, pleasure, or curiosity. A clown gapes at the pictures of wild beasts which he sees at a fair; 'It was now a miserable spectacle to see us nodding and gaping at one another, every man talking, and no man heard.'—SIR JOHN MANDEVILLE. An impertinent fellow stares at every woman he looks at, and stares a modest woman out of countenance;

Astonish'd Aunus just arrives by chance
To see his fall, nor farther dares advance;
But, fixing on the maid his horrid eye,
He stares and shakes, and finds it vain to fly.

DRYDEN.

A lover of the fine arts will gaze with admiration and delight at the productions of Raphael or Titian;

For while expecting there the queen, he rais'd
His wond'ring eyes, and round the temple gaz'd,
Admir'd the fortune of the rising town,
The striving artists, and their art's renown.

DRYDEN.

When a person is stupified by affright, he gives a vacant stare. Those who are filled with transport gaze on the object of their ecstasy.

VIEW, SURVEY, PROSPECT.

View, v. To look, and survey, compounded of vey or view and sur over, mark the act of the person, namely, the looking at a thing with more or less attention; prospect, from the Latin prospectus and propicio to see before, designates the thing seen. We take a view or survey; the prospect presents itself: the view is of an indefinite extent; the survey is always comprehensive in its nature. Ignorant people take but narrow views of things; men take more or less enlarged views, according to their cultivation: the capacious mind of a genius takes a survey of all nature;

Fools view but part, and not the whole survey,
So crowd existence all into a day.—JENYNS.

The view depends altogether on the train of a person's thoughts; the prospect is set before him, it depends upon the nature of the thing; our views of advancement are sometimes very fallacious; our prospects are very delusive; both occasion disappointment; the former is the keener, as we have to charge the miscalculation upon ourselves. Sometimes our prospects depend upon our views, at least in matters of religion; he who forms erroneous views of a future state has but a wretched prospect beyond the grave;

No land so rude but looks beyond the tomb
For future prospects in a world to come.—JENYNS

VIEW, PROSPECT, LANDSCAPE.

View and prospect (v. View, prospect), though applied here to external objects of sense, have a similar distinction as in the preceding article. The view is not only that which may be seen, but that which is actually seen; the prospect is that which may be seen: that ceases, therefore, to be a view, which has not an immediate agent to view; although a prospect exists continually, whether seen or not: hence we speak with more propriety of our view being intercepted, than our prospect intercepted; a confined and bounded view, but a lively or dreary prospect. The terms, however, are sometimes indifferently applied;

Thus was this place
A happy rural seat of various views.—MILTON.

Now skies and seas their prospect only bound.
DRYDEN.

View is an indefinite term; it may be said either of a number of objects, or of a single object, of a whole or of a part; prospect is said only of an aggregate number of objects: we may have a view of a town, of a number of scattered houses, of a single house, or of the spire of a steeple; but a prospect comprehends all that comes within the range of the eye. View may be said of that which is seen directly or indirectly; prospect only of that which directly presents itself to the eye; hence a drawing of an object may be termed a view, although not a prospect. View is confined to no particular objects; prospect mostly respects rural objects; and landscape respects no others. Landscape, landskip, or landshape denotes any portion of country which is in a particular form: hence the landscape is a species of prospect. A prospect may be wide, and comprehend an assemblage of objects both of nature and art; but a landscape is narrow, and lies within the compass of the naked eye: hence it is also that landscape may be taken also for the drawing of a landscape, and consequently for a species of view: the taking of views or landscapes is the last exercise of the learner in drawing;

So lovely seem'd
That landscape, and of pure now purer air
Meets his approach.—MILTON.

VISION, APPARITION, PHANTOM, SPECTRE, GHOST.

Vision, from the Latin visus seeing or seen, signifies either the act of seeing or the thing seen; apparition, from appear, signifies the thing that appears. As the thing seen is only the improper signification, the term vision is never employed but in regard to some agent: the vision depends upon the state of the visual organ; the vision of a person whose sight is defective will frequently be fallacious; he will see some things double which are single, long which are short, and the like. In like manner, if the sight be miraculously impressed his vision will enable him to see that which is supernatural; hence it is that vision is either true or false, according to the circumstances of the individual; and a vision, signifying a thing seen, is taken for a supernatural exertion of the vision: apparition, on the contrary, refers us to the object seen; this may be true or false according to the manner in which it presents itself.

Joseph was warned by a vision to fly into Egypt with his family; *Mary Magdalen was informed of the resurrection of our Saviour by an apparition.

* Vide Trusler: "Vision, apparition" feverish people often think they see visions; timid and credulous people sometimes take trees and posts for apparitions;

Visions and inspirations some expect
Their course here to direct.—COWLEY.

Fud fast he flies, and dares not look behind him,
Till out of breath he overtakes his fellows,
Who gather round and wonder at the tale
Of horrid apparition.—BLAIR.

Phantom, from the Greek phaino to appear, is used for a false apparition, or the appearance of a thing otherwise than what it is; thus the ignis fatuus, vulgarly called Jack-o'-Lantern, is a phantom; besides which there are many phantoms of a moral kind which haunt the imagination; 'The phantoms which haunt a desert are want, and misery, and danger.'—JOHNSON.

Spectre, from specio to behold, and ghost, from geist a spirit, are the apparitions of immaterial substances. The spectre is taken for any spiritual being that appears; but the ghost is taken only for the spirits of departed men who appear to their fellow-creatures: a spectre is sometimes made to appear on the stage; ghosts exist mostly in the imagination of the young and the ignorant;

Rous'd from their slumbers,
In grim array the grisly spectres rise.—BLAIR.

The lonely tower
Is also shunn'd, whose mournful chambers hold,
So night-struck fancy dreams, the yelling ghost.
THOMSON.

RETROSPECT, REVIEW, SURVEY.

Retrospect is literally looking back, from retro behind, and specio to behold or cast an eye upon; a review is a view repeated; and a survey is a looking over at once, from the French sur over, and voir to see.

A retrospect is always taken of that which is past and distant; a review may be taken of that which is present and before us; every retrospect is a species of review, but every review is not a retrospect. We take a retrospect of our past life in order to draw salutary reflections from all that we have done and suffered; we take a review of any particular circumstance which is passing before us, in order to regulate our present conduct. The retrospect goes further by virtue of the mind's power to reflect on itself, and to recall all past images to itself; the review may go forward by the exercise of the senses on external objects. The historian takes a retrospect of all the events which have happened within a given period; the journalist takes a review of all the events that are passing within the time in which he is living; 'Believe me, my lord, I look upon you as a spirit entered into another life, where you ought to despise all little views and mean retrospects.'—POPE (Letters to Atterbury). 'The retrospect of life is seldom wholly unattended by uneasiness and shame. It too much resembles the review which a traveller takes from some eminence of a barren country.'—BLAIR.

The review may be said of the past as well as the present; it is a view not only of what is, but what has been: the survey is entirely confined to the present; it is a view only of that which is; 'Every man accustomed to take a survey of his own notions, will, by a slight retrospection, be able to discover that his mind has undergone many revolutions.'—JOHNSON.

We take a review of what we have already viewed, in order to get a more correct insight into it; we take a survey of a thing in all its parts in order to get a comprehensive view of it, in order to examine it in all its bearings. A general occasionally takes a review of all his army; he takes a survey of the fortress which he is going to besiege or attack.

REVISAL, REVISION, REVIEW.

Revisal, revision, and review, all come from the Latin video to see, and signify looking back upon a thing or looking at it again: the terms revisal and revision are however mostly employed in regard to what is written; review is used for things in general. The revisal of a book is the work of the author, for the purposes of correction; 'There is in your persons a difference and a peculiarity of character preserved through the whole of your actions, that I could never imagine but that this proceeded from a long and careful revisal of your work.'—LOFTUS. The review of a book is the work of the critic, for the purpose of estimating its value; 'A commonplace book accustoms the mind to discharge itself of its reading on paper, instead of relying on its natural powers of retention aided by frequent revisions of its ideas.'—EARL OF CHATHAM. Revisal and revision differ neither in sense nor application, unless that the former is more frequently employed abstractedly from the object revised, and revision mostly in conjunction: whoever wishes his work to be correct, will not spare a revisal; the revision of classical books ought to be intrusted only to men of profound erudition. The term revision may also sometimes be applied to other objects besides those of literature; 'How enchanting must such a review (of their memorandum books) prove to those who make a figure in the polite world.'—HAWKES WORTH.

TO ECLIPSE, OBSCURE.

Eclipse, in Greek ἐκλείψις, comes from ἐκλείπω to fail, signifying to cause a failure of light; obscure, from the adjective obscure (v. Dark), signifies to cause the intervention of a shadow.

In the natural as well as the moral application, eclipse is taken in a particular and relative signification; obscure is used in a general sense. Heavenly bodies are eclipsed by the intervention of other bodies between them and the beholder; things are in general obscured which are in any way rendered less striking or visible. To eclipse is therefore a species of obscuring; that is always obscured which is eclipsed; but every thing is not eclipsed which is obscured.

So figuratively real merit is eclipsed by the intervention of that which is superior;

Sarcasms may eclipse thine own,
But cannot blur my lost renown.—BUTLER.

Merit is often obscured by an ungracious exterior in the possessor, or by the unfortunate circumstances of his life; 'Among those who are the most richly endowed by nature and accomplished by their own industry, how few are there whose virtues are not obscured by the ignorance, prejudice, or envy of their beholders.'—ADDISON.

DARK, OBSCURE, DIM, MYSTERIOUS.

Dark, in Saxon deore, is doubtless connected with the German dunkel dark and dunst a vapour, which is a cause of darkness; obscure, in Latin obscurus, compounded of ob and scurus, Greek σκιερός and σκία a shadow, signifies literally interrupted by a shadow; dim is but a variation of dark, dunkel, &c.

Darkness expresses more than obscurity: the former denotes the total privation of light; the latter only the diminution of light.

Dark is opposed to light; obscure to bright: what is dark is altogether hidden; what is obscure is not to be seen distinctly, or without an effort.

Darkness may be used either in the natural or moral sense; obscurity only in the moral sense; in this case the former conveys a more unfavourable idea than the latter: darkness serves to cover that which ought not to be hidden; obscurity intercepts our view of that which we would wish to see: the former is the consequence of design; the latter of neglect or accident: the letter sent by the conspirator in the gunpowder plot to his friend was dark;

Why are thy speeches dark and troubled,
As Cretan seas when vex'd by warring winds?
SMITH.

All passages in ancient writers which allude to circumstances no longer known, must necessarily be obscure; 'He that reads and grows no wiser seldom suspects his own deficiency, but complains of hard words and obscure sentences.'—JOHNSON. A corner may be said to be dark or obscure; but the former is used literally and the latter figuratively: the owl is obliged, from the weakness of its visual organs, to seek the darkest corners in the daytime; men of distorted minds often seek obscure corners, only from disappointed ambition.

Dim expresses a degree of darkness, but it is em played more in relation to the person seeing than to the object seen. The eyes are said to grow dim, or the sight dim. The light is said to be dim, by which things are but dimly seen;

The stars shall fade away, the sun himself
Grow dim with age, and nature sink in years,
But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth.

ADDISON.

Mysterious denotes a species of the dark, in relation to the actions of men: where a veil is intentionally thrown over any object so as to render it as incomprehensible as that which is sacred. Dark is an epithet taken always in the bad sense, but mysterious is always in an indifferent sense. We are told in the Sacred Writings, that men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil. Whatever, therefore, is dark in the ways of men, is naturally presumed to be evil; but things may be mysterious in the events of human life, without the express intention of an individual to render them so. The speeches of an assassin and conspirator will be dark; 'Randolph, an agent extremely proper for conducting any dark intrigue, was despatched into Scotland, and, residing secretly among the lords of the congregation, observed and quickened their motions.'—ROBERTSON. Any intricate affair which involves the characters and conduct of men may be mysterious; 'The affection which Mary in her letter expresses for Bothwell, fully accounts for every subsequent part of her conduct, which, without admitting this circumstance, appears altogether mysterious and inconsistent.'—ROBERTSON.

The same distinction exists between these terms when applied to the ways of Providence, which are said to be sometimes dark, inasmuch as they present a cloudy aspect; and mostly mysterious, inasmuch as they are past finding out.

UNSEARCHABLE, INSCRUTABLE.

These terms are both applied to the Almighty, but not altogether indifferently; for that which is unsearchable is not set at so great a distance from us as that which is inscrutable: for that which is searched is in common concerns easier to be found than that which requires a scrutiny. The ways of God are all, to us finite creatures, more or less unsearchable;

Things else by me unsearchable, now heard
With wonder.—MILTON.

The mysterious plans of Providence as frequently evinced in the affairs of men are altogether inscrutable; 'To expect that the intricacies of science will be pierced by a careless glance, is to expect a particular privilege; but to suppose that the maze is inscrutable to diligence, is to enchain the mind in voluntary shackles.'—JOHNSON

OPAQUE, DARK.

Opaque, in Latin opacus, comes from ops the earth, because the earth is the darkest of all bodies; the word opaque is to dark as the species to the genus, for it expresses that species of darkness which is inherent in solid bodies, in distinction from those which emit light from themselves, or admit of light into themselves; it is therefore employed scientifically for the more vulgar and familiar term dark. On this ground, the earth is termed an opaque body in distinction from the sun, moon, or other luminous bodies: any solid substance, as a tree or a stone, is an opaque body, in distinction from glass, which is a clear or transparent body.

But all sunshine, as when his beams at noon,
Culminate from th' equator as they now
Shot upward still, whence no way round
Shadow from body opaque can fall.—MILTON.

SHADE, SHADOW.

Shade and shadow, in German schatten, are in all probability connected with the word shine, show, (v. To show, &c.)

Both these terms express that darkness which is occasioned by the sun's rays being intercepted by any body; but shade simply expresses the absence of the light, and shadow signifies also the figure of the body which thus intercepts the light. Trees naturally produce a shade, by means of their branches and leaves and wherever the image of the tree is reflected on the earth, that forms its shadow. It is agreeable in the heat of summer to sit in the shade;

Welcome, ye shades! ye bowery thickets, hail!

THOMSON.

The constancy with which the shadow follows the man has been proverbially adopted as a simile for one who clings close to another;

At every step,
Solemn and slow, the shadows blacker fall,
And all is awful listening gloom around.

THOMSON

The distinction between these terms, in the moral sense, is precisely the same: a person is said to be in the shade, if he lives in obscurity, or unnoticed; 'the law (says St. Paul) is a shadow of things to come.'

TO DISAPPEAR, VANISH.

To disappear signifies not to appear (v. Air); vanish, in French evanir, Latin evaneo or evanesco, compounded of e and vaneo, in Greek φαίνω to appear, signifies to go out of sight.

To disappear comprehends no particular mode of action; to vanish includes in it the idea of a rapid motion. A thing disappears either gradually or suddenly; it vanishes on a sudden: it disappears in the ordinary course of things; it vanishes by an unusual effort, a supernatural or a magic power. Any object that recedes or moves away will soon disappear;

Red meteors ran across th' ethereal space,
Stars disappear'd, and comets took their place

DRYDEN.

In fairy tales things are made to vanish the instant they are beheld; 'While I was lamenting this sudden desolation that had been made before me, the whole scene vanished.'—ADDISON. To disappear is often a temporary action; to vanish generally conveys the idea of being permanently lost to the sight. The stars appear and disappear in the firmament; lightning vanishes with a rapidity that is unequalled.

TO LOOK, APPEAR.

Look is here taken in the neuter and improper sense, signifying the act of things figuratively striving to be seen; appear, from the Latin appareo or pareo, Greek παίειν, signifies to be present or at hand, within sight.

The look of a thing respects the impressions which it makes on the senses, that is, the manner in which it looks; its appearance implies the simple act of its coming into sight: the look of any thing is therefore characterized as good or bad, mean or handsome, ugly or beautiful; the appearance is characterized as early or late, sudden or unexpected: there is something very unseemly in the look of a clergyman affecting the airs of a fine gentleman; the appearance of the stars in an evening presents an interesting view even to the ordinary beholder. As what appears must appear in some form, the signification of the term has been extended to the manner of the appearance, and brought still nearer to look in its application; in this case, the term look is rather more familiar than that of appearance. We may speak either of regarding the look or the appearance of a thing, as far as it may impress others; but the latter is less colloquial than the former: a man's conduct is said to look rather than to appear ill; but on the other hand, we say a thing assumes an appearance, or has a certain appearance.

Look is always employed for what is real; what a thing looks is that which it really is: appear, however, sometimes refers not only to what is external, but to what is superficial. If we say a person looks ill, it supposes some positive and unequivocal evidence of illness: if we say he appears to be ill, it is a less positive assertion than the former; it leaves room for doubt, and allows the possibility of a mistake. We are at liberty to judge of things by their looks, without being chargeable with want of judgement; but as appearances are said to be deceitful, it becomes necessary to admit them with caution as the rule of our judgement. Look is employed mostly in regard to objects of sense; appearance respects natural and moral objects indifferently: the sky looks lowering; an object appears through a microscope greater than it really is;

Distressful nature pants;
The very streams look languid from afar.

THOMSON.

A person's conduct appears in a more culpable light when seen through the representation of an enemy; 'Never does liberty appear more amiable than under the government of a pious and good prince.'—ADDISON.

LOOK, GLANCE.

Look (v. Air) is the generic, and glance (v. To glance at) the specific term; that is to say, a casual or momentary look: a look may be characterized as severe or mild, fierce or gentle, angry or kind; a glance as hasty or sudden, imperfect or slight: so likewise we speak of taking a look, or catching a glance;

Here the soft flocks, with the same harmless look
They wore alive.—THOMSON.

The tiger, darting fierce
Impetuous on his prey, the glance has doom'd.
THOMSON.

TO LOOK, SEE, BEHOLD, VIEW, EYE.

Look, in Saxon locan, Upper German lügen, comes from lux light, and the Greek Ado to see; see, in German sehen, probably a variation from the Latin video to see: behold, compounded of the intensive be and hold, signifies to hold or fix the eye on an object; view, from the French voir, and the Latin video, signifies simply to see; to eye, from the noun eye, naturally signifies to fathom with the eye.

We look voluntarily; we see involuntarily: the eye sees; the person looks: absent people often see things before they are fully conscious that they are at hand: we may look without seeing, and we may see without looking: near-sighted people often look at that which is too distant to strike the visual organ. To behold is to look at for a continuance; to view is to look at in all directions; to eye is to look at earnestly, and by side glances: that which is seen may disappear in an instant; it may strike the eye and be gone: but what is looked at must make some stay; consequently, lighting, and things equally fugitive and rapid in their flight, may be seen, but cannot be looked at.

To look at is the familiar, as well as the general term, in regard to the others; we look at things in general, which we wish to see, that is, to see them clearly, fully, and in all their parts; but we behold that which excites a moral or intellectual interest: 'The most unpardonable malefactor in the world going to his death, and hearing it with composure, would win the pity of those who should behold him.'—STEELE. We view that which demands intellectual attention;

They climb the next ascent, and, looking down,
Now at a nearer distance view the town;
The prince with wonder sees the stately tow'rs
(Which late were huts and shepherds' bow'rs).

DRYDEN.

We eye that which gratifies any particular passion;

Half afraid, the first
Against the window beats, then brisk alights
On the warm hearth; then, hopping o'er the floor,
Eyes all the smiling family askance.—THOMSON.

An inquisitive child looks at things which are new to him, but does not behold them; we look at plants, or finery, or whatever gratifies the senses, but we do not behold them: on the other hand, we behold any spectacle which excites our admiration, our astonishment, our pity, or our love: we look at objects in order to observe their external properties; but we view them in order to find out their component parts, their internal properties, their powers of motion and action, &c.: we look at things to gratify the curiosity of the moment, or for mere amusement; but the jealous man eyes his rival, in order to mark his movements, his designs, and his successes: the envious man eyes him who is in prosperity, with a malignant desire to see him humbled.

To look is an indifferent, to behold and view are good and honourable actions; to eye, as the act of persons, is commonly a mean, and even base action.

LOOKER-ON, SPECTATOR, BEHOLDER, OBSERVER.

The looker-on and the spectator are both opposed to the agents or actors in any scene; but the former is still more abstracted from the objects he sees than the latter.

A looker-on (v. To look) is careless; he has no part and takes no part in what he sees; he looks on, because the thing is before him, and he has nothing else to do: a spectator may likewise be unconcerned, but in general he derives amusement, if nothing else, from what he sees. A clown may be a looker-on, who with open mouth gapes at all that is before him, without understanding any part of it; but he who looks on to draw a moral lesson from the whole, is in the moral sense not an uninterested spectator; 'Lookers-on many times see more than gamesters.'—BACON.

But high in heaven they sit, and gaze from far,
The tame spectators of his deeds of war.—POPE.

The beholder has a nearer interest than the spectator; and the observer has an interest not less near than that of the beholder, but somewhat different. The beholder has his affections roused by what he sees; 'Objects imperfectly discerned take forms from the hope or fear of the beholder.'—JOHNSON. The observer has his understanding employed in that which passes before him; 'Swift was an exact observer of life.'—JOHNSON. The beholder indulges himself in contemplation; the observer is busy in making it subservient to some proposed object; every beholder of our Saviour's sufferings and patience was struck with the conviction of his Divine character, not excepting even some of those who were his most prejudiced adversaries; every calm observer of our Saviour's words and actions was convinced of his Divine mission.

TO SEE, PERCEIVE, OBSERVE.

See, in the German sehen, Greek θεδωαι, Hebrew ראה, is a general term; it may be either a voluntary or involuntary action; perceive, from the Latin percipio or per and cipio to take into the mind, is always a voluntary action; and observe (v. To notice) is an intentional action. The eye sees when the mind is absent; the mind and the eye perceive in conjunction: hence, we may say that a person sees, but does not perceive: we observe, not merely by a simple act of the mind, but by its positive and fixed exertion. We see a thing without knowing what it is; we perceive a thing, and know what it is, but the impression passes away; we observe a thing, and afterward retrace the image of it in our mind. We see a star when the eye is directed towards it; we perceive it move if we look at it attentively; we observe its position in different parts of the heavens. The blind cannot see, the absent cannot perceive, the dull cannot observe.

Seeing, as a corporeal action, is the act only of the eye; perceiving and observing are actions in which all the senses are concerned. We see colours, we perceive the state of the atmosphere, and observe its changes. Seeing is sometimes extended to the mind's operations, in which it has an indefinite meaning; but perceive and observe have both a definite sense: we may see a thing distinctly and clearly, or otherwise; we perceive it always with a certain degree of distinctness; and observe it with a positive degree of minuteness: we see the truth of a remark; we perceive the force of an objection; we observe the reluctance of a person. It is farther to be observed, however, that when see expresses a mental operation, it expresses what is purely mental; perceive and observe are applied to such objects as are seen by the senses as well as the mind.

See is either employed as a corporeal or incorporeal action; perceive and observe are obviously a junction of the corporeal and incorporeal. We see the light with our eyes, or we see the truth of a proposition with our mind's eye;

There plant eyes, all mist from thence Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
Of things invisible to mortal sight.—MILTON.

We perceive the difference of climate, or we perceive the difference in the comfort of our situation;

Sated at length, ere long I might perceive
Strange alteration in me.—MILTON.

We observe the motions of the heavenly bodies; 'Every part of your last letter glowed with that warmth of friendship, which, though it was by no means new to me, I could not but observe with peculiar satisfaction.'

MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero).

TO SEEM, APPEAR.

The idea of coming to the view is expressed by both these terms; but the word seem rises upon that of appear. Seem, from the Latin similis like, signifies literally to appear like, and is therefore a species of appearance, which is from the Latin appareo or pareo, and the Greek napéō to be present, signifies to be present, or before the eye. Every object may appear; but nothing seems, except that which the mind admits to appear in any given form. To seem requires some reflection and comparison of objects in the mind one with another; this term is, therefore, peculiarly applicable to matters that may be different from what they appear, or of an indeterminate kind: that the sun seems to move, is a conclusion which we draw from the exercise of our senses, and by comparing this case with others of a similar nature; it is only by a farther research into the operations of nature that we discover this to be no conclusive proof of its motion. To appear, on the contrary, is the express act of the things themselves on us; it is, therefore, peculiarly applicable to such objects as make an impression on us: to appear is the same as to present itself; the stars appear in the firmament, but we do not say that they seem there; the sun appears dark through the clouds.

They are equally applicable to moral as well as natural objects with the above-mentioned distinction. Seem is said of that which is dubious, contingent, or future; appear of that which is actual, positive, and past. A thing seems strange which we are led to conclude as strange from what we see of it; a thing appears clear when we have a clear conception of it; a plan seems practicable or impracticable; an author appears to understand his subject, or the contrary. It seems as if all efforts to reform the bulk of mankind will be found inefficient; it appears from the long catalogue of vices which are still very prevalent, that little progress has hitherto been made in the work of reformation;

Lash'd into foam, the fierce conflicting brine
Seems o'er a thousand raging waves to burn.

THOMSON.

O heavenly poet! such thy verse appears,
So sweet, so charming to my ravish'd ears.—DRYDEN.

TO PERCEIVE, DISCERN, DISTINGUISH.

Perceive, in Latin percipio, or per and cipio, signifies to take hold of thoroughly; discern, v. Discernant.

To perceive (v. To see) is a positive, to discern a relative, action: we perceive things by themselves; we discern them amid many others: we perceive that which is obvious; we discern that which is remote, or which requires much attention to get an idea of it. We perceive by a person's looks and words what he intends; we discern the drift of his actions. We may perceive sensible or spiritual objects; we commonly discern only that which is spiritual; we perceive light, darkness, colours, or the truth or falsehood of any thing;

And lastly, turning inwardly her eyes,
Perceives how all her own ideas rise.—JENYNS.

We discern characters, motives, the tendency and consequences of actions, &c.; 'One who is actuated by party spirit, is almost under an incapacity of discerning either real blemishes or beauties.'—ADDISON. It is the act of a child to perceive according to the quickness of its senses; it is the act of a man to discern according to the measure of his knowledge and understanding.

To discern and distinguish (v. Difference) approach the nearest in sense to each other; but the former signifies to see only one thing, the latter to see two or more in quick succession. We discern what lie in things; we distinguish things according to their outward marks; we discern things in order to understand their essences; we distinguish in order not to confound them together. Experienced and discreet people may discern the signs of the times; it is just to distinguish between an action done from inadvertence and that which is done from design. The conduct of people is sometimes so veiled by art, that it is not easy to discern their object; 'The custom of arguing on any side, even against our persuasions, dims the understanding, and makes it by degrees lose the faculty of discerning between truth and falsehood.'—LOCKE. It is necessary to distinguish between practice and profession; 'Mr. Boyle observes, that though the mole be not totally blind (as is generally thought), she has not sight enough to distinguish objects.'—ADDISON

TO OBSERVE, WATCH.

These terms agree in expressing the act of looking at an object; but to observe (v. To notice) is not to look after so strictly as is implied by to watch (v. To watch); a general observes the motions of an enemy when they are in no particular state of activity; he watches the motions of an enemy when they are in a state of commotion: we observe a thing in order to draw an inference from it; we watch any thing in order to discover what may happen: we observe with coolness; we watch with eagerness: we observe carefully; we watch narrowly: the conduct of mankind in general is observed;

Nor must the ploughman less observe the skies.

DRYDEN

The conduct of suspicious individuals is watched:

For thou know'st
What hath been warn'd of us, what malicious foe
Watches, no doubt, with greedy hope to find,
His wish and best advantage, us asunder.—MILTON

WAKEFUL, WATCHFUL, VIGILANT.

We may be wakeful without being watchful; but we cannot be watchful without being wakeful.

Wakefulness is an affair of the body, and depends upon the temperament; watchfulness is an affair of the will, and depends upon the determination. Some persons are more wakeful than they wish to be;

Musick shall wake her, that hath power to charm
Pale sickness, and avert the stings of pain;
Can raise or quell our passions, and becalm
In sweet oblivion the too wakeful sense.—FENTON.

Few persons are as watchful as they ought to be; 'He who remembers what has fallen out will be watchful against what may happen.'—SOUTH. Vigilance, from the Latin vigil, and the Greek ἀγανθία to be on the alert, expresses a high degree of watchfulness: a sentinel is watchful who on ordinary occasions keeps good watch; but it is necessary for him, on extraordinary occasions, to be vigilant, in order to detect whatever may pass.

We are watchful mostly in the proper sense of watching; but we may be vigilant in detecting moral as well as natural evils: 'Let a man strictly observe the first hints and whispers of good and evil that pass in his heart: this will keep conscience quick and vigilant.'—SOUTH.

TO ABSTRACT, SEPARATE, DISTINGUISH.

To abstract, from the Latin abstractum, participle of abstrahō to draw from, signifies to draw one thing from another; separate, in Latin separatus, participle of separo, is compounded of se and paro to dispose apart, signifying to put things asunder, or at a distance from each other; distinguish, in French distinguer, Latin distinguo, is compounded of the separative preposition dis and tingo to tinge or colour, signifying to give different marks by which things may be known from each other.

Abstract is used for the most part in the moral or spiritual sense; separate mostly in a physical sense: distinguish either in a moral or physical sense: we abstract what we wish to regard particularly and individually; we separate what we wish not to be united; we distinguish what we wish not to confound. The mind performs the office of abstraction for itself; separating and distinguishing are exerted on external objects.* Arrangement, place, time, and circum stances serve to separate: the ideas formed of things, the outward marks attached to them, the qualities attributed to them serve to distinguish.

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Distinguer, separer"

By the operation of abstraction the mind creates for itself a multitude of new ideas: in the act of separation bodies are removed from each other by distance of place: in the act of distinguishing objects are discovered to be similar or dissimilar. Qualities are abstracted from the subjects in which they are inherent: countries are separated by mountains or seas: their inhabitants are distinguished by their dress, language, or manners. The mind is never less abstracted from one's friends than when separated from them by immense oceans: it requires a keen eye to distinguish objects that bear a great resemblance to each other. Volatile persons easily abstract their minds from the most solemn scenes to fix them on trifling objects that pass before them; 'We ought to abstract our minds from the observation of an excellence in those we converse with, till we have received some good information of the disposition of their minds.'—STEELE. An unsocial temper leads some men to separate themselves from all their companions; 'It is an eminent instance of Newton's superiority to the rest of mankind that he was able to separate knowledge from those weaknesses by which knowledge is generally disgraced.'—JOHNSON. An absurd ambition leads others to distinguish themselves by their eccentricities; 'Fontenelle, in his panegyric on Sir Isaac Newton, closes a long enumeration of that philosopher's virtues and attainments with an observation that he was not distinguished from other men by any singularity either natural or affected.'—JOHNSON.

ABSENT, ABSTRACTED, DIVERTED, DISTRACTED.

Absent, in French absent, Latin absens, comes from ab and sum to be from, signifying away or at a distance from all objects; abstracted, in French abstrait, Latin abstractus, participle of abstraho, or ab and traho to draw from, signifies drawn or separated from all objects; diverted, in French divertir, Latin diverto, compounded of di or dis asunder and verto to turn, signifies to turn aside from the object that is present; distracted of course implies drawn asunder by different objects.

A want of attention is implied in all these terms, but in different degrees and under different circumstances.

Absent and abstracted denote a total exclusion of present objects; diverted and distracted a misapplied attention to surrounding objects, an attention to such things as are not the immediate object of concern.

Absent and abstracted differ less in sense than in application: the former is an epithet expressive either of a habit or a state, and precedes the noun; the latter expresses a state only, and is never adjoined to the noun: we say, a man is absent or an absent man; he is abstracted, but not an abstracted man, although when applied to other objects it may be applied to denote a temporary state;

A voice, than human more, th' abstracted ear
Of fancy strikes, "Be not afraid of us, Poor kindred man."—THOMSON.

We are absent or abstracted when not thinking on what passes before us; we are diverted when we listen to any other discourse than that which is addressed to us; we are distracted when we listen to the discourse of two persons at the same time.

The absent man has his mind and person never in the same place: he is abstracted from all the surrounding scenes; his senses are locked up from all the objects that seek for admittance; he is often at Rome while walking the streets of London, or solving a problem of Euclid in a social party; 'Theophrastus called one who barely rehearsed his speech, with his eyes fixed, an "absent actor."'—HUGHES. The man who is diverted seeks to be present at every thing; he is struck with every thing, and ceases to be attentive to one thing in order to direct his regards to another; he turns from the right to the left, but does not stop to hink on any one point; 'The mind is refrigerated by interruption; the thoughts are diverted from the principal subject; the reader is weary, he knows not why.'—JOHNSON (Preface to Shakspeare). The distracted man can be present at nothing, as all objects strike him with equal force; his thoughts are in a state of vacillation and confusion; 'He used to rave for his Marianne, and call upon her in his distracted fits' ADDISON.

A habit of profound study sometimes causes absense; it is well for such a mind to be sometimes diverted: the ardent contemplation of any one subject occasions frequent abstractions; if they are too frequent, or ill-timed, they are reprehensible: the juvenile and versatile mind is most prone to be diverted; it follows the bias of the senses, which are caught by the outward surface of things; it is impelled by curiosity to look rather than to think: a well-regulated mind is rarely exposed to distractions, which result from contrariety of feeling, as well as thinking, peculiar to persons of strong susceptibility or dull comprehension.

The absent man neither derives pleasure from society, nor imparts any to it; his resources are in himself. The man who is easily diverted is easily pleased; but he may run the risk of displeasing others by the distractions of his mind. The distracted man is a burden to himself and others.

TO DISTINGUISH, DISCRIMINATE.

To distinguish (v. To abstract) is the general, to discriminate (v. Discernment) is the particular, term the former is an indefinite, the latter a definite, action To discriminate is in fact to distinguish specifically hence we speak of a distinction as true or false, but of a discrimination as nice.

We distinguish things as to their divisibility or unity; we discriminate them as to their inherent properties: we distinguish things that are alike or unlike to separate or collect them; we discriminate those that are different, for the purpose of separating one from the other: we distinguish by means of the senses as well as the understanding; we discriminate by the understanding only: we distinguish things by their colour, or we distinguish moral objects by their truth or falsehood;

'T is easy to distinguish by the sight

The colour of the soil, and black from white

DRYDEN

We discriminate the characters of men, or we discriminate their merits according to circumstances; 'A satire should expose nothing but what is corrigible, and make a due discrimination between those who are and those who are not the proper objects of it.'—ADDISON.

TO DIVIDE, SEPARATE, PART.

To divide signifies the same as in the preceding; to separate, in Latin separatus, participle of separo, or se apart and paro to dispose, signifies to put things asunder, or at a distance from each other; to part signifies to make into parts.

That is said to be divided which has been, or is conceived to be, a whole; that is separated which might be joined: a river divides a town by running through it;

Nor cease your sowing till mid-winter ends,

For this, through twelve bright signs Apollo guides

The year, and earth in several climes divides.

DRYDEN.

Mountains or seas separate countries; 'Can a body be inflammable from which it would puzzle a chymist to separate an inflammable ingredient?'—BOYLE. To divide does not necessarily include a separation; although a separation supposes a division: an army may be divided into larger or smaller portions, and yet remain united; but during a march, or an engagement, these companies are frequently separated.

Opinions, hearts, minds, &c. may be divided; corporeal bodies only are separated: the minds of men are often most divided, when in person they are least separated; and those, on the contrary, who are separated at the greatest distance from each other may be the least divided; 'Where there is the greatest and most honourable love, it is sometimes better to be joined in death, than separated in life.'—STEELE.

To part approaches nearer to separate than to divide: the latter is applied to things only; the two former to persons, as well as things; a thing becomes smaller by being divided; 'If we divide the life of most men into twenty parts, we shall find at least nineteen of them filled with gaps and chasms, which are neither filled up with pleasure or business.'—ADDISON. One thing loses its junction with, or cohesion to, another, by being parted: a loaf of bread is divided by being cut into two; two loaves are parted which have been baked together.

Sometimes part, as well as divide, is used in the application of that which is given to several, in which case they bear the same analogy as before: several things are parted, one thing is divided: a man's personal effects may be parted, by common consent, among his children; but his estate, or the value of it, must be divided: whatever can be disjoined without losing its integrity is parted, otherwise it is divided: in this sense our Saviour's garments are said to have been parted, because they were distinct things; but the vesture which was without seam must have been divided if they had not cast lots for it.

As disjunction is the common idea attached to both separate and part, they are frequently used in relation to the same objects: houses may be both separated and parted; they are parted by that which does not keep them at so great a distance, as when they are said to be separated: two houses are parted by a small opening between them; they are separated by an intervening garden: fields are with more propriety said to be separated; rooms are said more properly to be parted.

With regard to persons, part designates the actual leaving of the person; separate is used in general for that which lessens the society: the former is often casual, temporary, or partial; the latter is positive and serious: the parting is momentary;

The prince pursu'd the parting deity
With words like these, 'Ah, whither do you fly?
Unkind and cruel to deceive your son.'—DRYDEN.

The separation may be longer or shorter; 'I pray let me retain some room, though never so little, in your thoughts, during the time of this our separation.'—HOWELL. Two friends part in the streets after a casual meeting; two persons separate on the road who had set out to travel together: men and their wives often part without coming to a positive separation: some couples are separated from each other in every respect but that of being directly parted: the moment of parting between friends is often more painful than the separation which afterward ensues.

TO DIVIDE, DISTRIBUTE, SHARE.

To divide, in Latin divido, from di or dis and vido, in the Etruscan iduo to part, which comes from the Greek εἰς δύο into two, signifies literally to make into two; distribute, in Latin distributus, from distribu, or dis and tribuo, signifies to bestow apart; share, from the word shear, and the German scheeren, signifies simply to cut.

The act of dividing does not extend beyond the thing divided; that of distributing and sharing comprehends also the purpose of the action: we divide the thing; we distribute to the person: we may divide therefore without distributing; or we may divide in order to distribute: thus we divide our land into distinct fields for our private convenience; or we divide a sum of money into so many parts, in order to distribute it among a given number of persons;

Let old Timotheus yield the prize,
Or both divide the crown;
He rais'd a mortal to the skies,
She drew an angel down.—DRYDEN.

Two urns by Jove's high throne have ever stood
The source of evil one, and one of good;
From thence the cup of mortal man he fills,
Blessings to these, to those distributes ill.—POPE.

On the other hand, we may distribute without dividing; for guineas, books, apples, and many other things may be distributed, which require no division.

To share is to make into parts the same as divide, and it is to give those parts to some persons, the same as distribute: but the person who shares takes a part himself;

Why grieves my son? Thy anguish let me share,
Reveal the cause, and trust a parent's care.—POPE.

He who distributes gives it always to others; 'Providence has made an equal distribution of natural gifts whereof each creature severally has a share.'—L'ES TRANGE. A loaf is divided in order to be eaten: bread is distributed in loaves among the poor; the loaf is shared by a poor man with his poorer neighbour, or the profits of a business are shared by the partners.

To share may imply either to give or receive; to distribute implies giving only: we share our own with another, or another shares what we have; but we distribute our own to others; 'They will be so much the more careful to determine properly as they shall (will) be obliged to share the expenses of maintaining the masters.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny).

TO DISPENSE, DISTRIBUTE.

Dispense, from the La. in pendo to pay or bestow, signifies to bestow in different directions; and distribute, from the Latin tribuo to bestow, signifies the same thing.

Dispense is an indiscriminate action; distribute is a particularizing action: we dispense to all; we distribute to each individually: nature dispenses her gifts bountifully to all the inhabitants of the earth;

Though Nature weigh our talents, and dispense
To every man his modicum of sense;
Yet much depends, as in the tiller's toil,
On culture, and the sowing of the soil.

COWPER.

A parent distributes among his children different tokens of his parental tenderness; 'Pray be no niggard in distributing my love plentifully among our friends at the inns of court.'—HOWELL.

Dispense is an indirect action that has no immediate reference to the receiver; distribute is a direct and personal action communicated by the giver to the receiver: Providence dispenses his favours to those who put a sincere trust in him; 'Those to whom Christ has committed the dispensing of his Gospel.'—DECAY OF PIETY. A prince distributes marks of his favour and preference among his courtiers; 'The king sent over a great store of gentlemen and warlike people, among whom he distributed the land.'—SPENSER on Ireland.

PART, DIVISION, PORTION, SHARE.

Part, in Latin pars, comes from the Hebrew פֶּרֶשׁ to divide, signifying the thing divided or parted from another; division signifies the same as portion; portion, in Latin portio, is supposed to be changed from partio, which comes from partior to distribute, and originally from the Hebrew, as the word part; share, in Saxon scýran to divide, comes in all probability from the Hebrew שָׁרָר to remain, that is, what remains after a division.

Part is a term not only of more general use, but of more comprehensive meaning than division; it is always employed for the thing divided, but division may be either employed for the act of dividing, or the thing that is divided: but in all cases the word division has always a reference to some action, and the agent by whom it has been performed; whereas part, which is perfectly abstract, has altogether lost this idea. We always speak of a part as opposed to the whole, but of a division as it has been made of the whole.

A part is formed of itself by accident, or made by design; a division is always the effect of design: a part is indefinite as to its quantity or nature, it may be large or small, round or square, of any dimension, of any form, of any size, or of any character; but a division is always regulated by some certain principles, it depends upon the circumstances of the divisor and thing to be divided. A page, a line, or a word is the part of any book; but the books, chapters, sections, and paragraphs are the divisions of the book. Stones, wood, water, air, and the like, are parts of the world; fire, air, earth, and water are physical divisions of the globe; continents, seas, rivers, mountains, and the like, are geographical divisions, under which are likewise included its political divisions into countries, kingdoms, &c.;

Shall little haughty Ignorance pronounce
His works unwise, of which the smallest part
Exceeds the narrow vision of her mind?—THOMSON

'A division (in a discourse) should be natural and simple.'—BLAIR.

A part may be detached from the whole; a division is always conceived of in connexion with the whole; portion and share are particular species of divisions, which are said of such matters as are assignable to individuals; portion respects individuals without any distinction;

The jars of gen'rous wine, Acestes' gift,
He set abroach, and for the feast prepar'd,
In equal portions with the ven'son shar'd.

DRYDEN.

Share respects individuals specially referred to;

The monarch, on whom fertile Nile bestows
All which that grateful earth can bear,
Deceives himself if he suppose
That more than this falls to his share.—COWLEY.

The portion of happiness which falls to every man's lot is more equal than is generally supposed; the share which partners have in the profits of any undertaking depends upon the sum which each has contributed towards its completion. The portion is that which simply comes to any one; but the share is that which belongs to him by a certain right. According to the ancient customs of Normandy, the daughters could have no more than a third part of the property for their share, which was divided in equal portions between them.

PART, PIECE, PATCH.

Part signifies the same as in the preceding article; piece, in French pièce, comes from the Hebrew פֶּסֶק to diminish; whence also comes patch, signifying the thing in its diminished form, that which is less than a whole. The part in its strict sense is taken in connexion with the whole; the piece is the part detached from the whole; the patch is that piece which is distinguished from others. Things may be divided into parts without any express separation; but when divided into pieces they are actually cut asunder. Hence we may speak of a loaf as divided into twelve parts when it is conceived only to be so; and divided into twelve pieces, when it is really so. On this ground, we talk of the parts of a country, but not of the pieces; and of a piece of land, not a part of land: so likewise letters are said to be the component parts of a word, but the half or the quarter of any given letter is called a piece. The chapters, the pages, the lines, &c. are the various parts of a book; certain passages or quantities drawn from the book are called pieces: the parts of matter may be infinitely decomposed; various bodies may be formed out of so ductile a piece of matter as clay. The piece is that which may sometimes serve as a whole; but the patch is that which is always broken and disjointed,—something imperfect: many things may be formed out of a piece; but the patch only serves to fill up a chasm.

TO PARTAKE, PARTICIPATE, SHARE.

Partake and participate, the one English, and the other Latin, signify literally to take a part in a thing. The former is employed in the proper or improper sense; and the latter in the improper sense only: we may partake of a feast, or we may partake of pleasure; but we participate only in pleasure or pain, &c.

To partake is a selfish action; to participate is either a selfish or a benevolent action: we partake of that which pleases ourselves;

All else of nature's common gift partake,
Unhappy Dido was alone awake.—DRYDEN.

We participate in that which pleases another;

Our God, when heav'n and earth he did create,
Form'd man, who should of both participate.

DENHAM.

We partake of a meal with a friend; we participate in the gifts of Providence, or in the enjoyments which another feels.

To partake is the act of taking the thing, or getting the thing to one's self; to share is the act of having a title to a share, or being in the habits of receiving a share: we may, therefore, partake of a thing without sharing it, and share it without partaking. We par- take of things mostly through the medium of the senses whatever, therefore, we take part in, whether gratuitously or casually, that we may be said to partake of; in this manner we partake of an entertainment with out sharing it; or we partake in a design, &c.;

By-and-by, thy bosom shall partake

The secrets of my heart.—SHAKESPEARE.

On the other hand, we share things that promise to be of advantage or profit, and what we share is what we claim; in this manner we share a sum of money which has been left to us in common with others;

Avoiding love, I had not found despair,
But shar'd with savage beasts the common air.

DRYDEN.

DEAL, QUANTITY, PORTION.

Deal, in Saxon deæl, Dutch deel, and German theil, from delen, theilen, &c. to divide, signifies literally the thing divided or taken off; quantity, in Latin quantitas, comes from quantum, signifying how much; portion, through the Latin pars and portio, comes from the Hebrew פֶּרֶשׁ to divide, signifying, like the word deal, the thing taken off.

Deal always denotes something great, and cannot be coupled with any epithet that does not express much: quantity is a term of relative import; it either marks indefinitely the how, or so much of a thing, or may be defined by some epithet to express much or little: portion is of itself altogether indefinite, and admits of being qualified by any epithet to express much or little: deal is a term confined to familiar use, and sometimes substituted for quantity, and sometimes for portion. It is common to speak of a deal or a quantity of paper, a great deal or a great quantity of money; likewise of a great deal or a great portion of pleasure, a great deal or a great portion of wealth: and in some cases deal is more usual than either quantity or portion, as a deal of heat, a deal of rain, a deal of frost, a deal of noise, and the like; but it is altogether inadmissible in the higher style of writing; 'This, my inquisitive temper, or rather impertinent humour, of prying into all sorts of writing, with my natural aversion to loquacity, gives me a good deal of employment when I enter any house in the country.'—ADDISON. 'There is never room in the world for more than a certain quantity or measure of renown.'—JOHNSON.

Portion is employed only for that which is detached from the whole; quantity may sometimes be employed for a number of wholes. We may speak of a large or a small quantity of books; a large or a small quantity of plants or herbs; but a large or a small portion of food, a large or small portion of colour. Quantity is used only in the natural sense: portion also in the moral application, and mostly in the sense of a stated quantity. Material substances, as wood, stone, metals, and liquids, are necessarily considered with regard to quantity; the qualities of the mind and the circumstances of human life are divided into portions. A builder estimates the quantity of materials which he will want for the completion of a house; the workman estimates the portion of labour which the work will require;

In battles won, fortune a part did claim,
And soldiers have their portion in the fame.

WALLER

TO COMMUNICATE, IMPART.

Communicate, in Latin communicatus, participle of communico, contracted from communifico, signifies to make common property with another; impart, compounded of in and part, signifies to give in part to another.

Imparting is a species of communicating; one always communicates in imparting, but not vice versa.

Whatever can be enjoyed in common with others is communicated; whatever can be shared by another is imparted: what one knows or thinks is communicated, or made commonly known; what one feels is imparted and participated in: intelligence or information is communicated; 'A man who publishes his works in a volume has an infinite advantage over one who communicates his writings to the world in loose tracts.'—ADDISON. Secrets or sorrows are imparted;

Yet hear what an unskilful friend may say,
As if a blind man should direct your way:
So I myself, though wanting to be taught,
May yet impart a hint that's worth your thought.
GOLDING.

Those who always communicate all they hear, sometimes communicate more than they really know; it is the characteristic of friendship to allow her votaries to impart their joys and sorrows to each other.

A person may communicate what belongs to another, as well as that which is his own; but he imparts that only which concerns or belongs to himself: an openness of temper leads some men to communicate their intentions as soon as they are formed; loquacity impels others to communicate whatever is told them: a generosity of temper leads some men to impart their substance for the relief of their fellow-creatures; a desire for sympathy leads others to impart their sentiments. There is a great pleasure in communicating good intelligence and in imparting good advice.

COMMUNICATIVE, FREE,

Are epithets that convey no respectful sentiment of the object to which they are applied: a person is communicative, who is ready to tell all he knows; he is free, when he is ready to say all he thinks: the communicative person has no regard for himself; the free person has no regard for others.

A communicative temper leads to the breach of all confidence; a free temper leads to violation of all decency: communicativeness of disposition produces much mischief; freedom of speech and behaviour occasions much offence. Communicativeness is the excess of sincerity; it offends by revealing what it ought to conceal: freedom is the abuse of sincerity; it offends by speaking what it ought not to think.

These terms are sometimes taken in a good sense; when a person is communicative for the instruction or amusement of others, and is free in imparting to others whatever he can of his enjoyments; 'The most miserable of all beings is the most envious; as on the other hand the most communicative is the happiest.'—GROVE. 'Aristophanes was in private life of a free, open, and companionable temper.'—CUMBERLAND.

COMMUNION, CONVERSE.

Communion, from commune and commun, signifies the act of making common (v. Common); converse, from the Latin converso to convert or translate, signifies a transferring.

Both these terms imply a communication between minds; but the former may take place without corporal agency, the latter never does; spirits hold communion with each other, or men may hold spiritual communion with God; 'Where a long course of piety and close communion with God has purged the heart and rectified the will, knowledge will break in upon such a soul.'—SOUTH. People hold converse together;

In varied converse softening every theme,
You frequent pausing turn; and from her eyes,
Where meekness'd sense, and amiable grace,
And lively sweetness dwell, enraptured drink
That nameless spirit of ethereal joy.—THOMSON.

For the same reason a man may hold communion with himself; he holds converse always with another.

COMMUNITY, SOCIETY.

Both these terms are employed for a body of rational beings; community, from communis and communis common (v. Common), signifies abstractedly the state of being common, and in an extended sense those who are in a state of common possession; society, in Latin societas, from socius a companion, signifies the state of being companions, or those who are in that state.

Community in any thing constitutes a community; a common interest, a common language, a common government, is the basis of that community which is formed by any number of individuals; communities are therefore divisible into large or small; the former may be states, the latter families; 'Was there ever any community so corrupt as not to include within it individuals of real worth?'—BLAIR. The coming together of many constitutes a society; societies are either private or publick, according to the purpose for which they meet together; friends form societies for the purpose of pleasure; indifferent persons form societies for the purposes of business; 'The great community of mankind is necessarily broken into smaller independent societies.'—JOHNSON.

Community has always a restrictive and relative sense; society has a general and unlimited import: the most dangerous members of the community are those who attempt to poison the minds of youth with contempt for religion and disaffection to the state; the morals of society are thus corrupted as it were at the fountain-head.

Community refers to spiritual as well as corporeal agents; society mostly to human beings only: the angels, the saints, and the spirits of just men made perfect, constitute a community; with them there is more communion than association.

CONVIVIAL, SOCIAL, SOCIABLE.

Convivial, in Latin convivialis, from convivo to live together, signifies being entertained together; social, from socius a companion, signifies pertaining to company.

The prominent idea in convivial is that of sensual indulgence; the prominent idea in social is that of enjoyment from an intercourse with society. The convivial is a species of the social; it is the social in matters of festivity. What is convivial is social, but what is social is something more; the former is excelled by the latter as much as the body is excelled by the mind. We speak of convivial meetings, convivial enjoyments, or the convivial board; but social intercourse, social pleasure, social amusements, and the like; 'It is related by Carte, of the Duke of Ormond, that he used often to pass a night with Dryden, and those with whom Dryden consorted; who they were Carte has not told, but certainly the convivial table at which Ormond sat was not surrounded with a plebeian society.'—JOHNSON. 'Plato and Socrates shared many social hours with Aristophanes.'—CUMBERLAND.

Social signifies belonging or allied to a companion, having the disposition of a companion; sociable, from the same root, signifies able or fit to be a companion; the former is an active, the latter a passive quality: social people seek others; sociable people are sought for by others. It is possible for a man to be social and not sociable; to be sociable and not social: he who draws his pleasures from society without communicating his share to the common stock of entertainments is social but not sociable; men of a taciturn disposition are often in this case; they receive more than they give; he, on the contrary, who has talents to please company, but not the inclination to go into company, may be sociable, but is seldom social; of this description are humorists who go into company to gratify their pride, and stay away to indulge their humour. Social and sociable are likewise applicable to things, with a similar distinction; social intercourse is that intercourse which men have together for the purposes of society; social pleasures are what they enjoy by associating together;

Social friends,

Attun'd to happy unison of soul.—THOMSON.

A path or a carriage is denominated sociable which encourages the association of many; 'Sciences are of a sociable disposition, and flourish best in the neighbourhood of each other.'—BLACKSTONE.

SOCIETY, COMPANY.

Society (v. Association) and company (v. Association) here express either the persons associating or the act of associating.

In either case, society is a general, and company a particular, term; as respects persons associating, society comprehends either all the associated part of mankind, as when we speak of the laws of society, the well-being of society; or it is said only of a particular number of individuals associated: in which latter case it comes nearest to company, and differs from it only as to the purpose of the association. A society is always formed for some solid purpose, as the Humane Society; and the company is always brought together for pleasure or profit, as has already been observed.

Good sense teaches us the necessity of conforming to the rules of the society to which we belong; good breeding prescribes to us to render ourselves agreeable to the company of which we form a part.

When expressing the abstract action of associating, society is even more general and indefinite than before; It expresses that which is common to mankind; and company that which is peculiar to individuals. The love of society is inherent in our nature; it is weakened or destroyed only by the vice of our constitution or the derangement of our system;

Solitude sometimes is best society,

And short retirement urges sweet return.—MILTON.

Every one naturally likes the company of his own friends and connexions in preference to that of strangers. Society is a permanent and habitual act; company is only a particular act suited to the occasion; it behooves us to shun the society of those from whom we can learn no good, although we may sometimes be obliged to be in their company. The society of intelligent men is desirable for those who are entering life; the company of facetious men is agreeable in travelling; 'Company, though it may relieve a man from his melancholy, cannot secure him from his conscience.'—SOUTH.

ASSOCIATE, COMPANION.

Associate, in Latin associatus, participle of associare, compounded of as or ad and socio to ally, signifies one united with a person; companion, from company, signifies one that bears company (v. To accompany).

Associates are habitually together; companions are only occasionally in each other's company; as our habits are formed from our associates, we ought to be particular in our choice of them; as our companions contribute much to our enjoyments, we ought to choose such as are suitable to ourselves; 'We see many struggling single about the world, unhappy for want of an associate, and pining with the necessity of confining their sentiments to their own bosoms.'—JOHNSON. Many men may be admitted as companions, who would not altogether be fit as associates; 'There is a degree of want by the freedom of agency is almost destroyed, and long association with fortuitous companions will at last relax the strictness of truth, and abate the fervour of sincerity.'—JOHNSON.

An associate may take part with us in some business, and share with us in the labour; 'Addison contributed more than a fourth part (of the last volume of the Spectator), and the other contributors are by no means unworthy of appearing as his associates.'—JOHNSON. A companion takes part with us in some concern, and shares with us in the pleasure or the pain;

Thus while the cordage stretch'd ashore may guide
Our brave companions through the swelling tide;
This floating lumber shall sustain them o'er
The rocky shelves, in safety to the shore.—FALCONER.

ASSOCIATION, SOCIETY, COMPANY, PARTNERSHIP.

All these terms denote a union of several persons into one body.

Association (v. To associate) is general, the rest specific. Whenever we habitually or frequently meet together for some common object, it is an association. Associations are therefore political, religious, commercial, and literary; a society is an association for some specific purpose, moral or religious, civil or political; a company is, in this application of the term, an association of many for the purpose of trade; a partnership is an association of a few for the same object.

Whenever association is used in distinction from the others, it denotes that which is partial in its object and temporary in its duration. It is founded on unity of sentiment as well as unity of object; but it is mostly unorganized, and kept together only by the spirit which gives rise to it. It is not, however, the less dangerous on this account; and when politics are the subject, it commonly breathes a spirit hostile to the established order of things; as the last thirty years have evinced to us by woful experience; 'For my own part I could wish that all honest men would enter into an association for the support of one another against the endeavours of those whom they ought to look upon as their common enemies, whatever side they may belong to.'—ADDISON.

A society requires nothing but unity of object, which is permanent in its nature; it is well organized, and commonly set on foot to promote the cause of humanity, literature, or religion. No country can boast such numerous and excellent societies, whether of a charitable, a religious, or a literary description, as England; 'What I humbly propose to the publick is, that there may be a society erected in London to consist of the most skilful persons of both sexes, for the inspection of modes and fashions.'—BUDGELL

Companies are brought together for the purposes of interest, and are dissolved when that object ceases to exist; their duration depends on the contingencies of profit and loss. The South Sea Company, which was founded on an idle speculation, was formed for the ruin of many, and dispersed almost as soon as it was formed. The East India Company, on the other hand, which is one of the grandest that ever was raised, promises as much permanency as is commonly allotted to human transactions; 'The nation is a company of players.'—ADDISON.

Partnerships are altogether of an individual and private nature. As they are without organization and system, they are more precarious than any other association. Their duration depends not only on the chances of trade, but the compatibility of individuals to co-operate in a close point of union. They are often begun rashly and end ruinously; 'Gay was the general favourite of the whole association of wits; but they regarded him as a playfellow rather than a partner, and treated him with more fondness than respect.'—JOHNSON. The term partnership is sometimes used figuratively, in reference to other objects; 'Society is a partnership in all science; a partnership in every virtue and in all perfection.'—BURKE

ASSOCIATION, COMBINATION.

Association, v. Associate; combination, from the Latin combinare, or con and binus, signifies tying two into one.

An association is something less binding than a combination; associations are formed for purposes of convenience; combinations are formed to serve either the interests or passions of men. The word association is therefore always taken in a good or an indifferent sense; combination in an indifferent or bad sense. An association is publick; it embraces all classes of men; a combination is often private, and includes only a particular description of persons. Associations are formed for some general purpose; 'In my yesterday's paper I proposed that the honest men of all parties should enter into a kind of association for the defence of one another.'—ADDISON. Combinations are frequently formed for particular purposes, which respect the interest of the few, to the injury of many; 'The cry of the people in cities and towns, though unfortunately (from a fear of their multitude and combination) the most regarded, ought in fact to be the least regarded, on the subject of monopoly.'—BURKE. Associations are formed by good citizens; combinations by discontented mechanics, or low persons in general. The latter term may, however, be used in a good sense when taken for the general act of combining, in which case it expresses a closer union than association; 'There is no doubt but all the safety, happiness, and convenience that men enjoy in this life, is from the combination of particular persons into societies or corporations.'—SOUTH.

When used for things, association is a natural action; combination an arbitrary action. Things associate of themselves, but combinations are formed either by design or accident. Nothing will associate but what harmonizes: things the most opposite in their nature are combined together. We associate persons with places, or events with names; discordant properties are combined in the same body. With the name of one's birthplace are associated pleasurable recollections; virtue and vice are often so combined in the same character as to form a contrast. The association of ideas is a remarkable phenomenon of the human mind, but it can never be admitted as solving any difficulty respecting the structure and composition of the soul; 'Meekness and courtesy will always recommend the first address, but soon pall and nauseate unless they are associated with more sprightly qualities.'—JOHNSON. The combination of letters forms syllables, and that of syllables forms words; 'Before the time of Dryden, those happy combinations of words which distinguish poetry from prose had been rarely attempted.'—JOHNSON.

COMBINATION, CABAL, PLOT, CONSPIRACY.

Combination, v. Association, combination; cabal, in French cabale, comes from the Hebrew kabala, signifying a secret science, pretended to by the Jewish Rabbi, whence it is applied to any association that has a pretended secret; plot, in French complot, is derived, like the word complicate, from the Latin plico to entangle, signifying any intricate or dark concern; conspiracy, in French conspiration, from con and spiro to breathe together, signifies the having one spirit.

An association for a bad purpose is the idea common to all these terms, and peculiar to combination. A combination may be either secret or open, but secrecy forms a necessary part in the signification of the other terms; a cabal is secret as to its end; a plot and conspiracy are secret both as to the means and the end.

Combination is the close adherence of many for their mutual defence in obtaining their demands, or resisting the claims of others. A cabal is the intrigue of a party or faction, formed by cunning practices in order to give a turn to the course of things to its own advantage: the natural and ruling idea of cabal is that of assembling a number, and manœuvring secretly with address. A plot is a clandestine union of some persons for the purpose of mischief: the ruling idea in a plot is that of a complicated enterprise formed in secret, by two or more persons. A conspiracy is a general intelligence among persons united to effect some serious change: the ruling and natural idea in this word is that of unanimity and concert in the prosecution of a plan.

A combination is seldom of so serious a nature as a cabal or a plot, though always objectionable; a combination may have many or few. A cabal requires a number of persons sufficient to form a party, it gains strength by numbers; a plot is generally confined to a few, it diminishes its security by numbers; a conspiracy mostly requires many for the fulfilment of its purposes, although it is thereby the more exposed to discovery.

Selfishness, insubordination, and laxity of morals give rise to combinations; they are peculiar to mechanicks, and the lower orders of society; 'The protector, dreading combinations between the parliament and the malecontents in the army, resolved to allow no leisure for forming conspiracies against him.'—HUME. Restless, jealous, ambitious, and little minds are ever forming cabals; they are peculiar to courtiers;

I see you court the crowd,
When with the shouts of the rebellious rabble,
I see you borne on shoulders to cabals.—DRYDEN.

Malignity, revenge, and every foul passion is concerned in forming plots;

Oh! think what anxious moments pass between
The birth of plots, and their last fatal periods.
ADDISON.

Disaffected subjects and bad citizens form conspiracies, which are frequently set on foot by disappointed ambition;

O Conspiracy!

Sham'st thou to show thy dangerous brow by night,
When evils are most free.—SHAKESPEARE.

The object of a combination, although not less formidable than the others, is not always so criminal; it rests on a question of claims which it proposes to decide by force; the end is commonly as unjustifiable as the means: to this description are the combinations formed by journeymen against their masters, which are expressly contrary to law. The object of a cabal is always petty, and mostly contemptible; its end is to gain favour, credit, and influence; to be the distributor of places, honours, emoluments, reputation, and all such contingencies as are eagerly sought for by the great mass of mankind; at court it makes and unmakes ministers, generals, and officers; in the republic of letters it destroys the reputation of authors, and blasts the success of their works; in public societies it stops the course of equity, and nips merit in the bud; in the world at large it is the never-ending source of vexation, broils, and animosities. A plot has always the object of committing some atrocity, whether of a private or public nature, as the murder or plunder of individuals, the traitorous surrender of a town, or the destruction of something very valuable. Astarba in Telemachus is represented as having formed a plot for the poisoning of Pygmalion: the annihilation of the English government was the object of that plot which received the name of gunpowder treason. The object of a conspiracy is oftener to bring about some evil change in public than in private concerns; it is commonly directed against the government, in order to overturn the government: in a republic, conspiracies are justified and hailed as glorious events when sanctioned by success: the conspiracy of Brutus against Cæsar is always represented by the favourers of a republic as a magnanimous exploit. Where every man can rule, there will always be usurpers and tyrants, and where every man has an equal right to set himself up against his ruler, there will never be wanting conspiracies to crush the usurpers; hence usurpations and conspiracies succeed each other as properly and naturally in republics as cause and effect; the right of the strongest, the most daring, or the most unprincipled, is the only right which can be acknowledged upon the principles of republican equality: on the contrary, in a monarchy, where the person of the sovereign and his authority are alike sacred, every conspirator to his country, and every conspiracy, does no less violence to the laws of God, than to those of man.

FELOWSHIP, SOCIETY.

Both these terms are employed to denote a close intercourse; but fellowship is said of men as individuals, society of them collectively: we should be careful not to hold fellowship with any one of bad character or to join the society of those who profess bad principles;

Ill becomes it me

To wear at once thy garter and thy chains;
Though by my former dignity I swear,
That were I reinstated in my throne,
Thus to be join'd in fellowship with thee
Would be the first ambition of my soul.

Unhappy he! who from the first of joys,

Amid this world of death.—THOMSON.

TO ASSEMBLE, MUSTER, COLLECT.

Assemble, in French assembler, Latin adsummare or assimulare, from similis like and sum together, signifies to make alike or bring together; muster, in German mustern to set out for inspection, comes from the Latin monstror to show or display; collect, in Latin collectus, participle of colligo, compounded of col or con and lego to bind, signifies to bring together, or into one point.

Assemble is said of persons only; muster and collect of persons or things. To assemble is to bring together by a call or invitation; to muster is to bring together by an act of authority, into one point of view, at one time, and from one quarter; to collect is to bring together at different times, and from different quarters: the parliament is assembled; soldiers are mustered every day in order to ascertain their numbers;

Assemble all their choirs, and with their notes,
Salute and welcome up the rising sun.—OWEN.

An army is collected in preparation for war: a king assembles his council in order to consult with them or public measures; a general musters his forces before he undertakes an expedition, and collects more troops if he finds himself too weak.

Collect is used for every thing which can be brought together in numbers; muster is used figuratively for bringing together, for an immediate purpose, what is

* Vide Roubaud: "Cabale, complot, conspiration, conjuration."

is in one's possession: books, coins, curiosities, and the like, are collected; a person's resources, his strength, courage, resolution, &c., are mustered: some persons have a pleasure in collecting all the pieces of antiquity which fall in their way;

Each leader now his scatter'd force conjoins
In close array, and forms the deep'ning lines;
Not with more ease the skilful shepherd swain
Collects his flock, from thousands on the plain.

POPE.

On a trying occasion it is necessary to muster all the fortitude of which we are master;

Oh! thou hast set my busy brain at work!
And now she musters up a train of images.

ROWE

TO ASSEMBLE, CONVENE, CONVOKE.

Assemble, v. To assemble, muster; convene, in Latin convenio, signifies to come or bring together; convoke, in Latin convoco, signifies to call together.

The idea of collecting many persons into one place, for a specific purpose, is common to all these terms. Assemble conveys this sense without any addition; convene and convoke include likewise some collateral idea: people are assembled, whenever they are convened or convoked, but not vice versa. Assembling is mostly by the wish of one; convening by that of several: a crowd is assembled by an individual in the streets; a meeting is convened at the desire of a certain number of persons: people are assembled either on public or private business; they are always convened on a public occasion. A king assembles his parliament; a particular individual assembles his friends;

He ceas'd; the assembled warriors all assent,
All but Atides.—CUMBERLAND.

The inhabitants of a district are convened:

They form one social shade, as if conven'd
By magic summons of the Orphean lyre.

COWPER.

Animals also as well as men may be said to be assembled or convened;

Where on the mingling boughs they sit embow'ered
All the hot noon, till cooler hours arrive,
Faint underneath, the household fowls convene.

THOMSON.

There is nothing imperative on the part of those that assemble or convene, and nothing binding on those assembled or convened: one assembles or convenes by invitation or request; one attends to the notice or not at pleasure. To convoke, on the other hand, is an act of authority: it is the call of one who has the authority to give the call; it is heeded by those who feel themselves bound to attend. Assembling and convening are always for domestic or civil purposes: convoking is always employed in civil or spiritual matters: a dying man assembles his friends round his death-bed; a meeting is convened in order to present an address; the dignitaries in the church are convoked by the supreme authority, or a king convokes his council;

Here cease thy fury, and the chiefs and kings,
Convokes to council, weigh the sum of things.

POPE.

ASSEMBLY, ASSEMBLAGE, GROUP, COLLECTION.

Assembly, assemblage, are collective terms derived from the verb assemble; group comes from the Italian gruppo, which among painters signifies an assemblage of figures in one place; collection expresses the act of collecting, or the body collected (v. To assemble, muster).

Assembly respects persons only; assemblage, things only; group and collection, persons or things: an assembly is any number either brought together, or come together of themselves; an assemblage is any number standing together: a group is come together by accident, or put together by design; a collection is mostly put or brought together by design.

A general alarm will cause an assembly to disperse; Love and marriage are the natural effects of these anniversary assemblies.—BUDGELL. An agreeable assemblage of rural objects, whether in nature or in representation, constitutes a landscape:

O Hertford! fitted or to shine in courts
With unaffected grace, or walk the plain
With innocence and meditation join'd
In soft assemblage, listen to my song.

THOMSON.

A painting will sometimes consist only of a group of figures, but if they be well chosen it will sometimes produce a wonderful effect: a collection of evil-minded persons ought to be immediately dispersed by the authority of the magistrate. In a large assembly you may sometimes observe a singular assemblage of characters, countenances, and figures; when people come together in great numbers on any occasion, they will often form themselves into distinct groups;

A lifeless group the blasted cattle lie.

THOMSON

The collection of scarce books and curious editions has become a passion, which is justly ridiculed under the title of bibliomania; 'There is a manuscript at Oxford containing the lives of a hundred and thirty-five of the finest Persian poets, most of whom left very ample collections of their poems behind them.'—SIR W. JONES

ASSEMBLY, COMPANY, MEETING, CONGREGATION, PARLIAMENT, DIET, CONGRESS, CONVENTION, SYNOD, CONVOCATION, COUNCIL.

An assembly (v. To assemble, muster) is simply the assembling together of any number of persons, or the persons so assembled: this idea is common to all the rest of these terms, which differ in the object, mode, and other collateral circumstances of the action; company, a body linked together (v. To accompany), is an assembly for purposes of amusement; meeting, a body met together, is an assembly for general purposes of business; congregation, a body flocked or gathered together, from the Latin grex a flock, is an assembly brought together from congeniality of sentiment, and community of purpose; parliament, in French parlement, from parler to speak, signifies an assembly for speaking or debating on important matters; diet, from the Greek diarâda to govern, is an assembly for governing or regulating affairs of state; congress, from the Latin congregior to march in a body, is an assembly coming together in a formal manner from distant parts for the special purposes; convention, from the Latin convenio to come together, is an assembly coming together in an informal and promiscuous manner from a neighbouring quarter; synod, in Greek συνόδος, compounded of σύν and δός, signifies literally going the same road, and has been employed to signify an assembly for consultation on matters of religion; convocation is an assembly convoked for an especial purpose; council is an assembly for consultation either on civil or ecclesiastical affairs.

An assembly is, in its restricted sense, public, and under certain regulations; 'Lucan was so exasperated with the repulse, that he muttered something to himself, and was heard to say, "that since he could not have a seat among them himself, he would bring in one who alone had more merit than their whole assembly," upon which he went to the door and brought in Cato of Utica.'—ADDISON. A company is private, and confined to friends and acquaintances; 'As I am insignificant to the company in public places, and as it is visible I do not come thither as most do to show myself, I gratify the vanity of all who pretend to make an appearance.'—STEELE. A meeting is either public or private: a congregation is always public. Meetings are held by all who have any common business to arrange or pleasure to enjoy; 'It is very natural for a man who is not turned for mirthful meetings of men, or assemblies of the fair sex, to delight in that sort of conversation which we meet with in coffee-houses.'—STEELE. A congregation in its limited sense consists of those who follow the same form of doctrine and discipline; 'As all innocent means are to be used for the propagation of truth, I would not deter those who are employed in preaching to common congregations from any practice which they may find permissive.'—JOHNSON. But the term may be extended to bodies either of men or brutes congregated for some common purpose;

Their tribes adjusted, clean'd their vig'rous wings,
And many a circle, many a short essay,
Wheel'd round and round: in congregation full
The figur'd flight ascends.—THOMSON.

All these different kinds of assemblies are formed by individuals in their private capacity; the other terms designate assemblies that come together for national purposes, with the exception of the word convention, which may be either domestick or political.

A parliament and diet are popular assemblies under a monarchical form of government; congress and convention are assemblies under a republican government: of the first description are the parliaments of England and France, the diets of Germany and Poland, which consisted of subjects assembled by the monarch, to deliberate on the affairs of the nation; 'The word parliament was first applied to general assemblies of the states under Louis VII. in France, about the middle of the twelfth century.'—BLACKSTONE. 'What further provoked their indignation was that instead of twenty-five pistoles formerly allowed to each member for their charge in coming to the diet, he had presented them with six only.'—STEELE. Of the latter description are the congress of the United Provinces of Holland, and that of the United States of America, and the late national convention of France: but there is this difference observable between a congress and a convention, that the former consists of deputies or delegates from higher authorities, that is, from independent governments already established; but a convention is a self-constituted assembly, which has no power but what it assumes to itself; 'Prior had not, however, much reason to complain; for he came to London, and obtained such notice, that (in 1691) he was sent to the congress at the Hague, as secretary to the embassy.'—JOHNSON. 'The office of conservators of the peace was newly erected in Scotland; and these, instigated by the clergy, were resolved, since they could not obtain the king's consent, to summon in his name, but by their own authority, a convention of states.'—HUME.

A synod and convocation are in religious matters what a diet and convention are in civil matters: the former exist only under an episcopal form of government; the latter may exist under any form of church discipline, even where the authority lies in the whole body of the ministry; 'A synod of the celestials was convened, in which it was resolved that patronage should descend to the assistance of the sciences.'—JOHNSON. 'The convocation is the miniature of a parliament, wherein the archbishop presides with regal state.'—BLACKSTONE.

A council is more important than all other species of assembly; it consists of persons invested with the highest authority, who, in their consultations, do not so much transact ordinary concerns, as arrange the forms and fashions of things. Religious councils used to determine matters of faith and discipline; political councils frame laws and determine the fate of empires;

Inspir'd by Juno, Thetis' godlike son
Conven'd to council all the Grecian train.
POPE.

GUEST, VISITER, OR VISITANT.

Guest, from the northern languages, signifies one who is entertained; visitor is the one who pays the visit. The guest is to the visitor as a species to the genus: every guest is a visitor, but every visitor is not a guest. The visitor simply comes to see the person, and enjoy social intercourse; but the guest also partakes of hospitality. We are visitors at the tea-table, at the card-table, and round the fire: we are guests at the festive board;

Some great behest from heav'n
To us perhaps he brings, and will vouchsafe
This day to be our guest.—MILTON.

No palace with a lofty gate he wants,
T' admit the tides of early visitants.—DRYDEN.

COLLEAGUE, PARTNER, COADJUTOR, ASSISTANT.

Colleague, in French collègue, Latin collega, compounded of col or con and legatus sent, signifies sent or employed upon the same business; partner, from the word part, signifies one having a part or share.

Colleague is more noble than partner: men in the highest offices are colleagues; tradesmen, mechanics, and subordinate persons are partners: every Roman consul had a colleague; every workman has commonly a partner.

Colleague is used only with regard to community of office; partner is most generally used with regard to community of interest: whenever two persons are employed to act together on the same business they stand in the relation of colleagues to each other; whenever two persons unite their endeavours either in trade or in games they are denominated partners: ministers, judges, commissioners, and plenipotentiaries are colleagues;

But from this day's decision, from the choice
Of his first colleagues, shall succeeding times
Of Edward judge, and on his frame pronounce.

WEST.

Bankers, merchants, chess-players, card-players, and the like, have partners;

And lo! sad partner of the general care,
Weary and faint I drive my goal-star.

WARTON

Coadjutor, compounded of co or con and adjutor a helper, signifying a fellow-labourer, is more noble than assistant, which signifies properly one that assists or takes a part; the latter being mostly in a subordinate station, but the former is an equal.

The assistant performs menial offices in the minor concerns of life, and a subordinate part at all times; the coadjutor labours conjointly in some concern of common interest and great importance. An assistant is engaged for a compensation; a coadjutor is a voluntary fellow-labourer. In every publick concern where the purposes of charity or religion are to be promoted, coadjutors often effect more than the original promoters; 'Advices from Vienna import that the Archbishop of Salzburg is dead, who is succeeded by Count Harrach, formerly bishop of Vienna, and for these last three years coadjutor to the said Archbishop.'—STEELE. In the medical and scholastick professions assistants are indispensable to relieve the pressure of business; 'As for you, gentlemen and ladies, my assistants and grand juries, I have made choice of you on my right-hand, because I know you to be very jealous of your honour; and you on my left, because I know you are very much concerned for the reputation of others.'—ADDISON. Coadjutors ought to be zealous and unanimous; assistants ought to be assiduous and faithful.

ALLY, CONFEDERATE, ACCOMPLICE.

Although the terms ally and confederate are derived from the words alliance and confederacy (v. Alliance), they are used only in part of their acceptations.

An ally is one who forms an alliance in the political sense; a confederate is one who forms confederacies in general, but more particularly when such confederacies are unauthorized.

The Portuguese and English are allies; 'We could hinder the accession of Holland to France, either as subjects with great immunities for the encouragement of trade, or as an inferior and dependent ally under their protection.'—TEMPLE. William Tell had some few particular friends who were his confederates; 'Having learned by experience that they must expect a vigorous resistance from this warlike prince, they entered into an alliance with the Britons of Cornwall, and landing two years after in that country made an inroad with their confederates into the county of Devon.'—HUME. This latter term is however used with more propriety in its worst sense, for an associate in a rebellious faction, as in speaking of Cromwell and his confederates who were concerned in the death of the king.

Confederate and accomplice both imply a partner in some proceeding, but they differ as to the nature of the proceeding: in the former case it may be lawful or unlawful; in the latter unlawful only. In this latter sense a confederate is a partner in a plot or secret association; an accomplice is a partner in some active violation of the laws. Guy Fawkes retained his resolution till the last extremity, not to reveal the names of his confederates: it is the common refuge of all robbers and desperate characters to betray their accomplices in order to screen themselves from punishment;

Now march the bold confed'rates through the plain,
Well hors'd, well clad, a rich and shining train.

DRYDEN.

It is not improbable that the Lady Mason (the grandmother of Savage) might persuade or compel his mother to desist, or perhaps she could not easily find accomplices wicked enough to concur in so cruel an action, as that of banishing him to the American plantations.

—JOHNSON.

ALLIANCE, LEAGUE, CONFEDERACY.

Alliance, in French alliance, from the Latin alligo to knit or tie together, signifies the moral state of being tied; league, in French ligue, comes from the same verb ligo to bind; confederacy or confederation, in Latin confederatio, from con and fædus an agreement, or fides faith, signifies a joining together under a certain pledge.

* Relationship, friendship, the advantage of a good understanding, the prospect of aid in case of necessity, are the ordinary motives for forming alliances. A league is a union of plan, and a junction of force, for the purpose of effectuating some common enterprise, or obtaining some common object. A confederacy is a union of interest and support on particular occasions, for the purpose of obtaining a redress of supposed wrong, or of defending right against usurpation and oppression.

Treaties of alliance are formed between sovereigns; it is a union of friendship and convenience concluded upon precise terms, and maintained by honour or good faith. Leagues are mostly formed between parties or small communities; as they are occasioned by circumstances of an imperative nature, they are in this manner rendered binding on each party. Confederacies are formed between individuals or communities; they continue while the impelling cause that set them in motion remains; and every individual is bound more by a common feeling of safety, than by any express contract.

History mentions frequent alliances which have been formed between the courts of England and Portugal;

Who but a fool would wars with Juno choose,
And such alliances and such gifts refuse?

DRYDEN.

The cantons of Switzerland were bound to each other by a famous league, which was denominated the Helvetic league, and which took its rise in a confederacy formed against the Austrian government by William Tell and his companions;

Rather in leagues of endless peace unite,
And celebrate the hymenial rite.—ADDISON.

The history of mankind informs us that a single power is very seldom broken by a confederacy.—JOHNSON.

Confederacy is always taken in a civil or political sense: alliance and league are sometimes employed in a moral sense; the former being applied to marriage, the latter to plots or factions. Alliance is taken only in a good acceptance; league and confederacy frequently in relation to that which is bad. Alliances are formed for the mutual advantage of the parties concerned; 'Though domestic misery must follow an alliance with a gamester, matches of this sort are made every day.'—CUMBERLAND. Leagues may have plunder for their object, and confederacies may be treasonable;

Tiger with tiger, bear with bear, you'll find
In leagues offensive and defensive join'd.

TATE.

When Babel was confounded, and the great Confederacy of projectors wild and vain

* Vide Girard and Roubaud: "Alliance, ligue, confederation."

Was split into diversity of tongues,
Then, as a shepherd separates his flock,
These to the upland, to the valley those,
God drave asunder.—COWPER.

ALLIANCE, AFFINITY.

Alliance, v. Alliance, league; affinity, in Latin affinitas, from af or ad and finis a border signifies a contiguity of borders.

Alliance is artificial: affinity is natural; an alliance is formed either by persons or by circumstances; an affinity exists of itself: an alliance subsists between persons only in the proper sense, and between things figuratively; 'Religion (in England) has maintained a proper alliance with the state.'—BLAIR. An affinity exists between things as well as persons; 'It cannot be doubted but that signs were invented originally to express the several occupations of their owners; and to bear some affinity, in their external designations, with the wares to be disposed of.'—BATHURST. The alliance between families is matrimonial;

O horror! horror! after this alliance
Let tigers match with hinds, and wolves with sheep,
And every creature couple with its foe.—DRYDEN.

The affinity arises from consanguinity

BAND, COMPANY, CREW, GANG.

Band, in French bande, in German, &c. band, from binden to bind, signifies the thing bound; company, v. To accompany; crew, from the French cru, participle of croître, and the Latin cresco to grow or gather, signifies the thing grown or formed into a mass; gang, in Saxon, German, &c. gang a walk, from gehen to go, signifies a body going the same way.

All these terms denote a small association for a particular object: a band is an association where men are bound together by some strong obligation, whether taken in a good or bad sense, as a band of soldiers, a band of robbers;

Behold a ghastly band
Each a torch in his hand!
These are Grecian ghosts that in battle were slain,
And unbury'd remain,
Inglorious in the plain.—DRYDEN.

A company marks an association for convenience without any particular obligation, as a company of travellers, a company of strolling players; 'Chaucer supposes in his prologue to his tales that a company of pilgrims going to Canterbury assemble at an Inn in Southwark, and agree that for their common amusement on the road each of them shall tell at least one tale in going to Canterbury, and another in coming back from thence.'—TYRWHITT.

Crew marks an association collected together by some external power, or by coincidence of plan and motive: in the former case it is used for a ship's crew; in the latter and bad sense of the word it is employed for any number of evil-minded persons met together from different quarters, and co-operating for some bad purpose;

The clowns, a boist'rous, rude, ungovern'd crew,
With furious haste to the loud summons fly.—DRYDEN.

Gang is mostly used in a bad sense for an association of thieves, murderers, and depredators in general; for such an association is rather a casual meeting from the similarity of pursuits, than an organized body under any leader: it is more in common use than band; the robbers in Germany used to form themselves into bands that set the government of the country at defiance; housebreakers and pickpockets commonly associate now in gangs;

Others again who form a gang,
Yet take due measures not to hang
In magazines their forces join,
By legal methods to purloin.—MALLET.

TROOP, COMPANY.

In a military sense a troop is among the horse what a company is among the foot; but this is only a partial acceptance of the terms. Troop, in French troupe

Spanish tropa, Latin turba, signifies an indiscriminate multitude; company (v. To accompany) is any number joined together, and bearing each other company: hence we speak of a troop of hunters, a company of players; a troop of horsemen, a company of travellers.

ACCOMPANIMENT, COMPANION,
CONCOMITANT.

Accompaniment is properly a collective term to express what goes in company, and is applied only to things; companion, which also signifies what is in the company, is applied either to persons or to things; concomitant, from the intensive syllable con and comes a companion, implies what is attached to an object, or goes in its train, and is applied only to things.

When said in relation to things, accompaniment implies a necessary connexion; companion an incidental connexion: the former is as a part to a whole, the latter is as one whole to another: the accompaniment belongs to the thing accompanied, inasmuch as it serves to render it more or less complete; the companion belongs to the thing accompanied, inasmuch as they correspond: in this manner singing is an accompaniment in instrumental music; subordinate ceremonies are the accompaniments in any solemn service; 'We may well believe that the ancient heathen bards, who were chiefly Asiatick Greeks, performed religious rites and ceremonies in metre with accompaniments of music, to which they were devoted in the extreme.'—CUMBERLAND. A picture may be the companion of another picture from their fitness to stand together; 'Alas, my soul! thou pleasing companion of this body, thou fleeting thing that art now deserting it, whither art thou flying?'—STEELE.

The concomitant is as much of an appendage as the accompaniment, but it is applied only to moral objects: thus morality is a concomitant to religion; 'As the beauty of the body accompanies the health of it, so certainly is decency concomitant to virtue.'—HUGHES.

TO ACCOMPANY, ATTEND, ESCORT, WAIT ON.

Accompany, in French accompagner, is compounded of ac or ad and compagner, in Latin compagno to put or join together, signifying to give one's company and presence to any object, to join one's self to its company; attend, in French attendre, compounded of at or ad and tendo to tend or incline towards, signifies to direct one's notice or care towards any object; escort, in French escorter, from the Latin cohors a cohort or band of soldiers that attended a magistrate on his going into a province, signifies to accompany by way of safeguard.

We *accompany those with whom we wish to go; we attend those whom we wish to serve; we escort those whom we are called upon to protect or guard. We accompany our equals, we attend our superiours, and escort superiours or inferiours. The desire of pleasing or being pleased actuates in the first case; the desire of serving or being served, in the second case; he fear of danger or the desire of security, in the last case.

One is said to have a numerous company, a crowd of attendants, and a strong escort; but otherwise one person only may accompany or attend, though several are wanting for an escort. Friends accompany each other in their excursions; 'This account in some measure excited our curiosity, and at the entreaty of the ladies I was prevailed upon to accompany them to the playhouse, which was no other than a barn.'—GOLDSMITH. Princes are attended with a considerable retinue whenever they appear in publick, and with a strong escort when they travel through unfrequented and dangerous roads. 'When the Marquis of Wharcon was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, Addison attended him as his secretary.'—JOHNSON. Cræusa the wife of Æneas accompanied her husband on his eaving Troy; Socrates was attended by a number of his illustrious pupils, whom he instructed by his example and his doctrines; St. Paul was escorted as a prisoner by a band of three hundred men; 'He very prudently called up four or five of the hostlers that belonged to the yard, and engaged them to enlist under his command as an escort to the coach.'—HAWKES WORTH.

Accompany and attend may likewise be said of persons as well as things. In this case the former is applied to what goes with an object so as to form a part of it; the latter to that which follows an object as a dependant upon it; 'The old English plainness and sincerity, that generous integrity of nature and honesty of disposition, which always argues true greatness of mind, and is usually accompanied with undaunted courage and resolution, is in a great measure lost among us.'—TILLOTSON. 'Humility lodged in a worthy mind is always attended with a certain homage, which no haughty soul, with all the arts imaginable, can pursue.'—HUGHES. Pride is often accompanied with a meanness, and attended with much inconvenience to the possessor; 'The practice of religion will not only be attended with that pleasure which naturally accompanies those actions to which we are habituated, but with those supernumerary joys that rise from the consciousness of such a pleasure.'—ADDISON.

Attend (v. To attend to) is here employed in the improper sense for the devotion of the person to an object. To wait on is the same as to wait for or expect the wishes of another.

Attendance is an act of obligation; waiting on that of choice. A physician attends his patient; a member attends in parliament; one gentleman waits on another. We attend a person at the time and place appointed; we wait on those with whom we wish to speak. Those who dance attendance on the great must expect every mortification; it is wiser, therefore, only to wait on those by whom we can be received upon terms of equality.

Attend and wait on are likewise used for being about the person of any one; to attend is to bear company or be in readiness to serve; to wait on is actually to perform some service. A nurse attends a patient in order to afford him assistance as occasion requires; the servant waits on him to perform the menial duties. Attendants about the great are always near the person; but men and women in waiting are always at call. People of rank and fashion have a crowd of attendants.

At length, her lord descends upon the plain
In pomp, attended with a num'rous train.—DRYDEN.

Those of the middle classes have only those who wait on them; 'One of Pope's constant demands was of coffee in the night; and to the woman that waited on him in his chamber he was very burdensome; but he was careful to recompense her want of sleep.'—JOHNSON.

PROCESSION, TRAIN, RETINUE.

Procession, from the verb proceed, signifies the act of going forward or before, that is, in the present instance, of going before others, or one before another; train in all probability comes from the Latin traho to draw, signifying the thing drawn after another, and in the present instance the persons who are led after, or follow, any object; retinue, from the verb retain, signifies those who are retained as attendants.

All these terms are said of any number of persons who follow in a certain order; but this, which is the leading idea in the word procession, is but collateral in the terms train and retinue: on the other hand, the procession may consist of persons of all ranks and stations; but the train and retinue apply only to such as follow some person or thing in a subordinate capacity: the former in regard to such as make up the concluding part of some procession; the latter only in regard to the servants or attendants on the great. At funerals there is frequently a long train of coaches belonging to the friends of the deceased, which close the procession; princes and nobles never go out on state or publick occasions, without a numerous retinue.

The beauty of every procession consists in the order with which every one keeps his place, and the regularity with which the whole goes forward;

And now the priests, Potitius at their head,
In skins of beasts involv'd, the long procession led.
DRYDEN.

The length of the train is what renders it most worthy of notice;

* Vide Girard: "Accompagner, escorter."

My train are men of choice and rarest parts,
That in the most exact regard support
The worship of their names.—SHAKESPEARE.

Train is also applied to other objects besides persons;
The moon, and all the starry train,
Hung the vast vault of heav'n.—GAY.

The number of the retinue in Eastern nations is one criterion by which the wealth of the individual is estimated;

Him and his sleeping slaves, he slew; then spies
Where Remus with his rich retinue lies.—DRYDEN.

MULTITUDE, CROWD, THRONG, SWARM.

The idea of many is common to all these terms, and peculiar to that of multitude, from the Latin multus; crowd, from the verb to crowd, signifies the many that crowd together; throng, from the German drängen to press, signifies the many that press together; and swarm, from the German schwärmen to fly about, signifies running together in numbers.

These terms vary, either in regard to the object, or the circumstance: multitude is applicable to any object; crowd, throng, and swarm are in the proper sense applicable only to animate objects: the first two in regard to persons; the latter to animals in general, but particularly brutes. A multitude may be either in a stagnant or a moving state; all the rest denote a multitude in a moving state;

A multitude is incapable of framing orders.

TEMPLE.

A crowd is always pressing, generally eager and tumultuous;

'The crowd shall Cæsar's Indian war behold.

DRYDEN.

A throng may be busy and active, but not always pressing or incommodious. This term is best adapted to poetry to express a multitude of agreeable objects;

I shone amid the heavenly throng.—MASON.

It is always inconvenient, sometimes dangerous, to go into a crowd; it is amusing to see the throng that is perpetually passing in the streets of the city; the swarm is more active than either of the two others; it is commonly applied to bees which fly together in numbers, but sometimes to human beings, to denote their very great numbers when scattered about; thus the children of the poor in low neighbourhoods swarm in the streets;

Numberless nations, stretching far and wide,
Shall (I foresee it) soon with Gothic swarms come forth,

From ignorance's universal North.—SWIFT.

MEETING, INTERVIEW.

Meeting, from to meet, is the act of meeting or coming into company; interview compounded of inter between, and view to view, is a personal view of each other. The meeting is an ordinary concern, and its purpose familiar; meetings are daily taking place between friends;

I have not joy'd an hour since you departed,
For public miseries and private fears;
But this bless'd meeting has o'erpaid them all.

DRYDEN.

The interview is extraordinary and formal; its object is commonly business; an interview sometimes takes place between princes or commanders of armies;

His fears were, that the interview between England and France might through their amities
Breed him some prejudice.—SHAKESPEARE.

TO FREQUENT, RESORT TO, HAUNT.

Frequent comes from frequent, in Latin frequens crowded, signifying to come in numbers, or come often to the same place; resort, in French resortir, compounded of re and sortir, signifies to go backward and forward; haunt comes from the French hanter, which is of uncertain original.

Frequent is more commonly used for an individual who does often to a place; resort and haunt for a number of individuals. A man is said to frequent a public place; but several persons may resort to a private place: men who are not fond of home frequent taverns; in the first ages of Christianity, while persecution raged, the disciples used to resort to private places for purposes of worship.

Frequent and resort are indifferent actions; but haunt is always used in a bad sense. A man may frequent a theatre, a club, or any other social meeting, innocent or otherwise; 'For my own part I have ever regarded our inns of court as nurseries of statesmen and lawgivers, which makes me often frequent that part of the town.'—BUDGELL. People from different quarters may resort to a fair, a church, or any other place where they wish to meet for a common purpose;

Home is the resort

Of love, of joy, of peace, and plenty, where,
Supporting and supported, polish'd friends
And dear relations mingle into bliss.—THOMSON.

Those who haunt any place go to it in privacy for some bad or selfish purpose;

But harden'd by affronts, and still the same,
Lost to all sense of honour and of fame,
Thou yet canst love to haunt the great man's board,
And think no supper good but with a lord.—LEWIS.

Our Saviour frequented the synagogues: the followers of the prophet Mahomet resort to his tomb at Mecca; thieves haunt the darkest and most retired parts of the city in order to concert their measures for obtaining plunder.

PEOPLE, NATION.

People, in Latin populus, comes from the Greek λαός people, πᾶνθός a multitude, and πᾶλις many. Hence the simple idea of numbers is expressed by the word people; but the term nation, from natus, marks the connexion of numbers by birth: people is, therefore, the generic, and nation the specific term. A nation is a people connected by birth; there cannot, therefore, strictly speaking, be a nation without a people; but there may be a people where there is not a nation.

* The Jews are distinguished as a people or a nation, according to the different aspects under which they are viewed: when considered as an assemblage, under the special direction of the Almighty, they are termed the people of God; but when considered in regard to their common origin, they are denominated the Jewish nation. The Americans, when spoken of in relation to Britain, are a distinct people, because they have each a distinct government; but they are not a distinct nation, because they have a common descent. On this ground the Romans are not called the Roman nation, because their origin was so various, but the Roman people, that is, an assemblage living under one form of government.

In a still closer application people is taken for a part of the state, namely, that part of a state which consists of a multitude, in distinction from its government; whence arises a distinction in the use of the terms; for we may speak of the British people, the French or the Dutch people, when we wish merely to talk of the mass, but we speak of the British nation, the French nation, and the Dutch nation, when public measures are in question, which emanate from the government, or the whole people. The English people have ever been remarkable for their attachment to liberty; 'It is too flagrant a demonstration how much vice is the darling of any people, when many among them are preferred for those practices for which in other places they can scarce be pardoned.'—SOUTH. The abolition of the slave trade is one of the most glorious acts of public justice, which was ever performed by the British nation; 'When we read the history of nations, what do we read but the crimes and follies of men?'—BLAIR. The impetuosity and volatility of the French people render them peculiarly unfit to legislate for themselves; the military exploits of the French nation have rendered them a highly distinguished people in the annals of history. Upon the same ground republican states are distinguished by the name of people; but kingdoms are commonly spoken of in history as nations. Hence we say, the Spartan people,

* Vide Roubaud: "Nation, people."

the Athenian people, the people of Genoa, the people of Venice; but the nations of Europe, the African nations, the English, French, German, and Italian nations.

PEOPLE, POPULACE, MOB, MOBILITY.

People and populace are evidently changes of the same word to express a number. The signification of these terms is that of a number gathered together. People is said of any body supposed to be assembled, as well as really assembled;

The people like a headlong torrent go,
And every dam they break or overflow.

SHAKESPEARE.

Populace is said of a body only, when actually assembled;

The pliant populace,
Those dupes of novelty, will bend before us.

MALLET.

The voice of the people cannot always be disregarded; the populace of England are fond of dragging their favourites in carriages.

Mob and mobility are from the Latin mobilis, signifying moveableness, which is the characteristic of the multitude; hence Virgil's mobile vulgus. These terms, therefore, designate not only what is low, but tumultuous. A mob is at all times an object of terror: the mobility, whether high or low, are a fluttering order that mostly run from bad to worse; 'By the senseless and insignificant clink of misapplied words, some restless demagogues had inflamed the mind of the sottish mobile to a strange, unaccountable abhorrence of the best of men.'—SOUTH.

PEOPLE, PERSONS, FOLKS.

The term people has already been considered in two acceptations (v. People, nation; People, populace), under the general idea of an assembly; but in the present case it is employed to express a small number of individuals: the word people, however, is always considered as one undivided body, and the word person may be distinctly used either in the singular or plural; as we cannot say one, two, three, or four people; but we may say one, two, three, or four persons: yet on the other hand, we may indifferently say, such people or persons; many people or persons; some people or persons, and the like.

With regard to the use of these terms, which is altogether colloquial, people is employed in general propositions; and persons in those which are specific or referring directly to some particular individuals: people are generally of that opinion; some people think so; some people attended;

Performance is even the duller for
His act; and, but in the plainer and simple Kind of the people, the deed is quite out of Use.—SHAKESPEARE.

There were but few persons present at the entertainment; the whole company consisted of six persons; 'You may observe many honest, inoffensive persons strangely run down by an ugly word.'—SOUTH.

As the term people is employed to designate a promiscuous multitude, it has acquired a certain meanness of acceptance which makes it less suitable than the word persons, when people of respectability are referred to: were I to say, of any individuals, I do not know who those people are, it would not be so respectable as to say, I do not know who those persons are: in like manner, one says, from people of that stamp better is not to be expected; persons of their appearance do not frequent such places.

Folks, through the medium of the northern languages, comes from the Latin vulgus, the common people: it is not unusual to say good people, or good folks; and in speaking jocularly to one's friends, the latter term is likewise admissible: but in the serious style it is never employed except in a disrespectful manner: such folks (speaking of gamblers) are often put to sorry shifts; 'I paid some compliments to great folks, who like to be complimented.'—HERRING.

GENTILE, HEATHEN, PAGAN.

* The Jews comprehended all strangers under the name of □ nations or gentiles: among the Greeks and Romans they were designated by the name of barbarians. By the name Gentile was understood especially those who were not of the Jewish religion, including, in the end, even the Christians; for, as Fleury remarks, there were some among these uncircumcised Gentiles, who worshipped the true God, and were permitted to dwell in the holy land, provided they observed the law of nature and abstinence; 'There might be several among the Gentiles in the same condition that Cornelius was before he became a Christian.'—TILLOTSON.

Some learned men pretend that the Gentiles were so named from their having only a natural law, and such as they imposed on themselves, in opposition to the Jews and Christians, who have a positive revealed law to which they are obliged to submit.

Frisch and others derive the word heathen from the Greek ἔθνος, a nation, which derivation is corroborated by the translation in the Anglo-saxon law of the word hæthne by the Greek ἔθνος. Adelung, however, thinks it to be more probably derived from the word heid a field, for the same reason as pagan is derived from pagus a village, because when Constantine banished idolaters from the towns they repaired to the villages, and secretly adhered to their religious worship, whence they were termed by the Christians of the fourth century Pagani, which, as he supposes, was translated literally into the German heidener a villager or worshipper in the field. Be this as it may, it is evident that the word Heathen is in our language more applicable than Pagan, to the Greeks, the Romans, and the cultivated nations who practised idolatry; and, on the other hand, Pagan is more properly employed for any rude and uncivilized people who worship false gods.

The Gentile does not expressly believe in a Divine Revelation; but he either admits of the truth in part, or is ready to receive it: the Heathen adopts a positively false system that is opposed to the true faith: the Pagan is the species of Heathen who obstinately persists in a worship which is merely the fruit of his own imagination. The Heathens or Pagans are Gentiles; but the Gentiles are not all either Heathens or Pagans Confucius and Socrates, who rejected the plurality of gods, and the followers of Mahomet, who adore the true God, are, properly speaking, Gentiles. The worshippers of Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, and all the deities of the ancients, are termed Heathens. The worshippers of Fo, Brama, Xaca, and all the deities of savage nations, are termed Pagans.

The Gentiles were called to the true faith, and obeyed the call: many of the illustrious Heathens would have doubtless done the same, had they enjoyed the same privilege; 'Not that I believe that all the virtues of the Heathens were counterfeited, and destitute of an inward principle of goodness. God forbid we should pass so hard a judgement upon those excellent men, Socrates, and Epictetus, and Antoninus.'—TILLOTSON.

There are many Pagans to this day who reject this advantage, to pursue their own blind imaginations;

And nations laid in blood; dread sacrifice
To Christian pride! which had with horror shock
The darkest Pagans, offered to their gods.—YOUNG

FAMILY, HOUSE, LINEAGE, RACE.

Divisions of men, according to some rule of relationship or connexion, is the common idea in these terms.

Family, from the Latin familia a family, and famulus a servant, in Greek οἶκος an assembly, and the Hebrew עמל to labour, is the most general term, being applicable to those who are bound together upon the principle of dependence; house figuratively denotes those who live in the same house, and is commonly extended in its signification to all that passes under the same roof: hence we rather say that a woman manages her family; that a man rules his house.

The family is considered as to its relationships, the number, union, condition, and quality of its members.

* Vide Roubaud: "Gentils, païens" bers: the house is considered more as to what is transacted within its walls. We speak of a numerous family, a united or affectionate family, a mercantile house; the house (meaning the members of the house of parliament). If a man cannot find happiness in the bosom of his family, he will seek for it in vain elsewhere; 'To live in a family where there is but one heart and as many good strong heads as persons, and to have a place in that enlarged single heart, is such a state of happiness as I cannot hear of without feeling the utmost pleasure.'—FIELDING. The credit of a house is to be kept up only by prompt payments; or, in a general sense of the term, the business of the house is performed by the domesticks; 'They two together rule the house. The house I call here the man, the woman, their children, their servants.'—SMITH.

In an extended application of these words they are made to designate the quality of the individual, in which case family bears the same familiar and indiscriminate sense as before: house is employed as a term of grandeur.

* When we consider the family in its domestick relations; in its habits, manners, connexions, and circumstances; we speak of a genteel family, a respectable family, the royal family; 'An empty man of a great family is a creature that is scarce conversible.'—ADDISON. When we consider the family with regard to its political and civil distinctions, its titles, and its power, then we denominate it a house, as an illustrious house; the house of Bourbon, of Brunswick, or of Hanover; the imperial house of Austria. Any subject may belong to an ancient or noble family. Princes are said to be descended from ancient houses; 'The princes of the house of Tudor, partly by the vigour of their administration, partly by the concurrence of favourable circumstances, had been able to establish a more regular system of government.'—HUME. A man is said to be of a family or of no family: we may say likewise that he is of a certain house; but to say that he is of no house would be superfluous.† In republics there are families but not houses, because there is no nobility; in China likewise, where the private virtues only distinguish the individual or his family, the term house is altogether inapplicable.

Family includes in it every circumstance of connexion and relationship; lineage respects only consanguinity: family is employed mostly for those who are coeval; lineage is generally used for those who have gone before. When the Athenian general Iphicrates, son of a shoemaker, was reproached by Hermodius with his birth, he said, I had rather be the first than the last of my family. David was of the lineage of Abraham, and our Saviour was of the lineage of David;

We want not cities, nor Sicilian coasts,
Where king Acestes Trojan lineage boasts.
DRYDEN.

Race, from the Latin radix a root, denotes the origin or that which constitutes their original point of resemblance. A family supposes the closest alliance; a race supposes no closer connexion than what a common property creates. Family is confined to a comparatively small number; 'A nation properly signifies a great number of families derived from the same blood, born in the same country, and living under the same government and civil constitutions.'—TEMPLE. Race is a term of extensive import, including all mankind, as the human race; or particular nations, as the race of South Sea islanders; or a particular family, as the race of the Heracides: from Hercules sprung a race of heroes;

Nor knows our youth of noblest race,
To mount the manag'd steed or urge the chase;
More skill'd in the mean arts of vice,
The whirling troque or law-forbidden dice.
FRANCIS.

NATAL, NATIVE, INDIGENOUS.

Natal, in Latin natalis, from natus, signifies belonging to one's birth, or the act of one's being born; but native, in Latin nativus, likewise from natus, signifies having the origin or beginning; indigenous, in Latin indigena, from inde and genitus, signifies sprung from a particular place.

The epithet natal is applied only to the circumstance of a man's birth, as his natal day; his natal hour a natal song; a natal star;

Safe in the hand of one disposing pow'r,
Or in the natal or the mortal hour.—POPE.

Native has a more extensive meaning, as it comprehends the idea of one's relationship by origin to an object; as one's native country, one's native soil, native village, or native place, native language, and the like;

Nor can the grov'ling mind
In the dark dungeon of the limbs confin'd,
Assert the native skies or own its heav'nly kind.
DRYDEN.

Indigenous is the same with regard to plants, as native in regard to human beings or animals; but it is sometimes applied to people when taken in a collective sense, 'Negroes were all transported from Africa, and are not indigenous or proper natives of America'

NATIVE, NATURAL.

Native (v. Natal) is to natural as a species to the genus: every thing native is according to its strict signification natural; but many things are natural which are not native. Of a person we may say that his worth is native, to designate that it is some valuable property which is born with him, not foreign to him, or ingrafted upon his character: but we say of his disposition, that it is natural, as opposed to that which is acquired by habit. Native is always employed in a good sense, in opposition to what is artful, assumed, and unreal; 'In heaven we shall pass from the darkness of our native ignorance into the broad light of everlasting day.'—SOUTH. Natural is used in an indifferent sense, as opposed to whatever is the effect of habit or circumstances; 'Scripture ought to be understood according to the familiar, natural way of construction.'—SOUTH. When children display themselves with all their native simplicity, they are interesting objects of notice: when they display their natural turn of mind, it is not always that which tends to raise human nature in our esteem.

RELATION, RELATIVE, KINSMAN, KINDRED.

Relation is here taken to express the person related, and is the general term both in sense and application; relative is employed only as respects the particular individual to whom one is related; kinsman designates the particular kind of relation; and kindred is a collective term to comprehend all one's relations, or those who are akin to one. In abstract propositions we speak of relations; a man who is without relations feels himself an outcast in society; 'You are not to imagine that I think myself discharged from the duties of gratitude, only because my relations do not adjust their looks to my expectations.'—JOHNSON. In designating one's close and intimate connexion with person we use the term relative; our near and dear relatives are the first objects of our regard; 'It is an evil undutifulness in friends and relatives, to suffer one to perish without reproof.'—TAYLOR. In designating one's relationship and connexion with persons, kinsman is preferable; when a man has not any children he frequently adopts one of his kinsmen as his heir: when the ties of relationship are to be specified in the persons of any particular family, they are denominated kindred; a man cannot abstract himself from his kindred while he retains any spark of human feeling; 'Herod put all to death whom he found in Trechortius of the families and kindred of any of those at Repta'—PRIDEAUX

KIND, SPECIES, SORT.

Kind comes most probably from the Teutonic kind a child, signifying related, or of the same family; species, in Latin species, from specio to behold, signifies literally the form or appearance, and in an extended sense that which comes under a particular form; sort, in Latin sors a lot, signifies that which constitutes particular lot or parcel.

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Famille, maison."

† Abbe Roubaud: "Race lineage, famille, maison."

Kind and species are both employed in their proper sense; sort has been diverted from its original meaning by colloquial use; kind is properly employed for animate objects, particularly for mankind, and improperly for moral objects; species is a term used by philosophers, classing things according to their external or internal properties. Kind, as a term in vulgar use, has a less definite meaning than species, which serves to form the groundwork of science: we discriminate things in a loose or general manner by saying that they are of the animal or vegetable kind, of the canine or feline kind; but we discriminate them precisely if we say that they are a species of the arbutus, of the pomegranate, of the dog, the horse, and the like. By the same rule we may speak of a species of madness, a species of fever, and the like; 'If the French should succeed in what they propose, and establish a democracy in a country circumstanced like France, they will establish a very bad government, a very bad species of tyranny.'—BURKE. Because diseases have been brought under a systematic arrangement: but, on the other hand, we should speak of a kind of language, a kind of feeling, a kind of influence; and in similar cases where a general resemblance is to be expressed; 'An ungrateful person is a kind of thoroughfare or common shore for the good things of the world to pass into.'—SOUTH.

Sort may be used for either kind or species; it does not necessarily imply any affinity, or common property in the objects, but simple assemblage, produced as it were by sorts, chance: hence we speak of such sort of folks or people; such sort of practices; different sorts of grain; the various sorts of merchandises: and in similar cases where things are sorted or brought together, rather at the option of the person, than according to the nature of the thing; 'The French made and recorded a sort of institute and digest of anarchy, called the rights of man.'—BURKE.

KINDRED, RELATIONSHIP, AFFINITY, CONSANGUINITY.

The idea of a state in which persons are placed with regard to each other is common to all these terms, which differ principally in the nature of this state. Kindred signifies that of being of the same kind (v. Kind); relationship signifies that of holding a nearer relation than others (v. To connect); affinity (v. Alliance) signifies that of being affined or coming close to each other's boundaries; consanguinity, from sanguis the blood, signifies that of having the same blood.

The kindred is the most general state here expressed: It may embrace all mankind, or refer to particular families or communities; it depends upon possessing the common property of humanity, or of being united by some family tie;

Like her, of equal kindred to the throne,
You keep her conquests, and extend your own
DRYDEN.

The philanthropist claims kindred with all who are unfortunate, when it is in his power to relieve them. The term kindred is likewise distinguished from the rest, as it expresses not only a state, but the persons collectively who are in that state; 'Though separated from my kindred by little more than half a century of miles, I know as little of their concerns as if oceans and continents were between us.'—COWPER.

Relationship is a state less general than kindred, but more extended than either affinity or consanguinity; it applies to particular families only, but it applies to all of the same family, whether remotely or distantly related; 'Herein there is no objection to the succession of a relation of the half blood, that is, where the relationship proceeds not from the same couple of ancestors (which constitutes a kinsman of the whole blood), but from a single ancestor only.'—BLACKSTONE. The term relationship is likewise extended to other subjects besides that of families. Men stand in different relations to each other in society; 'The only general private relation now remaining to be discussed is that of guardian and ward.—In examining this species of relationship I shall first consider the different kind of guardians.'—BLACKSTONE.

Affinity denotes a close relationship, whether of an artificial or a natural kind. there is an affinity between the husband and the wife in consequence of the marriage tie; and there is an affinity between those who descend from the same parents or relations in a direct line. Consanguinity is, strictly speaking, this latter species of descent; and the term is mostly employed in all questions of law respecting descent and inheritance; 'Consanguinity or relation by blood, and affinity or relation by marriage, are canonical disabilities (to contract a marriage).—BLACKSTONE.

RACE, GENERATION, BREED.

Race, v. Family; generation, in Latin generatio from genero, and the Greek γεννάω, to engender or beget, signifies the thing begotten; breed signifies that which is bred (v. To breed).

These terms are all employed in regard to a number of animate objects which have the same origin; the former is said only of human beings, the latter only of brutes: the term is employed in regard to the dead as well as the living; generation is employed only in regard to the living: hence we speak of the race of the Heraclidae, the race of the Bourbons, the race of the Stuarts, and the like; but the present generation, the whole generation, a worthless generation, and the like; 'Where racés are thus numerous and thus combined, none but the chief of a clan is thus addressed by his name.'—JOHNSON.

Like leaves on trees the race of man is found,
Now green in youth, now with'ring on the ground,
So generations in their course decay,
So flourish these when those are pass'd away.

POPE.

Breed is said of those animals which are brought forth, and brought up in the same manner. Hence we denominate some domestick animals as of a good breed, where particular care is taken not only as to the animals from which they come, but also of those which are brought forth;

Nor last forget thy faithful dogs, but feed
With fat'n'ing whey the mastiff's gen'rous breed
DRYDEN

TO BREED, ENGENDER.

Breed, in Saxon breetan, is probably connected with braten to roast, being an operation principally performed by fire or heat; engender, compounded of en and gender, from genitus participle of gigno, signifies to lay or communicate the seeds for production.

These terms are figuratively employed for the act of procreation.

To breed is to bring into existence by a slow operation: to engender is to be the author or prime cause of existence. So, in the metaphorical sense, frequent quarrels are apt to breed hatred and animosity: the levelling and inconsistent conduct of the higher classes in the present age serves to engender a spirit of insubordination and assumption in the inferior order.

Whatever breeds acts gradually; whatever engenders produces immediately, as cause and effect. 'Un cleanliness breeds diseases of the body; want of occupation breeds those of the mind; 'The strong desire of fame breeds several vicious habits in the mind.'—ADDISON. Playing at chance games engenders a love of money; 'Eve's dream is full of those high conceits engendering pride, which, we are told, the Devil en- deavoured to instil into her.'—ADDISON.

LAND, COUNTRY.

Land, in German land, &c. from lean and line, signifies an open, even space, and refers strictly to the earth; country, in French contrée, from con and terra, signifies lands adjoining so as to form one portion. The term land, therefore, properly excludes the idea of habitation; the term country excludes that of the earth, or the parts of which it is composed. hence we speak of the land, as rich or poor, according to what it yields; of a country, as rich or poor, according to what its inhabitants possess: so, in like manner, we say, the land is ploughed or prepared for receiving the grain; but the country is cultivated; the country is under a good government; or, a man's country is dear to him. In an extended application, however, these words may be put for one another: the word land may sometimes be put for any portion of land that is under a government, as the land of liberty; 'You are still in the land of the living, and have all the means that can be desired, whereby to prevent your falling into condemnation.'—BEVERIDGE. Country may be put for the soil, as a rich country; 'We love our country as the seat of religion, liberty, and laws.'—BLAIR.

NEIGHBOURHOOD, VICINITY.

Neighbourhood, from nigh, signifies the place which is nigh, that is, nigh to one's habitation; vicinity, from vicus a village, signifies the place which does not exceed in distance the extent of a village.

Neighbourhood, which is of Saxon origin, and first admitted into our language, is employed in reference to the inhabitants, or in regard to inhabited places; that is, it signifies either a community of neighbours, or the place they occupy: but vicinity, which in Latin bears the same acceptation as neighbourhood, is employed in English for the place in general, that is, near to the person speaking, whether inhabited or otherwise: hence the propriety of saying, a populous neighbourhood, a quiet neighbourhood, a respectable neighbourhood, and a pleasant neighbourhood, either as it respects the people or the country; to live in the vicinity of a manufactory, to be in the vicinity of the metropolis or of the sea; 'Though the soul be not actually debauched, yet it is something to be in the neighbourhood of destruction.'—SOUTH. 'The Dutch, by the vicinity of their settlements to the coast of Caraccas, gradually engrossed the greatest part of the cocoa trade.'—ROBERTSON.

DISTRICT, REGION, TRACT, QUARTER.

District, in Latin districtus, from distringo to bind separately, signifies a certain part marked off specifically; region, in Latin regio from rego to rule, signifies a portion that is within rule; tract, in Latin tractus, from traho to draw, signifies a part drawn out; quarter signifies literally a fourth part.

These terms are all applied to country: the former two comprehending divisions marked out on political grounds; the latter a geographical or an indefinite division: district is smaller than a region; the former refers only to part of a country, the latter frequently applies to a whole country: a quarter is indefinite, and may be applied either to a quarter of the world or a particular neighbourhood: a tract is the smallest portion of all, and comprehends frequently no more than what may fall within the compass of the eye. We consider a district only with relation to government; every magistrate acts within a certain district; 'The very inequality of representation, which is so foolishly complained of, is perhaps the very thing which prevents us from thinking or acting as members for districts.'—BURKE. We speak of a region when considering the circumstances of climate, or the natural properties which distinguish different parts of the earth, as the regions of heat and cold;

Between those regions and our upper light
Deep forests and impenetrable night
Possess the middle space.—DRYDEN.

We speak of a tract to designate the land that runs on in a line, as a mountainous tract; so likewise figuratively to pursue a tract or a line of thinking;

My timorous muse
Unambitious tracts pursues.—COWLEY.

We speak of the quarter simply to designate a point of the compass; as a person lives in a certain quarter of the town that is north, or south-east, or west, &c. and so also in an extended application, we say, to meet with opposition in an unexpected quarter; 'There is no man in any rank who is always at liberty to act as he would incline. In some quarter or other he is limited by circumstances.'—BLAIR.

TO FOUND, GROUND, REST, BUILD.

Found, in French fonder, Latin fundo, comes from fundus the ground, and, like the verb ground, properly signifies to make firm in the ground, to make the ground the support.

To found implies the exercise of art and contrivance in making a support; to ground signifies to lay a thing so deep that it may not totter; it is merely in the moral sense that they are here considered, as the verb to ground with this signification is never used otherwise. Found is applied to outward circumstances; ground to what passes inwardly: a man *found*s his charge against another upon certain facts that are come to his knowledge; he grounds his belief upon the most substantial evidence: a man should be cautious not to make any accusations which are not well grounded; nor to indulge any expectations which are not well grounded: monarchs commonly found their claims to a throne upon the right of primogeniture; 'The only sure principles we can lay down for regulating our conduct must be grounded on the Christian religion.'—BLAIR. Christians ground their hopes of immortality on the word of God; 'I know there are persons who look upon these wonders of art (in ancient history) as fabulous; but I cannot find any ground for such a suspicion.'—ADDISON.

To found and ground are said of things which demand the full exercise of the mental powers; to rest is an action of less importance: whatever is *found*ed requires and has the utmost support; whatever is *rest*ed is more by the will of the individual: a man *found*s his reasoning upon some unequivocal fact; he *rest*s his assertion upon mere hearsay; 'Our distinction must rest upon a steady adherence to rational religion, when the multitude are deviating into licentious and criminal conduct.'—BLAIR. The words found, ground, and rest have always an immediate reference to the thing that supports; to build has an especial reference to that which is supported, to the superstructure that is raised: we should not say that a person *found*s an hypothesis, without adding something, as observations, experiments, and the like, upon which it was *found*ed; but we may speak of his simply building systems, supposing them to be the mere fruit of his disordered imagination; or we may say that a system of astronomy has been built upon the discovery of Copernicus respecting the motion of the earth; 'They who from a mistaken zeal for the honour of Divine revelation, either deny the existence, or vilify the authority, of natural religion, are not aware, that by disallowing the sense of obligation, they undermine the foundation on which revelation *build*s its power of commanding the heart.'—BLAIR.

FOUNDATION, GROUND, BASIS.

Foundation and ground derive their meaning and application from the preceding article: a report is said to be without any foundation, which has taken its rise in mere conjecture, or in some arbitrary cause independent of all fact; 'If the foundation of a high name be virtue and service, all that is offered against it is but rumour, which is too short-lived to stand up in competition with glory, which is everlasting.'—STEELE. A man's suspicion is said to be without ground, which is not supported by the shadow of external evidence: unfounded clamours are frequently raised against the measures of government; groundless jealousies frequently arise between families, to disturb the harmony of their intercourse; 'Every subject of the British government has good grounds for loving and respecting his country.'—BLAIR.

Foundation and basis may be compared with each other, either in the proper or the improper signification: both foundation and basis are the lowest parts of any structure; but the former lies under ground, the latter stands above: the foundation supports some large and artificially erected pile; the basis supports a simple pillar: hence we speak of the foundation of St. Paul's, and the base or basis of the monument: this distinction is likewise preserved in the moral application of the terms: disputes have too often their foundation in frivolous circumstances; treaties have commonly their basis in acknowledged general principle; with governments that are at war pacific negotiations may be commenced on the basis of the uti possidetis; 'It is certain that the basis of all lasting reputation is laid in moral worth.'—BLAIR.

TO BUILD, ERECT, CONSTRUCT

Build, in Saxon byltian, French batir, German bauen, Gothic boa, bua, byggja, to erect houses, from the Hebrew בָּנָה a habitation; erect, in French eriger,

Latin erecta, participle of erigo, compounded of e and rego, comes from the Greek ἀρέχω to stretch or extend, signifies literally to carry upward; construct, in Latin constructus, participle of construo, compounded of con together, and struo to put, in Greek σπάρνυμι to strow, in Hebrew רָבַץ to dispose or put in order, signifies to form together into a mass.

The word build by distinction expresses the purpose of the action; erect indicates the mode of the action; construct indicates contrivance in the action.

What is built is employed for the purpose of receiving, retaining, or confining; what is erected is placed in an elevated situation; what is constructed is put together with ingenuity.

All that is built may be said to be erected or constructed; but all that is erected or constructed is not said to be built; likewise what is erected is mostly constructed, though not vice versa. We build from necessity; we erect for ornament; we construct for utility and convenience. Houses are built, monuments erected, machines are constructed; 'Montesquieu wittily observes, that by building professed madhouses, men tacitly insinuate that all who are out of their senses are to be found only in those places.'—WARTON. 'It is as rational to live in caves till our own hands have erected a palace, as to reject all knowledge of architecture which our understandings will not supply.'—JOHNSON. 'From the raft or canoe, which first served to carry a savage over the river, to the construction of a vessel capable of conveying a numerous crew with safety to a distant coast, the progress in improvement is immense.'—ROBERTSON.

ARCHITECT, BUILDER.

Architect, from architecture, in Latin architectus, from architectura, Greek ἀρχιτεκτονική, compounded of ἀρχός the chief, and τεχνη art or contrivance, signifies the chief of contrivers; builder, from the verb to build, denotes the person concerned in buildings, who causes the structure of houses, either by his money or his personal service.

An architect is an artist employed only to form the plans for large buildings; 'Rome will bear witness that the English artists are as superior in talents as they are in numbers to those of all nations besides. I reserve the mention of her architects as a separate class.'—CUMBERLAND. A builder is a simple tradesman, or even workman, who builds common dwelling-houses; 'With his ready money, the builder, mason, and carpenter are enabled to make their market of gentlemen in his neighbourhood who inconsiderately employ them.'—STEELE.

EDIFICE, STRUCTURE, FABRICK.

Edifice, in Latin ædificium, from ædifico or ædes and acio, to make a house, signifies properly the house made; structure, from the Latin structura and struo to raise, signifies the raising a thing, or the thing raised; fabrick, from the Latin fabrico, signifies the 'fabricating or the thing fabricated.

Edifice in its proper sense is always applied to a building; structure and fabrick are either employed as abstract actions, or the results and fruits of actions: in the former case they are applied to many objects besides buildings; structure referring to the act of raising or setting up together; fabrick to that of framing or contriving.

As the edifice bespeaks the thing itself, it requires no modification, since it conveys of itself the idea of something superior; 'The levellers only pervert the natural order of things; they load the edifice of society, by setting up in the air what the solidity of the structure requires to be on the ground.'—BURKE. The word structure must always be qualified; it is employed only to designate the mode of action; 'In the whole structure and constitution of things, God hath shown himself to be favourable to virtue, and inimical to vice and guilt.'—BLAIR. The fabrick is itself a species of epithet; it designates the object as something contrived by the power of art or by design;

By destiny compell'd, and in despair,
The Greeks grew weary of the tedious war,
And, by Minerva's aid, a fabrick rear'd.

DRYDEN.

The edifices dedicated to the service of religion have in all ages been held sacred: it is the business of the architect to estimate the merits or demerits of the structure: when we take a survey of the vast fabrick of the universe, the mind becomes bewildered with contemplating the infinite power of its Divine Author.

When employed in the abstract sense of actions, structure is limited to objects of magnitude, or such as consist of complicated parts; fabrick is extended to every thing in which art or contrivance is requisite; hence we may speak of the structure of vessels, and the fabrick of cloth, iron ware, and the like.

CORNER, ANGLE.

Corner answers to the French coin, and Greek γωνία, which signifies either a corner or a hidden place; angle, in Latin angulus, comes in all probability from ἄγκυον the elbow.

The vulgar use of corner in the ordinary concerns of life, and the technical use of angle in the science of mathematicks, is not the only distinction between these terms.

Corner properly implies the outer extreme point of any solid body; angle, on the contrary, the inner extremity produced by the meeting of two right lines. When speaking therefore of solid bodies, corner and angle may be both employed; but in regard to simple right lines, the word angle only is applicable: in the former case a corner is produced by the meeting of the different parts of a body whether inwardly or outwardly; but an angle is produced by the meeting of two bodies: one house has many corners; two houses or two walls, at least, are requisite to make an angle; 'Jewellers grind their diamonds with many sides and angles, that their lustre may appear many ways.'—DERHAM.

We likewise speak of making an angle by the direction that is taken in going either by land or sea, because such a course is equivalent to a right line; in that case the word corner could not be substituted: on the other hand, the word corner is often used for a place of secrecy or obscurity, agreeably to the derivation of the term; 'Some men, like pictures, are fitter for a corner than for a full light.'—POPE.

PILLAR, COLUMN.

Pillar, in French pilier, in all probability comes from pile, signifying any thing piled up in an artificial manner. Column, in Latin columna, comes from columna a prop or support. In their original meaning, therefore, it is obvious that these words differ essentially, although in their present use they refer to the same object. The pillar mostly serves as a column or support, and the column is always a pillar; but sometimes a pillar does not serve as a prop, and then it is called by its own name; but when it supplies the place of a prop, then it is more properly denominated a column;

Whate'er adorns

The princely dome, the column, and the arch,
The breathing marbles, and the sculptur'd gold,
Beyond the proud possessor's narrow claim,
His tuneful breast enjoys.—AKENSIDE.

Hence the monument is a pillar, and not a column; but the pillars on which the roofs of churches are made to rest, may with more propriety be termed columns. Pillar is more frequently employed in a moral application than column, and in that case it always implies a prop; 'Withdraw religion, and you shake all the pillars of morality.'—BLAIR. Government is the pillar on which all social order rests.

LODGINGS, APARTMENTS.

A lodging, or a place to lodge or dwell in, comprehends single rooms, or many rooms, or in fact any place which can be made to serve the purpose; apartments respect only suits of rooms: apartments, therefore, are, in the strict sense, lodgings; but all lodgings are not apartments: on the other hand, the word lodgings is mostly used for rooms that are let out to hire, or that serve a temporary purpose; but the word apartments may be applied to the suits of rooms in any large house: hence the word lodging becomes op one ground restricted in its use, and apartments on the other: all apartments to let out for hire are lodgings, but apartments not to let out for hire are not lodgings.

MONUMENT, MEMORIAL, REMEMBRANCER.

Monument, in Latin monumentum or monimentum, from monere to advise or remind, signifies that which puts us in mind of something; memorial, from memory, signifies the thing that helps the memory; and remembrancer, from remember (v. Memory), the thing that causes to remember.

From the above it is clear that these terms have, in their original derivation, precisely the same signification, and differ only in their collateral acceptations: monument is applied to that which is purposely set up to keep a thing in mind; memorials and remembrancers are any things which are calculated to call a thing to mind. a monument is used to preserve a publick object of notice from being forgotten; a memorial serves to keep an individual in mind: the monument is commonly understood to be a species of building; as a tomb which preserves the memory of the dead, or a pillar which preserves the memory of some publick event: the memorial always consists of something which was the property, or in the possession, of another; as his picture, his handwriting, his hair, and the like. The Monument at London was built to commemorate the dreadful fire of the city in the year 1666: friends who are at a distance are happy to have some token of each other's regard, which they likewise keep as a memorial of their former intercourse.

The monument, in its proper sense, is always made of wood or stone for some specific purpose; but, in the improper sense, any thing may be termed a monument when it serves the purpose of reminding the publick of any circumstance: thus, the pyramids are monuments of antiquity; the actions of a good prince are more lasting monuments than either brass or marble; 'If (in the Isle of Sky) the remembrance of papal superstition is obliterated, the monuments of papal piety are likewise effaced.'—JOHNSON.

Memorials are always of a private nature, and at the same time such as remind us naturally of the object to which they have belonged; this object is generally some person, but it may likewise refer to some thing, if it be of a personal nature: our Saviour instituted the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper as a memorial of his death; 'Any memorial of your good-nature and friendship is most welcome to me.'—POPE.

A memorial respects some object external of ourselves; the remembrancer is said of that which directly concerns ourselves and our particular duty; a man leaves memorials of himself to whomsoever he leaves his property; but the remembrancer is that which we acquire for ourselves: the memorial carries us back to another; the remembrancer brings us back to ourselves: the memorial revives in our minds what we owe to another; the remembrancer puts us in mind of what we owe to ourselves; it is that which recalls us to a sense of our duty: a gift is the best memorial we can give of ourselves to another: a sermon is often a good remembrancer of the duties which we have neglected to perform; 'When God is forgotten, his judgements are his remembrancers.'—COWPER.

GRAVE, TOMB, SEPULCHRE.

All these terms denote the place where bodies are deposited. Grave, from the German graben to dig, has a reference to the hollow made in the earth; tomb, from tumulus and tumeo to swell, has a reference to the rising that is made above it; sepulchre, from sepelio to bury, has a reference to the use for which it is employed. From this explanation it is evident, that these terms have a certain propriety of application; 'to sink into the grave' is an expression that carries the thoughts where the body must rest in death;

The path of glory leads but to the grave.—GRAY.

To inscribe on the tomb, or to encircle the tomb with flowers, carries our thoughts to the external of that place in which the body is interred;

Nor you, ye proud, impute to these the fault,

If mem'ry o'er their tombs no trophies raise.—GRAY.

To inter in a sepulchre, or to visit or enter a sepulchre, reminds us of a place in which bodies are deposited;

'The Lay itself is either lost or buried, perhaps for ever, in one of those sepulchres of MSS. which by courtesy are called libraries.'—TYRWHITT

TO ADORN, DECORATE, EMBELLISH.

Adorn, in Latin adorno, is compounded of the intensive syllable ad and orno, in Greek ὀπάω to make beautiful, signifying to dispose for the purpose of ornament; decorate, in Latin decoratus, participle of decoro, from decorus becoming, signifies to make becoming, embellish, in French embellir, is compounded of the intensive syllable em or in and bellir or bel, in Latin bellus handsome, signifying to make handsome.

One adorns by giving the best external appearance to a thing:

As vines the trees, as grapes the vines adorn.

DRYDEN.

One decorates by annexing something to improve its appearance; 'A few years afterward (1751), by the death of his father, Lord Lyttleton inherited a baronet's title, with a large estate, which, though perhaps he did not augment, he was careful to adorn by a house of great elegance, and by much attention to the decoration of his park.'—JOHNSON. One embellishes by giving a finishing stroke to a thing that is well executed; 'I shall here present my reader with a letter from a projector, concerning a new office which he thinks may very much contribute to the embellishment of the city.'

—ADDISON. Females adorn their persons by the choice and disposal of their dress: a headdress is decorated with flowers, or a room with paintings: fine writing is embellished by suitable flourishes.

Adorn and embellish are figuratively employed; decorate only in the proper sense. The mind is adorned by particular virtues which are implanted in it; a narrative is embellished by the introduction of some striking incidents.

OBLONG, OVAL.

Oblong, in Latin oblongus, from the intensive syllable ob, signifies very long, longer than it is broad; oval from the Latin ovum an egg, signifies egg-shaped.

The oval is a species of the oblong: what is oval is oblong; but what is oblong is not always oval. Oblong is peculiarly applied to figures formed by right lines, that is, all rectangular parallelograms, except squares, are oblong; but the oval is applied to curvilinear oblong figures, as ellipses, which are distinguished from the circle: tables are oftener oblong than oval; garden beds are as frequently oval as they are oblong.

GLOBE, BALL.

Globe, in Latin globus, comes probably from the Greek γῆλοφος a hillock of earth; ball, in Teutonic ball, is doubtless connected with the words bowl, bow, bend, and the like, signifying that which is turned or rounded.

Globe is to ball as the species to the genus; a globe is a ball, but every ball is not a globe. The globe does not in its strict sense require to be of an equal roundness in all its parts; it is properly an irregularly round body; 'It is said by modern philosophers, that not only the great globes of matter are thinly scattered through the universe, but the hardest bodies are so porous, that if all matter were compressed to perfect solidity, it might be contained in a cube of a few feet.'—JOHNSON. A ball on the other hand is generally any round body, but particularly one that is entirely regularly round: the earth itself is therefore properly denominated a globe, from its unequal roundness; and for the same reason the mechanical body which is made to represent the earth is also denominated a globe; but in the higher style of writing the earth is frequently denominated a ball, and in familiar discourse every solid body which assumes a circular form is entitled a ball:

What though in solemn silence all

Move round the dark terraqueous ball,

In reason's ear they all rejoice,

And utter forth a glorious voice.—ADDISON.

TO EMIT, EXHALE, EVAPORATE

Emit, from the Latin emitto, expresses properly the act of sending out. exhale, from halitus the breath, and evaporate, from vapor vapour or steam, are both modes of emitting.

Emit is used to express a more positive effort to send out; exhale and evaporate designate the natural and progressive process of things: volcanoes emit fire and flames;

Full in the blazing sun great Hector shin'd
Like Mars commission'd to confound mankind;
His nodding helm emits a streamy ray,
His piercing eyes through all the battle stray.—POPE.

The earth exhales the damps, or flowers exhale perfumes;

Here paus'd a moment, while the gentle gale
Convey'd that freshness the cool seas exhale.
POPE.

Liquids evaporate; 'After allowing the first fumes and heat of their zeal to evaporate, she (Elizabeth) called into her presence a certain number of each house.'—ROBERTSON.

Animals may emit by an act of volition; things exhale or evaporate by an external action upon them: they exhale that which is foreign to them; they evaporate that which constitutes a part of their substance.

The pole-cat is reported to emit such a stench from itself when pursued, as to keep its pursuers at a distance from itself: bogs and fens exhale their moisture when acted upon by the heat: water evaporates by means of steam when put into a state of ebullition.

ERUPTION, EXPLOSION.

The eruption, from e and rumpo, signifies the breaking forth, that is, the coming into view by a sudden bursting; explosion, from ex and plaudo, signifies bursting out with a noise: hence of flames there will be properly an eruption, but of gunpowder an explosion; volcanoes have their eruptions at certain intervals; which are sometimes attended with explosions: on this account the term eruption is applied to the human body, for whatever comes out as the effects of humour, and may be applied in the same manner to any indications of humour in the mind; the term explosion is also applied to the agitations of the mind which burst out; 'Sin may truly reign where it does not actually rage and pour itself forth in continual eruptions.'—SOUTH. 'A burst of fury, an exclamation seconded by a blow, is the first natural explosion of a soul so stung by scorpions as Macbeth's.'—CUMBERLAND.

BREACH, BREAK, GAP, CHASM.

Breach and break are both derived from the same verb break (v. To break), to denote what arises from being broken, in the figurative sense of the verb itself; gap, from the English gape, signifies the thing that gapes or stands open; chasm, in Greek χάσμα from χαίω, and the Hebrew חלל to be open, signifies the thing that has opened itself.

The idea of an opening is common to these terms, but they differ in the nature of the opening. A breach and a gap are the consequence of a violent removal which destroys the connexion; a break and a chasm may arise from the absence of that which would form a connexion. A breach in a wall is made by means of cannon;

A mighty breach is made; the rooms conceal'd
Appear, and all the palace is reveal'd.—DRYDEN.

Gaps in fences are commonly the effects of some violent effort to pass through;

Or if the order of the world below
Will not the gap of one whole day allow,
Give me that minute when she made her way.
DRYDEN.

A break is made in a page of printing by leaving off in the middle of a line; 'Considering probably, how much Homer had been disfigured by the arbitrary compilers of his works. Virgil, by his will, obliged Tucca and Varius to add nothing, nor so much as fill up the breaks he had left in his poem.'—WALSH. A chasm is left in writing when any words in the sentence are omitted;

'The whole chasm in nature, from a plant to a man, is filled up with diverse kinds of creatures.'—ADDISON.

A breach and a chasm always imply a larger opening than a break or gap. A gap may be made in a knife; a breach is always made in the walls of a building or fortification: the clouds sometimes separate so as to leave small breaks; the ground is sometimes so convulsed by earthquakes as to leave frightful chasms.

Breach and chasm are used morally; break and gap seldom otherwise than in application to natural objects. Trifling circumstances occasion wide breaches in families;

When breach of faith join'd hearts does disengage,
The calmest temper turns to wildest rage.—LEE.

The death of relatives often produces a sad chasm in the enjoyments of individuals;

Some lazy ages, lost in ease,
No action leave to busy chronicles;
Such, whose supine felicity but makes
In story chasms, in epochs mistakes.—DRYDEN

TO BREAK, RACK, REND, TEAR.

Break, in Saxon brecan, Danish and Low German breken, High German brechen, Latin frango, Greek σπῆννυμι, σπῆννω, Chaldee פִּרַק to separate; rack comes from the same source as break; it is properly the root of this word, and an onomatopœia, conveying a sound correspondent with what is made by breaking; rak in Swedish, and racco in Icelandic, signifies a breaking of the ice; rend is in Saxon brendan, brendan, Low German ritan, High German reissen to split, Greek ρίσσω, Hebrew רָעַע to break in pieces; tear, in Saxon taeran, Low German tiren, High German zerren, is an intensive verb from ziehen to pull, Greek τῆνω, τῆνω to bruise, Hebrew תָּוַר to split, divide, or cleave.

The forcible division of any substance is the common characteristic of these terms.

Break is the generic term, the rest specific: every thing racked, rent, or torn is broken, but not vice versa. Break has however a specific meaning, in which it is comparable with the others. Breaking requires less violence than either of the others: brittle things may be broken with the slightest touch, but nothing can be racked without intentional violence of an extraordinary kind. Glass is quickly broken; a table is racked. Hard substances only are broken or racked; but every thing of a soft texture and composition may be rent or torn.

Breaking is performed by means of a blow; racking by that of a violent concussion; but rending and tearing are the consequences of a pull. Any thing of wood or stone is broken; any thing of a complicated structure, with hinges and joints, is racked; cloth is rent, paper is torn. Rend is sometimes used for what is done by design; a tear is always faulty. Cloth is sometimes rent rather than cut when it is wanted to be divided; but when it is torn it is injured. These terms are similarly distinguished in their figurative application;

But out affection!

All bond and privilege of nature break.

SHAKESPEARE

Long has this secret struggl'd in my breast;

Long has it rack'd and rent my tortur'd bosom.

SMITH

The people rend the skies with loud applause,

And heaven can hear no other name but yours.

DRYDEN.

She sigh'd, she sobb'd, and, furious with despair,

She rent her garments, and she tore her hair.

DRYDEN.

Who would not bleed with transport for his country

Tear every tender passion from his heart?

THOMSON.

TO BREAK, BRUISE, SQUEEZE, POUND, CRUSH.

Break, v. To break, rack; bruise, in French briser Saxon brysed, not improbably from the same source as press; squeeze, in Saxon cwygn, Low German quetsen, quoesen, Swedish quasa, Latin quatio to shake, or produce a concussion; pound, in Saxon punian, is not improbably derived by a change of letters from the Latin lando to bruise; crush, in French écraser, is most probably only a variation of the word squeeze, like crash, or squash.

Break always implies the separation of the component parts of a body; bruise denotes simply the destroying the continuity of the parts. Hard, brittle substances, as glass, are broken;

Dash my devoted bark! ye surges, break it!
'Tis for my ruin that the tempest rises.—ROWE.

Soft, pulpy substances, as flesh or fruits, are bruised;
Yet lab'ring well his little spot of ground,
Some scatt'ring potherbs here and there he found;
Which, cultivated with his daily care,
And, bruise'd with vervain, were his daily fare.

DRYDEN.

The operation of bruising is performed either by a violent blow or by pressure; that of squeezing by compression only. Metals, particularly lead and silver, may be bruised; fruits may be either bruised or squeezed. In this latter sense bruise applies to the harder substances, or indicates a violent compression; squeeze is used for soft substances or a gentle compression. The kernels of nuts are bruised; oranges or apples are squeezed;

He therefore first among the swains was found,
To reap the produce of his labour'd ground,
And squeeze the combs with golden liquor crown'd.

DRYDEN.

To pound is properly to bruise in a mortar so as to produce a separation of parts;

And where the rafters on the columns meet,
We push them headlong with our arms and feet:
Down goes the top at once; the Greeks beneath
Are piecemeal torn, or pounded into death.

DRYDEN.

To crush is the most violent and destructive of all operations, which amounts to the total dispersion of all the parts of a body; 'Such were the sufferings of our Lord, so great and so grievous as none of us are in any degree able to undergo. That weight under which he crouched, would crush us.'—TILLOTSON.

What is broken may be made whole again; what is bruised or squeezed may be restored to its former tone and consistency; what is pounded is only reduced to smaller parts for convenience; but what is crushed is destroyed. When the wheel of a carriage passes over any body that yields to its weight, it crushes it to powder; thus in the figurative sense this term marks a total annihilation: if a conspiracy be not crushed in the bud, it will prove fatal to the power which has suffered it to grow;

To crush rebellion every way is just.—DARCY.

TO BREAK, BURST, CRACK, SPLIT.

Break, v. To break, rack; burst, in Saxon beorstan, bersten, byrsten, Low German baisten, basten, High German bersten, Old German bresten, Swedish brysta, is but a variation of break; crack is in Saxon cearcian, French cracquer, High German krachen, Low German kraken, Danish krakke, Greek κράκιν, which are in all probability but variations of break, &c., split, in Dutch split, Danish splitter, Low German spalten, High German spalten, Old German spalten, Swedish spalta, which are all connected with the German platzen to burst, from the Greek παλάσσειναι to tear or split, and the Hebrew pelah to separate, palcat or palety to cut in pieces.

Break denotes a forcible separation of the constituent parts of a body. Burst and crack are onomatopœas or imitations of the sound which are made in bursting and cracking. Splitting is a species of cracking that takes place in some bodies in a similar manner without being accompanied with the noise.

Breaking is generally the consequence of some external violence: every thing that is exposed to violence may without distinction be broken;

Ambitious thence the manly river breaks,
And gathering many a flood, and copious fed
With all the mellowed treasures of the sky,
Winds in progressive majesty along.—THOMSON.

Bursting arises mostly from an extreme tension: not low bodies, when over-filled, burst;

Off, traitors! Off! or my distracted soul
Will burst indignant from this jail of nature.

THOMSON.

Cracking is caused by the application of excessive heat, or the defective texture of the substance: glass cracks; the earth cracks; leather cracks;

And let the weighty roller run the round,
To smooth the surface of th' unequal ground;
Lest crack'd with summer heats the flooring flies,
Or sinks, and through the crannies weeds arise.

DRYDEN

Splitting may arise from a combination of external and internal causes: wood in particular is liable to split;

Is't meet that he Should leave the helm, and like a fearful lad,
With tearful eyes, add water to the sea?
While in his mean, the ship splits on the rock,
Which industry and courage might have saved.

SHAKESPEARE.

A thing may be broken in any shape, form, and degree. bursting leaves a wide gap; cracking and splitting leave a long aperture; the latter of which is commonly wider than that of the former.

RUPTURE, FRACTURE, FRACTION.

Rupture, from rumpo to break or burst, and fracture or fraction, from frango to break, denote different kinds of breaking, according to the objects to which the action is applied. Soft substances may suffer a rupture; as the rupture of a blood-vessel: hard substances a fracture; as the fracture of a bone. Rupture and fracture, though not fracture, are used in an improper application; as the rupture of a treaty, or the fracture of a unit into parts; 'To be an enemy, and once to have been a friend, does it not embitter the rupture?'—SOUTH.

And o'er the high-pl'd hills of fractur'd earth,
Wide dash'd the waves!—THOMSON.

FRAGILE, FRAIL, BRITTLE.

Fragile and frail, in French frêle, both come from the Latin fragilis, signifying breakable; but the former is used in the proper sense only, and the latter more generally in the improper sense: man, corporeally considered, is a fragile creature, his frame is composed of fragile materials; mentally considered, he is a frail creature, for he is liable to every sort of frailty;

What joys, alas! could this frail being give,
That I have been so covetous to live.—DRYDEN

Brittle comes from the Saxon brittan to break, and by the termination le or lis, denotes likewise a capacity to break, that is, properly breakable; but it conveys a stronger idea of this quality than fragile: the latter applies to whatever will break from the effects of time; brittle to that which will not bear a temporary violence: in this sense all the works of men are fragile, and in fact all sublunary things; 'An appearance of delicacy, and even of fragility, is almost essential to beauty.'—BURKE. But glass, stone, and ice are peculiarly denominated brittle; and friendships are sometimes termed brittle; 'The brittle chain of this world's friendships is as effectually broken when one is "oblitus meorum," as when one is "obliviscendus et illis."

—CROFT.

SAP, UNDERMINE.

Sap signifies the juice which springs from the root of a tree; hence to sap signifies to come at the root of any thing by digging: to undermine signifies to form a mine under the ground, or under whatever is upon the ground: we may sap, therefore, without undermining; and undermine without sapping: we may sap the foundation of a house without making any mine underneath; and in fortifications we may undermine either a mound, a ditch, or a wall, without striking immediately at the foundation: hence, in the moral application, to sap is a more direct and decisive mode of destruction, undermine is a gradual, and may be a partial, action. Infidelity saps the morals of a nation;

With morning drams,

A filthy custom which he caught from thee,
Clean from his former practice, now he saps
His youthful vigour.—CUMBERLAND.

Courtiers undermine one another's interests at court;
'To be a man of business is, in other words, to be a plague and spy, a treacherous supplanter and underminer of the peace of families.'—SOUTH.

TO ERADICATE, EXTIRPATE, EXTERMINATE.

To eradicate, from radix the root, is to get out by the root; extirpate, from ex and stirps the stem, is to get out the stock, to destroy it thoroughly. In the natural sense we may eradicate noxious weeds whenever we pull them from the ground; but we can never extirpate all noxious weeds, as they always disseminate their seeds and spring up afresh. These weeds are seldom used in the physical than in the moral sense; where the former is applied to such objects as are conceived to be plucked up by the roots, as habits, vices, abuses, evils; and the latter to whatever is united or supposed to be united into a race or family, and is destroyed root and branch. Youth is the season when vicious habits may be thoroughly eradicated; 'It must be every man's care to begin by eradicating those corruptions which, at different times, have tempted him to violate conscience.'—BLAIR. By the universal deluge the whole human race was extirpated, with the exception of Noah and his family;

Go thou, inglorious, from th' embattled plain;
Ships thou hast store, and nearest to the main:

A nobler care the Grecians shall employ,

To combat, conquer, and extirpate Troy.—POPE.

Exterminate, in Latin exterminatus, participle of extermino, from ex or extra, and terminus, signifies to expel beyond a boundary (of life), that is, out of existence. It is used only in regard to such things as have life, and designates a violent and immediate action; extirpate, on the other hand, may designate a progressive action: the former may be said of individuals, but the latter is employed in the collective sense only. Plague, pestilence, famine, extirpate: the sword exterminates; 'So violent and black were Hannan's passions, that he resolved to exterminate the whole nation to which Mordecai belonged.'—BLAIR.

TO DEFACE, DISFIGURE, DEFORM.

Deface, disfigure, and deform signify literally to spoil the face, figure, and form.

Deface expresses more than either deform or disfigure. To deface is an act of destruction; it is the actual destruction of that which has before existed: to disfigure is either an act of destruction or an erroneous execution, which takes away the figure: to deform is altogether an imperfect execution, which renders the form what it should not be. A thing is defaced by design; it is disfigured either by design or accident; it is deformed either by an error or by the nature of the thing.

Persons only deface; persons or things disfigure; things are most commonly deformed of themselves. That may be defaced, the face or external surface of which may be injured or destroyed;

Yet she had heard an ancient rumour fly

(Long cited by the people of the sky),

That times to come should see the Trojan race

Her Carthage ruin, and her tow'rs deface.—DRYDEN.

That may be disfigured or deformed, the figure or form of which is imperfect or may be rendered imperfect; 'It is but too obvious that errors are committed in this part of religion (devotion). These frequently disfigure its appearance before the world, and subject it to unjust reproach.'—BLAIR.

A beauteous maid above; but magick art

With barking dogs deform'd her nether part.

DRYDEN.

A fine painting or piece of writing is defaced which is torn or besmeared with dirt: a fine building is disfigured by any want of symmetry in its parts: a building is deformed that is made contrary to all form. A statue may be defaced, disfigured, and deformed: it is defaced when any violence is done to the face or any outward part of the body; it is disfigured by the loss of a limb; it is deformed if made contrary to the perfect form of a person or thing to be represented.

Inanimate objects are mostly defaced or disfigured, but seldom deformed; animate objects are either disfigured or deformed, but not defaced. A person may disfigure himself by his dress; he is deformed by the hand of nature.

BANE, PEST, RUIN.

Bane, in its proper sense, is the name of a poisonous plant; pest, in French peste, Latin pestis a plague, from pastum, participle of pasco to feed upon or consume; ruin, in French ruine, Latin ruina, from ruo to rush, signifies the falling into a ruin, or the cause of ruin.

These terms borrow their figurative signification from three of the greatest evils in the world; namely, poison, plague, and destruction. Bane is said of things only; pest of persons only: whatever produces a deadly corruption is the bane; whoever is as obnoxious as the plague is a pest: luxury is the bane of civil society; gaming is the bane of all youth; sycophants are the pests of society;

First dire Chimæra's conquest was enjoined;

This pest he slaughter'd (for he read the skies),

And trusted heaven's informing prodigies.—POPE.

Be this, O mother! your religious care;

I go to rouse soft Paris to the war.

Oh! would kind earth the hateful wretch embrace,

That pest of Troy, that ruin of our race.

Deep to the dark abyss might he descend,

Troy yet should flourish, and my sorrows end.

POPE.

Bane when compared with ruin does not convey so strong a meaning; the former in its positive sense is that which tends to mischief;

Pierc'd through the dauntless heart then tumbles slain,
And from his fatal courage finds his bane.—POPE.

Ruin is that which actually causes ruin: a love of pleasure is the bane of all young men whose fortune depends on the exercise of their talents: drinking is the ruin of all who indulge themselves in it to excess.

POISON, VENOM.

Poison, in French poison, comes from the Latin potia a potion or drink; venom, in French venin, Latin venenum, comes probably from vena the veins, because it circulates rapidly through the veins, and infects the blood in a deadly manner.

Poison is a general term; in its original meaning it signifies any potion which acts destructively upon the system; venom is a species of deadly or malignant poison: a poison may be either slow or quick; a venom is always most active in its nature: a poison must be administered inwardly to have its effect; a venom will act by an external application: the juice of the hellebore is a poison; the tongue of the adder and the tooth of the viper contain venom: many plants are unfit to be eaten on account of the poisonous quality which is in them; the Indians are in the habit of dipping the tips of their arrows in a venomous juice, which renders the slightest wound mortal.

The moral application of these terms is clearly drawn from their proper acceptation: the poison must be infused or injected into the subject; the venom acts upon him externally: bad principles are justly compared to a poison, which some are so unhappy as to suck in with their mothers' milk; 'The Devil can convey the poison of his suggestions quicker than the agitation of thought or the strictures of fancy.'—SOUTH. The shafts of envy are peculiarly venomous when directed against those in elevated situations;

As the venom spread

Frightful convulsions writh'd his tortur'd limbs.

FENTON.

TO OVERTURN, OVERTHROW, SUBVERT, INVERT, REVERSE.

To overturn is simply to turn over, which may be more or less gradual: but to overthrow is to throw over, which will be more or less violent. To overturn is to turn a thing either with its side or its bottom upward; but to subvert is to turn that under which should be upward: to reverse is to turn that before which should be behind; and to invert is to place that on its head which should rest on its feet. These terms differ accordingly in their application and circumstances: things are overturned by contrivance and gradual means; infidels attempt to overturn Christianity by the arts of ridicule and falsehood;

An age is rip'ning in revolving fate,
When Troy shall overturn the Grecian state.

DRYDEN.

The French revolutionists overthrew their lawful government by every act of violence;

Thus prudes, by characters o' earthborn,
Imagine that they raise their own.—GAY.

To overturn is said of small matters; to subvert only of national or large concerns: domestic economy may be overturned; religious or political establishments may be subverted; 'Others, from public spirit, laboured to prevent a civil war, which, whatever party should prevail, must shake, and perhaps subvert, the Spanish power.'—ROBERTSON. That may be overturned which is simply set up; that is subverted which has been established: an assertion may be overturned; the best sanctioned principles may by artifice be subverted.

To overturn, overthrow, and subvert generally involve the destruction of the thing so overturned, overthrown, or subverted, or at least render it for the time useless, and are, therefore, mostly unallowed acts; but reverse and invert, which have a more particular application, have a less specific character of propriety: we may reverse a proposition by taking the negative instead of the affirmative; a decree may be reversed so as to render it nugatory; but both of these acts may be right or wrong, according to circumstances; 'Our ancestors affected a certain pomp of style, and this affectation, I suspect, was the true cause of their so frequently inverting the natural order of their words, especially in poetry.'—TYRREWHITT. The order of particular things may be inverted to suit the convenience of parties; but the order of society cannot be inverted without subverting all the principles on which civil society is built; 'He who walks not uprightly has neither from the presumption of God's mercy reversing the decree of his justice, nor from his own purposes of a future repentance, any sure ground to set his foot upon.'—SOUTH.

TO OVERWHELM, CRUSH.

To overwhelm (v. To overbear) is to cover with a heavy body, so that one should sink under it: to crush is to destroy the consistency of a thing by violent pressure. A thing may be crushed by being overwhelmed, but it may be overwhelmed without being crushed; and it may be crushed without being overwhelmed. The girl Tarpeia, who betrayed the Capitoline hill to the Sabines, is said to have been overwhelmed with their arms, by which she was crushed to death. When many persons fall on one, he may be overwhelmed, but not necessarily crushed; when a wagon goes over a body, it may be crushed, but not overwhelmed; 'Let not the political metaphysics of Jacobins break prison, to burst like a Levanter, to sweep the earth with their hurricane, and to break up the fountains of the great deep to overwhelm us.'—BURKE.

Melt his cold heart, and wake dead nature in him,
Crush him in thy arms.—OTWAY.

TO ROT, PUTREFY, CORRUPT.

The dissolution of bodies by an internal process is implied by all these terms: but the first two are applied to natural bodies only; the last to all bodies natural and moral. Rot is the strongest of all these terms; it denotes the last stage in the progress of dissolution: putrefy expresses the progress towards rottenness; and corruption the commencement. After fruit has arrived at its maturity or proper state of ripeness, it rots;

Debate destroys despatch, as fruits we see
Rot when they hang too long upon the tree.

DENHAM.

Meat which is kept too long putrefies;

And draws the copious stream from swampy fetus,
Where putrefaction into life ferments.—THOMSON

There is a tendency in all bodies to corruption; iron and wood corrupt with time; whatever is made, or done, or wished by men, is equally liable to be corrupt or to grow corrupt;

After that they again returned beene,
That in that garden planted be agayne
And grow afresh, as they had never seene
Fleshy corruption nor mortal payne.—SPENSER

DESTRUCTION, RUIN.

Destruction, from destroy, and the Latin destruo, signifies literally to unbuild that which is raised up; ruin, from the Latin ruo to fall, signifies to fall into pieces: destruction is an act of immediate violence; ruin is a gradual process: a thing is destroyed by some external action upon it; a thing falls to ruin of itself. We witness destruction wherever war or the adverse elements rage; we witness ruin whenever the works of man are exposed to the effects of time. Nevertheless, if destruction be more forcible and rapid, ruin is on the other hand more sure and complete. What is destroyed may be rebuilt or replaced; but what is ruined is lost for ever; it is past recovery.

When houses or towns are destroyed, fresh ones rise up in their place; but when commerce is ruined, it seldom returns to its old course.

Destruction admits of various degrees: ruin is something positive and general. The property of a man may be destroyed to a greater or less extent without necessarily involving his ruin;

Destruction hangs o'er yon devoted wall,
And nodding Ilium waits th' impending fall.—POPE.

The ruin of a whole family is oftentimes the consequence of destruction by fire;

The day shall come, that great avenging day,
Which Troy's proud glories in the dust shall lay;
When Priam's pow'rs, and Priam's self, shall fall,
And one prodigious ruin swallow all.—POPE.

The health is destroyed by violent exercise or some other active cause; it is ruined by a course of imprudent conduct.

The happiness of a family is destroyed by broils and discord; the morals of a young man are ruined by a continued intercourse with vicious companions.

Destruction may be used either in the proper, or the improper sense; ruin has mostly a moral application.

The destruction of both body and soul is the consequence of sin; the ruin of a man, whether in his temporal or spiritual concerns, is inevitable, if he follow the dictates of misguided passion.

DESTRUCTIVE, RUINOUS, PERNICIOUS.

Destructive signifies producing destruction (v. Destruction); ruinous, either having or causing ruin (v. Destruction); pernicious, from the Latin pernicies or per and neco to kill violently, signifies causing violent and total dissolution.

Destructive and ruinous, as the epithets of the preceding terms, have a similar distinction in their sense and application: fire and sword are destructive things; a poison is destructive; consequences are ruinous; a condition or state is ruinous; intestine commotions are ruinous to the prosperity of a state;

'Tis yours to save us if you cease to fear;

Flight, more than shameful, is destructive here.

POPE.

'There have been found in history few conquests more ruinous than that of the Saxons.'—HUME.

Pernicious approaches nearer to destructive than to ruinous; both the former imply tendency to dissolution, which may be more or less gradual; but the latter refers us to the result itself, to the dissolution as already having taken place: hence we speak of the instrument or cause as being destructive or pernicious, and the action or event as ruinous; destructive is applied in the most extended sense to every object which has been created or supposed to be so; pernicious is applicable only to such objects as act only in a limited way: sin is equally destructive to both body and soul; certain food is pernicious to the body; certain books are pernicious to the mind; 'The effects of divisions (in a state) are pernicious to the last degree, not only with regard to those advantages which they give the common enemy; but to those private evils which they produce in the heart of almost every particular person.'—ADDISON.

TO CONSUME, DESTROY, WASTE.

Consume, in French consommer, Latin consumo, compounded of con and sumo, signifies to take away altogether; destroy, in Latin destruo, compounded of de privative and struo to build, signifies to undo or scatter that which has been raised; waste, from the adjective waste or desert, signifies to make waste or naked.

The idea of bringing that to nothing which has been something is common to all these terms.

What is consumed is lost for any future purpose; what is destroyed is rendered unfit for any purpose whatever: consume may therefore be to destroy as the means to the end; things are often destroyed by being consumed: when food is consumed it serves the intended purpose; but when it is destroyed it serves no purpose, and is likewise unfit for any.

When iron is consumed by rust, or the body by disease, or a house by the flames, the things in these cases are literally destroyed by consumption: on the other hand, when life or health is taken away, and when things are either worn or torn so as to be useless, they are destroyed;

Let not a fierce unruly joy
The settled quiet of the mind destroy.—ADDISON.

In the figurative signification consume is synonymous with waste: the former implies a reducing to nothing; the latter conveys also the idea of misuse: to waste is to consume uselessly; much time is consumed in complaining, which might be employed in remedying the evils complained of; 'Mr. Boyle, speaking of a certain mineral, tells us that a man may consume his whole life in the study, without arriving at the knowledge of its qualities.'—ADDISON. Idlers waste their time because they do not properly estimate its value: those who consume their strength and their resources in fruitless endeavours to effect what is impracticable, are unfitted for doing what might be beneficial to themselves: it is an idle waste of one's powers to employ them in building up new systems, and making men dissatisfied with those already established;

For this I mourn, till grief or dire disease,
Shall waste the form whose crime it was to please.
POPE.

TO DEMOLISH, RAZE, DISMANTLE, DESTROY.

The throwing down what has been built up is the common idea included in all these terms.

Demolish, from the Latin demolior, and moles a mass, signifies to decompound what has been in a mass; raze like erase (v. To blot out) signifies the making smooth or even with the ground; dismantle, in French demanteler, signifies to deprive of the mantle or guard; destroy, from the Latin destruo, compounded of the privative de and struo to build, signifies properly to pull down.

A fabrick is demolished by scattering all its component parts; it is mostly an unlicensed act of caprice; it is * razed by way of punishment, that it may be left as a monument of public vengeance; a fortress is dismantled from motives of prudence, in order to render it defenceless; places are destroyed by various means and from various motives, that they may not exist any longer.

Individuals may demolish; justice causes a razure; a general orders towers to be dismantled and fortifications to be destroyed;

From the demolish'd tow'rs the Trojans throw
Huge heaps of stones, that falling crush the foe.
DRYDEN.

Great Diomed has compass'd round with walls
The city which Argypria he calls,
From his own Argos nam'd; we touch'd with joy
The royal hand that raz'd unhappy Troy.—DRYDEN.

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Demolir, raser, demanteler, detruire"

O'er the drear spot see desolation spread,
And the dismantled walls in ruin lie.—MOORE.

We, for myself I speak, and all the name
Of Grecians who to Troy's destruction came,
Not one but suffered and too dearly bought
The prize of honour which in arms he sought.
DRYDEN

TO BEREAVE, DEPRIVE, STRIP.

Bereave, in Saxon beræfian, German berauben, &c is compounded of be and raue or rob, Saxon raefian, German rauben, Low German roofen, &c. Latin rapina and rapio to catch or seize, signifying to take away contrary to one's wishes; deprive, compounded of de and prive, French priver, Latin privo, from privus private, signifies to make that one's own which was another's; strip is in German streifen, Low German streipen, stroepen, Swedish ströfva, probably changed from the Latin surripio to snatch by stealth.

To bereave expresses more than deprive, but less than strip, which in this sense is figurative, and denotes a total bereavement; one is bereaved of children, deprived of pleasures, and stripped of property: we are bereaved of that on which we set most value; the act of bereaving does violence to our inclination: we are deprived of the ordinary comforts and conveniences of life; they cease to be ours: we are stripped of the things which we most want; we are thereby rendered as it were naked. Deprivations are preparatory to bereavements; if we cannot bear the one patiently, we may expect to sink under the other; common prudence should teach us to look with unconcern on our deprivations: Christian faith should enable us to consider every bereavement as a step to perfection; that when stripped of all worldly goods we may be invested with those more exalted and lasting honours which await the faithful disciple of Christ.

We are bereaved of our dearest hopes and enjoyments by the dispensations of Providence;

O first-created Being, and thou great Word,
Let there be light, and light was over all;
Why am I thus bereav'd thy prime decree?
MILTON.

Casualties deprive us of many little advantages or gratifications which fall in our way;

Too daring bard! whose unsuccessful pride
Th' immortal muses in their art defied;
Th' avenging muses of the light of day
Depriv'd his eyes, and snatch'd his voice away.
POPE.

Men are active in stripping each other of their just rights and privileges; 'From the uncertainty of life, moralists have endeavoured to sink the estimation of its pleasures, and if they could not strip the seductions of vice of their present enjoyment, at least to load them with the fear of their end.'—MACKENZIE.

DEPREDAATION, ROBBERY.

Depredation, in Latin deprædatio, from præda a prey, signifies the act of spoiling or laying waste, as well as taking away; robbery, on the other hand, signifies simply the removal or taking away from another by violence. Every depredation, therefore, includes a robbery, but not vice versa. A depredation is always attended with mischief to some one, though not always with advantage to the depredator; but the robber always calculates on getting something for himself. Depredations are often committed for the indulgence of private animosity; robbery is always committed from a thirst for gain.

Depredation is either the publick act of a community, or the private act of individuals; robbery mostly the private act of individuals. Depredations are committed wherever the occasion offers; in open or covert places; robberies are committed either on the persons or houses of individuals. In former times neighbouring states used to commit frequent depredations on each other, even when not in a state of open hostility; robberies were, however, then less frequent than at present; 'As the delay of making war may sometimes be detrimental to individuals, who have suffered by depredations from foreign potentates, our laws have in some respects, armed the subject with powers to liapel the prerogative, by directing the ministers to issue letters of marque.'—BLACKSTONE. 'From all this, what is my inference? That this new system of robbery in France cannot be rendered safe by any art.'—BURKE

Depredation is used in the proper and bad sense, for animals as well as for men; robbery may be employed figuratively and in the indifferent sense. Birds are great depredators in the cornfields; bees may be said to plunder or rob the flowers of their sweets.

TO DEPRIVE, DEBAR, ABRIDGE.

Deprive (v. To bereave) conveys the idea of either taking away that which one has, or withholding that which one may have; debar, from de and bar, signifying to prevent by means of a bar, conveys the idea only of withholding; abridge (v. To abridge) conveys that also of taking away. Depriving is a coercive measure; debar and abridge are merely acts of authority. We are deprived of that which is of the first necessity; we are debarred of privileges, enjoyments, opportunities, &c.; we are abridged of comforts, pleasures, conveniences, &c. Criminals are deprived of their liberty; their friends are in extraordinary cases debarred the privilege of seeing them; thus men are often abridged of their comforts in consequence of their own faults.

Deprivation and debarring sometimes arise from things as well as persons; abridging is always the voluntary act of conscious agents. Misfortunes sometimes deprive a person of the means of living; the poor are often debarred, by their poverty, of the opportunity to learn their duty; it may sometimes be necessary to abridge young people of their pleasures when they do not know how to make a good use of them. Religion teaches men to be resigned under the severest deprivations; it is painful to be debarred the society of those we love, or to abridge others of any advantage which they have been in the habit of enjoying.

When used as reflective verbs they preserve the same analogy in their signification. An extravagant person deprives himself of the power of doing good; 'Of what small moment to your real happiness are many of those injuries which draw forth your resentment? Can they deprive you of peace of conscience, of the satisfaction of having acted a right part?'—BLAIR. A person may debar himself of any pleasure from particular motives of prudence; 'Active and masculine spirits, in the vigour of youth, neither can nor ought to remain at rest. If they debar themselves from aiming at a noble object, their desires will move downward.'—HUGHES. A miser abridges himself of every enjoyment in order to gratify his ruling passion; 'The personal liberty of individuals in this kingdom cannot ever be abridged at the mere discretion of the magistrate.'—BLACKSTONE.

CAPTURE, SEIZURE, PRIZE.

Capture, in French capture, Latin captura, from captus, participle of capio to take, signifies either the act of taking, or the thing taken, but mostly the former; seizure, from seize, in French saisir, signifies only the act of seizing; prize, in French prise, from pris, participle of prendre to take, signifies only the thing taken.

Capture and seizure differ in the mode: a capture is made by force of arms; a seizure by direct and personal violence. The capture of a town or an island requires an army; the seizure of property is effected by the exertions of an individual. A seizure always requires some force, which a capture does not. A capture may be made on an unresisting object; it is merely the taking into possession: a seizure supposes much eagerness for possession on the one hand, and reluctance to yield on the other. Merchant vessels are captured which are not in a state to make resistance; contraband goods are seized by the police officers.

A capture has always something legitimate in it; it is a public measure flowing from authority, or in the course of lawful warfare; 'The late Mr. Robert Wood, in his essay on the original genius and writings of Homer, inclines to think the Iliad and Odyssey were finished about half a century after the capture of Troy.—CUMBERLAND. A seizure is a private measure, frequently an unlawful and unjust as it is violent; it depends on the will of the individual; 'Many of the dangers imputed of old to exorbitant wealth are now at an end. The rich are neither waylaid by robbers, nor watched by informers; there is nothing to be dreaded from proscriptions or seizures.'—JOHNSON. A capture is general, it respects the act of taking: a prize is particular, it regards the object taken, and its value to the captor: many captures are made by sea which never become prizes; 'Sensible of their own force, and allured by the prospect of so rich a prize, the northern barbarians, in the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, assailed at once all the frontiers of the Roman empire.'—HUME.

BOOTY, SPOIL, PREY.

These words mark a species of capture.

Booty, in French butin, Danish brutte, Dutch buut, Teutonic beute, probably comes from the Teutonic bat a useful thing, denoting the thing taken for its use; spoil, in French depouille, Latin spolium, in Greek σκόλον, signifies the things stripped off from the dead, from σκάω, Hebrew לָקַח to spoil; prey, in French proie, Latin præda, is not improbably changed from prædo, prendo, or prehendo to lay hold of, signifying the thing seized.

The first two are used as military terms or in attacks on an enemy, the latter in cases of particular violence. The soldier gets his booty; the combatant his spoils; the carnivorous animal his prey. Booty respects what is of personal service to the captor; spoils whatever serves to designate his triumph; prey includes whatever gratifies the appetite and is to be consumed. When a town is taken, soldiers are too busy in the work of destruction and mischief to carry away much booty; in every battle the arms and personal property of the slain enemy are the lawful spoils of the victor; the hawk pounces on his prey, and carries him up to his nest;

'T was in the dead of night, when sleep repairs
Our bodies worn with toils, our minds with cares,
When Hector's ghost before my sight appears:
A bloody shroud he seem'd, and bath'd in tears,
Unlike that Hector who return'd from toils
Of war, triumphant in Æacian spoils.—DRYDEN.

Greediness stimulates to take booty; ambition produces an eagerness for spoils; a ferocious appetite impels to a search for prey. Among the ancients the prisoners of war who were made slaves constituted a part of their booty; and even in later periods such a capture was good booty, when ransom was paid for those who could liberate themselves. Among some savages the head or limb of an enemy constituted part of their spoils. Among cannibals the prisoners of war are the prey of the conquerors.

Booty and prey are often used in an extended and figurative sense. Plunderers obtain a rich booty; the diligent bee returns loaded with its booty; 'When they (the French National Assembly) had finally determined on a state resource from church booty, they came on the 14th of April, 1790, to a solemn resolution on the subject.'—BURKE. It is necessary that animals should become a prey to man, in order that man may not become a prey to them; every thing in nature becomes a prey to another thing, which in its turn falls a prey to something else. All is change but order. Man is a prey to the diseases of his body or his mind, and after death to the worms;

The wolf, who from the nightly fold
Forth drags the bleating prey, ne'er drank her milk,
Nor wore her warming fleece.—THOMSON.

RAVAGE, DESOLATION, DEVASTATION.

Ravage comes from the Latin rapio, and the Greek ἀρπάζω, signifying a seizing or tearing away; desolation, from solus alone, signifies made solitary or reduced to solitude; devastation, in Latin devastatio, from devasto to lay waste, signifies reducing to a waste or desert.

* Vide Roubaud. "Proie, butin"

Ravage expresses less than either desolation or devastation: a breaking, tearing, or destroying is implied in the word ravage; but the desolation goes to the entire unpeopling a land, and the devastation to the entire clearing away of every vestige of cultivation. Torrents, flames, tempests, and wild beasts ravage;

Beasts of prey retire, that all night long,
Urg'd by necessity, had rang'd the dark,
As if their conscious ravage shunn'd the light,
Asham'd.—THOMSON.

War, plague, and famine desolate;

Amid thy bow'rs the tyrant's hand is seen,
And desolation saddens all thy green.

GOLDSMITH.

Armies of barbarians, who inundate a country, carry devastation with them wherever they go; 'How much the strength of the Roman republic is impaired, and what dreadful devastation has gone forth into all its provinces!'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero). * Nothing resists ravages, they are rapid and terrible; nothing arrests desolation, it is cruel and un pitying; devastation spares nothing, it is ferocious and indefatigable. Ravages spread alarm and terror; desolation, grief and despair; devastation, dread and horror.

Ravage is employed likewise in the moral application; desolation and devastation only in the proper application to countries. Disease makes its ravages on beauty; death makes its ravages among men in a more terrible degree at one time than at another;

Would one think 't were possible for love
To make such ravage in a noble soul?—ADDISON.

OVERSPREAD, OVERRUN, RAVAGE.

To overspread signifies simply to cover the whole surface of a body; but to overrun is a mode of spreading, namely, by running: things in general, therefore, are said to overspread which admit of extension; nothing can be said to overrun but what literally or figuratively runs: the face is overspread with spots; the ground is overrun with weeds. To overrun and to ravage are both employed to imply the active and extended destruction of an enemy; but the former expresses more than the latter; a small body may ravage in particular parts; but immense numbers are said to overrun, as they run into every part: the Barbarians overran all Europe, and settled in different countries; detachments are sent out to ravage the country or neighbourhood; 'The storm of hail and fire, with the darkness that overspread the land for three days, are described with great strength.'—ADDISON. 'Most despotick governments are naturally overrun with ignorance and barbarity.'—ADDISON. 'While Herod was absent, the thieves of Trachonites ravaged with their depredations all the parts of Judea and Cælo-Syria that lay within their reach.'—PRIDEAUX.

RAPINE, PLUNDER, PILLAGE.

The idea of property taken from another contrary to his consent is included in all these terms: but the term rapine includes most violence; plunder includes most removal or carrying away; pillage most search and scrutiny after. A soldier, who makes a sudden incursion into an enemy's country, and carries away whatever comes within his reach, is guilty of rapine;

Upon the banks
Of Tweed, slow winding thro' the vale, the seat
Of war and rapine once.—SOMERVILLE.

Robbers frequently carry away much plunder when they break into houses; 'Ship-money was pitched upon as fit to be formed by excise and taxes, and the burden of the subjects took off by plunderings and sequestrations.'—SOUTH. When an army sack a town they strip it of every thing that is to be found, and go away loaded with pillage; 'Although the Eretrians for a time stood resolutely to the defence of their city, it was given up by treachery on the seventh day, and pillaged and destroyed in a most barbarous manner by the Persians.'—CUMBERLAND. Mischief and bloodshed attend rapine; loss attends plunder; distress and ruin follow wherever there has been pillage.

* Vide Roubaud: "Ravager, desoler, devastar, sacager."

RAPACIOUS, RAVENOUS, VORACIOUS.

Rapacious, in Latin rapax, from rapio to seize, signifies seizing or grasping a thing with an eager desire to have; ravenous, from the Latin rabies a fury, and rapio to seize, signifies the same as rapacious; voracious, from voro to devour, signifies an eagerness to devour.

The idea of greediness, which forms the leading features in the signification of all these terms, is varied in the subject and the object: rapacious is the quality peculiar to beasts of prey, or of men who are actuated by a similar spirit of plunder; 'A display of our wealth before robbers is not the way to restrain their boldness, or to lessen their rapacity.'—BURKE. Ravenous and voracious are common to all animals, when impelled by hunger. The beasts of the forest are rapacious at all times; all animals are more or less ravenous or voracious, as circumstances may make them: the rapacious applies to the seizing of other animals as food; the ravenous applies to the seizing of any thing which one takes for one's food;

Again the holy fires on altars burn,
And once again the ravenous birds return.

DRYDEN.

A lion is rapacious when it seizes on its prey; it is ravenous in the act of consuming it. The word ravenous respects the haste with which one eats; the word voracious respects the quantity which one consumes;

Ere you remark another's sin,
Bid thy own conscience look within;
Control thy more voracious bill,
Nor for a breakfast nations kill.—GAY.

A ravenous person is loath to wait for the dressing of his food; he consumes it without any preparation: a voracious person not only eats in haste, but he consumes great quantities, and continues to do so for a long time. Abstinence from food, for an unusual length, will make any healthy creature ravenous; habitual intemperance in eating, or a diseased appetite, will produce voracity.

As the leading idea in the term rapacious is that of plunder, it may be extended to things figuratively. 'Any of these, without regarding the pains of church men, grudge them those small remains of ancient piety, which the rapacity of some ages has scarce left to the church.'—SPRAT.

SANGUINARY, BLOODY, BLOOD-THIRSTY.

Sanguinary, from sanguis, is employed both in the sense of bloody or having blood; blood-thirsty, or the thirsting after blood: sanguinary, in the first case, relates only to blood shed, as a sanguinary engagement, or a sanguinary conflict; 'They have seen the French rebel against a mild and lawful monarch with more fury than ever any people has been known to rise against the most illegal usurper or the most sanguinary tyrant.'—BURKE. Bloody is used in the familiar application, to denote the simple presence of blood, as a bloody coat, or a bloody sword;

And from the wound,
Black bloody drops distill'd upon the ground.

DRYDEN.

In the second case, sanguinary is employed to characterize the tempers of persons only; blood-thirsty to characterize the tempers of persons or animals: the French revolution has given us many specimens how sanguinary men may become who are abandoned to their own furious passions; tigers are by nature the most blood-thirsty of all creatures; 'The Peruvians fought not like the Mexicans, to glut blood-thirsty divinities with human sacrifices.'—ROBERTSON.

TO ENCROACH, INTRENCH, INTRUDE, INVADE, INFRINGE.

Encroach, in French encrocher, is compounded of en or in and crouch cringe or creep, signifying to creep into any thing; intrench, compounded of in and trench, signifies to trench or dig beyond one's own into another's ground ; intrude, from the Latin intrudo, signifies literally to thrust upon ; and invade, from invado, signifies to march in upon ; infringe, from the Latin infringo, compounded of in and frango, signifies to break in upon.

All these terms denote an unauthorized procedure ; but the two former designate gentle or silent actions, the latter violent if not noisy actions.

Encroach is often an imperceptible action, performed with such art as to elude observation ; it is, according to its derivation, an insensible creeping into : intrench is in fact a species of encroachment, namely, that perceptible species which consists in exceeding the boundaries in marking out the ground or space : it should be one of the first objects of a parent to check the first indications of an encroaching disposition in their children ; according to the building laws, it is made actionable for any one to intrench upon the street or publick road with their houses or gardens.

In an extended application of these terms we may speak of encroaching on a person's time, or intrenching on the sphere, &c. of another : intrude and invade designate an unauthorized entry ; the former in violation of right, equity, or good manners ; the latter in violation of publick law : the former is more commonly applied to individuals ; the latter to nations or large communities : unbidden guests intrude themselves sometimes into families to their no small annoyance ; an army never invades a country without doing some mischief : nothing evinces a greater ignorance and impertinence than to intrude one's self into any company where we may of course expect to be unwelcome ; in the feudal times, when civil power was invested in the hands of the nobility and petty princes, they were incessantly invading each other's territories : 'It is observed by one of the fathers that he who restrains himself in the use of things lawful will never encroach upon things forbidden.'—JOHNSON. 'Religion intrenches upon none of our privileges, invades none of our pleasures.'—SOUTH. 'One of the chief characteristics of the golden age, of the age in which neither care nor danger had intruded on mankind, is the community of possessions.'—JOHNSON.

Invade has likewise an improper as well as a proper acceptance ; in the former case it bears a close analogy to infringe : we speak of invading rights, or infringing rights ; but the former is an act of greater violence than the latter : by an authorized exercise of power the rights of a people may be invaded ; by gradual steps and imperceptible means their liberties may be infringed : invade is used only for publick privileges ; infringe is applied also to those which belong to individuals.

King John of England invaded the rights of the Barons in so senseless a manner as to give them a colour for their resistance ; it is of importance to the peace and well-being of society that men should, in their different relations, stations, and duties, guard against any infringement on the sphere or department of such as come into the closest connexion with them ;

No sooner were his eyes in slumber bound,
When from above a more than mortal sound
Invades his ears.—DRYDEN.

'The King's partisans maintained that, while the prince commands no military force, he will in vain by violence attempt an infringement of laws so clearly defined by means of late disputes.'—HUME.

TO INFRINGE, VIOLATE, TRANSGRESS.

Infringe, v. To encroach ; violate, from the Latin vis force, signifies to use force towards ; transgress, v. Offence.

Civil and moral laws are infringed by those who act in opposition to them ; 'I hold friendship to be a very holy league, and no less than a pacle to infringe it.'—HOWELL. Treaties and engagements are violated by those who do not hold them sacred ;

No violated leagues with sharp remorse
Shall sting the conscious victor.—SOMERVILLE.

The bounds which are prescribed by the moral law are transgressed by those who are guilty of any excess ;

Why hast thou, Satan, broke the bounds prescrib'd
To thy transgressions?—MILTON.

It is the business of government to see that the rights and privileges of individuals or particular bodies be not infringed : policy but too frequently runs counter to equity ; where the particular interests of princes are more regarded than the dictates of conscience, treaties and compacts are first violated and then justified : the passions, when not kept under proper control, will ever hurry men on to transgress the limits of right reason.

INFRINGEMENT, INFRACTION.

Infringement and infraction, which are both derived from the Latin verb infringo or frango (v. To infringe), are employed according to the different senses of the verb infringe : the former being applied to the rights of individuals, either in their domestic or publick capacity ; and the latter rather to national transactions. Politeness, which teaches us what is due to every man in the smallest concerns, considers any unasked-for interference in the private affairs of another as an infringement ; 'We see with Orestes (or rather with Sophocles), that "it is fit that such gross infringements of the moral law (as parricide) should be punished with death."'—MACKENZIE. Equity, which enjoins on nations as well as individuals, an attentive consideration to the interests of the whole, forbids the infraction of a treaty in any case ; 'No people can, without the infraction of the universal league of social beings, incite those practices in an other dominion which they would themselves punish in their own.'—JOHNSON.

INVASION, INCURSION, IRRUPTION, INROAD.

The idea of making a forcible entrance into a foreign territory is common to all these. Invasion, from vado to go, expresses merely this general idea, without any particular qualification ; incursion, from curro to run, signifies a hasty and sudden invasion ; irruption, from rumpo to break, signifies a particularly violent invasion ; inroad, from in and road, signifies a making a road or way for one's self, which includes invasion and occupation. Invasion is said of that which passes in distant lands ; Alexander invaded India ; Hannibal crossed the Alps, and made an invasion into Italy ;

The nations of the Ausonian shore
Shall hear the dreadful rumour, from afar,
Of arm'd invasion, and embrace the war.

—DRYDEN

Incursion is said of neighbouring states ; the borderers on each side the Tweed used to make frequent incursions into England or Scotland ; 'Britain by its situation was removed from the fury of these barbarous incursions.'—HUME. Invasion is the act of a regular army ; it is a systematick military movement : irruption is the irregular and impetuous movement of undisciplined troops. The invasion of France by the allies was one of the grandest military movements that the world ever witnessed ; the irruption of the Goths and Vandals into Europe has been acted over again by the late revolutionary armies of France ; 'The study of ancient literature was interrupted in Europe, by the irruption of the northern nations.'—JOHNSON.

An invasion may be partial and temporary ; one invades from various causes, but not always from hostility to the inhabitants : an inroad is made by a conqueror who determines to dispossess the existing occupier of the land : invasion is therefore to inroad only as a means to an end. He who invades a country, and gets possession of its strong places so as to have an entire command of the land, is said to make invasions into that country ; but since it is possible to get forcible possession of a country by other means besides that of a military entry, there may be an inroad where there is no express invasion ; 'From Scotland we have had in former times some alarms, and inroads into the northern parts of this kingdom.'—BACON. Alexander made such inroads into Persia, as to become master of the whole country ; but the French republick, and all its usurped authorities, made inroads into different countries by means of spies and revolutionary incen liaries, who effected more than the sword in subjecting them to the power of France.

These terms bear a similar distinction in the improper sense. In this case invasion is figuratively employed to express a violent seizure, in general of what belongs to individuals, particularly that which he enjoys by civil compact, namely, his rights and privileges. The term may also be extended to other objects, as when we speak of invading a person's province, &c.; 'Encouraged with success, he invades the province of philosophy.'—DRYDEN. Things may likewise be said to invade;

Far off we hear the waves, which surly sound,
Invade the rocks; the rocks their groans rebound.

DRYDEN.

In like manner we speak of the inroads which disease makes on the constitution; and of the incursion or irruption of unpleasant thoughts in the mind; 'Rest and labour equally perceive their reign of short duration and uncertain tenure, and their empire liable to inroads from those who are alike enemies to both.'—JOHNSON.

I refrain, too suddenly,
To utter what will come at last too soon:
Lest evil tidings, with too rude irruption,
Hitting thy aged ear should pierce too deep.

MILTON.

Sins of daily incursion, and such as human frailty is unavoidably liable to.'—SOUTH.

INTRUDER, INTERLOPER.

An intruder (v. To intrude) thrusts himself in; an interloper, from laufen, runs in between and takes his station. The intruder may be so only for a short space of time, in an unimportant degree; or may intrude only in unimportant matters; the interloper abridges another of his essential rights and for a permanency. A man is an intruder who is an unbidden guest at the table of another;

Will you, a bold intruder, never learn
To know your basket and your bread discern?

DRYDEN.

A man is an interloper when he joins any society in such manner as to obtain its privileges, without sharing its burdens; 'Some proposed to vest the trade to America in exclusive companies, which interest would render the most vigilant guardians of the Spanish commerce, against the encroachments of interlopers.'—ROBERTSON. The term intruder may, however, be applied to any who takes violent or unauthorized possession of what belongs to another; 'I would not have you to offer it to the doctor, as eminent physicians do not love intruders.'—JOHNSON. 'They were but intruders upon the possession during the minority of the heir; they knew those lands were the rightful inheritance of that young lady.'—DAVIES.

TO INTRUDE, OBTUDE.

To intrude is to thrust one's self into a place; to obtrude is to thrust one's self in the way. It is intrusion to go into any society unasked and undesired; it is obtruding to join any company and take a part in the conversation without invitation or consent. We violate the rights of another when we intrude; we set up ourselves by obtruding; one intrudes with one's person in the place which does not belong to one's self; one obtrudes with one's person, remarks, &c., upon another: a person intrudes out of curiosity or any other personal gratification; he obtrudes out of vanity.

Politeness denominates it intrusion to pass the threshold of another, without having first ascertained that we are perfectly welcome; modesty denominates it obtruding to offer an opinion in the presence of another, unless we are expressly invited or authorized by our relationship and situation. There is no thinking man who does not feel the value of having some place of retirement, which is free from the intrusion of all impertinent visitants; it is the fault of young persons, who have formed any opinions for themselves, to obtrude them upon every one who will give them a hearing.

In the moral acceptation they preserve the same distinction. In moments of devotion the serious man endeavours to prevent the intrusion of improper ideas in his mind: 'The intrusion of scruples, and the recollection of better notions, will not suffer some to live contented with their own conduct.'—JOHNSON. The stings of conscience obtrude themselves upon the guilty even in the season of their greatest merriment; 'Artists are sometimes ready to talk to an incidental inquirer as they do to one another, and to make their knowledge ridiculous by injudicious obtrusion.'—JOHNSON.

TO ABSORB, SWALLOW UP, INGULF, ENGROSS.

Absorb, in French absorber, Latin absorbeo, is compounded of ab and sorbeo to sup up, in distinction from swallow up; the former denoting a gradual consumption; the latter a sudden envelopment of the whole object. The excessive heat of the sun absorbs all the nutritious fluids of bodies animal and vegetable. The gaming table is a vortex in which the principle of every man is swallowed up with his estate; 'Surely the bare remembrance that a man was formerly rich or great cannot make him at all happier there, where an infinite happiness or an infinite misery shall equally swallow up the sense of these poor felicities.'—SOUTH. Ingulf, compounded of in and gulf, signifies to be enclosed in a great gulf, which is a strong figurative representation for being swallowed up. As it applies to grand and sublime objects, it is used only in the higher style;

Ingulf'd, all helps of art we vainly try
To weather leeward shores, alas! too high.

FALCONER.

Engross, which is compounded of the French words en gros in whole, signifies to purchase wholesale, so as to swallow up the profits of others. In the moral application, therefore, it is very analogous to absorb.

The mind is absorbed in the contemplation of any subject, when all its powers are so bent upon it as not to admit distraction;

Absorbed in that immensity I see,
I shrink abased, and yet aspire to thee.—COWPER.

The mind is engrossed by any subject when the thoughts of it force themselves upon its contemplation to the exclusion of others which should engage the attention. 'Those two great things that so engross the desires and designs of both the nobler and ignobler sort of mankind, are to be found in religion, namely, wisdom and pleasure.'—SOUTH. The term engross may also convey the idea of taking from another, as well as taking to ourselves, which it is still more distinguished from the other terms; 'This inconvenience the politician must expect from others, as well as they have felt from him, unless he thinks that he can engross this principle to himself, and that others cannot be as false and atheistical as himself.'—SOUTH.

TO MUTILATE, MAIM, MANGLE.

Mutilate, in Latin mutilatus, from mutilo and mutilus, Greek μῦτιλος or μῦτιλος without horns, signifies to take off any necessary part; maim and mangle are in all probability derived from the Latin manus, which comes from manus, signifying to deprive of a hand, or to wound in general.

Mutilate has the most extended meaning; it implies the abridging of any limb; mangle is applied to irregular wounds in any part of the body: maim is confined to wounds in the hands. Men are exposed to be mutilated by means of cannon balls; they are in danger of being mangled when attacked promiscuously with the sword; they frequently get maimed when boarding vessels or storming places. One is mutilated and mangled by active means; one becomes maimed by natural infirmity.

They are similarly distinguished in the moral application, but maiming is the effect of a direct effort whereby an object loses its value; 'I have shown the evil of maiming and splitting religion.'—BLAIR. Mangling is a much stronger term than mutilating, the latter signifies to lop off an essential part; to mangle is to mutilate a thing to such a degree as to render it useless or worthless. Every sect of Christians is fond of mutilating the Bible by setting aside such parts as do not favour their own ideas, so that among them the sacred Scriptures have been literally mangled, and stripped of all their most important doctrines; 'How Hales would have borne the mutilations which his Plea of the Crown has suffered from the editor, they who know his character will easily conceive.'—JOHNSON. 'What have they (the French nobility) done that they should be hunted about, mangled, and tortured?'—BURKE.

TO KILL, MURDER, ASSASSINATE, SLAY OR SLAUGHTER.

Kill, which is in Saxon cýlan, and Dutch kélan, is of uncertain origin; murder, in German mord, &c. is connected with the Latin mors death: assassinate signifies to kill after the manner of an assassin; which word probably comes from the Levant, where a prince of the Arsacides or assassins, who was called the old man of the mountains, lived in a castle between Antioch and Damascus, and brought up young men to lie in wait for passengers; slay or slaughter, in German schlagen, &c. is probably connected with lügen to lie, signifying to lay low.

To kill is the general and indefinite term, signifying simply to take away life; to murder is to kill with open violence and injustice; to assassinate is to murder by surprise, or by means of lying in wait; to slay is to kill in battle; to kill is applicable to men, animals, and also vegetables; to murder and assassinate to men only; to slay mostly to men, but sometimes to animals; to slaughter only to animals in the proper sense, but it may be applied to men in the improper sense, when they are killed like brutes, either as to the numbers or to the manner of killing them; 'The fierce young hero who had overcome the Curiatii, being upbraided by his sister for having slain her lover, in the height of his resentment kills her.'—ADDISON. 'Murders and executions are always transacted behind the scenes in the French theatre.'—ADDISON. 'The women interposed with so many prayers and entreaties, that they prevented the mutual slaughter which threatened the Romans and the Sabines.'—ADDISON.

On this vain hope, adulterers, thieves rely,
And to this altar vile assassins fly.—JENYNS.

CARNAGE, SLAUGHTER, MASSACRE, BUTCHERY.

Carnage, from the Latin caro carnis flesh, implies properly a collection of dead flesh, that is, the reducing to the state of dead flesh; slaughter, from slay, is the act of taking away life; massacre, in French massacre, comes from the Latin macrare, to kill for sacrifice; butchery, from to butcher, signifies the act of butchering; in French boucherie, from bouche the mouth, signifies the killing for food.

Carnage respects the number of dead bodies made; it may be said either of men or animals, but more commonly of the former; slaughter respects the act of taking away life, and the circumstances of the agent; massacre and butchery respect the circumstances of the objects who are the sufferers of the action: the three latter are said of human beings only.

Carnage is the consequence of any impetuous attack from a powerful enemy. Soldiers who get into a besieged town, or a wolf who breaks into a sheepfold, commonly make a dreadful carnage;

The carnage Juno from the skies survey'd,
And, touch'd with grief, bespoke the blue-ey'd maid.
POPE.

Slaughter is the consequence of warfare. In battles the slaughter will be very considerable where both parties defend themselves pertinaciously;

Yet, yet a little, and destructive slaughter
Shall rage around and mar this beauteous prospect.
ROWE.

A massacre is the consequence of secret and personal resentment between bodies of people. It is always a stain upon the nation by whom it is practised, as it cannot be effected without a violent breach of confidence, and a direct act of treachery; of this description was the massacre of the Danes by the original Britons, and the massacre of the Huguenots in France;

Our groaning country bled at every vein;
When murders, rapes, and massacres prevail'd.
ROWE.

Butchery is the general accompaniment of a massacre, defenceless women and children are commonly butchery by the savage furies who are most active in this work of blood;

Let us be sacrificers, but not butchers.—SHAKESPEARE.

BODY, CORPSE, CARCASS.

Body is here taken in the improper sense for a dead body; corpse, from the Latin corpus a body, has also been turned from its derivation to signify a dead body; carcass, in French carcasse, is compounded of caro and cassa vita, signifying flesh without life.

Body is applicable to either men or brutes, corpse to men only, and carcass to brutes only, unless when taken in a contemptuous sense. When speaking of any particular person who is deceased we should use the simple term body; the body was suffered to lie too long unburied: when designating its condition as lifeless, the term corpse is preferable; he was taken up as a corpse: when designating the body as a lifeless lump separated from the soul, it may be characterized (though contemptuously) as a carcass; the fowls devour the carcass;

A groan, as of a troubled ghost, renew'd
My fright, and then these dreadful words ensued:
Why dost thou thus my buried body rend,
Oh! spare the corpse of thy unhappy friend.

DRYDEN.

On the bleak shore now lies th' abandon'd king,
A headless carcass, and a nameless thing.

DRYDEN.

EMBRYO, FŒTUS.

Embryo, in French embrion, Greek ἐμβρυον, from βῆω to germinate, signifies the thing germinated; fetus, in French fetus, Latin fetus, from foveo to cherish, signifies the thing cherished, both words referring to what is formed in the womb of the mother; but embryo properly implies the first fruit of conception, and the fetus that which is arrived to a maturity of formation. Anatomists tell us that the embryo in the human subject assumes the character of the fetus about the forty-second day after conception.

Fetus is applicable only in its proper sense to animals: embryo has a figurative application to plants and fruits when they remain in a confused and imperfect state, and also a moral application to plans, or whatever is roughly conceived in the mind.

CORPORAL, CORPOREAL, BODILY.

Corporal, corporeal, and bodily, as their origin speaks, have all relation to the same object, the body; but the two former are employed to signify relating or appertaining to the body; the latter to denote containing or forming part of the body. Hence we say, corporal punishment, bodily vigour or strength, corporeal substances; the Godhead bodily, the corporeal frame, bodily exertion; 'Bettesworth was so little satisfied with this account, that he publicly professed his resolution of a violent and corporeal revenge, but the inhabitants of St. Patrick's district imbibed themselves in the Dean's (Swift's) defence.'—JOHNSON.

Corporal is only employed for the animal frame in its proper sense; corporeal is used for animal substance in an extended sense; hence we speak of corporeal sufrance and corporeal agents; 'When the soul is freed from all corporeal alliance then it truly exists.'—HUGHES. Corporeal is distinguished from spiritual; bodily from mental. It is impossible to represent spiritual beings any other way than under a corporeal form; bodily pains, however severe, are frequently overpowered by mental pleasures; 'The soul is beset with a numerous train of temptations to evil which arise from bodily appetites.'—BLAIR.

CORPOREAL, MATERIAL.

Corporeal is properly a species of material; what ever is corporeal is material, but not vice versâ. Corporeal respects animate bodies; material is used for every thing which can act on the senses, animate or inanimate. The world contains corporeal beings and consists of material substances;

Grant that corporeal is the human mind,
It must have parts in infinitum join'd;
And each of these must will, perceive, design,
And draw confus'dly in a diff'rent line.—JENYNS.

'In the present material system in which we live, and where the objects that surround us are continually exposed to the examination of our senses, how many things occur that are mysterious and unaccountable.'—BLAIR.

CORPULENT, STOUT, LUSTY.

Corpulent from corpus the body, signifies having fulness of body; stout, in Dutch stott, is no doubt a variation of the German stättig steady, signifying able to stand, solid, firm; lusty, in German, &c. lustig merry, cheerful, implies here a vigorous state of body.

Corpulent respects the fleshy state of the body; stout respects also the state of the muscles and bones: corpulence is therefore an incidental property; stoutness is a natural property; corpulence may come upon a person according to circumstances; 'Mallet's stature was diminutive, but he was regularly formed; his appearance, till he grew corpulent, was agreeable, and he suffered it to want no recommendation that dress could give it.'—JOHNSON. Stoutness is the natural make of the body which is born with us;

Hence rose the Marsian and Sabellian race,
Strong limb'd and stout, and to the wars inclin'd.

DRYDEN.

Corpulence and lustiness are both occasioned by the state of the health; but the former may arise from disease; the latter is always the consequence of good health: corpulence consists of an undue proportion of fat; lustiness consists of a due and full proportion of all the solids in the body;

Though I look old, yet I am strong and lusty,
For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors to my blood.

SHAKESPEARE.

LEAN, MEAGRE.

Lean is in all probability connected with line, lank, and long, signifying that which is simply long without any other dimension; meagre, in Latin macer, Greek μικρός small.

Lean denotes want of fat; meagre want of flesh: what is lean is not always meagre; but nothing can be meagre without being lean. Brutes as well as men are lean, but men only are said to be meagre: lean-ness is frequently connected with the temperament; meagreness is the consequence of starvation and disease. There are some animals by nature inclined to be lean; a meagre pale visage is to be seen perpetually in the haunts of vice and poverty;

Who ambles time withal
With a priest that lacks Latin,
And with a rich man that hath not the gout,
The one lacking the burthen of lean and Wasteful learning; the other knowing nor
Burthen of heavy tedious penury.—SHAKESPEARE.
So thin, so ghastly meagre, and so wan,
So bare of flesh, he scarce resembled man.

DRYDEN.

MEMBER, LIMB.

Member, in Latin membrum, probably from the Greek μέρος a part, because a member is properly a part; limb is connected with the word lame.

Member is a general term applied either to the animal body or to other bodies, as a member of a family, or a member of a community: limb is applicable to animal bodies; limb is therefore a species of member; for every limb is a member, but every member is not a limb.

The members of the body comprehend every part which is capable of performing a distinct office, but the limbs are those jointed members that are distinguished from the head and the body: the nose and the eyes are members but not limbs; the arms and legs are properly denominated limbs; 'A man's limbs (by which for the present we only understand those members the loss of which only amounts to mayhem by the common law) are the gifts of the wise Creator to enable him to protect himself from external injuries.'—BLACKSTONE.

ANIMAL, BRUTE, BEAST.

Animal, in French animal, Latin animal, from anima life, signifies the thing having life; brute is in French brute, Latin brutus dull, Greek βάρυς, Chaldee כרות foolishness; beast, in French bête, Latin bestia, changed from bostema, Greek βόσκημα a beast of burden, and βόσκειν to feed, signifies properly the thing that feeds.

Animal is the generic, brute and beast are the specific terms. The animal is the thing that lives and moves. If animal be considered as thinking, willing, reflecting, and acting, it is confined in its signification to the human species; if it be regarded as limited in all the functions which mark intelligence and will, if it be divested of speech and reason, it belongs to the brute; if animal be considered, moreover, as to its appetites, independent of reason, of its destination, and consequent dependence on its mental powers; it descends to the beast.

Man and brute are opposed. To man an immortal soul is assigned; but we are not authorized by Scripture to extend this dignity to the brutes. 'The brutes that perish' is the ordinary mode of distinguishing that part of the animal creation from the superior order of terrestrial beings who are destined to exist in a future world. Men cannot be exposed to a greater degradation than to be divested of their particular characteristics, and classed under the general name of animal, unless we except that which assigns to them the epithet of brute or beast, which, as designating peculiar atrocity of conduct, does not always carry with it a reproach equal to the infamy of a thing; the perversion of the rational faculty is at all times more shocking and disgraceful than the absence of it by nature; 'Some would be apt to say, he is a conjurer; for he has found that a republic is not made up of every body of animals, but is composed of men only and not of horses.'—STEELE 'As nature has framed the several species of beings as it were in a chain; so man seems to be placed as the middle link between angels and brutes.'—ADDISON.

Whom e'en the savage beasts had spar'd they kill'
And strew'd his mangled limbs about the field.

DRYDEN.

SOUND, TONE.

Sound, in Latin sonus, and tone, in Latin tonus may probably both come from the Greek τέλω to stretch or exert, signifying simply an exertion of the voice; but

I should rather derive sound from the Hebrew שוּעַ
Sound is that which issues from any body, so as to become audible; tone is a species of sound, which is produced from particular bodies: the sound may be accidental; we may hear the sounds of waters or leaves, of animals or men: tones are those particular sounds which are made either to express a particular feeling, or to produce harmony; a sheep will cry for its lost young in a tone of distress; an organ is so formed as to send forth the most solemn tones; 'The sounds of the voice, according to the various touches which raise them, form themselves into an acute or grave, quick or slow, loud or soft, tone.'—HUGHES.

SMELL, SCENT, ODOUR, PERFUME, FRAGRANCE.

Smell and melt are in all probability connected together, because smells arise from the evaporation of bodies; scent, changed from sent, comes from the Latin sentio, to perceive or feel; odour, in Latin odori, comes from oleo, in Greek ἔλαιο to smell; perfume, compounded of per or pro and fumo or fumus a smoke or vapour; that is, the vapour that issues forth; fragrance, in Latin fragrantia, comes from frago, anciently frago, that is, to perfume or smell like the fraga or strawberry.

Smell and scent are said either of that which receives, or that which gives the smell; the odour, the perfume, and fragrance of that which communicates the smell. In the first case, smell is said generally of all living things without distinction; scent is said only of such animals as have this peculiar faculty of tracing objects by their smell: some persons have a much quicker smell than others, and some have an acuter smell of particular objects than they have of things in general: dogs are remarkable for their quickness of scent, by which they can trace their masters and other objects at an immense distance: other animals are gifted with this faculty to a surprising degree, which serves them as a means of defence against their enemies;

Then curses his conspiring feet, whose scent
Betrays that safety which their swiftness lent.

DENHAM.

In the second case, smell is compared with odour, perfume, and fragrance, either as respects the objects communicating the smell, or the nature of the smell which is communicated. Smell is indefinite in its sense, and universal in its application; odour, perfume, and fragrance are species of smells: every object is said to smell which acts on the olfactory nerves; flowers, fruits, woods, earth, water, and the like, have a smell; but odour is said of that which is artificial; the perfume and fragrance of that which is natural: the burning of things produces an odour;

So flowers are gathered to adorn a grave,
To lose their freshness among bones and rottenness,
And have their odours stifled in the dust.—ROWE.

The perfume and fragrance arise from flowers or sweet smelling herbs, spices, and the like. The terms smell and odour do not specify the exact nature of that which issues from bodies; they may both be either pleasant or unpleasant; but smell, if taken in certain connexions, signifies a bad smell, and odour signifies that which is sweet: meat which is kept too long will have a smell, that is, of course, a bad smell; the odours from a sacrifice are acceptable, that is, the sweet odours ascend to heaven. Perfume is properly a wide-spreading smell, and when taken without any epithet signifies a pleasant smell;

At last a soft and solemn breathing sound
Rose like a steam of rich distill'd perfumes.

MILTON.

Fragrance never signifies any thing but what is good; it is the sweetest and most powerful perfume: the perfume from flowers and shrubs is as grateful to one's sense as their colours and conformation are to the other; the fragrance from groves of myrtle and orange trees surpasses the beauty of their fruits or foliage;

Soft vernal fragrance clothe the flow'ring earth.

MASON.

TO SOAK, DRENCH, STEEP.

Soak is a variation of suck; drench is a variation of drink; steep, in Saxon steapan, &c. from the Hebrew satep, signifies to overflow or overwhelm.

The idea of communicating or receiving a liquid is common to these terms. We soak things in water when we wish to soften them; animals are drenched with liquid as a medicinal operation. A person's clothes are soaked in rain when the water has penetrated every thread; he himself is drenched in the rain when it has penetrated as it were his very body; drench therefore in this case only expresses the idea of soak in a stronger manner. To steep is a species of soaking employed as an artificial process; to soak is however a permanent action by which hard things are rendered soft; to steep is a temporary action by which soft bodies become penetrated with a liquid: thus salt meat requires to be soaked; fruits are sometimes steeped in brandy;

Drill'd through the sandy stratum, every way
The waters with the sandy stratum rise,
And clear and sweeten as they soak along.

THOMSON.

And deck with fruitful trees the fields around,
And with refreshing waters drench the ground.

DRYDEN.

O sleep, O gentle sleep,
Nature's soft nurse! How have I frighted thee,
That thou no more wilt weigh my eyelids down,
And steep my senses in forgetfulness?

SHAKESPEARE

TASTE, FLAVOUR, RELISH, SAVOUR.

Taste comes from the Teutonick tasten to touch lightly, and signifies either the organ which is easily affected, or the act of discriminating by a light touch of the organ, or the quality of the object which affects the organ; in this latter sense it is closely allied to the other terms; flavour most probably comes from the Latin fluo to breathe, signifying the rarefied essence of bodies which affect the organ of taste; relish is derived by Minshew from relecher to lick again, signifying that which pleases the palate so as to tempt to a renewal of the act of tasting; savour, in Latin sapor and sapio to smell, taste, or be sensible, most probably comes from the Hebrew שפּה the mouth or palate, which is the organ of taste.

Taste is the most general and indefinite of all these; it is applicable to every object that can be applied to the organ of taste, and to every degree and manner in which the organ can be affected: some things are tasteless, other things have a strong taste, and others a mixed taste;

Ten thousand thousand precious gifts
My daily thanks employ!
Nor is the least a cheerful heart,
That tastes those gifts with joy.—ADDISON.

The flavour is the predominating taste, and consequently is applied to such objects as may have a different kind or degree of taste; an apple may not only have the general taste of apple, but also a flavour peculiar to itself: the flavour is commonly said of that which is good, as a fine flavour, a delicious flavour; but it may designate that which is not always agreeable, as the flavour of fish, which is unpleasant in things that do not admit of such a taste; 'The Philippick islands give a flavour to our European bowls.'—ADDISON. The relish is also a particular taste; but it is that which is artificial, in distinction from the flavour, which may be the natural property. We find the flavour such as it is; we give the relish such as it should be, or we wish it to be: milk and butter receive a flavour from the nature of the food with which the cow is supplied; sauces are used in order to give a relish to the food that is dressed;

I love the people,
But do not like to stage me to their eyes,
Though it do well, I do not relish well
Their loud applause.—SHAKESPEARE.

Savour is a term in less frequent use than the others, but, agreeable to the Latin derivation, it is employed to designate that which smells as well as tastes, a sweet smelling savour;

The pleasant savoury smell
So quicken'd appetite, that I methought
Could not but taste.—MILTON.

So likewise, in the moral application, a man's actions or expressions may be said to savour of vanity. Taste and relish may be moreover compared as the act of persons: we taste whatever affects our taste; but we relish that only which pleases our taste; we taste fruits in order to determine whether they are good or bad; we relish fruits as a dessert, or at certain seasons of the day. So likewise, in the moral application, we have a relish for books, for learning, for society, and the like.

PALATE, TASTE.

Palate, in Latin palatum, comes either from the Greek πᾶν to eat, or, which is more probable, from the Etruscan word farlantum, signifying the roof or arch of Heaven, or, by an extended application, the roof of the mouth; taste comes from the German tasten to touch lightly, because the sense of taste requires but the slightest touch to excite it.

Palate is, in an improper sense, employed for taste, because it is the seat of taste; but taste is never employed for palate: a person is said to have a nice palate when he is nice in what he eats or drinks; but his taste extends to all matters of sense, as well as those which are intellectual;

No fruit our palate courts, or flow'r our smell

JENYNS

A man of taste, or of a nice taste, conveys much more as a characteristic, than a man of a nice palate: the former is said only in a good sense; but the latter is particularly applicable to the epicure;

In more exalted joys to fix our taste,
And wean us from delights that cannot last.

JENYNS.

INSIPID, DULL, FLAT.

A want of spirit in the moral sense is designated by these epithets, which borrow their figurative meaning from different properties in nature: the taste is referred to in the word insipid, from the Latin sapio to taste; the properties of colours are considered under the word dull (v. Dull); the property of surface is referred to by the word flat (v. Flat). As the want of flavour in any meat constitutes it insipid, and renders it worthless, so does the want of mind or character in a man render him equally insipid, and devoid of the distinguishing characteristic of his nature: as the beauty and perfection of colours consist in their brightness, and the absence of this essential property, which constitutes dulness, renders them uninteresting objects to the eye, so the want of spirit in a moral composition, which constitutes its dulness, deprives it at the same time of that ingredient which should awaken attention: as in the natural world objects are either elevated or flat, so in the moral world the spirits are either raised or depressed, and such moral representations as are calculated to raise the spirits are termed spirited, while those which fail in this object are termed flat. An insipid writer is without sentiment of any kind or degree; a dull writer fails in vivacity and vigour of sentiment; a flat performance is wanting in the property of provoking mirth, which should be its peculiar ingredient; 'To a covetous man all other things but wealth are insipid.'—SOUTH.

But yet beware of counsils when too full,
Number makes long disputes and graveness dull.

DENHAM.

The senses are disgusted with their old entertainments, and existence turns flat and insipid.—GROVE.

FEAST, BANQUET, CAROUSAL, ENTERTAINMENT, TREAT.

As feasts, in the religious sense, from festus, are always days of leisure, and frequently of public rejoicing, this word has been applied to any social meal for the purposes of pleasure: this is the idea common to the signification of all these words, of which feast seems to be the most general; and for all of which it may frequently be substituted, although they have each a distinct application: feast conveys the idea merely of enjoyment; banquet is a splendid feast, attended with pomp and state; it is a term of noble use, particularly adapted to poetry and the high style: carousal, in French carouse, in German geräusch, or rausch intoxication, from rauschen to intoxicate, is a drunken feast: entertainment and treat convey the idea of hospitality.

A feast may be given by princes or their subjects, by nobility or commonality;

New purple hangings clothe the palace walls,
And sumptuous feasts are made in splendid halls.

DRYDEN.

The banquet is confined to men of high estate; and more commonly spoken of in former times, when ranks and distinctions were less blended than they are at present: the dinner which the Lord Mayor of London annually gives is properly denominated a feast; the mode in which Cardinal Wolsey received the French ambassadors might entitle every meal he gave to be denominated a banquet;

With hymns divine the joyous banquet ends,
The pæans lengthen'd till the sun descends.—POPE.

A feast supposes indulgence of the appetite, both in eating and drinking, but not intemperately; a carousal is confined mostly to drinking, and that for the most part to an excess;

This game, these carousals, Ascanius taught,
And, building Alba, to the Latins brought.

DRYDEN.

33

A feast, therefore, is always a good thing, unless it ends in a carousal: a feast may be given by one or many, at private or public expense; but an entertainment and a treat are altogether personal acts, and the terms are never used but in relation to the agents: every entertainment is a feast as far as respects enjoyment at a social board; but no feast is an entertainment unless there be some individual who specifically provides for the entertainment of others: we may all be partakers of a feast, but we are guests at an entertainment: the Lord Mayor's feast is not strictly an entertainment, although that of Cardinal Wolsey was properly so. an entertainment is given between friends and equals, to keep alive the social affections; a treat is given by way of favour to those whom one wishes to oblige: a nobleman provides an entertainment for a particular party whom he has invited; 'I could not but smile at the account that was yesterday given me of a modest young gentleman, who, being invited to an entertainment, though he was not used to drink, had not the confidence to refuse his glass in his turn.'—ADDISON. A nobleman may give a treat to his servants, his tenants, his tradespeople, or the poor of his neighbourhood; 'I do not insist that you spread your table with so unbounded a profusion as to furnish out a splendid treat with the remains.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero).

Feast, entertainment, and treat are taken in a more extended sense, to express other pleasures besides those of the table: feast retains its signification of a vivid pleasure, such as voluptuaries derive from delicious viands; entertainment and treat retain the idea of being granted by way of courtesy: we speak of a thing as being a feast or high delight; 'Beattie is the only author I know, whose critical and philosophical researches are diversified and embellished by a poetical imagination, that makes even the driest subject and the leanest a feast for an epicure in books.'—COWPER. And of a person contributing to one's entertainment, or giving one a treat; 'Let us consider to whom we are indebted for all these entertainments of sense.'—ADDISON.

Sing my praise in strain sublime.

Treat not me with dogg're rhyme.—SWIFT

To an envious man the sight of wretchedness, in a once prosperous rival, is a feast; to a benevolent mind the spectacle of an afflicted man relieved and comforted is a feast; to a mind ardent in the pursuit of knowledge, an easy access to a well-stocked library is a continual feast: men of a happy temper give and receive entertainment with equal facility; they afford entertainment to their guests by the easy cheerfulness which they impart to every thing around them; they in like manner derive entertainment from every thing they see, or hear, or observe: a treat is given or received only on particular occasions; it depends on the relative circumstances and tastes of the giver and receiver; to one of a musical turn one may give a treat by inviting him to a musical party; and to one of an intelligent turn it will be equally a treat to be of the party which consists of the enlightened and conversible.

FARE, PROVISION.

Fare, from the German fahren to go or be, signifies in general the condition or thing that comes to one; provision, from provide, signifies the thing provided for one.

These terms are alike employed for the ordinary concerns of life, and may either be used in the limited sense for the food one procures, or in general for what ever is necessary or convenient to be procured: to the term fare is annexed the idea of accident; provision includes that of design: a traveller on the continent must frequently be contented with humble fare, unless he has the precaution of carrying his provisions with him;

This night at least with me forget your care,
Chesnuts, and curds, and cream shall be your fare;
DRYDEN.

The winged nation wanders through the skies,
And o'er the plains and shady forest flies;
They breed, they brood, instruct, and educate.
And make provision for the future state.—DRYDEN.

FOOD, DIET, REGIMEN.

Food signifies the thing which one feeds upon, in Saxon fode, Low German fode or föder, Greek βόρεον; diet comes from διαίρω to live medicinally, signifying any particular mode of living; regimen, in Latin regimen, from rego to regulate, signifies a system or practice by rule.

All these terms refer to our living, or that by which we live: food is here the general term; the others are specific. Food specifies no circumstance; whatever is taken to maintain life is food; diet is properly a prescribed or regular food. It is the hard lot of some among the poor to obtain with difficulty food and clothing for themselves and their families; an attention to the diet of children is an important branch of their early education; their diet can scarcely be too simple: no one can be expected to enjoy his food who is not in a good state of health; we cannot expect to find a healthy population where there is a spare and unwholesome diet, attended with hard labour.

Food is a term applicable to all living creatures, and also used figuratively for what serves to nourish; 'The poison of other states (that is, bankruptcy) is the food of the new republic.'—BURKE. Diet is employed only with regard to human beings who make choice of their food: corn is as much the natural food of some animals as of men; the diet of the peasantry consists mostly of bread, milk, and vegetables; 'The diet of men in a state of nature must have been confined almost wholly to the vegetable kind.'—BURKE.

Diet and regimen are both particular modes of living; but the former respects the quality of food; the latter the quantity as well as quality: diet is confined to modes of taking nourishment; regimen often respects the abstinence from food, bodily exercise, and whatever may conduce to health: diet is generally the consequence of an immediate prescription from a physician, and during the period of sickness; regimen commonly forms a regular part of a man's system of living: diet is in certain cases of such importance for the restoration of a patient that a single deviation may defeat the best medicine; it is the misfortune of some people to be troubled with diseases, from which they cannot get any exemption but by observing a strict regimen; 'Prolongation of life is rather to be expected from stated diets than from any common regimen.'—BACON. 'I shall always be able to entertain a friend of a philosophical regimen.'—SHENSTONE.

FEMALE, FEMININE, EFFEMINATE.

Female is said of the sex itself, and feminine of the characteristics of the sex. Female is opposed to male, feminine to masculine.

In the female character we expect to find that which is feminine. The female dress, manners, and habits have engaged the attention of all essayists, from the time of Addison to the present period;

Once more her haughty soul the tyrant bends,
To prayers and mean submissions she descends;
No female arts or aids she left untried,
Nor counsels unexplor'd, before she died.

DRYDEN.

The feminine is natural to the female; the effeminate is unnatural to the male. A feminine air and voice, which is truly grateful to the observer in the one sex, is an odious mark of effeminacy in the other. Beauty and delicacy are feminine properties;

Her heavenly form

Angelick: but more soft and feminine
Her graceful innocence.—MILTON.

Robustness and vigour are masculine properties; the former therefore when discovered in a man entitle him to the epithet of effeminate; 'Our martial ancestors, like some of their modern successors, had no other amusement (but hunting) to entertain their vacant hours; despising all arts as effeminate.'—BLACKSTONE.

GENDER, SEX.

Gender, in Latin genus, signifies properly a genus or kind; sex, in French sexe, Latin sexus, comes from the Greek ἑξ, signifying the habit or nature. The gender is that distinction in words which marks the distinction of sex in things; there are therefore three genders, but only two sexes. By the inflections of words are denoted whether things are of this or that sex, or of no sex. The genders, therefore, are divided in grammar into masculine, feminine, and neuter; and animals are divided into male and female sex.

GOLD, GOLDEN.

These terms are both employed as epithets, but gold is the substantive used in composition, and golden the adjective, in ordinary use. The former is strictly applied to the metal of which the thing is made, as a gold cup, or a gold coin; but the latter to whatever appertains to gold, whether properly or figuratively: as the golden lion, the golden crown, the golden age, or a golden harvest.

COOL, COLD, FRIGID.

In the natural sense, cool is simply the absence of warmth; cold and frigid are positively contrary to warmth; the former in regard to objects in general, the latter to moral objects: in the physical sense the analogy is strictly preserved. Cool is used as it respects the passions and the affections; cold only with regard to the affections; frigid only in regard to the inclinations.

With regard to the passions, cool designates a freedom from agitation, which is a desirable quality. Coolness in a time of danger, and coolness in an argument, are alike commendable.

As cool and cold respect the affections, the cool is opposed to the friendly, the cold to the warm-hearted, the frigid to the animated; the former is but a degree of the latter. A reception is said to be cool; an embrace to be cold; a sentiment frigid. Coolness is an enemy to social enjoyments; coldness is an enemy to every moral virtue; frigidity destroys all force of character. Coolness is engendered by circumstances; it supposes the previous existence of warmth; coldness lies often in the temperament, or is engendered by habit; it is always something vicious; frigidity is occasional, and is always a defect. Trifling differences produce coolness sometimes between the best friends; 'The jealous man's disease is of so malignant a nature, that it converts all it takes into its own nourishment. A cool behaviour is interpreted as an instance of aversion: a fond one raises his suspicions.'—ADDISON. Trade sometimes engenders a cold calculating temper in some minds; 'It is wondrous that a man can get over the natural existence and possession of his own mind, so far as to take delight either in paying or receiving cold and repeated civilities.'—STEELE. Those who are remarkable for apathy will often express themselves with frigid indifference on the most important subjects; 'The religion of the moderns abounds in topicks so incomparably noble and exalted, as might kindle the flames of genuine oratory in the most frigid and barren genius.'—WHARTON.

CHILL, COLD.

Chill and cold are but variations of the same word, in German kalt, &c.

Chill expresses less than cold, that is to say, it expresses a degree of cold. The weather is often chilly in summer; but it is cold in winter.

We speak of taking the chill off water when the cold is in part removed; and of a chill running through the frame when the cold begins to penetrate the frame that is in a state of warmth;

When men once reach their autumn, fickle joys
Fall off apace, as yellow leaves from trees;
Till left quite naked of their happiness,
In the chill blasts of winter they expire.

YOUNG

'Thus ease after torment is pleasure for a time, and we are very agreeably recruited when the body, chilled with the weather, is gradually recovering its natural tepidity; but the joy ceases when we have forgot the cold.'—JOHNSON.

TO STAIN, SOIL, SULLY, TARNISH.

Stain, v. Blemish; soil and sully, from soil, dirt, signify to smear with dirt; tarnish in French ternir comes probably from the Latin tere, to bruise

All these terms imply the act of diminishing the brightness of an object; but the term stain denotes something grosser than the other terms, and is applied to inferior objects: things which are not remarkable for purity or brightness may be stained, as hands when stained with blood, or a wall stained with chalk;

Thou, rather than thy justice should be chinked,
Didst stain the cross.—YOUNG.

Nothing is sullied or tarnished, but what has some intrinsic value; a fine picture or piece of writing may be easily soiled by a touch of the finger; 'I cannot endure to be mistaken, or suffer my purer affections to be soiled with the odious attributes of covetousness and ambitious falsehood.'—LORD WENTWORTH. 'The finest glass is the soonest tarnished: hence, in the moral application, a man's life may be stained by the commission of some gross immorality: his honour may be sullied, or his glory tarnished;

Oaths would debase the dignity of virtue,
Else I could swear by him, the power who clothed
The sun with light, and gave you sunny host
Their chaste, unsullied lustre.—FRANCIS.

'I am not now what I once was; for since I parted from thee fate has tarnished my glories.'—TRAPP.

TO SMEAR, DAUB.

To smear is literally to do over with smear, in Saxon smær, German schmear, in Greek σμερ as a verb. To daub, from do and ub over, signifies literally to do over with any thing unseemly, or in an unsightly manner.

To smear in the literal sense is applied to such substances as may be rubbed like grease over a body; if said of grease itself it may be proper, as coachmen smear the coach wheels with tar or grease; but if said of any thing else it is an improper action, and tends to disfigure, as children smear their hands with ink, or smear their clothes with dirt. To smear and daub are both actions which tend to disfigure; but we smear by means of rubbing over; we daub by rubbing, throwing, or any way covering over: thus a child smears the window with his finger, or he daubs the wall with dirt. By a figurative application, smear is applied to bad writing, and daub to bad painting: indifferent writers who wish to excel are fond of retouching their letters until they make their performance a sad smear; bad artists, who are injudicious in the use of their pencil, load their paintings with colour, and convert them into daubs.

MOISTURE, HUMIDITY, DAMPNESS.

Moisture, from the French moite moist, is probably contracted from the Latin humidus, from which humidity is immediately derived; dampness comes from the German dampf a vapour.

Moisture is used in general to express any small degree of infusion of a liquid in or on a body; humidity is employed scientifically to describe the state of having any portion of such liquid: hence we speak of the moisture of a table, the moisture of paper, or the moisture of a floor that has been wetted; but of the humidity of the air, or of a wall that has contracted moisture of itself. Dampness is that species of moisture that arises from the gradual contraction of a liquid in bodies capable of retaining it; in this manner a cellar is damp, or linen that has lain long by may become damp;

The plump people streak their wings with oil,
To throw the lucid moisture trickling off.

THOMSON.

Now from the town
Buried in smoke, and sleep, and noisome damps,
Oft let me wander.—THOMSON.

NASTY, FILTHY, FOUL.

Nasty is connected with nauseous, and the German nass wet; filthy and foul are variations from the Greek φαιδός.

The idea of dirtiness is common to these terms, but in different degrees, and with different modifications. Whatever dirt is offensive to any of the senses, renders that thing nasty which is soiled with it: the filthy exceeds the nasty, not only in the quantity but in the offensive quality of the dirt; and the foul exceeds the filthy in the same proportion;

We look behind, then view his shaggy beard,
His clothes were tagg'd with thorns, and filth his limbs besmear'd.—DRYDEN.

Only our foe
Tempting affronts us with his foul esteem.

MILTON.

DREGS, SEDIMENT, DROSS, SCUM, REFUSE.

Dregs, from the German dreck dirt, signifies the dirty part which separates from a liquor; sediment, from sedeo to sit, signifies that which settles at the bottom; dross is probably but a variation of dregs; scum, from the German schaum, signifies the same as foam or froth, or that which rises on the surface of any liquor: refuse signifies literally that which is refused or thrown away.

All these terms designate the worthless part of any body; but dregs is taken in a worse sense than sediment: for the dregs are that which is altogether of no value; but the sediment may sometimes form a necessary part of the body. The dregs are mostly a sediment in liquors, but many things are a sediment which are not dregs. After the dregs are taken away, there will frequently remain a sediment; the dregs are commonly the corrupt part which separates from compound liquids, as wine or beer; the sediment consists of the heavy particles which belong to all simple liquids, not excepting water itself. The dregs and sediment separate of themselves, but the scum and dross are forced out by a process; the former from liquids, and the latter from solid bodies rendered liquid or otherwise.

Refuse, as its derivation implies, is always said of that which is intentionally separated to be thrown away, and agrees with the former terms only inasmuch as they express what is worthless.

Of these terms, dregs, scum, and refuse admit likewise of a figurative application. The dregs and scum of the people are the corrupt part of any society; and the refuse is that which is most worthless and unfit for a respectable community; 'Epitomes of history are the corruptions and moths that have fretted and corroded many sound and excellent bodies of history and reduced them to base and unprofitable dregs.'—BACON. 'For it is not bare agitation, but the sediment at the bottom that troubles and defiles the water.'—SOUTH. 'For the composition too, I admit the Algerine community resemble that of France, being formed out of the very scum, scandal, disgrace, and pest of the Turkish Asia.'—BURKE.

Now cast your eyes around, while I dissolve
The mist and film that mortal eyes involve:
Purge from your sight the dross, and make you see
The shape of each avenging deity.—DRYDEN.

Next of his men and ships he makes review,
Draws out the best and ablest of the crew;
Down with the falling stream the refuse run
To raise with joyful news his drooping son.

DRYDEN

TO GLOSS, VARNISH, PALLIATE.

Gloss and varnish are figurative terms, which borrow their signification from the act of rendering the outer surface of any physical object shining. To gloss, which is connected with to glaze, is to give a gloss or brightness to any thing by means of friction, as in the case of japan or mahogany: to varnish is to give an artificial gloss, by means of applying a foreign substance. Hence, in the figurative use of the terms, to gloss is to put the best face upon a thing by various little distortions and artifices; but to varnish is to do the same thing by means of direct falsehood; to palliate, which likewise signifies to give the best possible outside to a thing (v. To extenuate), requires still less artifice than either. One glosses over that which is bad, by giving it a soft name; as when a man's vices are glossed over with the name of indiscretion, or a man's mistress is termed his good friend; 'If a jealous man once finds a false gloss put upon any single action he quickly suspects all the rest.'—ADDISON. One varnishes a bad character by ascribing good motives to his bad actions, by withholding many facts that are to his discredit, and fabricating other circumstances in his favour: an unvarnished tale contains nothing but the simple truth; the varnished tale on the other hand contains a great mixture of falsehood; the French accounts of their victories in the time of the revolution were mostly varnished;

The waiting tears stood ready for command,
And now they flew to varnish the false tale.

ROWE.

To palliate is to diminish the magnitude of an offence, by making an excuse in favour of the offender; as when an act of theft is palliated by considering the starving condition of the thief; 'A man's bodily defects should give him occasion to exert a noble spirit, and to palliate those imperfections which are not in his power, by those perfections which are.'—ADDISON.

CLOAK, MASK, BLIND, VEIL.

These are figurative terms, expressive of different modes of intentionally keeping something from the view of others. They are borrowed from those familiar objects which serve similar purposes in common life. Cloak and mask express figuratively and properly more than blind or veil. The two former keep the whole object out of sight; the two latter only partially intercept the view. In this figurative sense they are all employed for a bad purpose.

The cloak, the mask, and the blind serve to deceive others; the veil serves to deceive one's self.

The whole or any part of a character may be concealed by a blind; a part, though not the whole, may be concealed by a mask. A blind is not only employed to conceal the character but the conduct or proceedings. We carry a cloak and a mask about with us; but a blind is something external.

The cloak, as the external garment, is the most convenient of all coverings for entirely keeping concealed what we do not wish to be seen; a good outward deportment serves as a cloak to conceal a bad character; 'When this severity of manners is hypocritical, and assumed as a cloak to secret indulgence, it is one of the worst prostitutions of religion.'—BLAIR. A mask only hides the face; a mask therefore serves to conceal only as much as words and looks can effect;

Thou art no ruffian, who, beneath the mask
Of social commerce, com'st to rob their wealth.

THOMSON.

A blind is intended to shut out the light and prevent observation; whatever, therefore, conceals the real truth, and prevents suspicion by a false exterior, is a blind; 'Those who are bountiful to crimes will be rigid to merit, and penurious to service. Their penury is even held out as a blind and cover to their prodigality.'—BURKE. A veil prevents a person from seeing as well as being seen; whatever, therefore, obscures the mental sight acts as a veil to the mind's eye; 'As soon as that mysterious veil which covers futurity was lifted up, all the gaiety of life would disappear; its flattering hopes, its pleasing illusions would vanish, and nothing but vanity and sadness remain.'—BLAIR.

Religion may unfortunately serve to cloak the worst of purposes and the worst of characters; its importance, in the eyes of all men, makes it the most effectual passport to their countenance and sanction; and its external observances render it the most convenient mode of presenting a false profession to the eyes of the world: those, therefore, who set an undue value on the ceremonial part of religion, do but encourage this most heinous of all sins, by suffering themselves to be imposed upon by a cloak of religious hypocrisy. False friends always wear a mask; they cover a malignant heart under the smiles and endearments of friendship. Illicit traders mostly make use of some blind to facilitate the carrying on their nefarious practices. Among the various arts resorted to in the metropolis by the needy and profligate, none is so bad as that which is made to be a blind for the practice of debauchery. Prejudice and passion are the ordinary veils which obscure the judgement, and prevent it from distinguishing the truth.

TO COLOUR, DYE, TINGE, STAIN.

Colour, in Latin color, comes probably from colo to adorn; dye, in Saxon deagen, is a variation of tinge; tinge is in Latin tingo from the Greek τηννω to sprinkle; stain, like the French decolorer is but a variation of tinge.

To colour is to put colour on; to dye is to dip in any colour; to tinge is to touch lightly with a colour; to stain is to put on a bad colour or in a bad manner; we colour a drawing, we dye clothes of any colour we tinge a painting with blue by way of intermixture we stain a painting when we put blue instead of red; That childish colouring of her cheeks is now as ungraceful as that shape would have been when her face wore its real countenance.'—STEELE.

Now deeper blushes ting'd the glowing sky,
And evening rais'd her silver lamp on high.

SIR WM. JONES.

'We had the fortune to see what may be supposed to be the occasion of that opinion which Lucian relates concerning this river (Adonis), that is, that this stream at certain seasons of the year is of a bloody colour; something like this we actually saw come to pass, for the water was stained with redness.'—MAUNDRELL.

They are taken in a moral acceptation with a similar distinction: we colour a description by the introduction of strong figures, strong facts, and strong expressions; 'All these amazing incidents to the inspired historians relate nakedly and plainly, without any of the colourings and heightenings of rhetoric.'—WEST. Hence the term is employed to denote the giving a false or exaggerated representation; 'He colours the falsehood of Æneas by an express command from Jupiter to forsake the queen.'—DRYDEN. A person is represented as dying his hands in blood, who is so engaged in the shedding of blood as that he may change the colour of his skin, or the soil may be died in blood;

With mutual blood the Ausonian soil is died,
While on its borders each their claim decide.

DRYDEN.

A person's mind is tinged with melancholy or enthusiasm; 'Sir Roger is something of a humorist, and his virtues as well as imperfections are tinged by a certain extravagance, which makes them particularly his.'—ADDISON. A man's character may be said to be stained with crimes;

Of honour void, of innocence, of faith, of purity,
Our wonted ornaments, now soil'd and stain'd.

MILTON.

COLOUR, HUE, TINT.

Colour (v. To colour) is here the generic term; hue, which is probably connected with eye and view, and tint, from tinge, are but modes of colour; the former of which expresses a faint or blended colour; the latter a shade of colour. Between the colours of black and brown, as of all other leading colours, there are various hues and tints, by the due intermixture of which, natural objects are rendered beautiful;

Her colour chang'd, her face was not the same,
And hollow groans from her deep spirit came.

DRYDEN

SIR WM. JONES.

COLOURABLE, SPECIOUS, OSTENSIBLE, PLAUSIBLE, FEASIBLE.

Colourable, from to colour or tinge, expresses the quality of being able to give a fair appearance; specious, from the Latin specio to see, signifies the quality of looking as it ought; ostensible, from the Latin ostendo to show, signifies the quality of being able or fit to be shown or seen; plausible, from plaudo to clap or make a noise, signifies the quality of sounding as it ought; feasible, from the French faire, and Latin facio to do, signifies literally doable; but here it denotes seemingly practicable.

The first three of these are figures of speech drawn from what naturally pleases the eye; plausible is drawn from what pleases the ear; feasible takes its significance from what meets the judgement or conviction.

What is colourable has an aspect or face upon it that hells suspicion and affords satisfaction; what is specious has a fair outside when contrasted with that which it may possibly conceal; what is ostensible is that which presents such an appearance as may serve for an indication of something real; what is plausible is that which meets the understanding merely through the ear; that which is feasible recommends itself from its intrinsic value rather than from any representation given of it.

A pretence is colourable when it has the colour of truth impressed upon it; it is specious when its fallacy is easily discernible through the thin guise it wears; a motive is ostensible which is the one soonest to be discovered; an excuse is plausible when the well-connected narrative of the maker impresses a belief of its justice; an account is feasible which contains nothing improbable or singular.

It is necessary, in order to avoid suspicion, to have some colourable grounds for one's conduct when it is marked by eccentricity or directed to any bad object; All his (James I. of Scotland's) acquisitions, however fatal to the body of the nobles, had been gained by attacks upon individuals; and being founded on circumstances peculiar to the persons who suffered, night excite murmurs and apprehensions, but afforded no colourable pretext for a general rebellion.—ROBERTSON. Sophists are obliged to deal in specious arguments for want of more substantial ones in support of their erroneous opinions; 'The guardian directs one of his pupils to think with the wise, but speak with the vulgar. This is a precept specious enough, but not always practicable.'—JOHNSON. Men who have no ostensible way of supporting themselves, naturally excite the suspicion that they have some illicit source of gain; 'What is truly astonishing, the partisans of those two opposite systems were at once prevalent and at once employed, the one ostensibly, the other secretly, during the latter part of the reign of Louis XV.'—BURKE. Liars may sometimes be successful in inventing a plausible tale, but they must not scruple to support one lie by a hundred more as occasion requires; In this superficial way indeed the mind is capable of more variety of plausible talk, but is not enlarged as it should be in its knowledge.—LOCKE. If what an accused person has to say in justification of himself be no more than feasible, it will always subject him to unpleasant imputations; 'It is some years since I thought the matter feasible, that if I could by an exact time-keeper find in any part of the world what o'clock it is at Dover, and at the same time where the ship is, the problem is solved.'—ARBUUTHNOT.

TO COVER, HIDE.

Cover, in French couvrir, is contracted from contra and ouvrir, signifying to do the contrary of open, to put out of view: hide, v. To conceal.

Cover is to hide as the means to the end: we commonly hide by covering; but we may easily cover without hiding, as also hide without covering. The ruling idea in the word cover is that of throwing or putting something over a body; in the word hide is that of keeping carefully from observation.

To cover is an indifferent action, springing from a variety of motives, of convenience, or comfort; to hide is an action that springs from one specific intent, from care and concern for the thing, and the fear of foreign intrusion. In most civilized countries it is common to cover the head: in the eastern countries females commonly wear veils to hide the face. There are many things which decency as well as health require to be covered; and others which from their very nature must always be hidden. Houses must be covered with roofs, and bodies with clothing; the earth contains many treasures, which in all probability will always be hidden;

Or lead me to some solitary place
And cover my retreat from human race.—DRYDEN.

Hide me from the face
Of God, whom to behold was then my height
Of happiness.—MILTON.

In a moral application, cover may be used in the good sense of sheltering;

Thou mayst repent,
And one bad deed with many deeds well done
Mayst cover.—MILTON.

And also in the bad sense of hiding by means of falsehood;

Specious names are lent to cover vice.—SPECTATOR.

COVER, SHELTER, SCREEN.

Cover properly denotes what serves as a cover, and in the literal sense of the verb from which it is derived (v. To cover); shelter, like the word shield, comes from the German schild, old German schelen, to cover; screen, from the Latin secerno, signifies to keep off or apart.

Cover is literally applied to many particular things which are employed in covering; but in the general sense which makes it analogous to the other terms, it includes the idea of concealing: shelter comprehends that of protecting from some immediate or impending evil: screen includes that of warding off some trouble. A cover always supposes something which can extend over the whole surface of a body; a shelter or a screen may merely interpose to a sufficient extent to serve the intended purpose. Military operations are sometimes carried on under cover of the night; a bay is a convenient shelter for vessels against the violence of the winds; a chair may be used as a screen to prevent the violent action of the heat, or the external air.

In the moral sense, a cover may be employed allowably to diminish an imperfection or deformity; 'There are persons who cover their own rudeness by calling their conduct honest bluntness.'—RICHARDSON. But is for the most part taken in the bad sense of an endeavour to conceal the truth: a fair reputation is sometimes made the cover for the commission of gross irregularities in secret; 'The truth and reason of things may be artificially and effectually insinuated under the cover either of a real fact, or of a supposed one.'—L'ESTRANGE. When a person feels himself unable to withstand the attacks of his enemies, he seeks a shelter under the sanction and authority of a great name;

When on a bed of straw we sink together,
And the bleak winds shall whistle round our heads,
Wilt thou then talk to me thus?
Thus hush my cares, and shelter me with love?
OTWAY.

Bad men sometimes use wealth and power to screen them from the punishment which is due to their offences; 'It is frequent for men to adjudge that in an art impossible, which they find that art does not effect; by which means they screen indolence and ignorance from the reproach they merit.'—BACON.

TO HARBOUR, SHELTER, LODGE.

The idea of giving a resting place is common to these terms: but harbour (v. To foster) is used mostly in a bad sense, at least in its ordinary use: shelter (v. Asylum) in an indefinite sense; lodge, in French loge, from the German liegen to lie, in an indifferent sense. One harbours that which ought not or cannot find room any where; 'My lady bids me tell you, that though she harbours you as her uncle, she is nothing allied to your disorders.'—SHAKESPEARE. As the word harbour does not, in its original sense, mean any thing more than affording entertainment, or receiving into one's house for a time, it may be employed in a good sense to imply an act of hospitality; 'We owe this old house the same kind of gratitude that we do to an old friend, who harbours us in his declining condition, nay, even in his last extremities.'—POPE. One shelters that which cannot find security elsewhere. It is for the most part an act of charity, obligation, or natural feeling; 'The hen shelters her first brood of chickens with all the prudence that she ever attains'—JOHNSON. One lodges that which wants a resting place; it is an act of discretion. Thieves, traitors, or conspirators are harboured by those who have an interest in securing them from detection: either the wicked or the unfortunate may be sheltered from the evil with which they are threatened: travellers are lodged as occasion may require.

In the moral sense, a man harbours resentment, ill will, evil thoughts, and the like;

She harbours in her breast a furious hate
(And thou shalt find the dire effects too late),
Fix'd on revenge, and obstinate to die.—DRYDEN.

A man shelters himself from a charge by retorting it upon his adversary;

In vain I strove to check my growing flame,
Or shelter passion under friendship's name;
You saw my heart.—PRIOR.

A person lodges a complaint or information against any one with the magistrate, or a particular passion may be lodged in the breast, or ideas lodged in the mind; 'In viewing again the ideas that are lodged in the memory, the mind is more than passive.'—LOCKE.

They too are tempered high,
With hunger stung, and wild necessity,
Nor lodges pity in their shaggy breast.—THOMSON.

All these terms may be employed also as the acts of inconscious agents. Beds and bed-furniture harbour vermin; trees, as well as houses, shelter from a storm; a ball from a gun lodges in the human body, or any other solid substance.

HARBOUR, HAVEN, PORT.

The idea of a resting place for vessels is common to these terms, of which harbour is general, and the two others specifick in their signification.

Harbour, from the Teutonick herbenger to shelter, carries with it little more than the common idea of affording a resting or anchoring place; haven, from the Teutonick haben to have or hold, conveys the idea of security; port, from the Latin portus and porta a gate, conveys the idea of an enclosure. A haven is a natural harbour; a port is an artificial harbour. We characterize a harbour as commodious; a haven as snug and secure; a port as safe and easy of access. A commercial country profits by the excellence and number of its harbours; it values itself on the security of its havens, and increases the number of its ports accordingly. A vessel goes into a harbour only for a season; it remains in a haven for a permanency; it seeks a port as the destination of its voyage. Merchantmen are perpetually going in and out of a harbour;

But here she comes,
In the calm harbour of whose gentle breast,
My tempest-beaten soul may safely rest.—DRYDEN.

A distressed vessel, at a distance from home, seeks some haven in which it may winter;

Safe through the war her course the vessel steers,
The haven gain'd, the pilot drops his fears.

SHIRLEY.

The weary mariner looks to the port not as the termination of his labour but as the commencement of all his enjoyments; 'What though our passage through this world be never so stormy and tempestuous, we shall arrive at a safe port.'—TILLOTSON.

ASYLUM, REFUGE, SHELTER, RETREAT.

Asylum, in Latin asylum, in Greek ασυλιον, compounded of a privative and αυλη plunder, signified a place exempt from plunder, and exactions of every kind, and also a privileged place where accused persons were permitted to reside without molestation: refuge, in Latin refugium, from refugio to fly away, signifies the place which one may fly away to: shelter comes from shell, in High German schalen, Saxon seala, &c. from the Hebrew כֶּלִי to hide, signifying a cover or hiding-place: retreat, in French retraite, Latin retractus, from retraho or re and traho to draw back, signifies the place that is situated behind or in the back ground.

Asylum, refuge, and shelter all denote a place of safety; but the former is fixed, the two latter are occasional: the retreat is a place of tranquillity rather than of safety. An asylum is chosen by him who has no home, a refuge by him who is apprehensive of danger: the French emigrants found a refuge in England, but very few will make it an asylum. The inclemencies of the weather make us seek a shelter. The fatigues and toils of life make us seek a retreat.

It is the part of a Christian to afford an asylum to the helpless orphan and widow. The terrified passenger takes refuge in the first house he comes to, when assailed by an evil-disposed mob. The vessel shattered in a storm takes shelter in the nearest haven. The man of business, wearied with the anxieties and cares of the world, disengages himself from the whole, and seeks a retreat suited to his circumstances. In a moral or extended application they are distinguished in the same manner; 'The adventurer knows he has not far to go before he will meet with some fortress that has been raised by sophistry for the asylum of error.'—HAWKSWORTH. 'Superstition, now retiring from Rome, may yet find refuge in the mountains of Tibet.'—CUMBERLAND.

In rueful gaze
The cattle stand, and on the scowling heavens
Cast a deploring eye, by man forsook;
Who to the crowded cottage hies him fast,
Or seeks the shelter of the downward cave.

THOMSON.

TEGUMENT, COVERING.

Tegument, in Latin tegumentum, from tego to cover, is properly but another word to express covering, yet it is now employed in cases where the latter term is inadmissible. Covering signifies mostly that which is artificial; but tegument is employed for that which is natural: clothing is the covering for the body; the skin of vegetable substances, as seeds, is called the tegument. 'The covering is said of that which covers the outer surface: the tegument is said of that which covers the inner surface; the pods of some seeds are lined with a soft tegument.'

SKIN, HIDE, PEEL, RIND.

Skin, which is in German schin, Swedish skinn, Danish skind, probably comes from the Greek σκηρος a tent or covering; hide, in Saxon hyd, German haut, Low German huth, Latin cutis, comes from the Greek κεδεναι to hide, cover; peel, in German fell, &c. Latin pellis a skin, in Greek φελλος or φλοιός bark, comes from φλαω to burst or crack, because the bark is easily broken; rind is in all probability changed from round, signifying that which goes round and envelopes.

Skin is the term in most general use, it is applicable both to human creatures and to animals; hide is used only for the skins of large animals: we speak of the skins of birds or insects; but of the hides of oxen or horses, and other animals, which are to be separated from the body and converted into leather. Skin is equally applied to the inanimate and the animate world; but peel and rind belong only to inanimate objects; the skin is generally said of that which is interior, in distinction from the exterior, which is the peel: an orange has both its peel and its thin skin underneath; an apple, a pear, and the like, has a peel. The peel is a soft substance on the outside; the rind is generally interior, and of a harder substance: in regard to a stick, we speak of its peel and the inner skin; in regard to a tree, we speak of its bark and its rind; hence, likewise, the term rind is applied to cheese, and other incrustated substances that envelope bodies.

TO PEEL, PARE.

Peel, from the Latin pellis a skin, is the same as to skin or to take off the skin: to pare, from the Latin paro to trim or make in order, signifies to smooth. The former of these terms denotes a natural, the latter an artificial process: the former excludes the idea of a forcible separation; the latter includes the idea of separation by means of a knife or sharp instrument: potatoes and apples are peeled after they are boiled; they are pared before they are boiled: an orange and a walnut are always peeled, but not pared; a cucumber must be pared and not peeled: in like manner the skin may sometimes be peeled from the flesh, and the nails are pared.

GUISE, HABIT.

Guise and wise are both derived from the northern languages, and denote the manner; but the former is employed for a particular or distinguished manner of dress; habit, from the Latin habitus a habit, fashion or form, is taken for a settled or permanent mode of dress.

The guise is that which is unusual, and often only occasional; the habit is that which is usual among particular classes: a person sometimes assumes the guise of a peasant, in order the better to conceal himself; he who devotes himself to the clerical profession puts on the habit of a clergyman;

Anubis, Sphinx,
Idols of antique guise, and horned Pan,
Terrific, monstrous shapes!—DYER.

For 'tis the mind that makes the body rich,
And as the sun breaks through the darkest cloud,
So honour appeareth in the meanest habit.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO CONCEAL, HIDE, SECRETE.

Conceal, v. To conceal; hide, from the German hiden to guard against, and the Old German hedan to conceal, and the Greek κρύβω to cover or put out of sight; secrete, in Latin secretus, participle of secreo, or se and cerno, to see or know by one's self, signifies to put in a place known only to one's self.

Concealing conveys simply the idea of not letting come to observation; hiding that of putting under cover; secreting that of setting at a distance or in unfrequented places: whatever is not seen is concealed, but whatever is hidden or secreted is intentionally put out of sight; a person conceals himself behind a hedge; he hides his treasures in the earth; he secretes what he has stolen under his cloak.

Conceal is more general than either hide or secrete; all things are concealed which are hidden or secreted, but they are not always hidden or secreted when they are concealed: both mental and corporeal objects are concealed; corporeal objects mostly and sometimes mental ones are hidden; corporeal objects only are secreted; we conceal in the mind whatever we do not make known: that is hidden which may not be discovered or cannot be discerned; that is secreted which may not be seen. Facts are concealed, truths are hidden, goods are secreted.

Children should never attempt to conceal from their parents or teachers any error they have committed, when called upon for an acknowledgment;

Be secret and discreet; Love's fairly favours
Are lost when not conceal'd.—DRYDEN.

We are told in Scripture for our consolation that nothing is hidden which shall not be revealed;

Yet to be secret makes not sin the less,
'Tis only hidden from the vulgar view.—DRYDEN.

People seldom wish to secrete any thing but with the intention of concealing it from those who have a right to demand it back; 'The whole thing is too manifest to admit of any doubt in any man how long this thing has been working; how many tricks have been played with the Dean's (Swift's) papers; how they were secreted from time to time.'—POPE.

CONCEALMENT, SECRECY.

Concealment (v. To conceal) is itself an action; secrecy, from secret, is the quality of an action: concealment may respect the state of things; secrecy the conduct of persons: things may be concealed so as to be known to no one; but secrecy supposes some person to whom the thing concealed is known.

Concealment has to do with what concerns others; secrecy with that which concerns ourselves: what is concealed is kept from the observation of others; what is secret is known only to ourselves: there may frequently be concealment without secrecy, although there cannot be secrecy without concealment: concealment is frequently practised to the detriment of others; secrecy is always adopted for our own advantage or gratification: concealment aids in the commission of crimes; secrecy in the execution of schemes: many crimes are committed with impunity when the perpetrators are protected by concealment; 'There is but one way of conversing safely with all men, that is, not by concealing what we say or do, but by saying or doing nothing that deserves to be concealed.'—POPE. The best concerted plans are often frustrated for want of observing secrecy;

That 's not suddenly to be perform'd
But with advice and silent secrecy.—SHAKESPEARE.

Secrecy is, however, in our dealings with others, frequently not less impolitic than it is improper. An open and straight forward conduct is as a rule the only proper conduct in our commerce with the world;

Shun secrecy, and talk in open sight;
So shall you soon repair your present evil plight.
SPENSER.

When concealment is taken as the act of the Divine Being, or as the state of things, it is used in the best sense; 'One instance of Divine Wisdom is so illustrious that I cannot pass it over without notice; that is, the concealment under which Providence has placed the future events of our life on earth.'—BLAIR. When secrecy respects a man's own concerns with himself or his Maker, it is also proper; 'It is not with publick as with private prayer; in this, rather secrecy is commanded than outward show.'—HOOKER.

TO CONCEAL, DISSEMBLE, DISGUISE

Conceal, compounded of con and ceal, in French cacher, Latin celo, Hebrew כָּלַח to have privately; dissemble, in French dissimuler, compounded of dis and simulo or similis, signifies to make a thing appear unlike what it is; disguise, in French disguiser, compounded of the privative dis or de and guise, in German weise a manner or fashion, signifies to take a form opposite to the reality.

To conceal is simply to abstain from making known what we wish to keep secret; to dissemble and disguise signify to conceal, by assuming some false appearance: we conceal facts; we dissemble feelings; we disguise sentiments.

* Caution only is requisite in concealing; it may be effected by simple silence: art and address must be employed in dissembling; it mingles falsehood with all its proceedings: labour and cunning are requisite in disguising; it has nothing but falsehood in all its movements.

The concealer watches over himself that he may not be betrayed into any indiscreet communication; the dissembler has an eye to others so as to prevent them from discovering the state of his heart; disguise assumes altogether a different face from the reality, and rests secure under this shelter: it is sufficient to conceal from those who either cannot or will not see; it is necessary to dissemble with those who can see without being shown; but it is necessary to disguise from those who are anxious to discover and use every means to penetrate the veil that intercepts their sight.

Concealment is a matter of prudence often advisable, mostly innocent; when we have not resolution to shake off our vices, it is wisdom at least to conceal them from the knowledge of others; 'Ulysses himself adds, he was the most eloquent, and the most silent of men; he knew that a word spoke never wrought so much good as a word concealed.'—BROOME. 'Ridicule is never more strong than when it is concealed in gravity.'—SPECTATOR.

According to Girard, it was a maxim with Louis XI., that in order to know how to govern, it was necessary to know how to dissemble; this, he adds, is true in all cases even in domestic government; but if the word conveys as much the idea of falsehood in French as in English, then is this a French and not an English maxim; there are, however, many cases in which it is prudent to dissemble our resentments, if by allowing them time to die away we keep them from the knowledge of others. Disguise is altogether opposed to candour: an ingenuous mind revolts at it; an honest man will never find it necessary, unless the Abbe Girard be right, in saying that "when the necessity of circumstances and the nature of affairs call for disguise it is politick." Yet what train of circumstances can we conceive to exist which will justify policy founded upon the violation of truth? Intriguers, conspirators, and all who have dishonest purposes to answer, must practise disguise as the only means of success; but true policy is as remote from disguise as cunning is from wisdom;

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Cacher, dissimuler & enlever."

Let school-taught pride dissemble all it can,
These little things are great to little man.

GOLDSMITH.

'Good-breeding has made the tongue falsify the heart, and act a part of continual restraint, while nature has preserved the eyes to herself, that she may not be disguised or misrepresented.'—STEELE.

HYPOCRITE, DISSEMBLER.

Hypocrite, in Greek ὑποκρίτης, from ὑπό and κρίνομαι, signifies one appearing under a mask; dissembler, from dissemble, in Latin dissimulo or dis and similis, signifies one who makes himself appear unlike what he really is.

The hypocrite feigns to be what he is not; 'In regard to others, hypocrisy is not so pernicious as barefaced irreligion.'—ADDISON. The dissembler conceals what he is: the former takes to himself the credit of virtues which he has not; the latter conceals the vices that he has;

So spake the false dissembler unperceived.

MILTON.

Every hypocrite is a dissembler; but every dissembler is not a hypocrite; the hypocrite makes truth serve the purpose of falsehood; the dissembler is content with making falsehood serve his own particular purpose.

SIMULATION, DISSIMULATION.

Simulation, from similis, is the making one's self like what one is not; and dissimulation, from dissimilis unlike, is the making one's self appear unlike what one really is. The hypocrite puts on the semblance of virtue to recommend himself to the virtuous. The dissembler conceals his vices when he wants to gain the simple or ignorant to his side; 'The learned make a difference between simulation and dissimulation. Simulation is a pretence of what is not; and dissimulation is a concealment of what is.'—TATLER.

SECRET, HIDDEN, LATENT, OCCULT, MYSTERIOUS.

Secret (v. Clandestine) signifies known to one's self only; hidden, v. To conceal; latent, in Latin latens, from lateo to lie hid, signifies the same as hidden; occult, in Latin occultus, participle of occulo, compounded of oc or ob and culo or colo to cover over by tilling or ploughing, that is, to cover over with the earth; mysterious, v. Dark.

What is secret is known to some one; what is hidden may be known to no one: it rests in the breast of an individual to keep a thing secret; it depends on the course of things if any thing remains hidden: every man has more or less of that which he wishes to keep secret; the talent of many lies hidden for want of opportunity to bring it into exercise; as many treasures lie hidden in the earth for want of being discovered and brought to light. A secret concerns only the individual or individuals who hold it; but that which is hidden may concern all the world; sometimes the success of a transaction depends upon its being kept secret; the stores of knowledge which yet remain hidden may be much greater than those which have been laid open;

Ye boys, who pluck the flow'rs and spoil the spring,
Beware the secret snake that shoots a sting.

DRYDEN.

The blind, laborious mole
In winding mazes works her hidden hole.

DRYDEN.

The latent is the secret or concealed, in cases where it ought to be open: a latent motive is that which a person intentionally, though not justifiably, keeps to himself; the latent cause for any proceeding is that which is not revealed;

Mem'ry confus'd, and interrupted thought,
Death's harbingers, lie latent in the draught.

PRIOR.

Occult and mysterious are species of the hidden: the former respects that which has a veil naturally thrown over it; the latter respects that mostly which is covered with a supernatural veil: an occult science is one that is hidden from the view of persons in general, which is attainable but by few; occult causes or qualities are those which lie too remote to be discovered by the inquirer: the operations of Providence are said to be mysterious, as they are altogether past our finding out; many points of doctrine in our religion are equally mysterious, as connected with and dependent upon the attributes of the Deity; 'Some men have an occult power of stealing on the affections'—JOHNSON.

From his void embrace,

Mysterious heaven! That moment to the ground,
A blackened corse, was struck the beauteous maid.

THOMSON.

Mysterious is sometimes applied to human transactions in the sense of throwing a veil intentionally over any thing, in which sense it is nearly allied to the word secret, with this distinction, that what is secret is often not known to be secret; but that which is mysterious is so only in the eyes of others. Things are sometimes conducted with such secrecy that no one suspects what is passing until it is seen by its effects; an air of mystery is sometimes thrown over that which is in reality nothing when seen: hence secrecy is always taken in a good sense, since it is so great an essential in the transactions of men; but mystery is often employed in a bad sense; either for the affected concealment of that which is insignificant, or the purposed concealment of that which is bad: an expedition is said to be secret, but not mysterious; on the other hand, the disappearance of a person may be mysterious, but is not said to be secret.

MYSTERIOUS, MYSTICK.

Mysterious (v. Dark) and mystick are but variations of the same original; the former however is more commonly applied to that which is supernatural, or veiled in an impenetrable obscurity; the latter to that which is natural, but in part concealed from the view; hence we speak of the mysterious plans of Providence; mystick schemes of theology or mystick principles; 'As soon as that mysterious veil, which now covers futurity, was lifted up, all the gayety of life would disappear.'—BLAIR.

And ye five other wand'ring fires that move
In mystick dance not without song,
Resound his praise.—MILTON.

TO ABSCOND, STEAL AWAY, SECRETE ONE'S SELF.

Abscond, in Latin abscondo, is compounded of abs and condo, signifying to hide from the view, which is the original meaning of the other words; to abscond is to remove one's self for the sake of not being discovered by those with whom we are acquainted; to steal away is to get away so as to elude observation; to secrete one's self is to get into a place of secrecy without being perceived.

Dishonest men abscond, thieves steal away when they dread detection, and fugitives secrete themselves. Those who abscond will have frequent occasion to steal away, and still more frequent occasion to secrete themselves.

CLANDESTINE, SECRET.

Clandestine, in Latin clandestinus, comes from clām secretly; secret, in French secret, Latin secretus, participle of secreo to separate, signifies remote from observation.

Clandestine expresses more than secret. To do a thing clandestinely is to elude observation; to do a thing secretly is to do it without the knowledge of any one: what is clandestine is unlawful, which is not necessarily the case with what is secret.

With the clandestine must be a mixture of art; with secrecy, caution and management are requisite: a clandestine marriage is effected by a studied plan to escape notice; a secret marriage is conducted by the forbearance of all communication; conspirators have many clandestine proceedings and secret meetings: an unfaithful servant clandestinely conveys his master's property from the premises of his master; 'I went to this clandestine lodging, and found to my amazement all the ornaments of a fine gentleman, which he has taken upon credit."—JOHNSON. A person makes a secret communication of his intentions to another; 'Some may place their chief satisfaction in giving secretly what is to be distributed; others in being the open and avowed instruments of making such distributions.'—ATTERBURY.

POLITICAL, POLITICK.

Political has the proper meaning of the word polity, which, from the Greek πολιτεία and πόλις a city, signifies the government either of a city or a country; politic, like the word polity, has the improper meaning of the word polity, namely, that of clever management, because the affairs of states are sometimes managed with considerable art and finesse: hence we speak of political government as opposed to that which is ecclesiastick; and of politic conduct as opposed to that which is unwise and without foresight: in political questions, it is not politic for individuals to set themselves up in opposition to those who are in power; the study of politics, as a science, may make a man a clever statesman; but it may not always enable him to discern true polity in his private concerns; 'Machiavel laid down this for a master rule, in his political scheme, that the show of religion was helpful to the politician.'—SOUTH. 'A politic caution, a guarded circumspection, were among the ruling principles of our forefathers.'—BURKE.

ART, CUNNING, DECEIT.

Art, in Latin ars, probably comes from the Greek ἀρτυν to fit or dispose, Hebrew אָרַץ to contrive, in which action the mental exercises of art principally consists; cunning is in Saxon cuning, German kennend knowing, in which sense the English word was formerly used; deceit, from the Latin deceptum, participle of decipio or de and capiō, signifies taking by surprise or unawares.

Art implies a disposition of the mind, to use circumspection or artificial means to attain an end: cunning marks the disposition to practise disguise in the prosecution of a plan: deceit leads to the practice of dissimulation and gross falsehood, for the sake of gratifying a desire. Art is the property of a lively mind; cunning of a thoughtful and knowing mind; deceit of an ignorant, low, and weak mind.

Art is practised often in self-defence; as a practice therefore it is even sometimes justifiable, although not as a disposition: cunning has always self in view; the cunning man seeks his gratification without regard to others; deceit is often practised to the express injury of another: the deceitful man adopts base means for base ends. Animals practise art when opposed to their superiors in strength; but they are not artful, as they have not that versatility of power which they can habitually exercise to their own advantage like human beings; 'It has been a sort of maxim that the greatest art is to conceal art; but I know not how, among some people we meet with, their greatest cunning is to appear cunning.'—STEELE. Animals may be cunning, inasmuch as they can by contrivance and concealment seek to obtain the object of their desire; 'Cunning can in no circumstance imaginable be a quality worthy a man, except in his own defence, and merely to conceal himself from such as are so, and in such cases it is wisdom.'—STEELE. No animal is deceitful except man: the wickedest and the stupidest of men have the power and the will of deceiving and practising falsehood upon others, which is unknown to the brutes; 'Though the living man can wear a mask and carry on deceit, the dying Christian cannot counterfeit.'—CUMBERLAND.

ARTFUL, ARTIFICIAL, FICTITIOUS.

Artful, compounded of art and ful, marks the quality of being full of art (v. Art); artificial, in Latin artificialis, from ars and facio to do, signifies done with art; fictitious, in Latin fictitious, from figo to feign, signifies the quality of being feigned.

Artful respects what is done with art or design; artificial what is done by the exercise of workmanship; fictitious what is made out of the mind. Artful and artificial are used either for natural or moral objects; fictitious always for those that are moral: artful is opposed to what is artless, artificial to what is natural, fictitious to what is real: the ringlets of a lady's hair are disposed in an artful manner; the hair itself may be artificial: a tale is artful which is told in a way to gain credit; manners are artificial which do not seem to suit the person adopting them; a story is fictitious which has no foundation whatever in truth, and is the invention of the narrator.

Children sometimes tell their stories so artfully as to impose on the most penetrating and experienced: 'I was much surprised to see the ants' nest which I had destroyed, very artfully repaired.'—ADDISON. Those who have no character of their own are induced to take an artificial character in order to put themselves on a level with their associates; 'If we compare two nations in an equal state of civilization, we may remark that where the greater freedom obtains, there the greater variety of artificial wants will obtain also.'—CUMBERLAND. Beggars deal in fictitious tales of distress in order to excite compassion; 'Among the numerous stratagems by which pride endeavours to recommend folly to regard, there is scarcely one that meets with less success than affectation, or a perpetual disguise of the real character by fictitious appearances.'—JOHNSON.

ARTIFICE, TRICK, FINESSE, STRATAGEM

Artifice, in French artifice, Latin artifex an artificer, from artem facio to execute an art, signifies the performance of an art; trick, in French tricher, comes from the German triegen to deceive; finesse, a word directly imported from France with all the meaning attached to it, which is characteristic of the nation itself, means properly fineness; the word fin fine, signifying in French, as well as in the northern languages from which it is taken, subtlety or mental acumen; stratagem, in French stratagème, from the Greek στρατήγιον and στρατηγέω to lead an army, signifies by distinction any military scheme, or any scheme conducted for some military purpose.

All these terms denote the exercise of an art calculated to mislead others. Artifice is the generic term; the rest specific: the former has likewise a particular use and acceptance distinct from the others: it expresses a ready display of art for the purpose of extricating one's self from a difficulty, or securing to one's self an advantage. Trick includes in it more of design to gain something for one's self, or to act secretly to the inconvenience of others: it is rather a cheat on the senses than the understanding. Finesse is a species of artifice in which art and cunning are combined in the management of a cause: it is a mixture of invention, falsehood, and concealment. Stratagem is a display of art in plotting and contriving, a disguised mode of obtaining an end.

Females who are not guarded by fixed principles of virtue and uprightness are apt to practise artifices upon their husbands. Men without honour, or an honourable means of living, are apt to practise various tricks to impose upon others to their own advantage: every trade therefore is said to have its tricks; and professions are not entirely clear from this stigma, which has been brought upon them by unworthy members. Diplomats persons have most frequent recourse to finesse, in which no people are more skilful practitioners than those who have coined the word. Military operations are sometimes considerably forwarded by well-concerted and well-timed stratagems to surprise the enemy.

An artifice may be perfectly innocent when it serves to afford a friend an unexpected pleasure; 'Among the several artifices which are put in practice by the poets, to fill the minds of an audience with terror, the first place is due to thunder and lightning.'—ADDISON. A trick is childish which only serves to deceive or amuse children; 'Where men practise falsehood and show tricks with one another, there will be perpetual suspicions, evil surmisings, doubts, and jealousies.'—SOUTH. Stratagems are allowable not in war only; the writer of a novel or a play may sometimes adopt a successful stratagem to cause the reader a surprise.

* Trusler: "Cunning, finesse device, artifice, trick, stratagem."

Ok others practise thy Ligurian arts ;
The stratagems and tricks of little hearts
Are lost on me.—DRYDEN.

One of the most successful stratagems, whereby Mahomet became formidable, was the assurance that impostor gave his votaries, that whoever was slain in battle should be immediately conveyed to that luxurious paradise his wanton fancy had invented.—STEELE. Finesse is never justifiable ; it carries with it too much of concealment and disingenuousness to be practised but for selfish and unworthy purposes ;

Another can't forgive the paltry arts
By which he makes his way to shallow hearts,
Mere pieces of finesse, traps for applause.

CHURCHILL.

CUNNING, CRAFTY, SUBTLE, SLY, WILY.

Cunning, v. Art ; crafty signifies having craft, that is, according to the original meaning of the word, having a knowledge of some trade or art ; hence figuratively applied to the character ; subtle, in French subtil, and Latin subtilis thin, from sub and tela a thread drawn to be fine ; hence in the figurative sense in which it is here taken, fine or acute in thought ; sly is in all probability connected with slow and sleek, or smooth ; deliberation and smoothness entering very much into the sense of sly ; wily signifies disposed to wiles or stratagems.

All these epithets agree in expressing an aptitude to employ peculiar and secret means to the attainment of an end ; they differ principally in the secrecy of the means, or the degree of circumvention that is employed. The cunning man shows his dexterity simply in concealing ; this requires little more than reservedness and taciturnity ; 'There is still another secret that can never fail if you can once get it believed, and which is often practised by women of greater cunning than virtue. This is to change sides for awhile with the jealous man, and to turn his own passion upon himself.'—ADDISON. The crafty man goes farther ; he shapes his words and actions so as to lull suspicion ; hence it is that a child may be cunning, but an old man will be crafty ; 'Cunning is often to be met with in brutes themselves, and in persons who are but the fewest removes from them.'—ADDISON. 'You will find the examples to be few and rare of wicked, unprincipled men attaining fully the accomplishment of their crafty designs.'—BLAIR. A subtle man has more acuteness of invention than either, and all his schemes are hidden by a veil that is impenetrable by common observation ; the cunning man looks only to the concealment of an immediate object ; the crafty and subtle man has a remote object to conceal : thus men are cunning in their ordinary concerns ; politicians are crafty or subtle ; but the former is more so as to the end, and the latter as to the means. A man is cunning and crafty by deeds ; he is subtle mostly by means of words alone, or words and actions combined ; 'The part of Ulysses, in Homer's Odyssey, is very much admired by Aristotle, as perplexing that fable with very agreeable plots and intricacies, not only by the many adventures in his voyage and the subtlety of his behaviour, but by the various concealments and discoveries of his person in several parts of his poem.'—ADDISON. Slyness is a vulgar kind of cunning ; the sly man goes cautiously and silently to work ; 'If you or your correspondent had consulted me in your discourse upon the eye, I could have told you that the eye of Leonora is slyly watchful while it looks negligent.'—STEELE. Witless is a species of cunning or craft, applicable only to cases of attack or defence ;

Implore his aid ; for Proteus only knows
The secret cause, and cure of all thy woes ;
But first the wily wizard must be caught,
For, unconstrain'd, he nothing tells for nought.

DRYDEN.

TO DECEIVE, DELUDE, IMPOSE UPON.

Deceive, in French décevoir, Latin decipio, compounded of de privative, and capio to take, signifies to take wrong ; delude, in Latin deludo, compounded of de and ludo, signifies to play upon or to mislead by a trick ; impose, in Latin impono, perfect of impono, signifies literally to lay or put upon.

Falsehood is the leading feature in all these terms they vary however in the circumstances of the action To deceive is the most general of the three ; it signifies simply to produce a false conviction ; the other terms are properly species of deceiving, including accessory ideas. Deception may be practised in various degrees ; deluding is always something positive, and considerable in degree. Every false impression produced by external objects, whether in trifles or important matters, is a deception : delusion is confined to errors in matters of opinion. We may be deceived in the colour or the distance of an object ; we are deluded in what regards our principles or moral conduct ; 'I would have all my readers take care how they mistake themselves for uncommon geniuses and men above rule, since it is very easy for them to be deceived in this particular.'—BUDGELL. 'Deluded by a seeming excellence.'—ROSCOMMON.

A deception does not always suppose a fault on the part of the person deceived, but a delusion does. A person is sometimes deceived in cases where deception is unavoidable ;

I now believ'd

The happy day approach'd, nor are my hopes deceiv'd.
DRYDEN.

A person is deluded through a voluntary blindness of the understanding ;

Who therefore seeks in these
True wisdom, finds her not, or by delusion
Far worse, her false resemblance only meets.

PRIOR.

Artful people are sometimes capable of deceiving so as not even to excite suspicion ; their plausible tales justify the credit that is given to them : when the ignorant enter into nice questions of politics or religion, it is their ordinary fate to be deluded.

Deception is practised by an individual on himself or others ;

Wanton women in their eyes
Men's deceivings do comprise.—GREENE.

A delusion is commonly practised on one's self ;

I, waking, view'd with grief the rising sun,
And fondly mourn'd the dear delusion gone.

PRIOR.

An imposition is always practised on another ; 'As there seems to be in this manuscript some anachronisms and deviations from the ancient orthography, I am not satisfied myself that it is authentic, and not rather the production of one of those Grecian sophisters who have imposed upon the world several spurious works of this nature.'—ADDISON. Men deceive others from a variety of motives ; they always impose upon them for purposes of gain, or the gratification of ambition. Men deceive themselves with false pretexts and false confidence ; they delude themselves with vain hopes and wishes.

Professors in religion often deceive themselves as much as they do others : the grossest and most dangerous delusion into which they are liable to fall is that of substituting faith for practice, and an extravagant regard to the outward observances of religion in lieu of the mild and humble temper of Jesus : no imposition was ever so successfully practised upon mankind as that of Mahomet.

DECEIVER, IMPOSTOR.

Deceiver and impostor, the derivatives from deceive and impose, have a farther distinction worthy of notice.

Deceiver is a generic term ; impostor specific ; every impostor is a species of deceiver : the words have however a distinct use. The deceiver practises deception on individuals ; the impostor only on the public at large. The false friend and the faithless lover are deceivers ; the assumed nobleman who practises frauds under his disguise, and the pretended prince who lays claim to a crown to which he was never born, are impostors.

Deceivers are the most dangerous members of society ; they trifle with the best affections of our nature, and violate the most sacred obligations ; 'That tradition of the Jews that Christ was stolen out of the grave is ancient ; it was the invention of the Jews, and denies the integrity of the witnesses of his resurrection, making them deceivers.'—TILLOTSON. Impostors are seldom so culpable as those who give them credit; 'Our Saviour wrought his miracles frequently, and for a long time together: a time sufficient to have detected any impostor in.'—TILLOTSON. It would require no small share of credulity to be deceived by any of the impositions which have been hitherto practised upon the inconsiderate part of mankind.

DECEIT, DECEPTION.

Deceit (v. To deceive) marks the propensity to deceive, or the practice of deceiving; deception the act of deceiving (v. To deceive).

A deceiver is full of deceit: but a deception may be occasionally practised by one who has not this habit of deceiving. Deceit is a characteristic of so base a nature, that those who have it practise every species of deception in order to hide their characters from the observation of the world.

The practice of deceit springs altogether from a design, and that of the worst kind; but a deception may be practised from indifferent, if not innocent, motives, or may be occasioned even by inanimate objects;

I mean to plunge the boy in pleasing sleep,
And ravish'd in Idalian bow'rs to keep,
Or high Cythera, that the sweet deceit
May pass unseen, and none prevent the cheat.

DRYDEN.

All the joy or sorrow for the happiness or calamities of others is produced by an act of the imagination that realizes the event however fictitious, so that we feel, while the deception lasts, whatever emotions would be excited by the same good or evil happening to ourselves.'—JOHNSON.

A person or a conduct is deceitful; an appearance is deceptive. A deceitful person has always guile in his heart and on his tongue: jugglers practise various deceptions in the performance of their tricks for the entertainment of the populace. Parasites and sycophants are obliged to have recourse to deceit, in order to inveigle themselves into the favour of their patrons: there is no sense on which a deception can be practised with greater facility than on that of sight; sometimes it is an agreeable deception, as in the case of a panoramick exhibition.

DECEIT, DUPLICITY, DOUBLE-DEALING.

Deceit, v. Deceit, deception; duplicity signifies doubleness in dealing, the same as double-dealing.

The former two may be applied either to habitual or particular actions, the latter only to particular actions. There may be much deceit or duplicity in a person's character or in his proceedings; there is double-dealing only where dealing goes forward. The deceit may be more or less veiled; the duplicity lies very deep, and is always studied whenever it is put into practice. Duplicity in reference to actions is mostly employed for a course of conduct: double-dealing is but another term for duplicity on particular occasions. Children of reserved characters are frequently prone to deceit, which grows into consummate duplicity in riper years: the wealthy are often exposed to much duplicity when they choose their favourites among the low and ignorant; 'The arts of deceit do continually grow weaker and less serviceable to them that use them.'—TILLOTSON. 'Necessity drove Dryden into a duplicity of character that is painful to reflect upon.'—CUMBERLAND. Nothing gives rise to more double-dealing than the fabrication of wills; 'Maskwell (in the Double-Dealer) discloses by soliloquy, that his motive for double-dealing was founded in his passion for Cynthia.'—CUMBERLAND.

DECEIT, FRAUD, GUILT.

Deceit (v. Deceit, deception) is allied to fraud in reference to actions; to guilt in reference to the character.

Deceit is here, as in the preceding article, indeterminate when compared with fraud, which is a specific mode of deceiving: deceit is practised only in private transactions; fraud is practised towards bodies as well as individuals, in public as well as private. a child practises deceit towards its parents;

With such deceits he gain'd their easy hearts,
Too prone to credit his perfidious arts.—DRYDEN.

Frauds are practised upon government, on the publick at large, or on tradesmen; 'The story of the three books of the Sybils sold to Tarquin was all a fraud devised for the convenience of state.'—PRIDEAUX. Deceit involves the violation of moral law, fraud that of the civil law. A servant may deceive his master as to the time of his coming or going, but he defrauds him of his property if he obtains it by any false means. Deceit as a characteristic is indefinite in magnitude; guile marks a strong degree of moral turpitude in the individual;

Was it for force or guile,
Or some religious end you rais'd this pile?

DRYDEN.

The former is displayed in petty concerns: the latter, which contaminates the whole character, displays itself in inextricable windings and turnings that are suggested in a peculiar manner by the author of all evil. Deceitful is an epithet commonly and lightly applied to persons in general; but guileless is applied to characters which are the most diametrically opposed to and at the greatest possible distance from, that which is false.

FALLACIOUS, DECEITFUL, FRAUDULENT.

Fallacious comes from the Latin fallax and fallō to deceive, signifying the property of misleading; deceitful, v. To deceive; fraudulent signifies after the manner of a fraud.

The fallacious has respect to falsehood in opinion; deceitful to that which is externally false; our hopes are often fallacious; the appearances of things are often deceitful. Fallacious, as characteristic of the mind, excludes the idea of design;

But when Ulysses, with fallacious arts,
Had made impression on the people's hearts,
And forg'd a treason in my patron's name,
My kinsman fell.—DRYDEN.

Deceitful excludes the idea of mistake; fraudulent is a gross species of the deceitful; 'Such is the power which the sophistry of self-love exercises over us, that almost every one may be assured he measures himself by a deceitful scale.'—BLAIR. It is a fallacious idea for any one to imagine that the faults of others can serve as any extenuation of his own; it is a deceitful mode of acting for any one to advise another to do that which he would not do himself; it is fraudulent to attempt to get money by means of a falsehood;

Ill-fated Paris! slave to womankind,
As smooth of face as fraudulent of mind.—POPE.

FALLACY, DELUSION, ILLUSION.

Fallacy, in Latin fallacia, from fallō, has commonly a reference to the act of some conscious agent, whose intention is to deceive; the delusion (v. To deceive) and illusion may be the work of inanimate objects. We endeavour to detect the fallacy which lies concealed in a proposition; 'There is indeed no transaction which offers stronger temptations to fallacy and sophistication than epistolary intercourse.'—JOHNSON. One endeavours to remove the delusion to which the judgement has been exposed;

As when a wandering fire,
Hovering and blazing with delusive light,
Misleads th' amaz'd night-wanderer from his way.

MILTON.

It is sometimes difficult to dissipate the illusion to which the senses or the fancy are liable; 'Fame, glory, wealth, honour, have in the prospect pleasing illusions.'—STEELE.

In all the reasonings of freethinkers, there are fallacies against which a man cannot always be on his guard. The ignorant are perpetually exposed to delusions when they attempt to speculate on matters of opinion; among the most serious of these delusions we may reckon that of substituting their own feelings for the operations of Divine grace. The ideas of ghosts and apparitions are mostly attributable to the illusions of the senses and the imagination.

FAITHLESS, PERFIDIOUS, TREACHEROUS.

Faithless (v. Faithless) is the generic term, the rest are specific terms; a breach of good faith is expressed by them all, but faithless expresses no more; the others include accessory ideas in their signification: perfidious, in Latin perfidiosus, signifies literally breaking through faith in a great degree, and now implies the addition of hostility to the breach of faith; treacherous, most probably changed from traitorous, comes from the Latin trado to betray, and signifies one species of active hostile breach of faith.

A faithless man is faithless only for his own interest; a perfidious man is expressly so to the injury of another. A friend is faithless who consults his own safety in the time of need; he is perfidious if he profits by the confidence reposed in him to plot mischief against the one to whom he has made vows of friendship. Faithlessness does not suppose any particular efforts to deceive; it consists of merely violating that faith which the relation produces; perfidy is never so complete as when it has most effectually assumed the mask of sincerity. Whoever deserts his friend in need is guilty of faithlessness; but he is guilty of perfidy who draws from him every secret in order to effect his ruin;

Old Priam, fearful of the war's event,
This hapless Polydore to Thracia sent,
From noise and tumults, and destructive war,
Committed to the faithless tyrant's care.—DRYDEN.

'When a friend is turned into an enemy the world is just enough to accuse the perfidiousness of the friend, rather than the indiscretion of the person who confided in him.'—ADDISON.

Incle was not only a faithless but a perfidious lover. Faithlessness, though a serious offence, is unhappily not unfrequent: there are too many men who are unmindful of their most important engagements; but we may hope for the honour of humanity that there are not many instances of perfidy, which exceeds every other vice in atrocity, as it makes virtue itself subversive to its own base purposes.

Perfidy may lie in the will to do; treachery lies altogether in the thing done: one may therefore be perfidious without being treacherous. A friend is perfidious whenever he evinces his perfidy; but he is said to be treacherous only in the particular instance in which he betrays the confidence and interests of another. I detect a man's perfidy, or his perfidious aims, by the manner in which he attempts to draw my secrets from me; I am made acquainted with his treachery not before I discover that my confidence is betrayed and my secrets are divulged. On the other hand we may be treacherous without being perfidious. Perfidy is an offence mostly between individuals; it is rather a breach of fidelity (v. Faith, fidelity) than of faith: treachery on the other hand includes breaches of private or public faith. A servant may be both perfidious and treacherous to his master; a citizen may be treacherous, but not perfidious towards his country;

Shall then the Grecians fly, oh dire disgrace!
And leave unpunish'd this perfidious race?—POPE.
And had not Heav'n the fall of Troy design'd,
Enough was said and done t' inspire a better mind:
Then had our lances pierc'd the treach'rous wood,
And Iliad's towers and Priam's empire stood.

DRYDEN.

It is said that in the South Sea islands, when a chief wants a human victim, their officers will sometimes invite their friends or relations to come to them, when they take the opportunity of suddenly falling upon them and despatching them: here is perfidy in the individual who acts this false part; and treachery in the act of betraying him who is murdered. When the schoolmaster of Falerii delivered his scholars to Camillus, he was guilty of treachery in the act, and of perfidy towards those who had reposed confidence in him. When Romulus ordered the Sabine women to be seized, it was an act of treachery but not of perfidy; so in like manner when the daughter of Tarpeius opened the gates of the Roman citadel to the enemy.

FAITHLESS, UNFAITHFUL.

Faithless is mostly employed to denote a breach of faith; and unfaithful to mark the want of fidelity (v. Faith, fidelity). The former is positive; the latter is rather negative, implying a deficiency. A prince, a government, a people, or an individual is said to be faithless;

So spake the seraph Abdiel, faithful found;
Among the faithless, faithful only he.—MILTON.

A husband, a wife, a servant, or any individual is said to be unfaithful. Messius Tuffetius, the Alban Dictator, was faithless to the Roman people when he withheld his assistance in the battle, and strove to go over to the enemy;

The sire of men and monarch of the sky
Th' advice approv'd, and bade Minerva fly,
Dissolve the league, and all her arts employ
To make the breach the faithless act of Troy.

POPE.

At length, ripe vengeance o'er their head impends,
But Jove himself the faithless race defends.—POPE.

A man is unfaithful to his employer who sees him injured by others without doing his utmost to prevent it; 'If you break one jot of your promise, I will think you the most atheistical break-promise, and the most unworthy that may be chosen out of the gross band of the unfaithful.'—SHAKESPEARE. A woman is faithless to her husband who breaks the marriage vow; she is unfaithful to him when she does not discharge the duties of a wife to the best of her abilities.

The term unfaithful may also be applied figuratively to things;

If e'er with life I quit the Trojan plain,
If e'er I see my sire and spouse again,
This bow, unfaithful to my glorious aims,
Broke by my hands shall feed the blazing flames.

POPE.

TREACHEROUS, TRAITOROUS, TREASONABLE.

These epithets are all applied to one who betrays his trust; but treacherous (v. Faithless) respects a man's private relations; traitorous, his public relation to his prince and his country: he is a treacherous friend, and a traitorous subject. We may be treacherous to our enemies as well as our friends, for nothing can lessen the obligation to preserve the fidelity of promise; 'This very charge of folly should make men cautious how they listen to the treacherous proposals which come from his own bosom.'—SOUTII. We may be traitorous to our country by abstaining to lend that aid which is in our power, for nothing but death can do away the obligation which we owe to it by the law of nature; 'All the evils of war must unavoidably be endured, as the necessary means to give success to the traitorous designs of the rebel.'—SOUTH. Traitorous and treasonable are both applicable to subjects; but the former is extended to all public acts; the latter only to those which affect the supreme power: a soldier is traitorous who goes over to the side of the enemy against his country; a man is guilty of treasonable practices who meditates the life of the king, or aims at subverting his government: a man may be a traitor under all forms of government; but he can be guilty of treason only in a monarchical state; 'Herod trumped up a sham plot against Hyrcanus, as if he held correspondence with Malchus King of Arabia, for accomplishing treasonable designs against him.'—PRIDEAUX

INSIDIOUS, TREACHEROUS.

Insidious, in Latin insidiosus, from insidiu strata gem or ambush, from insideo to lie in wait or ambush, signifies after the manner of a stratagem, or prone to adopt stratagems; treacherous is changed from traitorous, and derived from trado to betray, signifying in general the disposition to betray.

The insidious man is not so bad as the treacherous man; for the former only lies in wait to ensnare us, when we are off our guard; but the latter throws us off our guard, by lulling us into a state of security, in order the more effectually to get us into his power: an enemy is, therefore, denominated insidious, but a friend is treacherous. The insidious man has recourse to various little artifices, by which he wishes to effect his purpose, and gain an advantage over his opponent; the treacherous man pursues a system of direct falsehood, in order to ruin his friend: the insidious man objects to a fair and open contest; but the treacherous man assails in the dark him whom he should support. The opponents to Christianity are fond of insidious attacks upon its sublime truths, because they have not always courage to proclaim their own shame; 'Since men mark all our steps, and watch our haltings, let a sense of their insidious vigilance excite us so to behave ourselves, that they may find a conviction of the mighty power of Christianity towards regulating the passions.'—ATTERBURY. The treachery of some men depends for its success on the credulity of others; as in the case of the Trojans, who listened to the tale of Simon, the Grecian spy;

The world must think him in the wrong,
Would say he made a treach'rous use
Of wit, to flatter and seduce.—SWIFT.

TO CHEAT, DEFRAUD, TRICK.

Cheat, in Saxon cettu, in all probability comes from captum and capiō, as deceit comes from decipio; defraud, compounded of de and fraud, signifies to practise fraud, or to obtain by fraud; trick, in French tricher, German trügen, signifies simply to deceive, or get the better of any one.

The idea of deception which is common to these terms varies in degree and circumstance.

One cheats by a gross falsehood; one defrauds by a settled plan; one tricks by a sudden invention: cheating is as low in its ends, as it is base in its means; cheats are contented to gain by any means: defrauding is a serious measure; its consequences are serious, both to the perpetrator and the sufferer. A person cheats at play; he defrauds those who place confidence in him.

Cheating is not punishable by laws; it involves no other consequence than the loss of character: frauds are punished in every form, even with death, when the occasion requires; they strike at the root of all confidence, and affect the public security: tricking is a species of dexterous cheating; the means and the end are alike trifling. Dishonest people cheat; villains defraud; cunning people trick. These terms preserve the same distinction in their extended application;

If e'er ambition did my fancy cheat
With any wish so mean as to be great;
Continue, Heav'n, still from me to remove
The humble blessings of that life I love.

COWLEY.

Thou, varlet, dost thy master's gains devour,
Thou milk'st his ewes, and often twice an hour;
Of grass and fodder thou defraud'st the dams,
And of the mother's dugs the starving lambs.

DRYDEN.

He who has the character of a crafty, tricking man is entirely deprived of a principal instrument of business, trust, whence he will find nothing succeed to his wish.'—BACON.

COQUET, JILT.

There are many jilts who become so from coquets, but one may be a coquet without being a jilt. Coquetry is contented with employing little arts to excite notice; jilting extends to the violation of truth and honour, in order to awaken a passion which it afterward disappoints. Vanity is the main spring by which coquets and jilts are impelled to action; but the former indulges her propensity mostly at her own expense only, while the latter does no less injury to the peace of others than she does to her own reputation. The coquet makes a traffick of her own charms by seeking a multitude of admirers; the jilt sports with the sacred passion of love, and barters it for the gratification of any selfish propensity. Coquetry is a fault which should be guarded against by every female as a snare to her own happiness; jilting is a vice which cannot be practised without some depravity of the heart; 'The coquet is indeed one degree towards the jilt; but the heart of the former is bent upon admiring herself, and giving false hopes to her lovers; but the latter is not contented to be extremely amiable, but she must add to that advantage a certain delight in being a torment to others.'—STEELE.

TO INSNARE, ENTRAP, ENTANGLE, INVEIGLE.

The idea of getting any object artfully into one's power is common to all these terms; to insnare is to take in or by means of a snare; to entrap is to take in a trap or by means of a trap; to entangle is to take in a tangle, or by means of tangled thread; to inveigle is to take by means of making blind, from the French aveugle blind.

Insnares and entangles are used either in the natural or moral sense; entrap mostly in the natural, inveigle only in the moral sense. In the natural sense birds are ensnared by means of birdlime, nooses, or whatever else may deprive them of their liberty: men and beasts are entrapped in whatever serves as a trap or enclosure; they may be entrapped by being lured into a house or any place of confinement: all creatures are entangled by nets, or that which confines the limbs and prevents them from moving forward.

In the moral sense men are said to be ensnared by their own passions and the allurements of pleasure into a course of vice which deprives them of the use of their faculties, and makes them virtually captives; 'This lion (the literary lion) has a particular way of imitating the sound of the creature he would ensnare'—ADDISON. Men may be entrapped by promises or delusive hopes into measures which they afterward repent of;

Though the new-dawning year in its advance
With hope's gay promise may entrap the mind,
Let memory give one retrospective glance.

CUMBERLAND.

Men are entangled by their errors and imprudencies in difficulties which interfere with their moral freedom, and prevent them from acting uprightly; 'Some men weave their sophistry till their own reason is entangled.'—JOHNSON. Men are inveigled by the artifices of others, when the consequences of their own actions are shut out from their view, and they are made to walk like blind men; 'Why the inveigling of a woman before she is come to years of discretion should not be as criminal as the seducing her before she is ten years old, I am at a loss to comprehend.'—ADDISON. Insidious freethinkers make no scruple of insnaring the immature understanding by the proposal of such doubts and difficulties as shall shake their faith. When a man is entangled in the evil courses of a wicked woman, the more he plunges to get his liberty, the faster she binds him in her toils. The practice of inveigling young persons of either sex into houses of ill fame is not so frequent at present as it was in former times.

TO COAX, WHEELDE, CAJOLE, FAWN

Coax probably comes from coke a simpton, signifying to treat as a simpton; wheelde is a frequentative of wheel, signifying to come round a person with smooth art; cajole is in French cajoler; to fawn, from the noun fawn, signifies to act or move like a fawn.

The idea of using mean arts to turn people to one's selfish purposes is common to all these terms: coax has something childish in it; wheelde and cajole that which is knavish; fawn that which is servile.

The act of coaxing consists of urgent entreaty and whining supplication; the act of wheeling consists of smooth and winning entreaty; cajoling consists mostly of trickery and stratagem, disguised under a soft address and insinuating manners; the act of fawning consists of supplicant grimace and antics, such as characterize the little animal from which it derives its name; children coax their parents in order to obtain their wishes; 'The nurse had changed her note, she was nuzzling and coaxing the child; "that's a good dear," says she.'—L'ESTRANGE. The greedy and covetous wheelde those of an easy temper; 'Regulus gave his son his freedom in order to entitle him to the estate left him by his mother, and when he got into possession of it endeavoured (as the character of the man made it generally believed) to needle him out of it by the most indecent complaisance."—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny). Knaves cajole the simple and unsuspecting; 'I must grant it a just judgement upon poets, that they whose chief pretence is wit, should be treated as they themselves treat fools, that is, be cajoled with praises.'—POPE. Parasites flatter upon those who have the power to contribute to their gratification;

Unhappy he,
Who, scornful of the flatterer's fawning art,
Dreads ev'n to pour his gratitude of heart.

ARMSTRONG.

Coaxing is mostly resorted to by inferiours towards those on whom they are dependent; wheeling and cajoling are low practices confined to the baser sort of men with each other; fawning, though not less mean and disgraceful than the above-mentioned vices, is commonly practised only in the higher walks of life, where men of base character, though not mean education, come in connexion with the great.

TO ADULATE, FLATTER, COMPLIMENT.

Adulate, in Latin adulatus, participle of adulor, is changed from adoleo to offer incense; flatter, in French flatter, comes from the Latin flatus wind or air, signifying to say what is airy and unsubstantial; compliment comes from comply, and the Latin complacere, to please greatly.

We adulate by discovering in our actions an entire subserviency; we flatter simply by words expressive of an unusual admiration; we compliment by fair language or respectful civilities. An adulatory address is couched in terms of feigned devotion to the object; a flattering address is filled with the fictitious perfections of the object; a complimentary address is suited to the station of the individual and the occasion which gives rise to it; it is full of respect and deference. Courtiers are guilty of adulation; lovers are addicted to flattery; people of fashion indulge themselves in a profusion of compliments.

Adulation can never be practised without falsehood; its means are hypocrisy and lying, its end private interest; 'The servile and excessive adulation of the senate soon convinced Tiberius that the Roman spirit had suffered a total change under Augustus.'—CUMBERLAND. Flattery always exceeds the truth; it is extravagant praise dictated by an overweening partiality, or, what is more frequent, by a disingenuous temper; 'You may be sure a woman loves a man when she uses his expressions, tells his stories, or imitates his manner. This gives a secret delight; for imitation is a kind of artless flattery, and mightily favours the principle of self-love.'—SPECTATOR. Compliments are not incompatible with sincerity, unless they are dictated from a mere compliance to the prescribed rules of politeness or the momentary desire of pleasing; 'I have known a hero complimented upon the decent majesty and state he assumed after victory.'—POPE. Adulation may be fulsome, flattery gross, compliments unmeaning. Adulation inspires a person with an immoderate conceit of his own importance; flattery makes him in love with himself; compliments make him in good-humour with himself.

FLATTERER, SYCOPHANT, PARASITE.

Flatterer, v. To adulate; sycophant, in Greek συκοφαντής, signified originally an informer on the matter of figs, but has now acquired the meaning of an obsequious and servile person; parasite, in Greek παράσιτος, from παρά and σιτος corn or meat, originally referred to the priests who attended feasts, but it is now applied to a hanger-on at the tables of the great.

The flatterer is one who flatters by words; the sycophant and parasite is therefore always a flatterer, and something more, for the sycophant adopts every mean artifice by which he can ingratiate himself, and the parasite submits to every degradation and servile compliance by which he can obtain his base purpose. These terms differ more in the object than in the means: the former having general purposes of favour; and the latter particular and still lower purposes to answer. Courtiers may be sycophants in order to be well with their prince and obtain preferment, but they are seldom parasites, for the latter are generally poor and in want of a meal; 'Flatterers are the bosom enemies of princes.'—SOUTH. 'By a revolution in the state, the fawning sycophant of yesterday is converted into the austere critic of the present hour.'—BURKE.

The first of pleasures
Were to be rich myself; but next to this
I hold it best to be a parasite,
And feed upon the rich.—CUMBERLAND.

TO GLORY, BOAST, VAUNT.

To glory is to hold as one's glory; to boast is to set forth to one's advantage; to vaunt is to boast loudly. The first two terms denote the value which the individual sets upon that which belongs to himself; the last term may be applied to that which respects others as well as ourselves.

To glory is more particularly the act of the mind, the indulgence of the internal sentiment; to boast and vaunt denote rather the expression of the sentiment. To glory is applied only to matters of moment; boast is rather suitable to trifling points; vaunt is a term of less familiar use than either, being suited rather to poetry or romance. A Christian martyr glories in the cross of Christ; 'All the laymen who have exerted a more than ordinary genius in their writings, and were the glory of their times, were men whose hopes were filled with immortality.'—ADDISON. A soldier boasts of his courage and his feats in battle; 'If a man looks upon himself in an abstracted light, he has not much to boast of.'—ADDISON.

Not that great champion
Whom famous poets' verse so much doth vaunt,
And hath for twelve huge labours high extoll'd
So many furies and sharp hits did haunt.

SPENSER

Glory is but seldom used in a bad sense, and boast still seldomer in a good sense. A royalist glories in the idea of supporting his prince and the legitimate rights of a sovereign; but there are republicans and traitors who glory in their shame, and boast of the converts they make to their lawless cause. It is an unbecoming action for an individual to boast of any thing in himself; but a nation, in its collective capacity, may boast of its superiority without doing violence to decorum. An Englishman glories in the reflection of belonging to such a distinguished nation, although he would do very idly to boast of it as a personal quality; no nation can boast of so many public institutions for the relief of distress as England.

TO EVADE, EQUIVOCATE, PREVARICATE

Evade, v. To escape; equivocate, v. Ambiguity; prevaricate, in Latin prævaricatus, participle of præ and varicor to go loosely, signifies to shift from side to side.

These words designate an artful mode of escaping the scrutiny of an inquirer; we evade by artfully turning the subject or calling off the attention of the inquirer; we equivocate by the use of equivocal expressions; we prevaricate by the use of loose and indefinite expressions: we avoid giving satisfaction by evading; we give a false satisfaction by equivocating; we give dissatisfaction by prevaricating. Evading is not so mean a practice as equivocating; it may be sometimes needful to evade a question which we do not wish to answer; 'Whenever a trader has endeavoured to evade the just demands of his creditors, this hath been declared by the legislature to be an act of bankruptcy.'—BLACKSTONE. Equivocations are employed for the purposes of falsehood and interest; 'When Satan told Eve "Thou shalt not surely die," it was in his equivocation, "Thou shalt not incur present death."—BROWN (Vulgar Errors). Prevarications are still meaner; and are resorted to mostly by criminals in order to escape detection; 'There is no prevaricating with God when we are on the very threshold of his presence.'—CUMBERLAND.

EVASION, SHIFT, SUBTERFUGE.

Evasion (v. To evade) is here taken only in the bad sense; shift and subterfuge are modes of evasion: the shift signifies that gross kind of evasion by which one attempts to shift off an obligation from one's self; the subterfuge, from subter under and fugio to fly, is a mode of evasion in which one has recourse to some screen or shelter.

The evasion, in distinction from the others, is resorted to for the gratification of pride or obstinacy: whoever wishes to maintain a bad cause must have recourse to evasions; candid minds despise all evasions, 'The question of a future state was hung up in doubt, or banded between conflicting disputants through all the quirks and evasions of sophistry and logic.'—CUMBERLAND. The shift is the trick of a knave; it always serves a paltry, low purpose; he who has not courage to turn open thief, will use any shifts rather than not get money dishonestly; 'When such little shifts come once to be laid open, how poorly and wretchedly must that man needs sneak, who finds himself both guilty and baffled too.'—SOUTH. The subterfuge is the refuge of one's fears; it is not resorted to from the hope of gain, but from the fear of a loss; not for purposes of interest, but for those of character; he who wants to justify himself in a bad cause, has recourse to subterfuges;

What farther subterfuge can Turnus find?

DRYDEN.

TO ESCAPE, ELUDE, EVADE.

Escape, in French échapper, comes in all probability from the Latin exipio to take out of, to get off; elude, v. To avoid; evade, from the Latin evado, compounded of e and vado, signifies to go or get out of a thing.

The idea of being disengaged from that which is not agreeable is comprehended in the sense of all these terms; but escape designates no means by which this is effected; elude and evade define the means, namely, 'the efforts which are used by one's self: we are simply disengaged when we escape; but we disengage ourselves when we elude and evade: we escape from danger; we elude the search; our escapes are often providential, and often narrow; our success in eluding depends on our skill: there are many bad men who escape hanging by the mistake of a word; there are many who escape detection by the art with which they elude observation and inquiry;

Vice oft is hid in virtue's fair disguise,
And in her borrow'd form escapes inquiring eyes.

SPECTATOR.

It is a vain attempt
To bind the ambitious and unjust by treaties;
These they elude a thousand specious ways.

THOMSON.

'The earl Rivers had frequently inquired for his son (Savage), and had always been amused with evasive answers.'—JOHNSON.

Elude and evade both imply the practice of art; but the former consists mostly of actions, the latter of words as well as actions: a thief eludes those who are in pursuit of him by dexterous modes of concealment; he evades the interrogatories of the judge by equivocal replies. One is said to elude a punishment, and to evade a law.

AMBIGUOUS, EQUIVOCAL.

Ambiguous, in Latin ambiguus, from ambigo, compounded of ambo and ago, signifies acting both ways; equivocal, in French equivoque, Latin equivocus, composed of æquus and vox, signifies that which may be applied equally to two or more objects.

An ambiguity arises from a too general form of expression, which leaves the sense of the author indeterminate; an equivocation lies in the power of particular terms used, which admit of a double interpretation: the ambiguity leaves us in entire incertitude as to what is meant; the equivocation misleads us by the use of a term in the sense which we do not suspect.

The ambiguity may be unintentional, arising from the nature both of the words and the things; or it may be employed to withhold information respecting our views; the equivocation is always intentional, and may be employed for purposes of fraud; 'An honest man will never employ an equivocal expression; a confused man may often utter ambiguous ones without any design.'—BLAIR. The histories of heathen nations are full of confusion and ambiguity: the heathen oracles are mostly veiled by some equivocation; of this we have a remarkable instance in the oracle of the Persian mule, by which Cræsus was misled; 'We make use of an equivocation to deceive; of an ambiguity to keep in the dark.'—TRUSLER. Ambiguous may sometimes be applied to other objects besides words;

Th' ambiguous god, who rul'd her lab'ring breast,
In these mysterious words his mind express'd,
Some truths reveal'd, in terms involv'd the rest.

DRYDEN.

'The parliament of England is without comparison the most voluminous author in the world, and there is such a happy ambiguity in its works, that its students have as much to say on the wrong side of every question as upon the right.'—CUMBERLAND. The term equivocal may sometimes be employed in an indifferent sense; 'Give a man all that is in the power of the world to bestow, but leave him at the same time under some secret oppression or heaviness of heart. You bestow indeed the materials of enjoyment, but you deprive him of the ability to extract it. Hence prosperity is so often an equivocal word, denoting merely affluence of possession, but unjustly applied to the possessor.'—BLAIR.

TO AVOID, ESCHEW, SHUN, ELUDE.

Avoid, in French éviter, Latin evito, compounded of e and vito, probably from viduus void, signifies to make one's self void or free from a thing; eschew and shun both come from the German scheuen, Swedish sky, &c. when it signifies to fly; elude, in French éluder, Latin eludo, compounded of e and ludo, signifies to get one's self out of a thing by a trick.

Avoid is both generic and specific; we avoid in eschewing or shunning, or we avoid without eschewing or shunning. Various contrivances are requisite for avoiding; eschewing and shunning consist only of going out of the way, of not coming in contact; eluding, as its derivation denotes, has more of artifice in it than any of the former. We avoid a troublesome visitor under real or feigned pretences of ill health, prior engagement, and the like; we eschew evil company by not going into any but what we know to be good; we shun the sight of an offensive object by turning into another road; we elude a punishment by getting out of the way of those who have the power of inflicting it.

Prudence enables us to avoid many of the evils to which we are daily exposed; 'Having thoroughly considered the nature of this passion, I have made it my study how to avoid the envy that may accrue to me from these my speculations.'—STEELE. Nothing but a fixed principle of religion can enable a man to eschew the temptations to evil which lie in his path. This term is particularly applicable to poetry and the grave style;

Thus Brute this realm into his rule subdued,
And reign'd long in great felicity,
Lo! 't' his friends and of his foes eschew'd.

SPENSER.

Fear will lead one to shun a madman, whom it is not in one's power to bind;

Of many things, some few I shall explain;
Teach thee to shun the dangers of the main,
And how at length the promised shore to gain.

DRYDEN.

A want of all principle leads a man to elude his creditors, whom he wishes to defraud;

The wary Trojan, bending from the blow,
Eludes the death, and disappoints his foe.—POPE.

The best means of avoiding quarrels is to avoid giving offence. The surest preservative of our innocence is to eschew evil company, and the surest preservative of our health is to shun every intemperate practice. Those who have no evil design in view will have no occasion to elude the vigilance of the law.

We speak of avoiding a danger, and shunning a danger; but to avoid it is in general not to fall into it; to shun it is with care to keep out of the way of it.

TO INVENT, FEIGN, FRAME, FABRICATE, FORGE.

Invent, v. To contrive; feign, v. To feign; frame signifies to make according to a frame, fabricate, in Latin fabricatus, from faber a workman, is changed from facio, signifying to make according to art; forge, from the noun forge, signifies to make in a forge.

All these terms are employed to express the production of something out of the mind, by means of its own efforts. To invent (v. To contrive) is the general term; the other terms imply modes of invention under different circumstances. To invent, as distinguished from the rest, is busied in creating new forms, either by means of the imagination or the reflective powers; it forms combinations either purely spiritual, or those which are mechanical and physical: the poet invents imagery; the philosopher invents mathematical problems or mechanical instruments; 'Pythagoras invented the forty-seventh proposition of the first book of Euclid.'—BARTELET.

Invent is used for the production of new forms to real objects, or for the creation of unreal objects; to feign (v. To feign) is used for the creation of unreal objects, or such as have no existence but in the mind: a play or story is invented from what passes in the world; Mahomet's religion consists of nothing but inventions: the heathen poets feigned all the tales and fables which constitute the mythology, or history of their deities;

Their savage eyes turned to a modest gaze
By the sweet power of music; therefore, the poet
Did feign that Orpheus drew trees, stones, and floods.
SHAKESPEARE.

To frame, or make according to a frame, is a species of invention which consists in the disposition as well as the combination of objects. Thespis was the inventor of tragedy; Psalmannazar framed an entire new language, which he pretended to be spoken on the island of Formosa; Solon framed a new set of laws for the city of Athens;

Nature hath fram'd strange fellows in her time.
SHAKESPEARE.

To invent, feign, and frame are all occasionally employed in the ordinary concerns of life, and in a bad sense; fabricate and forge are never used any otherwise. Invent is employed as to that which is the fruit of one's own mind; to feign is employed as to that which is unreal; to frame is employed as to that which requires deliberation and arrangement; to fabricate, from faber a workman, signifying to make in a workmanlike manner, and to forge, signifying to make as in a forge, are employed as to that which is absolutely false, and requiring more or less exercise of the inventive power. A person invents a lie, and feigns sorrow; invents an excuse, and feigns an attachment. A story is invented inasmuch as it is new, and not before conceived by others, or occasioned by the suggestions of others; it is framed inasmuch as it required to be duly disposed in all its parts, so as to be consistent; it is fabricated inasmuch as it runs in direct opposition to the actual circumstances, and therefore has required the skill and labour of a workman; it is forged inasmuch as it seems by its utter falsehood and extravagance to have caused as much severe action in the brain, as what is produced by the fire in a furnace or forge; 'The very idea of the fabrication of a new government is enough to fill us with horror.'—BURKE.

As chymists gold from brass by fire would draw,
Pretexes into treason forg'd by law.—DENHAM.

FICTION, FABRICATION, FALSEHOOD.

Fiction is opposed to what is real; fabrication, as it is here understood, and falsehood are opposed to what is true. Fiction relates what may be, though not what is; fabrication and falsehood relate what is not as what is, and vice versâ. Fiction serves for amusement and instruction; fabrication and falsehood serve to mislead and deceive. Fiction and fabrication both require invention: falsehood consists of simple assertions of what is not true. The fables of Æsop are fictions of the simplest kind, but yet such as required a peculiarly lively fancy and inventive genius to produce: the fabrication of a play as the production of Shakspeare's pen, was once executed with sufficient skill to impose for a time upon the public credulity: a good memory is all that is necessary in order to avoid uttering falsehoods that can be easily contradicted and confuted. In an extended sense of the word fiction, it approaches still nearer to the sense of fabricate, when said of the fictions of the ancients, which were delivered as truth, although admitted now to be false: the motive of the narrator is what here constitutes the difference; namely, that in the former case he believes, or is supposed to believe, what he relates to be true, in the latter he knows it to be false. The heathen mythology consists principally of the fictions of the poets: newspapers commonly abound in fabrication; 'All that the Jews tell us of their twofold Messiah is a mere fiction, framed without as much as a pretence to any foundation in Scripture for it.'—PRIDEAUX. 'The translator or fabricator of Ossian's poems.'—MASON. Sometimes, however, the term fabricate may be applied to any effort of genius, without regard to the veracity of the fabricator; 'With reason has Shakspeare's superiority been asserted in the fabrication of his preternatural machines.'—CUMBERLAND.

As epithets fictitious and false are very closely allied; for what is fictitious is false, though all that is false is not fictitious: the fictitious is that which has been feigned, or falsely made by some one; the false is simply that which is false by the nature of the thing. The fictitious account is therefore the invention of an individual, whose veracity is thereby impeached; but there may be many false accounts unintentionally circulated.

UNTRUTH, FALSEHOOD, FALSITY, LIE.

An untruth is an untrue saying; a falsehood and a lie are false sayings: untruth of itself reflects no disgrace on the agent; it may be unintentional or not: a falsehood and a lie are intentional false sayings, differing only in degree as the guilt of the offender: a falsehood is not always spoken for the express intention of deceiving, but a lie is uttered only for the worst of purposes. Some persons have a habit of telling falsehoods from the mere love of talking: those who are guilty of bad actions endeavour to conceal them by lies. Children are apt to speak untruths for want of understanding the value of words; 'Above all things tell no untruth, no, not even in trifles.'—SIR HENRY SYDNEY. Travellers from a love of exaggeration are apt to introduce falsehoods into their narrations; 'Many temptations to falsehood will occur in the disguise of passions too specious to fear much resistance.'—JOHNSON. It is the nature of a lie to increase itself to a tenfold degree; one lie must be backed by many more; 'The nature of a lie consists in this, that it is a false signification knowingly and voluntarily used.'—SOUTH.

Falsehood is also used in the abstract sense for what is false. Falsity is never used but in the abstract sense, for the property of the false. The former is general, the latter particular in the application: the truth or falsehood of an assertion is not always to be distinctly proved; 'When speech is employed only as the vehicle of falsehood, every man must disunite himself from others.'—JOHNSON. The falsity of any particular person's assertion may be proved by the evidence of others;

Can you on him such falsities obtrude?
And as a mortal the Most Wise delude?
SANDYS.

TRUTH, VERACITY.

Truth belongs to the thing; veracity to the person: the truth of the story is admitted upon the veracity of the narrator; 'I shall think myself obliged for the future to speak always in truth and sincerity of heart.'—ADDISON. 'Many relations of travellers have been slighted as fabulous, till more frequent voyages have confirmed their veracity.'—JOHNSON.

TO FEIGN, PRETEND.

Feign, in Latin finco or figo, from the Greek πνυω to fix or stamp; pretend, in Latin prætendo, signifies properly to stretch before, that is, to put on the outside. These words may be used either for doing or saying. They are both opposed to what is true, but they differ from the motive of the agent. To feign is taken either in a bad or an indifferent sense; to pretend always in a bad sense. One feigns in order to gain some future end; a person feigns sickness in order to be excused from paying a disagreeable visit; one pretends in order to serve a present purpose; a child pretends to have lost his book who wishes to excuse himself for his idleness.

To feign consists often of a line of conduct; to pretend consists always of words. Ulysses feigned madness in order to escape from going to the Trojan war. According to Virgil, the Grecian Sinon pretended to be a deserter come over to the Trojan camp. In matters of speculation, to feign is to invent by force of the imagination; to pretend is to set up by force of self-conceit. It is feigned by the poets that Orpheus went down into hell and brought back Euridice his wife;

To win me from his tender arms,
Unnumber'd suitors came,
Who praise'd me for imputed charms,
And felt or feign'd a flame.—GOLDSMITH.

Infidel philosophers pretend to account for the most mysterious things in nature upon natural, or, as they please to term it, rational principles; 'An affected delicacy is the common improvement in those who pretend to be refined above others.'—STEELE.

SPURIOUS, SUPPOSITIOUS, COUNTERFEIT.

Spurious, in Latin spurius, from σπρά, because the ancients called the female spurium; hence, one who is of uncertain origin on the father's side is termed spurious; suppositious, from suppose, signifies to be supposed or conjectured, in distinction from being positively known; counterfeit, v. To imitate.

All these terms are modes of the false; the two former indirectly, the latter directly: whatever is uncertain that might be certain, and whatever is conjectural that might be conclusive, are by implication false; that which is made in imitation of another thing, so as to pass for it as the true one, is positively false. Hence, the distinction between these terms, and the ground of their applications. An illegitimate offspring is said to be spurious in the literal sense of the word, the father in this case being always uncertain; and any offspring which is termed spurious falls necessarily under the imputation of not being the offspring of the person whose name they bear. In the same manner an edition of a work is termed spurious which comes out under a false name, or a name different from that in the titlepage; 'Being to take leave of England, I thought it very handsome to take my leave also of you, and my dearly honoured mother, Oxford; otherwise both of you may have just grounds to cry me up, for a forgetful friend, she for an ungrateful son, I for some spurious issue.'—HOWELL. Suppositious expresses more or less of falsehood, according to the nature of the thing. A suppositious parent implies little less than a directly false parent; but in speaking of the origin of any thing in remote periods of antiquity, it may be merely suppositious or conjectural from the want of information; 'The fabulous tales of early British history, suppositious treatises and charters, are the proofs on which Edward founded his title to the sovereignty of Scotland.'—ROBERTSON. Counterfeit respects rather works of art which are exposed to imitation: coin is counterfeit which bears a false stamp, and every invention which comes out under the sanction of the inventor's name is likewise a counterfeit if not made by himself or by his consent;

Words may be counterfeit,
False coin'd, and current only from the tongue,
Without the mind.—SOUTHERN.

TO IMITATE, COPY, COUNTERFEIT.

The idea of taking a likeness of some object is common to all these terms; but imitate (v. To follow) is the generic, copy (v. To copy) and counterfeit (v. Spurious) the specific: to imitate is to take a general likeness; to copy, to take an exact likeness; to counterfeit, to take a false likeness: to imitate is, therefore, almost always used in a good or an indifferent sense; to copy mostly, and to counterfeit always, in a bad sense: to imitate an author's style is at all times allowable for one who cannot form a style for himself; but to copy an author's style would be a too slavish adherence even for the dullest writer. To imitate is applicable to every object, for every external object is susceptible of imitation; and in man the imitative faculty displays itself alike in the highest and the lowest matters, in works of art and in moral conduct, 'Poetry and music have the power of imitating the manners of men.'—SIR WM. JONES. To copy is applicable only to certain objects which will admit of a minute likeness being taken; thus, an artist may be said to copy from nature, which is almost the only circumstance in which copying is justifiable, except when it is a mere manual act; to copy any thing in others, whether it be their voice, their manners, their language, or their works, is inconsistent with the independence which belongs to every rational agent; 'Some imagine, that whatsoever they find in the picture of a master, who has acquired reputation, must of necessity be excellent; and never fail when they copy, to follow the bad as well as the good things.'—DRYDEN. In a general application, however, the term copy may be used in an indifferent sense;

The mind, impressive and soft, with ease
Imbibes and copies what she hears and sees.

COWPER.

To counterfeit is applicable but to few objects, and happily practicable but in few cases; we may counterfeit the coin, or we may counterfeit the person, or the character, or the voice, or the handwriting of any one for whom we would wish to pass; but if the likeness be not very exact, the falsehood is easily detected;

I can counterfeit the deep tragedian,
Speak and look big, and pry on every side.

SHAKESPEARE

TO IMITATE, MIMICK, MOCK, APE.

Imitate, v. To follow; mimick, from the Greek μῖμος, has the same origin as imitate; mock, in French moquer, Greek μωκω to laugh at; to ape signifies to imitate like an ape.

To imitate is here the general term: to mimick and to ape are both species of vicious imitation.

One imitates that which is deserving of imitation, or the contrary: one mimicks either that which is not an authorized subject of imitation, or which is imitated so as to excite laughter. A person wishes to make that his own which he imitates, but he mimicks for the entertainment of others;

Because we sometimes walk on two.
I hate the imitating crew.—GAY.

The force of example is illustrated by the readiness with which people imitate each other's actions when they are in close intercourse: the trick of mimickry is sometimes carried to such an extravagant pitch that no man, however sacred his character, or exalted his virtue, can screen himself from being the object of this species of buffonery: to ape is a serious though an absurd act of imitation;

A courtier any ape surpasses;
Behold him humbly cringing wait
Upon the minister of state.
View him soon after to inferiours
Aping the conduct of superiours.—SWIFT

To mimick is a jocose act of imitation;

Nor will it less delight th' attentive sage
T' observe that instinct which unerring guides
The brutal race which mimicks reason's love.

SOMERVILLE

To mock is an ill-natured, or at least an unmeaning, act of imitation;

What though no friends in sable weeds appear,
Grieve for an hour, perhaps, then mourn a year,
And bear about the mockery of wo
To midnight dances.—POPE.

The ape imitates to please himself, but the mimick imitates to please others. The ape seriously tries to come as near the original as he can; the mimick tries to render the imitation as ridiculous as possible: the former apes out of deference to the person aped; the latter mimicks out of contempt or disregard.

Mimickry belongs to the merry-andrew or buffoon, aping to the weakling who has no originality in himself. Show-people display their talents in mimicking the cries of birds or beasts, for the entertainment of the gaping crowd; weak and vain people, who wish to be admired for that which they have not in themselves, ape the dress, the manners, the voice, the mode of speech, and the like, of some one who is above them. Mimicry excites laughter from that which is burlesque in it; aping excites laughter from that which is absurd and unsuitable in it; mockery excites laughter from the malicious temper of those who enjoy it.

TO FOLLOW, IMITATE.

Follow, v. To follow, succeed; imitate, in Latin imitatus, participle of imitor, from the Greek μιμῶ to mimic and ἑμῶς alike, signifies to do or make alike.

Both these terms denote the regulating our actions by something that offers itself to us, or is set before us; but we follow that which is either internal or external; we imitate that only which is external: we either follow the dictates of our own minds or the suggestions of others: but we imitate the conduct of others; in regard to external objects we follow either a rule or an example; but we imitate an example only: we follow the footsteps of our forefathers; we imitate their virtues and their perfections: it is advisable for young persons to follow as closely as possible the good example of those who are older and wiser than themselves;

And I with the same greediness did seek,
As water when I thirst, to swallow Greek;
Which I did only learn that I might know
Those great examples which I follow now.

DENHAM.

It is the bounden duty of every Christian to imitate the example of our blessed Saviour to the utmost of his power; 'The imitators of Milton seem to place all the excellency of that sort of writing in the use of uncouth or antique words.'—JOHNSON.

To follow and imitate may both be applied to that which is good or bad: the former to any action; but the latter only to the behaviour or the external manners: we may follow a person in his career of virtue or vice; we imitate his gestures, tone of voice, and the like. Parents should be guarded in all their words and actions; for whatever may be their example, whether virtuous or vicious, it will in all probability be followed by their children: those who have the charge of young people should be particularly careful to avoid all bad habits of gesture, voice, or speech; as there is a much greater propensity to imitate what is ridiculous than what is becoming.

TO COPY, TRANSCRIBE.

Copy is probably changed from the Latin copia to take, because we take that from an object which we copy; transcribe, in Latin transcribo, that is, trans over and scribo, signifies literally to write over from something else, to make to pass over in writing from one body to another.

To copy respects the matter; to transcribe respects simply the act of writing. What is copied must be taken immediately from the original, with which it must exactly correspond; what is transcribed may be taken from the copy, but not necessarily in an entire state. Things are copied for the sake of getting the contents: they are often transcribed for the sake of clearness and fair writing. A copier should be very exact; a transcriber should be a good writer. Lawyers copy deeds, and have them afterward frequently transcribed as occasion requires. Transcribe is sometimes used to signify a literal copy in a figurative application; 'Aristotle tells us that the world is a copy or transcript of those ideas which are in the mind of the First Being, and that those ideas which are in the mind of man are a transcript of the world. To this we may add that words are the transcript of those ideas which are in the mind of man, and that writing or printing are the transcript of words.'—ADDISON.

COPY, MODEL, PATTERN, SPECIMEN.

Copy, from the verb to copy (v. To copy), marks either the thing from which we copy or the thing copied; model, in French modèle, Latin modulus a little mode or measure, signifies the thing that serves as a measure, or that is made after a measure; pattern, which is a variation of patron, from the French patron, Latin patronus, signifies the thing that directs; specimen, in Latin specimen, from specio to behold, signifies what is looked at for the purpose of forming our judgement by it.

* A copy and a model may be both employed either as an original work or as a work formed after an original. In the former sense, copy is used in relation to impressions, manuscripts, or writings, which are made to be copied by the printer, the writer, or the engraver: model is used in every other case, whether in morality or the arts: the proof will seldom be faulty when the copy is clear and correct. There can be no good writing formed after a bad copy, or in an extended application of the terms, the poet or the artist may copy after nature; 'Longinus has observed that the description of love in Sappho is an exact copy of nature, and that all the circumstances which follow one another in such a hurry of sentiments, notwithstanding they appear repugnant to each other, are really such as happen in the phrensies of love.'—ADDISON. No human being has ever presented us with a perfect model of virtue; the classic writers of antiquity ought to be carefully perused by all who wish to acquire a pure style, of which they contain unquestionably the best models, 'Socrates recommends to Alcibiades, as the model of his devotions, a short prayer which a Greek poet composed for the use of his friends.'—ADDISON.

Respecting these words, however, it is here farther to be observed, that a copy requires the closest imitation possible in every particular, but a model ought only to serve as a general rule: the former must be literally retraced by a mechanical process in all its lines and figures; it leaves nothing to be supplied by the judgement or will of the executor. A model often consists of little more than the outlines and proportions, while the dimensions and decorations are left to the choice of the workman. One who is anxious to acquire a fine hand will in the first instance rather imitate the errors of his copy than attempt any improvement of his own. A man of genius will not suffer himself to be cramped by a slavish adherence to any model however perfect.

In the second sense copy is used for painting, and model for relief. A copy ought to be faithful, a model ought to be just; the former should delineate exactly what is delineated by the original; the latter should adhere to the precise rules of proportion observed in the original. The pictures of Raphael do not lose their attractions even in bad copies: the simple models of antiquity often equal in value originals of modern conception.

Pattern and specimen approach nearest to model in signification: the idea of guidance or direction is prominent in them. The model always serves to guide in the execution of a work; the pattern serves either to regulate the work, or simply to determine the choice: the specimen helps only to form the opinion. The architect builds according to a certain model; 'A fault it would be if some king should build his mansion-house by the model of Solomon's palace.'—HOOKER. The mechanic makes any thing according to a pattern, or a person fixes on having a thing according to the pattern offered to him; 'A gentleman sends to my shop for a pattern of stuff; if he like it, he compares the pattern with the whole piece, and probably we bargain.'—SWIFT. The nature and value of things are estimated by the specimen shown of them; 'Several persons have exhibited specimens of this art before multitudes of beholders.'—ADDISON. A model is always some whole complete in itself; a pattern may be either a whole or the part of a whole; a specimen is always a part. Models of ships, bridges, or other pieces of mechanism are sometimes constructed for the purpose of explaining most effectually the nature and design of the invention; whenever the make, colour, or materials of any article, either of convenience or luxury, is an object of consideration, it cannot be so rightly determined by any means as by producing a similar article to serve as a pattern: a single sentence in a book may be a sufficient specimen of the whole performance.

In the moral sense pattern respects the whole conduct or behaviour; specimen only individual actions. The female who devotes her time and attention to the management of her family and the education of her offspring is a pattern to those of her sex who depute the whole concern to the care of others. A person gives but an unfortunate specimen of his boasted sincerity, who is found guilty of an evasion; 'Xenophon, in the life of his imaginary prince, whom he describes as a pattern for real ones, is always celebrating the philanthropy or good-nature of his hero.'—ADDISON. 'We know nothing of the scanty jargon of our barbarous ancestors; but we have specimens of our language when it began to be adapted to civil and religious purposes, and find it such as might naturally be expected, artless and simple.'—JOHNSON.

* Vide Girard: "Copie, modèle."

EXAMPLE, PATTERN, ENSAMPLE.

Example, in Latin exemplum, very probably changed from exsimulato and exsimulo or simulo, signifies the thing framed according to a likeness; pattern, v. Copy; ensample signifies that which is done according to a sample or example.

All these words are taken for that which ought to be followed: but the example must be followed generally; he pattern must be followed particularly, not only as to what, but how a thing is to be done: the former serves as a guide to the judgement; the latter to guide the actions. The example comprehends what is either to be followed or avoided; the pattern only that which is to be followed or copied; the ensample is a species of example, the word being employed only in the solemn style. The example may be presented either in the object itself, or the description of it; the pattern displays itself most completely in the object itself; the ensample exists only in the description. Those who know what is right should set the example of practising it; and those who persist in doing wrong, must be made an example to deter others from doing the same;

The king of men his hardy host inspires

With loud command, with great examples fires.

POPE.

Every one, let his age and station be what they may, may afford a pattern of Christian virtue; the child may be a pattern to his playmates of diligence and dutifulness; the citizen may be a pattern to his fellow-citizens of sobriety and conformity to the laws; the soldier may be a pattern of obedience to his comrades; 'The fairy way of writing, as Mr. Dryden calls it, is more difficult than any other that depends upon the poet's fancy, because he has no pattern to follow in it.'—ADDISON. Our Saviour has left us an example of Christian perfection, which we ought to imitate, although we cannot copy it: the Scripture characters are drawn as ensamples for our learning;

Sir Knight, that doest that voyage rashly take,

By this forbidden way in my despite,

Doest by other's death ensample take.—SPENSER.

EXAMPLE, PRECEDENT.

Example, v. Example; precedent, from the Latin precedens preceding, signifies by distinction that preceding which is entitled to notice.

Both these terms apply to that which may be followed or made a rule; but the example is commonly present or before our eyes; the precedent is properly something past: the example may derive its authority from the individual; the precedent acquires its sanction from time and common consent: we are led by the example, or we copy the example; we are guided or governed by the precedent. The former is a private and often a partial affair; the latter is a public and often a national concern: we quote examples in literature, and precedents in law;

O Thames! the most lov'd of all the ocean's sons,

O could I flow like thee! and make thy stream

My great example, as it is my theme.—DENHAM.

At the revolution they threw a politic veil over every circumstance which might furnish a precedent for any future departure from what they had then settled for ever.—BURKE.

EXAMPLE, INSTANCE.

Example (v. Example, pattern) refers in this case to the thing; instance, from the Latin insto, signifies that which stands or serves as a resting point.

The example is set forth by way of illustration or instruction; the instance is adduced by way of evidence or proof. Every instance may serve as an example, but every example is not an instance. The example consists of moral or intellectual objects; the instance consists of actions only. Rules are illustrated by examples;

Let me, my son, an ancient fact unfold,

A great example drawn from times of old.—POPE.

Characters are illustrated by instances; 'Many instances may be produced, from good authorities, that children actually suck in the several passions and depraved inclinations of their nurses.'—STEELE. The best mode of instructing children is by furnishing them with examples for every rule that is laid down; the Roman history furnishes us with many extraordinary instances of self-devotion for their country.

Figure, in Latin figura, from figo to feign, signifies any thing painted or feigned by the mind; metaphor, in Greek μεταφορά, from μεταφέρω to transfer, signifies a transfer of one object to another; allegory, in Greek ἀλληγορία, from ἄλλος another thing, and ἀγορεύω to relate, signifies the relation of something under a borrowed form; emblem, in Greek ἐμβλημα, from ἐμβάλλω to impress, signifies the thing stamped on as a mark; symbol, from the Greek συμβάλλω to consider attentively, signifies the thing cast or conceived in the mind, from its analogy to represent something else; type, in Greek τύπος, from τύπτω to strike or stamp, signifies an image of something that is stamped on something else.

Likeness between two objects by which one is made to represent the other, is the common idea in the signification of these terms. Figure is the most general of these terms, comprehending every thing which is figured by means of the imagination; the rest are but modes of the figure. The figure consists either in words or in things generally: we may have a figure in expression, a figure on paper, a figure on wood or stone, and the like. It is the business of the imagination to draw figures out of any thing; 'The spring bears the same figure among the seasons of the year, that the morning does among the divisions of the day, or youth among the stages of life.'—ADDISON. The metaphor and allegory consist of a representation by means of words only: the figure, in this case, is any representation which the mind makes to itself of a resemblance between objects, which is properly a figure of thought, which when clothed in words is a figure of speech: the metaphor is a figure of speech of the simplest kind, by which a word acquires other meanings besides that which is originally affixed to it; as when the term head, which properly signifies a part of the body, is applied to the leader of an army; 'No man had a happier manner of expressing the affections of one sense by metaphors taken from another than Milton.'—BURKE. The allegory is a continued metaphor when attributes, modes and actions are applied to the objects thus figured, as in the allegory of sin and death in Milton; 'Virgil has cast the whole system of Platonick philosophy, so far as regards the soul of man, into beautiful allegories.'—ADDISON.

The emblem is that sort of figure of thought by which we make corporeal objects to stand for moral properties: thus the dove is represented as the emblem of meekness, or the bee-hive is conceived to be the emblem of industry; 'The stork's the emblem of true piety.'—BEAUMONT. The symbol is that species of emblem which is converted into a constituted sign among men, thus the olive and laurel are the symbols of peace, and have been recognised as such among barbarous as well as enlightened nations; 'I need not mention the justness of thought which is observed in the generation of these symbolical persons (in Milton's allegory of sin and death).'—ADDISON. The type is that species of emblem by which one object is made to represent an other mystically; it is, therefore, only employed in religious matters, particularly in relation to the coming, the office, and the death of our Saviour; in this manner the offering of Isaac is considered as a type of our Saviour's offering himself as an atoning sacrifice

All the remarkable events under the law were types of Christ.'—BLAIR.

PARABLE, ALLEGORY.

Parable, in French parabole, Greek παραβολή from παραβάλλω signifies what is thrown out or set before one, in lieu of something which it resembles, allegory, v. Figure.

* Both these terms imply a veiled mode of speech, which serves more or less to conceal the main object of the discourse by presenting it under the appearance of something else, which accords with it in most of the particulars: the parable is mostly employed for moral purposes; the allegory in describing historical events.

The parable substitutes some other subject or agent, who is represented under a character that is suitable to the one referred to. In the allegory are introduced strange and arbitrary persons in the place of the real personages, or imaginary characteristics and circumstances are ascribed to real persons.

The parable is principally employed in the sacred writings; the allegory forms a grand feature in the productions of the eastern nations.

SIMILE, SIMILITUDE, COMPARISON.

Simile and similitude are both drawn from the Latin similis like: the former signifying the thing that is like; the latter either the thing that is like, or the quality of being like: in the former sense only it is to be compared with simile, when employed as a figure of speech or thought; every thing is a simile which associates objects together on account of any real or supposed likeness between them; but a similitude signifies a prolonged or continued simile. The latter may be expressed in a few words, as when we say the god-like Achilles; but the former enters into minute circumstances of comparison, as when Homer compares any of his heroes fighting and defending themselves against multitudes to lions who are attacked by dogs and men. Every simile is more or less a comparison, but every comparison is not a simile: the latter compares things only as far as they are alike; but the former extends to those things which are different: in this manner, there may be a comparison between large things and small, although there can be no good simile; 'There are also several noble similes and allusions in the first book of Paradise Lost.'—ADDISON. 'It has have a natural bent to solitude (to carry on the former similitude) are like waters which may be forced into fountains.'—POPE. 'Your image of worshipping once a year in a certain place, in imitation of the Jews, is but a comparison, and simile non est idem.'—JOHNSON.

LIKENESS, RESEMBLANCE, SIMILARITY, OR SIMILITUDE.

Likeness denotes the quality of being alike (v. Equal); resemblance, from resemble, compounded of re and semble, in French sembler, Latin simulo, signifies putting on the form of another thing; similarity, in Latin similaritas, from similis, in Greek ομοιότης like, from the Hebrew כִּמְלִי an image, denotes the abstract property of likeness.

Likeness is the most general, and at the same time the most familiar, term of the three; it respects either external or internal properties: resemblance respects only the external properties; similarity only the internal properties: we speak of a likeness between two persons; of a resemblance in the cast of the eye, a resemblance in the form or figure; of a similarity in age and disposition.

Likeness is said only of that which is actual; resemblance may be said of that which is apparent: the likeness consists of something specific; the resemblance may be only partial and contingent. A thing is said to be, but not to appear, like another; it may, however, have the shadow of a resemblance: whatever things are alike are alike in their essential properties; but they may resemble in a partial degree, or in certain particulars, but are otherwise essentially different. We are most like the Divine Being in the act of doing good; there is nothing existing in nature which has not certain points of resemblance with something else.

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Parable, allegorie."

Similarity, or similitude, which is a higher term, is in the moral application, in regard to likeness, what resemblance is in the physical sense: what is alike has the same nature; what is similar has certain features of similarity: in this sense feelings are alike, sentiments are alike, persons are alike; but cases are similar, circumstances are similar, conditions are similar. Likeness excludes the idea of difference; similarity includes only the idea of casual likeness;

With friendly hand I hold the glass
To all promise'ous as they pass;
Should folly there her likeness view,
I fret not that the mirror's true.—MOORE.

So, faint resemblance! on the marble tomb
The well-dissembled lover stooping stands,
For ever silent and for ever sad.—THOMSON.

'Rochefoucault frequently makes use of the antithesis, a mode of speaking the most tiresome of any, by the similarity of the periods.'—WARTON. 'As it addeth deformity to an ape to be so like a man, so the similitude of superstition to religion makes it the more deformed.'—BACON.

LIKENESS, PICTURE, IMAGE, EFFIGY

In the former article likeness is considered as an abstract term, but in connexion with the words picture and image it signifies the representation of likeness; picture, in Latin pictura, from pingo to paint, signifies the thing painted; image, in Latin imago, contracted from imitago, comes from imitor to imitate, signifying an imitation; effigy, in Latin effigies, from effingo, signifies that which was formed after another thing.

Likeness is a general and indefinite term; picture and image express something positively like. A likeness is the work of nature or art; if it be the work of man, it is sketched by the pencil, and is more or less real;

God, Moses first, then David, did inspire,
To compose anthems for his heav'nly choir;
To th' one the style of friend he did impart,
On th' other stamp'd the likeness of his heart.

DENHAM.

A picture is either the work of design or accident; it may be drawn by the pencil or the pen, or it may be found in the incidental resemblances of things; it is more or less exact;

Or else the comick muse

Holds to the world a picture of itself.—THOMSON.

The image lies in the nature of things, and is more or less striking; 'The mind of man is an image, not only of God's spirituality, but of his infinity.'—SOUTH. It is the peculiar excellence of the painter to produce a likeness; the withering and falling off of the leaves from the trees in autumn is a picture of human nature in its decline; children are frequently the very image of their parents.

A likeness is that which is to represent the actual likeness; but an effigy is an artificial or arbitrary likeness; 'I have read somewhere that one of the popes refused to accept an edition of a saint's works, which were presented to him, because the saint in his effigies before the book, was drawn without a beard.'—ADDISON. It may be represented on wood or stone, or in the figure of a person, or in the copy of the figure. Artists produce likenesses in different manners; they carve effigies, or take impressions from those that are carved. Hence any thing dressed up in the figure of a man to represent a particular person is termed his effigy.

TO CONTRIVE, DEVISE, INVENT.

Contrive, in French contriver, compounded of con and trouver, signifies to find out by putting together; devise, compounded of de and vise, in Latin visus seen, signifies to show or present to the mind; invent, in Latin inventus, participle of invenio, compounded of in and venio, signifies to come or bring into the mind.

To contrive and devise do not express so much as to invent: we contrive and devise in small matters; we invent in those of greater moment. Contriving and devising respect the manner of doing things; inventing comprehends the action and the thing itself; the former are but the new fashioning of things that already exist; the latter is, as it were, the creation of something new: to contrive and devise are intentional actions, the result of a specific effort; invention naturally arises from the exertion of an inherent power: we require thought and combination to contrive or devise; ingenuity is the faculty which is exerted in inventing;

My sentence is for open war; of wiles
More unexpert I boast not; them let those Contrive who need, or when they need, not now.
MILTON.

The briskest nectar
Shall be his drink, and all th' ambrosial cates
Art can devise for wanton appetite,
Furnish his banquet.—NAB.

'Architecture, painting, and statuary, were invented with the design to lift up human nature.'—ADDISON.

Contriving requires even less exercise of the thoughts than devising; we contrive on familiar and common occasions; we devise in seasons of difficulty and trial. A contrivance is simple and obvious to a plain understanding; a device is complex and far-fetched; it requires a ready conception and a degree of art.

Contrivances serve to supply a deficiency, or increase a convenience; devices are employed to extricate from danger, to remove an evil, or forward a scheme: the history of Robinson Crusoe derives considerable interest from the relation of the various contrivances, by which he provided himself with the first articles of necessity and comfort; the history of robbers and adventurers is full of the various devices by which they endeavour to carry on their projects of plunder, or elude the vigilance of their pursuers; the history of civilized society contains an account of the various inventions which have contributed to the enjoyment or improvement of mankind.

DEVICE, CONTRIVANCE.

These nouns, derived from the preceding verbs, have also a similar distinction.

There is an exercise of art displayed in both these actions; but the former has most of ingenuity, trick, or cunning; the latter more of deduction and plain judgement in it. A device always consists of some invention or something newly made; a contrivance mostly respects the mode, arrangement, or disposition of things. Artists are employed in conceiving devices; men in general use contrivances for the ordinary concerns.

A device is often employed for bad and fraudulent purposes; contrivances mostly serve for innocent purposes of domestick life. Beggars have various devices for giving themselves the appearance of wretchedness and exciting the compassion of the spectator. Those who are reduced to the necessity of supplying their wants commonly succeed by forming contrivances of which they had not before any conception. Devices are the work of the human understanding only; contrivances are likewise formed by animals.

Men employ devices with an intention either to deceive or to please others; 'As I have long lived in Kent, and there often heard how the Kentish men evaded the conqueror by carrying green boughs over their heads; it put me in mind of practising this device against Mr. Simper.'—STEELE. Animals have their contrivances either to supply some want or to remove some evil; 'All the temples as well as houses of the Athenians were the effects of Nestor's (the architect) study and labour, inasmuch that it was said, "Sure Nestor will now be famous; for the habitations of gods, as well as men, are built by his contrivance."'—STEELE.

TO CONCERT, CONTRIVE, MANAGE.

Concert is either a variation of consort a companion, or from the Latin concerto to debate together; contrive, from contrivi, perfect of contero to bruise together, signifies to pound or put together in the mind so as to form a composition; manage, in French me- nager, compounded of the Latin manus and ago, signifies to lead by the hand.

There is a secret understanding in concerting; invention in contriving; execution in managing. There is mostly contrivance and management in concerting; but there is not always concerting in contrivance or management. Measures are concerted; schemes are contrived; affairs are managed.

Two parties at least are requisite in concerting, one is sufficient for contriving and managing. Concerting is always employed in all secret transactions; contrivance and management are used indifferently.

Robbers who have determined on any scheme of plunder concert together the means of carrying their project into execution; 'Modern statesmen are concerting schemes and engaged in the depth of politics, at the time when their forefathers were laid down quietly to rest, and had nothing in their heads but dreams.'—STEELE. Thieves contrive various devices to elude the vigilance of the police; 'When Cæsar was one of the masters of the mint, he placed the figure of an elephant upon the reverse of the publick money: the word Cæsar signifying an elephant in the Punick language. This was artfully contrived by Cæsar; because it was not lawful for a private man to stamp his own figure upon the coin of the commonwealth.'—ADDISON. Those who have any thing bad to do manage their concerns in the dark; 'It is the great art and secret of Christianity, if I may use that phrase, to manage our actions to the best advantage.'—ADDISON.

Those who are debarred the opportunity of seeing each other unrestrainedly, concert measures for meeting privately. The ingenuity of a person is frequently displayed in the contrivances by which he strives to help himself out of his troubles. Whenever there are many parties interested in a concern, it is never so well managed as when it is in the hands of one individual suitably qualified.

DESIGN, PURPOSE, INTEND, MEAN.

Design, from the Latin designare, signifies to mark out as with a pen or pencil; purpose, like propose comes from the Latin proposui, perfect of propono signifying to set before one's mind as an object of pursuit; intend, in Latin intendo to bend towards, signifies the bending of the mind towards an object; mean, in Saxon maenen, German, &c. meinen, is probably connected with the word mind, signifying to have in the mind.

Design and purpose are terms of higher import than intend and mean, which are in familiar use; the latter still more so than the former. The design embraces many objects; the purpose consists of only one;* the former supposes something studied and methodical, it requires reflection; the latter supposes something fixed and determinate, it requires resolution. A design is attainable; a purpose is steady. We speak of the design as it regards the thing conceived; we speak of the purpose as it regards the temper of the person. Men of a sanguine or aspiring character are apt to form designs which cannot be carried into execution; whoever wishes to keep true to his purpose must not listen to many counsellors;

Jove honours me and favours my designs,
His pleasure guides me, and his will confines.
POPE

Proud as he is, that iron heart retains
His stubborn purpose, and his friends disdains.
POPE.

The purpose is the thing proposed or set before the mind; the intention is the thing to which the mind bends or inclines: purpose and intend differ therefore both in the nature of the action and the object; we purpose seriously; we intend vaguely: we set about that which we purpose; we may delay that which we have only intended: the execution of one's purpose rests mostly with one's self; the fulfilment of an intention depends upon circumstances: a man of a resolute temper is not to be diverted from his purpose by trifling objects; we may be disappointed in our intentions by a variety of unforeseen but uncontrollable events.

* Vide Trusler: "Intention, design."

Mean, which is a term altogether of colloquial use, differs but little from intend, except that it is used for more familiar objects: to mean is simply to have in the mind; to intend is to lean with the mind towards any thing.

Purpose is always applied to some proximate or definite object;

And I persuade me God hath not permitted
His strength again to grow, were not his purpose
To use him further yet.

Intend and mean to that which is general or remote; 'The gods would not have delivered a soul into the body, which hath arms and legs, instruments of doing, but that it were intended the mind should employ them.'—SIDNEY.

And life more perfect have attain'd than fate
Meant me, by venturing higher than my lot.

MILTON.

We purpose to set out at a certain time or go a certain route; we mean to set out as soon as we can, and go the way that shall be found most agreeable; the moralist designs by his writings to effect a reformation in the manners of men: a writer purposes to treat on a given subject in some particular manner; it is ridiculous to lay down rules which are not intended to be kept; an honest man always means to satisfy his creditors.

Design and purpose are taken sometimes in the abstract sense; intend and mean always in connexion with the agent who intends or means: we see a design in the whole creation, which leads us to reflect on the wisdom and goodness of the Creator; whenever we see any thing done we are led to inquire the purpose for which it is done; or are desirous of knowing the intention of the person for so doing: things are said to be done with a design, in opposition to that which happens by chance; they are said to be done for a purpose, in reference to the immediate purpose which is expected to result from them. Design, when not expressly qualified by a contrary epithet, is used in a bad sense in connexion with a particular agent; purpose, intention, and meaning in an indifferent sense: a designing person is full of latent and interested designs;

His deep design unknown, the hosts approve
Atides' speech.—POPE.

There is nothing so good that it may not be made to serve the purposes of those who are bad;

Change this purpose,
Which, being so horrible, so bloody, must Lead on to some foul issue.

The intentions of a man must always be taken into the account when we are forming an estimate of his actions; 'I wish others the same intention and greater successes.'—TEMPLE. Ignorant people frequently mean much better than they do.

Nothing can evince greater depravity of mind than designedly to rob another of his good name; when a person wishes to get any information he purposely directs his discourse to the subject upon which he desires to be informed; if we unintentionally incur the displeasure of another, it is to be reckoned our misfortune rather than our fault; it is not enough for our endeavours to be well meant, if they be not also well directed;

Then first Polydamus the silence broke,
Long weigh'd the signal, and to Hector spoke:
How oft, my brother! thy reproach I hear,
For words well meant and sentiments sincere.

POPE.

DESIGN, PLAN, SCHEME, PROJECT.

Design, v. To design; plan, in French plan, comes from plane or plain, in Latin planus, smooth or even, signifying in general any plane place, or in particular the even surface on which a building is raised; and by an extended application the sketch of the plane surface of any building or object; scheme, in Latin schemata, Greek σχῆμα the form or figure, signifies the thing drawn out in the mind; project, in Latin projectus, from *pro*ficto, compounded of pro and jacio, signifies so cast or put forth, that is, the thing proposed.

Arrangement is the idea common to these terms:

the design includes the thing that is to be brought about; the plan includes the means by which it is to be brought about: a design was formed in the time of James I. for overturning the government of the country; the plan by which this was to have been realized, consisted in placing gunpowder under the parliament-house and blowing up the assembly; 'Is he a prudent man, as to his temporal estate, that lays designs only for a day without any prospect to the remaining part of his life?'—TILLOTSON. 'It was at Marseilles that Virgil formed the plan, and collected the materials, of all those excellent pieces which he afterward finished.'—WALSH.

A design is to be estimated according to its intrinsic worth; a plan is to be estimated according to its relative value, or fitness for the design: a design is noble or wicked; a plan is practicable: every founder of a charitable institution may be supposed to have a good design; but he may adopt an erroneous plan for obtaining the end proposed.

Scheme and project respect both the end and the means, which makes them analogous to design and plan: the design stimulates to action; the plan determines the mode of action: the scheme and project consist most in speculation: the design and plan are equally practical, and suited to the ordinary and immediate circumstances of life: the scheme and project are contrived or conceived for extraordinary or rare occasions: no man takes any step without a design; a general forms the plan of his campaign; adventurous men are always forming schemes for gaining money; ambitious monarchs are full of projects for increasing their dominions;

The happy people in their waxen cells
Sat tending public cares, and planning schemes
Of temperance for winter poor.—THOMSON.

'Manhood is led on from hope to hope, and from project to project.'—JOHNSON.

Scheme and project differ principally in the magnitude of the objects to which they are applied; the former being much less vast and extensive than the latter: a scheme may be formed by an individual for attaining any trifling advantage; projects are mostly conceived in matters of state, or of public interest; the metropolis abounds with persons whose inventive faculties are busy in devising schemes, either of a commercial, a literary, a philosophical, or political description, by which they propose great advantages to the public, but still greater to themselves; the project of universal conquest which entered into the wild speculations of Alexander the Great, did not, unfortunately for the world, perish at his death.

TO PURPOSE, PROPOSE.

We purpose (v. To design) that which is near at hand, or immediately to be set about; we propose that which is more distant: the former requires the setting before one's mind, the latter requires deliberation and plan. We purpose many things which we never think worth while doing; but we ought not to propose any thing to ourselves, which is not of too much importance to be lightly adopted or rejected. We purpose to go to town on a certain day;

When listening Philomela deigns
To let them joy, and purposes in thought
Elate to make her night excel their day.

THOMSON.

We propose to spend our time in a particular study 'There are but two plans on which any man can propose to conduct himself through the dangers and distresses of human life.'—BLAIR.

INTENT, INTENSE.

Intent and intense are both derived from the verb to intend, signifying to stretch towards a point, or to a great degree: the former is said only of the person or mind; the latter qualifies things in general: a person is intent when his mind is on the stretch towards an object; his application is intense when his mind is for a continuance closely fixed on certain objects: cold is intense when it seems to be wound up to its highest pitch; 'There is an evil spirit continually active and intent to seduce.'—SOUTH. 'Mutual favours naturally beget an intense affection in generous minds.'—SPECTATOR.

SAKE, ACCOUNT, REASON, PURPOSE, END.

These terms, all employed adverbially, modify or connect propositions: hence, one says, for his sake, on his account, for this reason, for this purpose, and to this end.

Sake, which comes from the word to seek, is mostly said of persons; what is done for a person's sake is the same as because of his seeking or at his desire; one may, however, say in regard to things, for the sake of good order, implying what good order requires: account is indifferently employed for persons or things; what is done on a person's account is done in his behalf, and for his interest; what is done on account of indisposition is done in consequence of it, the indisposition being the cause: reason, purpose, and end are applied to things only: we speak of the reason as the thing that justifies; we explain why we do a thing when we say we do it for this or that reason: we speak of the purpose and the end by way of explaining the nature of the thing: the propriety of measures cannot be known unless we know the purpose for which they were done; nor will a prudent person be satisfied to follow any course, unless he knows to what end it will lead.

EXPEDIENT, RESOURCE.

The expedient is an artificial means; the resource is a natural means: a cunning man is fruitful in expedients; a fortunate man abounds in resources: Robinson Crusoe adopted every expedient in order to prolong his existence, at a time when his resources were at the lowest ebb; 'When there happens to be any thing ridiculous in a visage, the best expedient is for the owner to be pleasant upon himself.'—STEELE. 'Since the accomplishment of the revolution, France has destroyed every resource of the state which depends upon opinion.'—BURKE.
